

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LIST OF COINS ENGRAVED IN THE SECOND VOLUME.

In the following list AV indicates that the coin is of gold, AR of silver, AE of copper, 1Æ first bronze Roman, 2Æ second bronze Roman, 3Æ third bronze Roman. The weight of all gold and silver coins is given, with the exception of the aurei and denarii, which are for the most part of nearly the same weight respectively. When a coin has been reduced or enlarged in the drawing, the diameter of the original coin is given in the last column, the numbers in which refer to the subjoined scale: those which have no numbers affixed to them are of the same size in the drawing as the originals.

A DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN BIOGRAPHY AND MYTHOLOGY.

EBION.

EA'RINUS, FLA'VIUS, a favourite eunuch of the emperor Domitian, in praise of whose beauty there are several epigrams of Martial, and a poem of Statius. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 2; Mart. Epigr. ix. 12, 13, 14, 17, 18; Stat. Silv. iii. 4.)

EBION ('Εβίων), the real or supposed founder of the sect of Christians called Ebionites, by which name, at least after the time of Irenaeus, were designated all those who, though professing Christ's religion, thought it necessary to continue the observance of the Mosaic law. The Ebionite doctrine therefore was a mere engrafting of Judaism upon Christianity. Generally speaking, the followers of this sect considered our Lord as a man chosen by God to the office of Messiah, and furnished with the divine power necessary for its fulfilment at the time of his baptism, which rite was performed by John, as the representative of Elijah. They insisted on the necessity of circumcision, regarded the earthly Jerusalem as still God's chosen city, and denounced St. Paul as a latitudinarian and a heretic. (See, for the latter statement, Orig. Jerem. Homil. xviii. 12.) It is, however, very difficult to distinguish accurately the various shades of these opinions, or to state at what time any particular form of them was prevalent. Irenaeus certainly confounded varieties of opinion almost sufficient to constitute their holders two distinct sects, whereas Origen (c. Cels. v. 61) divides the Ebionites into two classes, those who denied our Lord's miraculous conception, and those who allowed it; the latter admission of course implying, that the peculiar operation of the Holy Spirit on the man Jesus developed itself from the very commencement of his life, instead of first beginning to act at the particular time of his consecration to the Messianic mission. The first traces of Ebionism are doubtless to be found in the New Testament, where we recognize this doctrine as that of the Judaizing teachers in Galatia (Gal. iii. 1, &c.), the deniers of St. Paul's apostleship at Corinth (2 Cor. xi. 5, &c.), the heretics opposed in the Epistle to the Colossians, and perhaps of those mentioned by St. John. (1 Joh. ii. 18, on which see Lücke, Commentar über die Briefe des Evang. Johannes.) The "Clementines," a collection of homilies embodying these views, are probably a work of the 2nd century; and we find that the sect was flourishing in the time of Jerome (A. D. cir. 400), though with its opinions much modified and Christianized, inasmuch as it did not desire to force the ceremonial law upon the Gentiles, and fully admitted the authority of St. Paul. It is needless to trace its progress farther, for in fact Ebionism is only the type of a system which, in different forms, and adapted to various circumstances, has reappeared from time to time in almost all ages of the Church. With regard to Ebion himself, his existence is very doubtful. The first person who asserts it is Tertullian, who is followed by Augustine, Jerome, Epiphanius, and Theodoret. The latter, however (Haer. Fab. ii. 218), after saying, ταύτης τῆς φάλαγγος ἤρξεν Ἐβίων, adds, τὸν πτωχὸν δὲ οὕτως οἱ Ἑβραῖοι προσκαγορεύουσιν, which may be compared with the derivation given for the name of the sect by Origen (contr. Cels. ii. 1), who considers it formed from the Hebrew word Ebion, poor, and knows of no such person as the supposed founder Ebion. Modern writers, especially Matter (Histoire du Gnosticisme, vol. ii. p. 320) and Neander (in an appendix to his Genetische Entwicklung der vornehmsten Gnostische Systeme, Berlin, 1818, and also in his Kirchengeschichte, i. p. 612, &c.) deny Ebion's existence; though Lightfoot says, that he is mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud as one of the founders of sects. The authorities on both sides of the question are given by Burton. (Bampton Lectures, note 80.) If we reject the existence of Ebion, we must adopt Origen's derivation, though not with the explanation which he suggests, that it refers to the poverty of the Ebionite creed; for such a name could not have been chosen by themselves, since it would have been in that sense a reproach; nor given by the Christians of Gentile origin, who would not have chosen a title of Hebrew derivation. It is better to suppose that the name Ebionites was originally applied to an ascetic sect, and gradually extended to all the Judaizing Christians. For some of the ascetic Ebionites thought it wrong to possess anything beyond that which was absolutely necessary for their daily subsistence, holding that the present world, not in its abuse, but in its very nature, is the exclusive domain of Satan. This is Neander's explanation. [G. E. L. C.]

EBURNUS, an agnomen of Q. Fabius Maximus, who was consul in B. C. 116. [MAXIMUS.]

ECDEMUS. [DEMOPHANES.]

ECDICUS (Ἐδικός), a Lacedaemonian, was sent out with eight ships, in A. C. 391, to put down the democratic party in Rhodes. On his arrival however at Cnidus, he found that the forces of his opponents doubled his own, and he was therefore obliged to remain inactive. The Lacedaemonians, when they heard that he was not in a condition to effect anything, sent Teletius with a larger armament to supersede him. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 20—23; comp. Diod. xiv. 79, 97.) [E. E.]

ECEBO'LIUS (Ἐκβελλίος), a sophist of Constantinople, who in the reign of Constantine the Great pretended to be a Christian, but afterwards, in the time of the emperor Julian, conducted himself as a zealous pagan. (Suid. s. v.; Socrat. H. E. iii. 13.) [L. S.]

ECECHEIR'IA (Ἐκεχειρία), that is, the armistice or truce, which was personified and represented as a divine being at the entrance of the temple of Zeus at Olympia; there was a statue of Iphitua, which Ececheiria was in the act of crowning. (Paus. v. 10. § 3, 26. § 2.) [L. S.]

ECHECLUS (Ἐχέκλος), a son of Agenor, who was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xx. 473; Paus. x. 27.) A Trojan of the same name occurs in the Iliad. (xvi. 692.) [L. S.]

ECHECRATES (Ἐχεκράτης). 1. A Thessalian, was one of those whom the ministers of Ptolemy Philopator, when they were preparing for war with Antiochus the Great in B. C. 219, employed in the levying of troops and their arrangement into separate companies. He was entrusted with the command of the Greek forces in Ptolemy's pay, and of all the mercenary cavalry, and did good service in the war, especially at the battle of Raphia in B. C. 217. (Polyb. v. 63, 65, 82, 85.)

2. Son of Demetrius of Cyrene by Olympias of Larissa, and brother of Antigonus Dionaea. He had a son named Antigonus after his uncle. (Liv. xl. 54; see vol. i. pp. 187, 189, b.) [E. E.]

ECHECRATES (Ἐχεκράτης), the name of three Pythagorean philosophers, mentioned by Iamblichus. (Vit. Pyth. ad fin.)

1. A Locrian, one of those to whom Plato is said to have gone for instruction. (Cic. de Fin. v. 29.) The name Coetus in Valerius Maximus (viii. 7, Ext. 3) is perhaps an erroneous reading for Echebrates.

2. A Tarentine, probably the same who is mentioned in Plat. Ep. 9.

3. Of Phlius, was contemporary with Aristoxenus the Peripatetic. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 46; comp. Gell. iv. 11; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. p. 861.) [E. E.]

ECHECRATIDES (Ἐχεκράτιδης), a Peripatetic philosopher, who is mentioned among the disciples of Aristotle. He is spoken of only by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Μέθυμνα), from whom we learn that he was a native of Methymna in Lesbos.

Several other persons of this name, concerning whom nothing is known beyond what is contained in the passages where they occur, are mentioned by Thucydides (i. 111). Pausanias (x. 16. § 4), Aelian (V. H. i. 25), Lucian (Timon, 7), and by Anyte in the Greek Anthology. (vi. 123.) [L. S.]

ECHEDEMUS [Echeemus.]

ECHEDEMUS (Ἐχέδημος), the chief of the Athenian embassy which was sent, in B. C. 190, to meet Publius and Lucius Scipio at Anphissa, and to obtain peace for the Aetolians. When the consul Lucius refused to recede from the hard terms which had been already proposed by the senate, the Aetolians, by the advice of Echedemus, applied for and obtained a truce of six months, that they might again send ambassadors on the subject to Rome. (Polyb. xxi. 2, 3; Liv. xxviii. 6, 7.) [E. E.]

ECHE'MBROTUS (Ἐχέμβροτος), an Arcadian flute-player (αὐλοδότης), who gained a prize in the Pythian games about Ol. 48. 3 (B. C. 586), and dedicated a tripod to the Theban Hercules, with an inscription which is preserved in Pausanias (x. 7. § 3), and from which we learn that he won the prize by his melic poems and elegies, which were sung to the accompaniment of the flute. [L. S.]

ECHE'MENES (Ἐχεμένης), is mentioned by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 601) as the author of Κρητικά, from which a statement relating to the mythical history of Crete is there quoted. Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 436, ed. Westerm.) proposes to read in Fulgentius (Mythol. i. 14), Echemenes for Euxemenes, who is there spoken of as the author of Μυθολογούμενα, of which the first book is quoted. But this conjecture is without support. [L. S.]

ECHEMON (Ἐχέμων), a son of Priam, who was killed, with his brother Chromius, by Diomedes. (Hom. Il. v. 160; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

E'CHEMUS (Ἐχεμος), a son of Aeporus and grandson of Cepheus, succeeded Lycurgus as king of Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 4. § 7.) He was married to Timandra, a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 6.) In his reign the Dorians invaded Peloponnesus, and Echemus succeeded in slaying, in single combat, Hyllus, the son of Hercules. (Paus. viii. 5. § 1, 45. § 2; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. x. 79.) The fight was believed to have occurred on the frontier, between Corinth and Megara, and in the latter place Hyllus was buried. (Paus. i. 41. § 3, 44. § 14.) After the fall of Hyllus the Heracleidae were obliged to promise not to repeat their attempts upon Peloponnesus within the next fifty or hundred years, and the Tegeatans were honoured with the privilege of commanding one wing of the Peloponnesian army, whenever the inhabitants of the peninsula undertook an expedition against a foreign enemy. (Herod. ix. 26; Diod. iv. 58.) The fight of Echemus and Hyllus was represented on the tomb of Echemus at Tegea. (Paus. viii. 53. § 5.) According to Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἐκαδήμεια) Echemus accompanied the Dioscuri in their expedition to Attica, whereas Plutarch (Thes. 32) calls the Arcadian companions of the Dioscuri Echedemus and Marathus. [L. S.]

ECHENE'US (Ἐχένης), the eldest among the nobles of Alcinoüs in the island of the Phaeacians. (Hom. Od. vii. 155, xi. 341.) [L. S.]

ECHEPHRON (Ἐχέφρων). 1. A son of Hercules and Psophia, the daughter of Xanthus or Eryx. He was twin-brother of Promachus, and both had a heroum at Paophis. (Paus. viii. 24. §§ 1, 3.)

2. A son of Nestor by Eurydice or Anaxibia. (Hom. Od. iii. 413; Apollod. i. 9. § 9.) A third Echepron is mentioned in Apollodorus. (iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

ECHEPHY'LLIDES (Ἐχεφυλλίδης), a grammarian or historian, who is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Σφακτρία), and by the Scholiast on Plato's Phaedon (p. 389). [L. S.]

ECHRO'POLUS (Ἐχέπωλος). The Homeric

poems mention two personages of this name, the one a Trojan, who was slain by Antilochus (Il. iv. 457, &c.), and the other a Sicyonian, who made Agamemnon a present of the mare Aethre, in order not to be obliged to accompany him to Troy. (Il. xiii. 293, &c.) [L. S.]

ECHESTRATUS ('Εχέστρατος), son of Agis I., and third of the Agid line of Spartan kings. In his reign the district of Cynuria on the Argive border was reduced. He was the father of Labotas or Leobotes, king of Sparta. (Paus. iii. 2. § 2; Herod. vii. 204.) [A. H. C.]

ECHETIMUS ('Εχέτιμος), of Sicyon, was the husband of Nicagora, who was believed to have brought the image of Asclepius, in the form of a dragon, from Epidaurus to Sicyon, on a car drawn by mules. (Paus. ii. 10. § 3.) [L. S.]

ECHETLUS ('Εχέτλος), a mysterious being, about whom the following tradition was current at Athens. During the battle of Marathon there appeared among the Greeks a man, who resembled a rustic, and slew many of the barbarians with his plough. After the battle, when he was searched for, he was not to be found anywhere, and when the Athenians consulted the oracle, they were commanded to worship the hero Echethlus, that is the hero with the ἑχέτλην, or ploughshare. Echethlus was to be seen in the painting in the Poecile, which represented the battle of Marathon. (Paus. i. 15. § 4, 32. § 4.) [L. S.]

ECHETUS ('Εχέτος), a cruel king of Epeirus, who was the terror of all mortals. He was a son of Euchenor and Phlogaea. His daughter, Metope or Amphissa, who had yielded to the embraces of her lover Aechmodicus, was blinded by her father, and Aechmodicus was cruelly mutilated. Echetus further gave his daughter iron barleycorns, promising to restore her sight, if she would grind them into flour. (Hom. Od. xviii. 83, &c., xxi. 307; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1093; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1839.) [L. S.]

ECHIDNA ('Εχίδνα), a daughter of Tartarus and Ge (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2), or of Chrysaor and Callirrhoe (Hesiod. Theog. 295), and according to others again, of Peiras and Styx. (Paus. viii. 18. § 1.) Echidna was a monster, half maiden and half serpent, with black eyes, fearful and blood-thirsty. She was the destruction of man, and became by Typhon the mother of the Chimaera, of the many-headed dog Orthus, of the hundred-headed dragon who guarded the apples of the Hesperides, of the Colchian dragon, of the Sphinx, Cerberus, Scylla, Gorgon, the Lernaean Hydra, of the eagle which consumed the liver of Prometheus, and of the Nemean lion. (Hes. Theog. 307, &c.; Apollod. ii. 3. § 1, 5. §§ 10, 11, iii. 5. § 8; Hygin. Fab. Praef. p. 3, and Fab. 151.) She was killed in her sleep by Argus Panoptes. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.) According to Hesiod she lived with Typhon in a cave in the country of the Arimi, whereas the Greeks on the Euxine conceived her to have lived in Scythia. When Hercules, they said, carried away the oxen of Geryones, he also visited the country of the Scythians, which was then still a desert. Once while he was asleep there, his horses suddenly disappeared, and when he woke and wandered about in search of them, he came into the country of Hylaea. He there found the monster Echidna in a cave. When he asked whether she knew anything about his horses, she answered, that they were in her own possession, but that she would not give them up, unless he would consent to stay with her for a time. Hercules complied with the request, and became by her the father of Agathyrus, Gelonus, and Scythes. The last of them became king of the Scythians, according to his father's arrangement, because he was the only one among the three brothers that was able to manage the bow which Hercules had left behind, and to use his father's girdle. (Herod. iv. 8—10.) [L. S.]

ECHINADES, [ACHELOUS.]

ECHION ('Εχίων). 1. One of the five surviving Spartans that had grown up from the dragon's teeth, which Cadmus had sown. (Apollod. iii. 4. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 178; Ov. Met. iii. 126.) He was married to Agave, by whom he became the father of Pentheus. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 2.) He is said to have dedicated a temple of Cybele in Boeotia, and to have assisted Cadmus in the building of Thebes. (Ov. Met. x. 686.)

2. A son of Hermes and Antianeira at Alope. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollon. Rhod. i. 56.) He was a twin-brother of Erytus or Eurytus, together with whom he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts, in which, as the son of Hermes, he acted the part of a cunning spy. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 179; Ov. Met. viii. 311; comp. Orph. Argon. 134, where his mother is called Laethoe.) A third personage of this name, one of the giants, is mentioned by Claudian. (Gigant. 104.) [L. S.]

ECHION, a painter and statuary, who flourished in the 107th Olympiad (B. C. 352). His most noted pictures were the following: Father Liber; Tragedy and Comedy; Semiramis passing from the state of a handmaid to that of a queen, with an old woman carrying torches before her; in this picture the modesty of the new bride was admirably depicted. He is ranked by Pliny and Cicero with the greatest painters of Greece, Apelles, Melanthius, and Nicomachus. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19; xxxv. 7. s. 32; 10. s. 36. § 9.) The picture in the Vatican, known as "the Aldobrandini Marriage," is supposed by some to be a copy from the "Bride" of Echion. (Kugler, Handbuch d. Kunstgesch. p. 236; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst. § 140, 3.) Hirt supposes that the name of the painter of Alexander's marriage, whom Lucian praises so highly, ΑΞΙΩΝ, is a corruption of Echion. (Gesch. d. Bild. Künste, pp. 265—268.) [P. S.]

ECHIUS ('Εχιος.) Two mythical personages of this name occur in the Iliad; the one a Greek and a son of Mecisteus, was slain by Polites (viii. 333, xv. 339), and the other, a Trojan, was slain by Patroclus. (xvi. 416.) [L. S.]

ECHO ('Ηχώ), an Oreade, who when Zeus was playing with the nymphs, used to keep Hera at a distance by incessantly talking to her. In this manner Hera was not able to detect her faithless husband, and the nymphs had time to escape. Hera, however, found out the deception, and she punished Echo by changing her into an echo, that is, a being with no controul over its tongue, which is neither able to speak before anybody else has spoken, nor to be silent when somebody else has spoken. Echo in this state fell desperately in love with Narcissus, but as her love was not returned, she pined away in grief, so that in the end there remained of her nothing but her voice. (Ov. Met. iii. 356—401.) There were in Greece certain porticoes, called the Porticoes of Echo, on account of the echo which was heard there; thus, there was one stoa at Hermione with a threefold, and one at Olympia with a sevenfold echo. (Paus. ii. 35. § 6, v. 21. § 7.) Compare Wieseler, Die Nymphen Echo: eine kunsthistorische Abhandlung, Göttingen, 1844. [L. S.]

ELECTUS or ELECTUS, originally, it would appear, the freedman of L. Verus, after whose death he enjoyed the protection of M. Aurelius, became subsequently the chamberlain of Ummidius Quadratus, and after his destruction was chosen to fill the same office in the household of Commodus. The circumstances under which Electus, in conjunction with Laetus and Marcia, contrived the death of the tyrant and then forced the vacant throne upon Pertinax, along with whom he eventually perished are described elsewhere. [COMMODUS; LAETUS; MARCIA; PERTINAX.]

(Capitolin. Ver. 9, expressly declares that the Electus who was the freedman of Verus was the individual who murdered Commodus, while in Dion Cassius, lxxii. 4, he is first introduced as the chamberlain of Quadratus. See also Dion Cass. lxxii. 19, 22, lxxiii. 1; Capitolin. Pertin. 4, 11; Herodian, i. 51, &c., ii. 1; Zonar. xii. 5.) [W. R.]

Q. ECLGIUS or EULOGIUS. According to the commonly received text of Suetonius (Vitell. 1), Q. Eclgius or Eulogius was the author of a little work on the history and genealogy of the Vitellii, in which the origin of the family was traced from Faunus, king of the Aborigines. It must be remarked, however, that the existence of a writer bearing this appellation depends upon a conjectural emendation of Casaubon, who supposes that his name at full length was Q. Vitellius Eclgius or Eulogius, and that he was a freedman of the emperor whose pedigree he investigated. [W. R.]

ECPHANTIDES (Ἐκφαντίδης), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, flourished after Magnes, and a little before Cratinus and Telecleides. (Näke, Choerilus, p. 52.) He is called by Aspasius (ad Aristot. Eth. Nicom. iv. 2) τῶν ἀρχαίων παραδιδόντων ποιητῶν, which words some writers understand as implying that he was older than Chionides and Magnes. But we have the clear testimony of Aristotle (Poet. v. 3), that all the poets before Magnes furnished their choruses at their own expense, whereas the name of a person who was choragus for Ecphantides is mentioned also by Aristotle. (Pol. viii. 6.) Again, a certain Androcles, to whom Cratinus and Telecleides often refer, was also attacked by Ecphantides, who could not, therefore, have flourished long before those poets. (Schol. Aristoph. Vesp. 1182.) The date of Ecphantides may be placed about Ol. 80 (B. C. 460), and onwards. The meaning of the surname of Karvías, which was given to Ecphantides by his rivals, has been much disputed, but it seems to imply a mixture of subtlety and obscurity. He ridiculed the rudeness of the old Megarian comedy, and was himself ridiculed on the same ground by Cratinus, Aristophanes, and others. (Hesych. s. v. Karvías; Schol. Aristoph. Vesp. 151; Näke, Choeril. p. 52; Lehrs, Quaest. Epic. p. 23; Meineke, p. 36.)

There is only one certain title of a play by Ecphantides extant, namely, the Σάρπη, a line of which is preserved by Athenaeus (iii. p. 96, b., c.). Another play, Πύραυρος, is ascribed to him by Näke on conjectural grounds; but Meineke ascribes it to Antiphanes. Another title, Διδυμοί, is obtained by Näke from a comparison of Suidas (s. v. Εἰλίε) with Hephæstion (xv. 13, p. 96, Gaisf.; see Gaisford's note). Ecphantides was said to have been assisted in composing his plays by his slave CHORILUS. [P. S.]

E'DECON (Ἐδεκόν), an Iberian chief, called Edeco by Livy. He came to Scipio at Tarraco, in B. C. 209, and offered to surrender himself "to the faith of the Romans," requesting, at the same time, that his wife and children, who were among the hostages that had fallen into Scipio's hands at the capture of New Carthage, might be restored to him. Scipio granted his prayer, and thereby greatly increased the Roman influence in Spain.

Edecon was the first chief who, after the retreat of Hasdrubal to the Pyrenees, saluted Scipio as king,—a homage which the latter knew better than to accept. (Polyb. x. 34, 35, 40; Liv. xxvii. 17, 19.) [E. E.]

EDO'NUS (Ἐδώνος), the mythical ancestor of the Edones in Thrace. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐδωνοί.) The name is therefore used also in the sense of "Thracian," and as Thrace was one of the principal seats of the worship of Dionysus, it further signifies "Dionysiac" or "Bacchantic." (Ov. Rem. Am. 593; Hor. Carm. ii. 7. 27.) [L. S.]

EDU'LICA or EDUSA, a Roman divinity, who was worshipped as the protectress of children, and was believed to bless their food, just as Potina and Cuba blessed their drinking and their sleep. (Augustin, de Civ. Dei, iv. 11; Varro, ap. Non. p. 108; Arnob. iii. 25; Donat. ad Terent. Phorm. i. 1, 11.) [L. S.]

ERIBOEAE. [ERIBOEAE.]

EETION (Ἠτίων), a king of the Placian Thebe in Cilicia, and father of Andromache and Podes. (Hom. Il. vi. 396, xvii. 575.) He and seven of his sons were slain by Achilles (Il. vi. 415, &c.), who proposed the mighty iron ball, which Eëtion had once thrown, and which had come into the possession of Achilles, as one of the prizes at the funeral games of Patroclus. (Il. xxiii. 826, &c.) Among the booty which Achilles made in the town of Eëtion, we find especial mention of the horse Pedasus and the phorminx with a silver neck, on which Achilles played in his tent. (Il. xv. 153, ix. 186.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Il. xxi. 40, &c.; Paus. ii. 4. § 4.) [L. S.]

EGE'RIA. [AEGERIA.]

EGE'RIUS, the son of Aruns, who was the brother of L. Tarquinius Priscus [ARUNS, No. 1], was born after the death of his father; and as Demaratus, the father of Aruns, died shortly after the death of his son without knowing that his daughter-in-law was pregnant, none of his property was left to Egerius, from which circumstance, according to the legend, he derived his name. When the town of Collatia was taken by his uncle Tarquinius Priscus, Egerius was left in command of the place, and henceforth received, according to Dionysius, the surname of Collatinus (though this name is usually confined to his son L. Tarquinius Collatinus). Egerius was afterwards sent against Fidenæ in command of the allied forces of Rome. [COLLATINUS.] (Liv. i. 34, 38; Dionys. iii. 50, 57, comp. iv. 64.)

EGESI'NUS. [HOKSINUS.]

EGESTA. [ACESTES.]

L. EGI'LIVS, one of the three commissioners who superintended the foundation of the colony planted at Luca, B. C. 177. (Liv. xli. 17.) [C. P. M.]

EGNATIA GENS, a family of Samnite origin, some at least of whom settled at Teanum. At the end of the social war the greater part of these appear to have removed to Rome, where two of them were admitted into the senate (Cic. pro Cluent. 48), though a branch of the family seems still to have remained at Teanum. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1, mentions one Egnatius Sidicinus.) We find the following surnames borne by members of this gens: CRELLER, MAXIMUS, RUFUS, and VERATIUS. [C. P. M.]

EGNATIA MAXIMILLA, a descendant of that branch of the Egnatia gens which bore the surname of Maximus, is mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 71) as the wife of Glicius Gallus, who was banished by the emperor Nero. She accompanied her husband in his exile. [C. P. M.]

EGNATIUS. 1. GELLIUS EGNATIUS, was leader of the Samnites in the third great Samnite war, which broke out B. C. 298. By the end of the second campaign, the Samnites appeared entirely subdued; but in the following year Gellius Egnatius marched into Etruria, notwithstanding the presence of the Romans in Samnium, and roused the Etruscans to a close co-operation against Rome. This had the effect of withdrawing the Roman troops for a time from Samnium; but the forces of the confederates were defeated by the combined armies of the consuls L. Volumnius and Appius Claudius. In the fourth campaign (B. C. 295) Egnatius induced the Gauls and Umbrians to join the confederacy; but in consequence of the withdrawal of the Etruscans and Umbrians, the Gauls and Samnites fell back beyond the Apennines, and were met by the Romans near the town of Sentinum. A decisive battle, signalized by the heroic devotion of P. Decius, ensued, in which the confederate army was defeated, and Egnatius slain. (Liv. x. 18–29.)

2. MARIUS EGNATIUS, one of the principal leaders of the Italian allies in the social or Marsian war, which broke out B. C. 90. He was doubtless one of those twelve commanders, who were to be chosen year by year by the allies, to serve under two consuls. (Diod. Fragm. vol. x. p. 186, ed. Bip.) In Livy he is called the leader of the Samnites. The first of his exploits which we have mentioned is the capture of Venafrum, of which he made himself master through treachery, and where he destroyed two cohorts. Not long after, near Teanum, in a defile of Mons Massicus, he fell unexpectedly on the army of the consul L. Caesar, which he put to flight. The Romans fled to Teanum, but lost a great number of men in crossing the Savo, over which there was but a single bridge. In the following year Egnatius was killed in battle with the Romans under the praetors C. Cosconius and Lucceius. (Liv. Epit. lxxv.; Appian, B. C. i. 40, 41, 45.)

It has been ingeniously conjectured (by Prosper Mérimée, in his Essai sur la Guerre Sociale) that the M. Marius of Sidicinus mentioned by A. Gellius as being suae civitatis nobilissimus homo, and who was treated with such gross indignity by one of the consuls, probably of the year B. C. 123, was either the father or a near relative of Marius Egnatius.

3. CN. EGNATIUS, a man of somewhat disreputable character, was admitted into the Roman senate, but was subsequently expelled by the censors. (Cic. pro Cluent. 48.)

4. EGNATIUS, a son of the former, was, like his father, a member of the senate, and retained that dignity when his father's name was struck off the rolls. He was disinherited by his father. (Cic. pro Cluent. 48.)

5. EGNATIUS, probably a son of No. 4, accompanied Crassus on his expedition against the Parthians, and after the great defeat which Crassus sustained (B. C. 53), escaped from the scene of the disaster with 300 horsemen. (Plut. Crassus, 27.) Appian (B. C. iv. 21) mentions two Egnatii, father and son, who were included in the proscription of the year B. C. 43, and were slain by a single blow, while locked in each other's arms. They were perhaps the same with the two last.

6. EGNATIUS SIDICINUS, mentioned by Cicero as having had some money transactions with him. (Ad Att. vi. 1. § 23.) [EGNATIA GENS.]

7. EGNATIUS, a poet who wrote before Virgil. Macrobius (Sat. vi. 5) quotes some lines from his poem De Rerum Natura. [C. P. M.]

EGNATULEIUS, the name of a plebeian gens at Rome. The names of two only belonging to it have come down to us.

1. C. EGNATULEIUS, C. F., whose name is found upon a coin figured below. The obverse represents the head of Apollo with C. EGNATVLEI. C. (F.), and the reverse Victory and a trophy, with ROM(A) beneath. The letter Q indicates that the coin was a Quinarius or half a Denarius. (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. vol. v. p. 205.)

2. L. EGNATULEIUS, was quaestor in the year B. C. 44, and commanded the fourth legion, which deserted from Antony to Octavianus. As a reward for his conduct on this occasion, Cicero proposed in the senate that he should be allowed to hold public offices three years before the legal time. (Cic. Phil. iii. 3, 15, iv. 2, v. 19.) [C. P. M.]

EIDO'MENE (Εἰδομένη), a daughter of Pheres and wife of Amythaon in Pylos, by whom she became the mother of Bias and Melampus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 11.) In another passage (ii. 2. § 2) Apollodorus calls her a daughter of Abas. [L. S.]

EIDO'THEA (Εἰδοῦθα), a daughter of the aged Proteus, who instructed Menelaus, in the island of Pharos at the mouth of the river Aegyptus, in what manner he might secure her father and compel him to say in what way he should return home. (Hom. Od. iv. 365, &c.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. 182; Schol. ad Soph. Antig. 972; Anton. Lib. 30.) [L. S.]

EILEITHYIA (Εἰλειθυῖα), also called Eleithyia, Eleithyia, or Eleutho. The ancients derive her name from the verb εἰλεῖσθαι, according to which it would signify the coming or helping goddess. She was the goddess of birth, who came to the assistance of women in labour; and when she was kindly disposed, she furthered the birth, but when she was angry, she protracted the labour and delayed the birth. These two functions were originally assigned to different Εἰλειθυῖαι. (Hom. Il. xi. 270, xvi. 187, xix. 103; comp. Paus. i. 44. § 3; Hesych. s. v. Εἰλειθυῖαι.) Subsequently, however, both functions were attributed to one divinity, and even in the later Homeric poems the Cretan Eileithyia alone is mentioned. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. Del. 98, &c., Od. xix. 188.) According to the Iliad the Eileithyiae were daughters of Hera, the goddess of marriage, whom they obeyed. (Hom. Il. xix. 119; comp. Pind. Nem. vii. init.; Ov. Met. ix. 285, &c.; Anton. Lib. 29.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 922) Zeus was the father of Eileithyia, and she was the sister of Hebe and Ares. (Apollod. i. 3. § 1.) Artemis and Eileithyia were originally very different divinities, but there were still some features in their characters which afterwards made them nearly identical. Artemis was believed to avert evil, and to protect what was young and tender, and sometimes she even assisted women in labour. Artemis, moreover, was, like Eileithyia, a maiden divinity; and although the latter was the daughter of the goddess of marriage and the divine midwife, neither husband, nor lover, nor children of her are mentioned. She punished want of chastity by increasing the pains at the birth of a child, and was therefore feared by maidens. (Theocrit. xxvii. 28.) Frequent births, too, were displeasing to her. In an ancient hymn attributed to Olen, which was sung in Delos, Eileithyia was called the mother of Eros. (Paus. i. 18. § 5. ix. 27. § 2.) Her worship appears to have been first established among the Dorians in Crete, where she was believed to have been born in a cave in the territory of Knossus. From thence her worship spread over Delos and Attica. According to a Delian tradition, Eileithyia was not born in Crete, but had come to Delos from the Hyperboreans, for the purpose of assisting Leto. (Herod. iv. 35.) She had a sanctuary at Athens, containing three carved images of the goddess, which were covered all over down to the toes. Two were believed to have been presented by Phaedra, and the third to have been brought by Erychthon from Delos. (Paus. i. 8. § 15.) Her statues, however, were not thus covered everywhere, as Pausanias asserts, for at Aegion there was one in which the head, hands, and feet were uncovered. (Paus. vii. 23. § 5.) She had sanctuaries in various places, such as Sparta (Paus. iii. 17. § 1, 14. § 6), Cleitor (viii. 21. § 2), Messene (iv. 31. § 7), Tegea (viii. 48. § 5), Megara (i. 44. § 3), Hermione (ii. 35. § 8), and other places.

The Elionia, who was worshipped at Argos as the goddess of birth (Plut. Quest. Rom. 49), was probably the same as Eileithyia. (Böttiger, Ilthyia oder die Haze, Weimar, 1799; Müller, Dor. ii. 2. § 14.) [L. S.]

EIONEUS (Ἠιώνεύς), a son of Magnes, and one of the suitors of Hippodameia, was slain by Oenomaus. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1748.) There are three other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Il. vii. 11, x. 435; Dia.) [L. S.]

EIRENE (Εἰρήνη). 1. The goddess of peace. After the victory of Timotheus over the Lacedaemonians, altars were erected to her at Athens at the public expense. (Corn. Nep. Timotheus. 2; Plut. Cim. 13.) Her statue at Athens stood by the side of that of Amphiaras, carrying in its arms Plutus, the god of wealth (Paus. i. 8. § 3), and another stood near that of Hestia in the Prytaneion. (i. 18. § 3.) At Rome too, where peace (Pax) was worshipped, she had a magnificent temple, which was built by the emperor Vespasian. (Suet. Vespasianus. 9; Paus. vi. 9. § 1.) The figure of Eirene or Pax occurs only on coins, and she is there represented as a youthful female, holding in her left arm a cornucopia and in her right hand an olive branch or the staff of Hermes. Sometimes also she appears in the act of burning a pile of arms, or carrying corn-ears in her hand or upon her head. (Hirt. Mythol. Bilderb. ii. p. 104.)

2. A daughter of Poseidon and Melanthea, from whom the island of Calauria was, in early times, called Eirene. (Plut. Quest. Gr. 19.) [L. S.]

ELAEUSIUS (Ελαεισίος), if the name be correct, must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Soranus (de Arte Obste. p. 210), who calls him one of the followers of Asclepiades, and says he was one of those physicians who considered that there were certain diseases peculiar to the female sex, in opposition to some other medical writers who held the contrary opinion. He wrote a work on chronic diseases (Χρόνια), of which the thirteenth book is referred to by Soranus, but of which nothing now remains. [W. A. G.]

ELAGABALUS. The Roman emperor commonly known by this name, was the son of Julia Soemias and Sextus Varius Marcellus, and first cousin once removed to Caracalla. [See genealogical table prefixed to the article CARACALLA.] He was born at Emesa about A. D. 205, and was originally called VARIUS AVITUS BASSIANUS, a series of appellations derived from his father (Varius), maternal grandfather (Avitus), and maternal great-grandfather (Bassianus). While yet almost a child he became, along with his first cousin Alexander Severus, priest of Elagabalus, the Syro-Phoenician Sun-god, to whose worship a gorgeous temple was dedicated in his native city. The history of his elevation to the purple, to which in the earlier portion of his life he was not supposed to possess any claim, was effected in a very singular manner by his grandmother, Julia Maesa. She had long enjoyed the splendours and dignities of the imperial court in the society of her sister, Julia Domna, the wife of Septimius Severus and the mother of Geta and Caracalla. But after the murder of the latter by Macrinus, Maesa was compelled to return to Syria, there to dwell in unhonoured retirement. While still smarting under a reverse peculiarly galling to her haughty temper, she received intelligence that the army was already disgusted by the parsimony and rigid discipline of their new ruler, and was sighing for the luxury enjoyed under his predecessor. Maesa, skilled in court intrigues and familiar with revolutions, quickly perceived that this feeling might be turned to her own advantage. A report was circulated with industrious rapidity that Elagabalus was not the son of his reputed father, but the offspring of a secret commerce between Soemias and Caracalla. The troops stationed in the vicinity to guard the Phoenician border had already testified their admiration of the youth, whom they had seen upon their visits to Emesa gracefully performing the imposing duties of his priesthood, and, having been further propitiated by a liberal distribution of the wealth hoarded by Maesa, were easily persuaded to receive Elagabalus with his whole family into the camp, and to salute him as their sovereign by the title of M. Aurelius Antoninus, as if he had really been the undoubted progeny and lawful heir of their late monarch. These proceedings took place on the 16th of May, A. D. 218. Macrinus having received information of what had happened, despatched Julianus with a body of troops to quell the insurrection. But these, instead of obeying the orders of their general, were prevailed upon to join the mutineers. Whereupon Macrinus advanced in person to meet his rival, was signally defeated in a battle fought on the borders of Syria and Phœnicia, and having escaped in disguise was soon afterwards discovered, brought back, and put to death. [MACRINUS.] The conqueror hastened to Antioch, from whence he forwarded a letter to the senate, in which he at once assumed, without waiting for the form of their consent, all the designations of Caesar, Emperor, son of Antoninus, grandson of Severus, Pius, Felix, Augustus, and Proconsul, together with the tribunitian authority. At the same time he inveighed against the treachery of Macrinus towards his master, his low birth, and his presumption in daring to adopt the title of emperor, concluding with a promise to consult the best interests of all classes of the community, and declaring that he intended to set up Augustus, whose age when he first grasped the reins of power he compared with his own, as a model for imitation. No resistance to these claims was testified on the part of the senate or people, for we find from a curious inscription, discovered some years ago at Rome, that the Frates Arvales assembled in the Capitol on the 14th of July, that is scarcely more than five weeks after the decisive victory over Macrinus, in order to offer up their annual vows for the health and safety of their young prince, who is distinguished by all the appellations enumerated above.

Elagabalus entered upon his second consulship in A. D. 219, at Nicomedeia, and from thence proceeded to Rome, where he celebrated his accession by magnificent games, by prodigal largesses, and by laying the foundation of a sumptuous shrine for his tutelary deity. Two years afterwards, when he had rendered himself alike odious and contemptible by all manner of follies and abominations, he was persuaded by the politic Maesa to adopt his first cousin, Alexander Severus, to proclaim him Caesar, and nominate him consul-elect. Soon after, having repented of these steps, he endeavoured to procure the death of his kinsman, but was frustrated, partly by the watchfulness of his grandmother and partly by the zeal of the soldiers, with whom Alexander was a great favourite. A repetition of a similar attempt the year following (A. D. 222) proved his own destruction; for a mutiny having arisen among the praetorians in consequence, he was slain along with Soemias in the camp while endeavouring to appease their fury. The two bodies were dragged through the streets and cast into the Tiber, and hence the epithet or nickname of Tiberianus, one of the many applied in scorn to the tyrant after his death.

The reign of this prince, who perished at the age of eighteen, after having occupied the throne for three years, nine months, and four days, dating from the battle of Antioch, was characterised throughout by an accumulation of the most fantastic folly, and the most frantic superstition, together with impurity so bestial that the particulars almost transcend the limits of credibility. Had he confined himself to the absurd practical jokes of which so many have been recorded; had he been satisfied with sapping on the tongues of peacocks and fightingales, with feeding lions on pheasants and parrots, with assembling companies of guests who were all fat, or all lean, or all tall, or all short, or all bald, or all gouty, and regaling them with mock repasts; had he been content to occupy his leisure hours in solemnising the nuptials of his favourite deity with the Trojan Pallas or the African Urania, and in making matches between the gods and goddesses all over Italy, men might have laughed goodnaturedly, anticipating an increase of wisdom with increasing years. But unhappily even these trivial amusements were not unfrequently accompanied with cruelty and bloodshed. His earnest devotion to that god whose minister he had been, and to whose favour he probably ascribed his elevation, might have been regarded as excusable or even justifiable had it not been attended with persecution and tyranny. The Roman populace would with easy toleration have admitted and worshipped a new divinity, but they beheld with disgust their emperor appearing in public, arrayed in the attire of a Syrian priest, dancing wild measures and chanting barbaric hymns; they listened with horror to the tales of magic rites, and of human victims secretly slaughtered; they could scarcely submit without indignation to the ordinance that an outlandish idol should take precedence of their fathers' gods and of Jupiter himself, and still less could they consent to obey the decree subsequently promulgated, that it should not be lawful to offer homage at Rome to any other celestial power. But by far the blackest of his offences were his sins against the decencies of both public and private life, the details of which are too horrible and too disgusting to admit of description. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 30—41, lxxix.; Herodian, v. 4—23; Lamprid. Elagab.; Capitolin. Maer.; Entrop. viii. 13; Aurel. Vict. de Caes. xxiii., Epit. xxiii.) A coin of Elagabalus is given under PAULA, the wife of Elagabalus. [W. R.]

ELAPHUS (Ἐλαφος), the fifteenth in descent from Aesculapius, the son of Chrysus and the father of Hippolochus II., who lived probably in the island of Cos in the sixth and fifth centuries B. C. (Suid. s. v. Ἐλαφῶν; Thessali Oratio, ap. Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 840.) [W. A. G.]

ELARA (Ἐλάρα), a daughter of Orchemenus or Minyas, who became by Zeus the mother of the giant Tityus; and Zeus, from fear of Hera, concealed her under the earth. (Apollod. i. 4. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. i. 762; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1583; Müller, Orchom. p. 185, 2d. edit.) [L. S.]

ELASUS (Ἐλασος). There are two Trojans of this name, one of whom was slain by Patroclus and the other by Neoptolemus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 696; Paus. x. 26. § 1.) [L. S.]

ELATUS (Ἐλατος). 1. A son of Arcaea by Leaneira, Metaneira, or by the nymph Chrysopoleia. He was a brother of Azan and Apheidas, and king of Arcadia. By his wife Laodice he had four sons, Stympbalus, Aepyrtus, Cyllen, and Pereus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1, 10. § 3; Paus. viii. 4. § 2.) He is also called the father of Iachys (Pind. Pyth. iii. 31) and of Dotia. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δωτιῶν.) He is said to have resided on mount Cylene, and to have gone from thence to Phocis, where he protected the Phocians and the Delphic sanctuary against the Phlegyans, and founded the town of Elateia. (Paus. L. c. x. 34. § 3.) A statue of his stood in the market-place of Elateia, and another at Tegea. (Paus. x. 34. § 3, viii. 48. § 6.)

2. A prince of the Lapithae at Larissa in Thersaly, was married to Hippeia, by whom he became the father of Caeneus and Polyphemus, both of whom took part in the expedition of the Argonauts. (Hygin. Fab. 11; Ov. Met. xii. 497.) He is sometimes confounded with the Arcadian Elatus. (Müller, Orchom. pp. 186, 191, 2d. edit.) There are four more mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Il. vi. 33, Od. xxii. 268; Apollod. ii. 5. § 4; Apollon. Rhod. i. 101.) [L. S.]

ELECTRA (Ἠλέκτρα), i. e. the bright or brilliant one. 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and the wife of Thaumias, by whom she became the mother of Iris and the Harpies, Aëto and Ocypete. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 419; Hes. Theog. 266; Apollod. i. 2. § § 2, 6; Paus. iv. 33. § 6; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 212.)

2. A daughter of Atlas and Pleione, was one of the seven Pleiades, and became by Zeus the mother of Jason and Dardanus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1, 12. § § 1, 3.) According to a tradition preserved in Servius (ad Aen. i. 32, ii. 325, iii. 104, vii. 207) she was the wife of the Italian king Corythus, by whom she had a son Jason; whereas by Zeus she was the mother of Dardanus. (Comp. Serv. ad Aen. i. 384, iii. 167; Tzet. ad Lycop. 29.) Diodorus (v. 48) calls Harmonia her daughter by Zeus. She is connected also with the legend about the Palladium. When Electra, it is said, had come as a suppliant to the Palladium, which Athena had established, Zeus or Athena herself threw it into the territory of Ilium, because it had been sullied by the hands of a woman who was no longer a pure maiden, and king Ilus then built a temple to Zeus. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 3.) According to others it was Electra herself that brought the Palladium to Ilium, and gave it to her son Dardanus. (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1136.) When she saw the city of her son perishing in flames, she tore out her hair for grief, and was thus placed among the stars as a comet. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 272.) According to others, Electra and her six sisters were placed among the stars as the seven Pleiades, and lost their brilliancy on seeing the destruction of Ilium. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 138; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155.) The fabulous island of Electria was believed to have received its name from her. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 916.)

3. A sister of Cadmus, from whom the Electrian gate at Thebes was said to have received its name. (Paus. ix. 8. § 3; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 916.)

4. A daughter of Agamemnon and Clytaemnestra, is also called Laodice. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 742.) She was the sister of Iphigenia, Chrysothemis, and Orestes. The conduct of her mother and Aegisthus threw her into grief and great suffering, and in consequence of it she became the accomplice of Orestes in the murder of his mother. Her story, according to Hyginus (Fab. 122), runs thus: On receiving the false report that Orestes and Pylades had been sacrificed to Artemis in Tauris, Aletes, the son of Aegisthus, assumed the government of Mycenae; but Electra, for the purpose of learning the particulars of her brother's death, went to Delphi. On the day she reached the place, Orestes and Iphigenia likewise arrived there, but the same messenger who had before informed her of the death of Orestes, now added, that he had been sacrificed by Iphigenia. Electra, enraged at this, snatched a firebrand from the altar, with the intention of putting her sister's eyes out with it. But Orestes suddenly came to the spot, and made himself known to Electra. All being thus cleared up, they travelled together to Mycenae, where Orestes killed the usurper Aletes, and Electra married Pylades. The Attic tragedians, Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, have used the story of Electra very freely: the most perfect, however, is that in the "Electra" of Sophocles. When Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra, after the murder of Agamemnon, intended to kill young Orestes also, Electra saved him by sending him under the protection of a slave to king Strophius at Phanote in Phocia, who had the boy educated together with his own son Pylades. Electra, in the meantime, was ever thinking on taking revenge upon the murderers of her father, and when Orestes had grown up to manhood, she sent secret messages to him to remind him of his duty to avenge his father. At length, Orestes came with Pylades to Argos. A lock of hair which he had placed on the grave of his father, was a sign to Electra that her brother was near. Orestes soon after made himself known to her, and informed her that he was commanded by Apollo to avenge the death of his father. Both lamented their misfortunes, and Electra urged him to carry his design into effect. Orestes then agreed with her that he and Pylades should go into the house of Clytaemnestra, as strangers from Phocia, and tell her that Orestes was dead. This was done accordingly, and Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra fell by the hand of Orestes, who gave Electra in marriage to his friend Pylades. (Comp. Aeschyl. Electra, and Euripides, Orestes.) She became by him the mother of Medon and Strophius. Her tomb was shewn in later times at Mycenae. (Paus. ii. 16. § 5.)

5. A servant of Helen, was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi, in the act of kneeling before her mistress and fastening her sandals. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.)

A sixth Electra occurs among the daughters of Danaus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) [L. S.]

ELECTRYON (Ἠλεκτρώων), a son of Perseus and Andromeda, was king of Mycenae or Midea in Argolia. (Paus. ii. 25. § 8.) He was married to Anaxo, the daughter of Alcæus, by whom he had several children. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, &c.) The tradition about him is given under AMPHITRYON. Another Electryon is mentioned by Diodorus (iv. 67). [L. S.]

ELECTRYONE (Ἠλεκτρώωνη), a daughter of Helios and Rhodos. (Diod. v. 56; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii. 24.) The name is also used as a patronymic from Electryon, and given to his daughter, Alcmena. (Hes. Scut. Herc. 16.) [L. S.]

ELECTUS. [ELECTUS.]

ELEIUS (Ἠλείος). 1. A son of Poseidon and Eurydice, the daughter of Endymion, was king of the Epeians and father of Augeas. (Paus. v. 1. § 6, &c.)

2. A son of Amphimachus and king of Elia. In his reign the sons of Aristomachus invaded Peloponnesus. (Paus. v. 3. § 4.)

3. A son of Tantalus, from whom the country of Elis was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἠλείος.) [L. S.]

E'LEOS (Ἠλεός), the personification of pity or mercy, had an altar in the agora at Athens. "The Athenians," says Pausanias (i. 17. § 1), "are the only ones among the Hellenes that worship this divine being, and among all the gods this is the most useful to human life in all its vicissitudes."

Those who implored the assistance of the Athenians, such as Adrastus and the Heracleidae, approached as suppliants the altar of Eleos. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 1, iii. 7. § 1; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 258.) [L. S.]

ELEPHANTIS, the writer of certain amatory works (motles Elephantidos libelli), the character of which is sufficiently evident from the notices contained in Martial and Suetonius. We know not with certainty the sex of the author, nor in what language the pieces were composed, nor whether they were expressed in prose or verse; but the grammatical form of the name seems to indicate that the person in question was a female, and that she was either a Greek by birth or of Greek extraction. By the historians of literature she is generally ranked among the poetesses. (Martial. Ep. xii. 43. 5; Suet. Tib. 43; Priapei. iii.; Suidas, s. v. Ἀστροδασσα.) Galen quotes a treatise περὶ κοσμητικῶν by this or some other Elephantis. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 158; comp. Spanheim, de Præstantia et Usu Numism. Diss. ix. p. 771.) [W. R.]

ELEPHENOR (Ἐλεφήνωρ), a son of Chalcodon, and prince of the Abantes in Euboea, whom he led against Troy in thirty or forty ships. He there fell by the hand of Agenor. (Hom. II. ii. 540, iv. 463; Hygin. Fab. 97; Dict. Cret. i. 17.) Hyginus calls his mother Imenarete, and Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 1029) Melanippe. He is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen (Apollod. iii. 10. § 8), and was said to have taken with him to Troy the sons of Theseus, who had been entrusted to his care. (Plut. Thes. 35; Paus. i. 17. § 6.) According to Tzetzes, Elephenor, without being aware of it, killed his grandfather, Abas, in consequence of which he was obliged to quit Euboea. When therefore the expedition against Troy was undertaken, Elephenor did not return to Euboea, but assembled the Abantes on a rock on the Euripus, opposite the island. After the fall of Troy, which, according to some accounts, he survived, he went to the island of Othronos near Sicily, and, driven away thence by a dragon, he went to Amantia in Illyria. (Lycophr. 1029, &c.) [L. S.]

ELEUSI'NA or ELEUSI'NIA (Ἐλευσινία), a surname of Demeter and Persephone, derived from Eleusis in Attica, the principal seat of their worship. (Virg. Georg. i. 163; Phormus. N. D. 27; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐλευσίς.) [L. S.]

ELEUSIS (Ἐλευσίς), a son of Hermes and Dacia, the daughter of Oceanus. The town of Eleusis in Attica was believed to have derived its name from him. (Paus. i. 38. § 7; Apollod. i. 5. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 147.) He was married to Cothone or Cyntinia. (Hygin. l. c.; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 19.) [L. S.]

ELEUSIS (Ἐλευσίς), is quoted by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 29) as the author of a work on Achilles (περὶ Ἀχιλλεύου). [L. S.]

ELEUTHER (Ἐλευθέρις), a son of Apollo and Aethusa, the daughter of Poseidon, was regarded as the founder of Eleutherae in Boeotia. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐλευθέριαι.) He was the grandfather of Jasius and Poemander, the founder of Tanagra. (Paus. ix. 20. § 2.) He is said to have been the first that erected a statue of Dionysus, and spread the worship of the god. (Hygin. Fab. 225.) There are two other mythical personages of the same name. (Plut. Quæst. Gr. 39; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐλευθέριαι.) [L. S.]

ELEUTHEREUS (Ἐλευθερεὺς), a surname of Dionysus, which he derived either from Eleuther, or the Boeotian town of Eleutherae; but it may also be regarded as equivalent to the Latin Liber, and thus describes Dionysus as the deliverer of man from care and sorrow. (Paus. i. 20. § 2, 38. § 8; Plut. Quæst. Rom. 101.) The form Eleutherius is certainly used in the sense of the deliverer, and occurs also as the surname of Zeus. (Plut. Sympos. vii. in fin.; Pind. Ol. xii. 1; Strab. ix. p. 412; Tacit. Ann. xv. 64.) [L. S.]

ELIAS (Ἠλίας). This name, which is of Hebrew origin, belongs to several Greek writers, chiefly ecclesiastics, of the Byzantine empire. There were several prelates of the name in the Oriental patriarchates and bishoprics, and several writers, chiefly ecclesiastics, in the Oriental tongues, for whom see Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, and Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 257, xi. p. 614. We give only those belonging to Greek biography. In Latin the name is frequently written Helias.

1. 2. 3. ELIAS. There were three patriarchs of Jerusalem of this name. Elias I. was patriarch from A. D. 494 or 495 till his deposition by a council held at Sidon, whose decree was enforced, A. D. 513, by the emperor Anastasius I. He died in exile A. D. 518. Elias II. held the patriarchate from A. D. 760, or earlier, to 797, with the exception of an interval, when he was expelled by an intrusive patriarch Theodorus. He was represented at the second general council of Nicea, A. D. 787, by Joannes, a presbyter, and Thomas, principal of the convent of St. Arsenius near Babylon in Egypt: these ecclesiastics were also representatives of the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch. Elias III. was patriarch at least as early as 881, when he sent a letter to Charles le Gros and the prelates, princes, and nobles of Gaul. A Latin version of the letter of Elias to Charlemagne (for it is scarcely probable that the original was in that language) was published in the Spicilegium of D'Achéry. Elias died about A. D. 907. (Papebroche, Tractatus preliminaris de Episcopis et Patriarchis Sanctas Hierosolymitanas Ecclesias in the Acta Sanctorum; Maii, vol. iii. with the Appendix in vol. vii. p. 696, &c.; Labbe, Concilia, vol. vii.; D'Achéry, Spicileg. vol. iii. p. 363, ed. Paris, 1723.)

4. ELIAS OF CHARAX. A Manuscript in the library of St. Mark at Venice contains a citation, printed by Villosion, from a Greek treatise on versification by "Helias, a monk of Charax." Villosion states that the passage cited by him is, in several MSS. of the King's Library at Paris, improperly ascribed to Plutarch. Harless incorrectly represents Villosion as speaking of two works of Helias on versification, and without, or rather against authority, connects the name of Elias of Crete with them. Part of this work is printed by Hermann in an Appendix to his edition of Dracon of Stratoniceia. [DRACON.] (Villosion, Anecd. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 85, 86; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. p. 338.)

5. ELIAS OF CRETE. There are several works extant ascribed to Elias Cretensis, whom Rader, Cave, Fabricius, and others, suppose to have been Elias, bishop (or rather metropolitan) of Crete, who took part in the second general council of Nicea, A. D. 787. (Labbe, Concilia, vol. vii.) Leunclavius considers that the author was a different person from the prelate, and places the former in the sixth century or thereabout. (Proœmium in Sti Gregorii Nazianzeni Opera.) Oudin, who has examined the subject most carefully, agrees with Leunclavius in distinguishing the writer from the prelate, and deduces from the internal evidence of his works that the writer lived about A. D. 1120 or 1130.

He wrote (1) Commentaries on several of the Orations of Gregory Nazianzen. There are several MSS. extant of these commentaries in the original Greek, but we believe they have never been printed. A Latin version of them, partly new, partly selected from former translations, was published by Billius with his Latin version of Gregory's works, and has been repeatedly reprinted.

(2) A Commentary on the Κλίμαξ, Climax, "Scala Paradisi," or Ladder of Paradise of Joannes or John surnamed Scholasticus or Climacus. This commentary, which has never been published, but is extant in MS., is described by Rader in his edition of the Climax, as very bulky. Some extracts are embodied in the Scholia of a later commentator given by Rader.

(3) An Answer respecting virgins espoused before the age of puberty. This is extant in MS. in the King's Library at Paris, in the catalogue of which the author is described as the metropolitan of Crete.

(4) Answers to Dionysius the Monk on his seven different questions, given by Binefidius (Juris Orient. Libri, iii. p. 185) and Leunclavius (Jus Gr. Rom. i. p. 335).

It is not known that any other works of his are extant. Nicolaus Commenus in his Praeactiones Mystagogicae cites other works, but they are probably lost. One was On the Morals of the Heathens, and the others were Answers to the Monks of Corinth, To the Monks of Asca, and To the Solitary Monks. Harless incorrectly ascribes to Elias of Crete the work of Elias or Helias of Charax [see No. 4] on versification. (Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 641; Rader, Isayoge ad Scalum St. Joannis Climaci, prefixed to his edition of that work; Oudin, Commentarii de Scriptor. et Scriptis Ecclesiasticis, vol. ii. col. 1066, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 430, ix. p. 525, xi. p. 615; Catalogus Librorum Manuscriptorum Bibliothecae Regiae, Paris, 1740.)

6. ELIAS, called, from the ecclesiastical office which he held, ECDICUS ("Ἐκδικος), or "the Defender," was the author of a Greek work on the Ascetic life, extant in MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna, and in the King's Library at Paris. The work is said to be entitled Πῦρρῃ valouσα. A Latin version of a part is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxii. p. 756, &c. ed. Lyons, 1677. In the catalogue of the King's Library at Paris is a Greek MS. containing, among other things, a Florilegium, or selection, said to be by "Helias, Presbyter et Defensor." (Montfaucon, Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, p. 548; Catal. Codd. MSSorum Biblioth. Regiae, vol. ii. Nos. cccclxii 6, dcccclviii 21, Paris, 1740; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. Dissert. i. p. 7; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 615.)

7. ELIAS, called "the MONK." Leo Allatius in his De Symeonum Scriptis Diatriba (p. 101) mentions a discourse ἀποεόριον, on the Nativity, by Elias the Monk. (Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. Diss. i. p. 7, ed. Oxford, 1740—43.)

8. ELIAS, called "the PHILOSOPHER." There are in the Medicean Library at Florence Prolegomena to the Εἰσαγωγή of Porphyry taken from the writings of "Elias the Philosopher," and there are some extracts from the same Elias in a MS. in the Library of St. Mark at Venice. But nothing appears to be known of the writer beyond his name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 616.)

9. ELIAS SYNCELLUS. Leo Allatius has mentioned some hymns or poems addressed to the Virgin Mary, remarkable for their beauty, piety, and elegance: he promised to publish them, but did not fulfil his intention. Among the writers of them he names Elias Syncellus. (Allatius, Notes to his edition of Eustathius of Antioch, p. 284.)

Montfaucon mentions a black-letter MS. apparently in Latin, belonging at that time to the monastery of Caunes in Languedoc, entitled Requies in Clementinas, by Elias or Helias. But who this Elias was, is not stated, nor whether the work was a version from the Greek, which the name of the writer would lead us to suppose. A MS. entitled Theorica et Practica, by "Helias Salomon," is also mentioned by Montfaucon, but we know nothing of the writer. (Montfaucon, Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, pp. 515, 1241.) [J. C. M.]

ELICAON or HELICAON (Ἐλικῶν), of Rhegium, a Pythagorean philosopher. He is mentioned along with other Pythagoreans, who gave good and wholesome laws to Rhegium, and endeavoured to make practical use of the philosophical principles of their master in the administration of their country. (Iamblich. Vit. Pythag. 27, 30, 36.) [L. S.]

ELICUIUS, a surname of Jupiter at Rome, where king Numa dedicated to Jupiter Elicius an altar on the Aventine. (Liv. i. 20.) The same king was said to have instituted certain secret rites to be performed in honour of the god, which were recorded in his Commentarii. (Liv. i. 31.) The origin of the name as well as the notion of Jupiter Elicius is referred to the Etruscans, who by certain prayers and sacrifices called forth (elicebant or evocabant) lightning or invited Jupiter to send lightning. (Plin. H. N. ii. 54; Ov. Fast. iii. 327, &c.; Varro, de Ling. Lat. vi. 94.) The object of calling down lightning was according to Livy's explanation to elicit prodigies ex mentibus divinis; and when the god appeared or sent his lightning in anger, it was an unfortunate sign to the person who had invited it. Seneca (Quaest. Nat. ii. 49) attests that the ancients distinguished a kind of lightning or fulmina, called fulmina hospitalia, which it was possible for man to draw down, and Pliny mentions Numa, Tullus Hostilius, and Porsena, among the persons who in early times had called down lightning, though Tullus and his family perished in the attempt. Some modern writers think that the belief in the possibility of calling down lightnings arose out of certain observations or experiments in electricity, with which the ancients were acquainted, and some have even ventured upon the supposition that the ancients, and the Etruscans in particular, knew the use of conductors of lightning, which, though they cannot draw lightning from heaven, yet conduct it towards a certain point. Servius (ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 42) goes even so far as to say that the art of drawing down lightning was known to Prometheus. [L. S.]

ELIONIA. [EILEITHYIA.]

ELISSA. [DIDO.]

ELLOPION (Ἐλλοπίων), of Peparethus, a Socratic philosopher, who is mentioned only by Plutarch. (De Gen. Socrat. p. 578, f.) [L. S.]

ELLOPS (Ἐλλωψ), a son of Ion or Tithonus, from whom Ellopia in Euboea derived its name. (Strab. x. p. 445; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐλλωψ; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 280.) [L. S.]

ELPENOR (Ἐλπηνόρ), one of the companions of Odysseus, who were metamorphosed by Circe into swine, and afterwards back into men. Intoxicated with wine, Elpenor one day fell asleep on the roof of Circe's residence, and in his attempt to rise he fell down and broke his neck. (Hom. Od. x. 550, &c.) When Odysseus was in the lower world, he met the shade of Elpenor, who implored him to burn his body and to erect a monument to him. (Od. xi. 57.) After his return to the island of Circe, Odysseus complied with this request of his friend. (Od. xii. 10, &c.; comp. Juven. xv. 22; Ov. Ibis, 487.) Elpenor was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 29.) Servius (ad Aen. vi. 107) relates that Elpenor was killed by Odysseus himself for necromantic purposes. [L. S.]

ELPIDIUS (Ἐλπίδιος), is called a remarkable man and fond of learning. Leontius, in his commentary on the "Phaenomena" of Aratus, says, that he had constructed for Elpidius a sphaera according to the description of Aratus, and Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 94, note) supposes that this Elpidius is the same as the patrician who was sent as ambassador to Chaganus, king of the Avari, in the first year of the reign of the emperor Mauritius, and who is mentioned by Cedrenus and other writers of that period. [L. S.]

ELPIDIUS, or HELPIDIUS (Ἐλπίδιος), one of the physicians of Theodoric the Great, king of the Ostrogoths, A. D. 493—526, whom he attended in his last illness. (Procop. de Bello Goth. lib. i. p. 167, ed. Höschel.) He was a Christian, and in deacon's orders, and probably a native of Milan. There is extant a letter to him from king Theodoric (ap. Cassiod. Variar. iv. 24), and four from Ennodius. (Epist. vii. 7, viii. 8, ix. 14, 21; ap. Sirmundi Opera, vol. i.) [W. A. G.]

ELPINICE (Ἐλπίνικη), daughter of Miltiades, and sister of Cimon. According to some accounts she was only his half-sister, and he therefore made her his wife, the Athenian law permitting marriage with a sister, if she was not ἀμφιτέριος. He gave her, however, afterwards in marriage to Callias, who had fallen in love with her, and who made this the condition of paying for Cimon the fine which had been imposed upon Miltiades. [vol. i. p. 567, b.] The character of Elpinice does not stand high, and we hear of a suspected intrigue of her's with Polygnotus, the painter. When Cimon was accused of having taken bribes from Alexander I., king of Macedonia, Elpinice went to Pericles to entreat his forbearance. He put her off at the time with a jest, but he refrained on the trial from pressing strongly the charge against her brother. Cimon is said also to have negotiated with Pericles, through Elpinice, the terms on which he was to return from exile. (Plut. Cim. 4, 14, Peric. 10; Nepos, Cim. 1.) [E. E.]

ELVA, the name of a patrician family of the Aebutia gens.

L. T. AEBUTIUS T. F. ELVA, consul with P. Veturius Geminus Cicurinus in B. C. 499, in which year Fidenae was besieged and Crustumeria taken. In the following year, according to the date of most annalists, Elva was magister equitum to the dictator A. Postumius Albinus in the great battle fought at the Lake Regillus, where he commanded the left wing. The lays of that battle sung of his combat with Octavius Mamilius, by whom his arm was pierced through. (Liv. ii. 19; Dionys. v. 88, vi. 2, 4, 5, 11.)

L. AEBUTIUS T. F. T. N. ELVA, son of the preceding, consul with P. Servilius Priscus Structus in B. C. 463, was carried off in his consulship by the great plague which raged at Rome in that year. (Liv. iii. 6; Dionys. ix. 67; Diod. xl. 79; Oros. ii. 12.)

POSTUMUS AEBUTIUS ELVA CORNICEN, consul with M. Fabius Vibulanus in B. C. 442, in which year a colony was founded at Ardea, and magister equitum to the dictator Q. Servilius Priscus Structus in B. C. 435. (Liv. iv. 11, 21; Diod. xii. 34.)

M. AEBUTIUS ELVA, one of the triumviri for founding the colony at Ardea in B. C. 442. (Liv. iv. 11.)

ELYMUS (Ἐλμυος), a Trojan, a natural son of Anchises and a brother of Eryx. (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 959.) Previous to the emigration of Aeneas, Elymus and Aegestus had fled from Troy to Sicily, and had settled on the banks of the river Crimissus, in the country of the Sicani. When afterwards Aeneas also arrived there, he built for them the towns of Aegesta and Elyme, and the Trojans who settled in that part of Sicily called themselves Elymi, after Elymus. (Dionys. Hal. A. R. i. 52, &c.) Strabo (xiii. p. 608) calls him Elymnus, and says that he went to Sicily with Aeneas, and that they together took possession of Eryx and Lilybaeum. Elymus was further believed to have founded Aeca and Entella in Sicily. (Virg. Aen. v. 73, with Servius's note.) [L. S.]

EMANUEL. [MANUEL.]

EMATHION (Ἐμαθίων), a son of Tithonus and Eos, and a brother of Memnon. (Hes. Theog. 985.) He was king of Arabia, and was slain by Hercules. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Q. Smyrn. iii. 300.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Ov. Met. v. 105; Virg. Aen. ix. 571.) [L. S.]

EMATHUS (Ἐμαθος), a son of Macedon and brother of Pierus, from whom Emathia, that is Macedonia, was believed to have derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 980.) The daughters of Pierus (the Pierides) are sometimes called after their uncle Emathides. (Ov. Met. v. 669.) [L. S.]

EMILUS (Ἐμυλος) of Aegina, made the gold and ivory statues of the Hours sitting on thrones in the temple of Hera at Olympia. (Paus. v. 17. § 1.) There is no other mention of this artist, and there can be no doubt that Valckenaer is right in reading Ἐμυλός. Some MSS. give Ἐμυλός and Ἀμυλός. [SMILLIE.] [P. S.]

EMMENIDAE (Ἐμμενίδαι), a princely family at Agrigentum, which traced its origin to the mythical hero Polyneices. Among its members we know Emmenides (from whom the family derived its name) the father of Aenesidamus, whose sons Theron and Xenocrates are celebrated by Pindar as victors at the great games of Greece. Theron won a prize at Olympia, in Ol. 76 (B. C. 476), in the chariot-race with four full-grown horses, and Xenocrates gained prizes in the horse-race at the Pythian, Isthmian, and Panathenaic games. (Pind. Ol. ii. 48, iii. 38, Pyth. vi. 5, with the Scholiast, and Böckh's Explicat. ad Pind. pp. 114, &c.; 119, 122, 127, 135; Müller, Orckom. p. 332, 2nd edit.) [L. S.]

EMPANDA, or PANDA, was, according to Festus (s. v. Empanda), a dea paganorum. Varro (ap. Non. p. 44; comp. Gell. xiii. 22; Arnob. iv. 2) connects the word with pandere, but absurdly explains it by panem dare, so that Empanda would be the goddess of bread or food. She had a sanctuary near the gate, called after her the porta Pandana, which led to the capitol. (Festus, s. v. Pandana; Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 42.) Her temple was an asylum, which was always open, and the suppliants who came to it were supplied with food from the funds of the temple. This custom at once shews the meaning of the name Panda or Empanda: it is connected with pandere, to open; she is accordingly the goddess who is open to or admits any one who wants protection. Hartung (die Religion der Röm. ii. p. 76, &c.) thinks that Empanda and Panda are only surnames of Juno. [L. S.]

EMPEDOCLES (Ἐμπεδοκλῆς), of Agragas (Agrigentum), in Sicily, flourished about Olymp. 84, or B. C. 444. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 74; comp. 51, 52; Simon Karsten, Empedoclis Agrigent. Curmin. Reliquiae, p. 9, &c.) His youth probably fell in the time of the glorious rule of Theron, from Ol. 73 to Ol. 77; and although he was descended from an ancient and wealthy family (Diog. Laërt. viii. 51), Empedocles with enthusiasm joined the revolution—as his father, Meton, had probably done before—in which Thrasydaeus, the son and successor of Theron, was expelled, and which became the watchword for the other Greek towns to shake off the yoke of their monarchs. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 72.) His zeal in the establishment of political equality is said to have been manifested by his magnanimous support of the poor (ibid. 73), by his inexorable severity in persecuting the overbearing conduct of the aristocrats (Timaeus, ap. Diog. L. viii. 64, comp. 65, 66), and in his declining the sovereignty which was offered to him. (Aristot. ap. Diog. viii. 63; compare, however, Timaeus, ibid. 66, 76.) His brilliant oratory (Satyr. ap. Diog. viii. 58; Timaeus, ibid. 67), his penetrating knowledge of nature and of circumstances, and the reputation of his marvellous powers, which he had acquired by curing diseases, by his successful exertions in removing marshy districts, averting epidemics and obnoxious winds (Diog. Laërt. viii. 60, 70, 69; Plut. de Curios. Princ. p. 515, adv. Col. p. 1126; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 27, and others), spread a lustre around his name, which induced Timaeus and other historians to mention him more frequently. Although he himself may have been innocent of the name of “avertor” or “controller of storms” (καταστροφῆς, διεστροφῆς) and of a magician (γόνος), which were given to him (Karsten, l. c. p. 49, &c.), still he must have attributed to himself miraculous powers, if in the beginning of his Katharmoi he said of himself—he may, however, have been speaking in the name of some assistant daemon—“An immortal god, and no longer a mortal man, I wander among you, honoured by all, adorned with priestly diadems and blooming wreaths; to whatever illustrious towns I go, I am praised by men and women, and accompanied by thousands, who thirst for deliverance, some being desirous to know the future, others remedies for diseases,” &c. (Karsten, p. 142, v. 392, &c.; compare the accounts of the ostentation and haughtiness of Empedocles, p. 29, &c.) In like manner he promises remedies against the power of evil and of old age; he pretends to teach men how to break the vehemence of the unwearied winds, and how to call them forth again; how to obtain from dark rainy clouds useful drought, and tree-feeding rivers from the drought of summer (ibid. v. 425, &c.),—promises and pretensions, perhaps, expressive of his confidence in the infant science, which had only commenced its development, rather than in his own personal capability. With equal pride he celebrates the wisdom of the man—the ancient historians themselves did not know whether he meant Pythagoras or Parmenides—who, possessed of the richest mental and intellectual treasures, easily perceived everything in all nature, whenever with the full energy of his mind he attempted to do so. (ibid. v. 440, &c.) The time was one of a varied and lively mental movement, and Empedocles was acquainted or connected by friendship with the physicians Acron and Pausanias (Diog. Laërt. viii. 60, 61, 65, 69; Plut. de Ia. et Os. p. 383; Plin. H. N. xxix. 3; Suid. s. v.; comp. Fragm. v. 54, 433, &c.), with Pythagoreans, and it is said with Parmenides and Anaxagoras also (Diog. Laërt. viii. 55, 56, &c.; comp. Karsten, p. 47, &c.); and persons being carried away by that movement, believed themselves to be the nearer the goal the less clearly they perceived the way that led to it, and they regarded a perfect power over nature as the necessary consequence of a perfect knowledge of it.

Timaeus and Dicaearchus had spoken of the journey of Empedocles to Peloponnesus, and of the admiration which was paid to him there (Diog. Laërt. viii. 71, 67; Athen. xiv. p. 620); others mentioned his stay at Athens, and in the newly-founded colony of Thurii, B. C. 446 (Suid. s. v. Ἀκρων; Diog. Laërt. viii. 52); but it was only untrustworthy historians that made him travel in the east as far as the Magi. (Plin. H. N. xxx. 1, &c.; comp. Karsten, p. 39, &c.) His death is said to have been marvellous, like his life: a tradition, which is traced to Heracleides Ponticus, a writer fond of wonderful things, represented him as having been removed from the earth, like a divine being; another said that he had perished in the flames of mount Aetna. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 67, 69, 70, 71; Hor. ad Pison. 464, &c.; comp. Karsten, p. 36, &c.) But it is attested by the authority of Aristotle, that he died at the age of sixty, and the statements of later writers, who extend his life further, cannot be set up against such a testimony. (Apollon. ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 52, comp. 74, 73.) Among the disciples of Empedocles none is mentioned except Gorgias, the sophist and rhetorician, whose connexion with our philosopher seems to be alluded to even by Plato. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 58; Karsten, p. 56, &c.) Among the works attributed to Empedocles, and which were all metrical compositions (see the list in Karsten, p. 62, &c.), we can form an opinion only on his Katharmoi and his didactic poem on Nature, and on the latter work only from the considerable fragments still extant. It consisted of 2000 hexameter verses, and was addressed to the above-mentioned Pausanias,—its division into three books was probably made by later grammarians. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 77; Karsten, p. 70, &c.) The Kataploē, a poem said to have consisted of 3000 verses, seems to have recommended particularly a good moral conduct as the means of averting epidemics and other evils. (See the fragments in Karsten, p. 144, vers. 403, &c.; comp. Aristot. Eth. Nic. vii. 5; Eudem. vi. 3.) Empedocles was undoubtedly acquainted with the didactic poems of Xenophanes and Parmenides (Hermipp. and Theophrast. ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 55, 56)—allusions to the latter can be pointed out in the fragments,—but he seems to have surpassed them in the animation and richness of his style, and in the clearness of his descriptions and diction; so that Aristotle, though, on the one hand, he acknowledged only the metre as a point of comparison between the poems of Empedocles and the epics of Homer, yet, on the other hand, had characterised Empedocles as Homeric and powerful in his diction. (Poet. i. ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 57.) Lucretius, the greatest of all didactic poets, speaks of him with enthusiasm, and evidently marks him as his model. (See especially Lucret. i. 727, &c.) We are indebted for the first comprehensive collection of the fragments of Empedocles, and of a careful collection of the testimonies of the ancients concerning his doctrines, to Fr. W. Sturz (Empedocles Agrigentinus, Lipsiae, 1805), and lately Simon Karsten has greatly distinguished himself for what he has done for the criticism and explanation of the text, as well as for the light he has thrown on separate doctrines. (Philosophorum Graecorum ceterum reliquiae, vol. ii., containing Empedocles Agrigentini Carmin. Reliquiae, Amstelodami, 1838.)

Acquainted as Empedocles was with the theories of the Eleatics and the Pythagoreans, he did not adopt the fundamental principles either of the one or the other schools, although he agreed with the latter in his belief in the migration of souls (Fragm. vers. 1, &c., 380, &c., 350-53, 410, &c.; comp. Karsten, p. 509, &c.), in the attempt to reduce the relations of mixture to numbers, and in a few other points. (Karsten, p. 426, 33, 428, &c., 426; compare, however, Ed. Zeller, dis Philosophia der Griech. p. 169, &c., Tübingen, 1844.) With the Eleatics he agreed in thinking that it was impossible to conceive anything arising out of nothing (Fragm. vers. 81, &c., 119, &c., 345, &c.; comp. Parmenid. Fragm., ed. Karsten, vers. 47, 50, 60, &c., 66, 68, 75), and it is not impossible that he may have borrowed from them also the distinction between knowledge obtained through the senses, and knowledge obtained through reason. (Fragm. 49, &c., 108; Parmenid. Fragm. 49, 108.) Aristotle with justice mentions him among the Ionic physiologists, and he places him in very close relation to the atomistic philosophers and to Anaxagoras. (Metaphys. i. 3, 4, 7, Phys. i. 4, de Generat. et Corr. i. 8, de Caelo, iii. 7.) All three, like the whole Ionic physiology, endeavoured to point out that which formed the basis of all changes, and to explain the latter by means of the former; but they could not, like Heraclitus, consider the coming into existence and motion as the existence of things, and rest and tranquillity as the non-existence, because they had derived from the Eleatics the conviction that an existence could just as little pass over into a non-existence, as, vice versa, the latter into the former. In order, nevertheless, to establish the reality of changes, and consequently the world and its phenomena, against the deductions of the Eleatics, they were obliged to reduce that which appears to us as a coming into existence to a process of mixture and separation of unalterable substances; but for the same reason they were obliged to give up both, the Heraclitean supposition of one original fundamental power, and the earlier Ionic hypothesis of one original substance which produced all changes out of itself and again absorbed them. The supposition of an original plurality of unalterable elementary substances was absolutely necessary. And thus we find in the extant fragments of the didactic poem of Empedocles, the genuineness of which is attested beyond all doubt by the authority of Aristotle and other ancient writers, the most unequivocal statement, made with an evident regard to the argumentation of Parmenides, that a coming into existence from a non-existence, as well as a complete death and annihilation, are things impossible; what we call coming into existence and death is only mixture and separation of what was mixed, and the expressions of coming into existence and destruction or annihilation are justified only by our being obliged to submit to the usus loquendi. (Fragm. 77, &c., 345, &c.) The original and unalterable substances were termed by Empedocles the roots of things (ῥιζόσαρα τῶν πάντων βιζώματα, Fragm. vers. 55, &c., 74, &c.); and it was he who first established the number of four elements, which were afterwards recognized for many centuries, and which before Empedocles had been pointed out one by one, partly as fundamental substances, and partly as transition stages of things coming into existence. (Aristot. Metaphys. i. 4, 7, de Generat. et Corr. ii. 1; comp. Ch. A. Brandis, Handbuch d. Gesch. der Griech. Röm. Philos. i. p. 195, &c.) The mythical names Zeus, Hera, Nestis, and Aïdoneus, alternate with the common terms of fire, air, water, and earth; and it is of little importance for the accurate understanding of his theory, whether the life-giving Hera was meant to signify the air and Aïdoneus the earth, or Aïdoneus the air and Hera the earth, although the former is more probable than the latter. (Fragm. 55, &c., 74, &c.; comp. Brandis, l.c. p. 198.) As, however, the elementary substances were simple, eternal, and unalterable (Karsten, p. 336, &c.), and as change or alteration was merely the consequence of their mixture and separation, it was also necessary to conceive them as motionless, and consequently to suppose the existence of moving powers—the necessary condition of mixture and separation—as distinct from the substances, and equally original and eternal. But in this manner the dynamic explanations which the earlier physiologists, and especially Heraclitus, had given of nature, was changed into a mechanical one. In order here again to avoid the supposition of an actual coming into existence, Empedocles assumed two opposite directions of the moving power, the attractive and repulsive, the uniting and separating, that is, love and hate (Νεῖκος, Δῆμις, Κόρος—Φιλίη, Φιλότης, Ἀρμονίη, Στοιχῆ), as equally original and elementary (Fragm. 88, &c., 138, &c., 167, &c.; Aristot. Metaphys. i. 4; Karsten, p. 346, &c.); whereas with Heraclitus they were only different manifestations of one and the same fundamental power. But it is to be supposed that those two powers were from the beginning equally active? and is the state of mixture, i. e. the world and its phenomena, an original one, or was it preceded by a state in which the pure elementary substances and the two moving powers co-existed in a condition of repose and inertness? Empedocles decided in favour of the latter supposition (Fragm. vers. 88, &c., 59, &c.; comp. Plat. Soph. p. 242; Aristot. de Coel. i. 10, Phys. Auscult. i. 4, viii. 1), which agreed with ancient legends and traditions. This he probably did especially in order to keep still more distinctly asunder existences and things coming into existence; and he conceived the original co-existence of the pure elementary substances and of the two powers in the form of a sphere (σφαῖρος; comp. Karsten, p. 183, &c.), which was to indicate its perfect independence and self-sufficiency. As, however, these elementary substances were to exist together in their purity, without mixture and separation, it was necessary to suppose that the uniting power of love predominated in the sphere (Aristot. Metaphys. B. i. 4, A. 21, de Generat. et Corr. i. 1), and that the separating power of hate was in a state of limited activity, or, as Empedocles expresses it, guarded the extreme ends of the sphere. (Fragm. vers. 58, comp. 167, &c.) When the destructive hate rises into activity, the bond which keeps the pure elementary substances together in the sphere is dissolved (vers. 66, &c.); they separate in order partly to unite again by the power of love: and this is the origin of our world of phenomena. But that the elementary substances might not be completely absorbed by this world and lose their purity, Empedocles assumed a periodical change of the sphere and formation of the world (Fragm. vers. 88, &c., 167, &c.); but perhaps also, like the earlier Ionians, a perpetual continuance of pure fundamental substances, to which the parts of the world, which are tired of change, return and prepare the formation of the sphere for the next period of the world. (H. Ritter in Wolf's Analect. ii. p. 445, &c., Gesch. der Philos. i. p. 555, &c.; comp. Zeller, l. c. p. 191, &c.) The sphere being the embodiment of pure existence was with him also the embodiment or representative of the deity, either conceiving the deity as a collectivity, or mainly as the uniting power of love. (Fragm. vers. 70; comp. Aristot. de Generat. et Corr. ii. 6, Metaphys. B. 4, de Anim. i. 5.) But as existence is not to be confined to the sphere, but must rather be at the foundation of the whole visible world, so the deity also must be active in it. But Empedocles was little able to determine the how of this divine activity in its distinction from and connexion with the activity of the moving powers: he, too, like the Eleatics (Xenophan. Fragm. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, ed. Karsten), strove to purify and liberate the notion of the deity: "not provided with limbs, He, a holy, infinite spirit, passes through the world with rapid thoughts," is the sublime expression of Empedocles. (Fragm. vers. 359, &c., comp. 317.) Along with this, however, he speaks of the eternal power of Necessity as an ancient decree of the gods, and it is not clear whether the necessary succession of cause and effect, or an unconditional predestination, is to be understood by it; or, lastly, whether Empedocles did not rather leave the notion of Necessity and its relation to the deity in that mysterious darkness in which we find it in the works of most philosophers of antiquity.

We perceive the world of phenomena or changes through the medium of our senses, but not so its eternal cause; and although Empedocles traced both sensuous perception and thought to one and the same cause, his six original beings (Aristot. de Anim. iii. 3, Metaphys. i. 57; Fragm. 321, &c., 315, &c., 313, 318, &c.), still he clearly distinguished the latter as a higher state of development from the former; he complains of the small extent of our knowledge obtainable through our body (Fragm. 32, &c.), and advises us not to trust to our eyes or ears, or any other part of our body, but to see in thought of what kind each thing is by itself (Fragm. 49, &c., comp. 108, 356, &c.); but he attributes the thinking cognition to the deity alone. (Fragm. 32, &c., 41, &c., 354, 362, &c.) We are, however, by no means justified in supposing that Empedocles, like the Eleatics, considered that which is perceptible through the senses, i. e. the world and its phenomena, to be a mere phantom, and the unity of the divine sphere, that is, the world of love, which is arrived at only by thought, to be the sole existence. (H. Ritter in Wolf's Analect. i. p. 423, &c., Gesch. der Philos. i. p. 541, &c.; Brandis, in the Rheinisch. Museum, iii. p. 124; comp. Zeller, l. c. p. 184, &c.)

Further investigations concerning Empedocles's derivation of the different kinds of sensuous perception, and of the mutual influence of things upon one another in general, from the coincidence of effluxes and corresponding pores, as well as the examination of the fragments of his cosmologic and physiologic doctrines, must be left to a history of Greek philosophy. [Ch. A. B.]

EMPODUS (Ἐμφοδός), an otherwise unknown writer, whose ἀπομνημονεύματα are mentioned by Athenaeus. (ix. p. 370.) Casaubon proposed to read Πρεσβύσιος instead of Ἐμφοδός; but our ignorance about Empodius is not sufficient to justify such a conjecture. [L. S.]

EMPORIUS, a Latin rhetorician, author of three short tracts entitled 1. De Ethopoeia ac Loco Communi Liber; 2. Demonstrativae Materiae praeceptum; 3. De Deliberativa Specie. He is believed to have flourished not earlier than the sixth century, chiefly from the circumstance that he refers in his illustrations to the regal power rather than to the imperial dignity, which he would scarcely have done had he lived before the revival of the kingly title.

Emporius was first edited by Beatus Rhenanus, along with some other authors upon rhetoric, Basil. 4to. 1521; the pieces named above will all be found in the "Antiqui Rhetores Latini" of F. Pitloetus, 4to., Paris, 1599, p. 278. [W. R.]

EMPU'SA (Ἐμψυσα), a monstrous spectre, which was believed to devour human beings. It could assume different forms, and was sent out by Hecate to frighten travellers. It was believed usually to appear with one leg of brass and the other of an ass. (Aristoph. Ran. 294, Eccles. 1094.) Whenever a traveller addressed the monster with insulting words, it used to flee and utter a shrill sound. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. ii. 4.) The Lamiae and Mormolyceia, who assumed the form of handsome women for the purpose of attracting young men, and then sucked their blood like vampires and ate their flesh, were reckoned among the Empusae. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 25; Suid. s. v.) [L. S.]

EMPYLUS, a rhetorician; the companion, as we are told by Plutarch, of Brutus, to whom he dedicated a short essay, not destitute of merit, on the death of Caesar. It is not stated to what country he belonged. "Empylus the Rhodian" is mentioned in a passage of Quintilian, where the text is very doubtful, as an orator referred to by Cicero, but no such name occurs in any extant work of the latter.—(Plut. Brut. 2; Quintil. x. 6. § 4, and Spalding's note). [W. R.]

ENALUS (Ἐναλος). The Penthelides, the first settlers in Lesbos, had received an oracle from Amphitrite commanding them to sacrifice a bull to Poseidon and a virgin to Amphitrite and the Nereides, as soon as they should, on their journey to Lesbos, come to the rock Mesogeion. The leaders of the colonists accordingly caused their daughters to draw lots, the result of which was, that the daughter of Smintheus or Phineus was to be sacrificed. When she was on the point of being thrown into the sea, her lover, Enalus, embraced her, and leaped with her into the deep. But both were saved by dolphins. Once the sea all around Lesbos rose in such high billows, that no one ventured to approach it; Enalus alone had the courage to do so, and when he returned from the sea, he was followed by polypi, the greatest of which was carrying a stone, which Enalus took from it, and dedicated in a temple. (Plut. Sept. Sapient. Conviv. p. 163, c., de Sollert. animal. p. 984. d.) [L. S.]

ENANTIOPHANES. Cujacius, in his Preface to the 60th book of the Basilica, prefixed to the 7th volume of Fabrot's edition of that work, supposes Enantiophanes to be the assumed name of a Græco-Roman jurist, who wrote επι εναρτιοφανών, or concerning the explanation of apparent legal inconsistencies; and Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 35) says that Photius, in his Nomocanon, mentions having written such a work. Fabricius, in a note upon the work of Suarez (which is inserted in the Bibliotheca Græca), states that Balsamo, in his Preface to the Nomocanon of Photius, refers to Enantiophanes. Assemani, however, shews (Bibl. Jur. Orient. ii. 18, p. 389) that there is no reason for attributing a work επι εναρτιοφανών to Photius, that there is no passage in his Nomocanon relating to such a work, and that the sentence in which Balsamo is supposed by Fabricius to refer to Enantiophanes has no such meaning. The εναρτιοφανών βιβλίον is cited in Basil. v. p. 726. Enantiophanes (Basil. vi. p. 250) cites his own book de Legatis et Mortis Causa Donationibus, and the Παραγραφή, or annotation, of Enantiophanes is cited in Basil. vii. p. 496. The period when the jurist lived who bears this name, has been a subject of much dispute. Reiz (ad Theophilum, pp. 1234, 1236) thinks that Enantiophanes wrote before the composition of the Basilica, and marks his name with an asterisk as an ascertained contemporary of Justinian. In Basil. iii. p. 318 Enantiophanes calls Stephanus his master; but this is by no means conclusive. Assemani, misled by Papadopolis, thinks that the Stephanus here meant lived under Alexius Comnenus, and was not the Stephanus who was one of the compilers of Justinian's Digest. The contemporary of Justinian, however, was undoubtedly the person intended; but Stephanus was one of those early Græco-Roman jurists who, like Dominus, Patricius, and Cyrillus, are thought by Zachariæ (Anecdota, p. viii.) to have been called by subsequent jurists masters or teachers in a general sense. (Compare Basil. 11. tit. i. s. 67, sch. ed. Heimbach, i. p. 646.) Zachariæ places Enantiophanes among the jurists who lived before the time of Basiliscus Macedo. (Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delius, § 20. 1, 2.) That he lived before the formation of the present text of the Basilica, appears from his being several times named in the text itself, as in iii. p. 258, where he cites Theophilus; ii. p. 560, where he cites the Code of Justinian; i. 99, where he cites the Novella of Justinian. According to the Scholium on the Basilica (ii. p. 548, ed. Heimbach), he seems to have written notes upon the Digest. That he was alive after the death of Justinian appears from Basil. iii. p. 230 (ed. Heimbach), where he cites a Novell of Justin. On the other hand, Assemani thinks that he wrote after the composition of the Basilica, which, in the Scholium, Basil. i. p. 262, he appears to cite; but it is very likely that here, as in many other places, that which was originally a citation from the Digest has been subsequently changed for convenience into a reference to the Basilica. In Basil. iii. p. 440, he cites Gregorius Doxapater, whom Pohl (followed by Zachariæ), on the supposed authority of Montfaucon, places in the first half of the 12th century; but we have shewn [DOXAPATER] that there is no ground for identifying Gregorius Doxapater with the Doxapater mentioned by Montfaucon.

An eminent jurist of the time of Justinian is frequently cited in the Basilica, and in the Scholia on that work by the appellation of the Anonymous. This writer composed an Index or abridgment of the Novella of Justinian, and was the author of Paratitla (a comparison of parallel passages) in the Digest. To this work the treatise on apparently discordant passages would form a natural sequel; and Mortreuil (Histoire du Droit Byzantin, i. p. 296) makes it probable that Enantiophanes and the Anonymous were the same persons; for in Basil. vi. p. 251 Schol., a passage is ascribed to Enantiophanes, which, in Basil. vi. p. 260, Schol., is attributed to the Anonymous.

Biener (Geschichte der Novellen Justinians, p. 56) threw out the conjecture, that the Anonymous was no other than Julianus, the author of the Latin Epitome of the Novells; and Zachariæ (Anecdota, p. 204-7) attempts to establish this conjecture. Mortreuil seems disposed to identify the three.

In order to facilitate investigation, we subjoin a list (formed from Reiz and Fabricius) of passages in the Basilica where the name of Enantiophanes occurs.

Basil. i. pp. 70, 99, 100, 109, 260, 408, 262, 265, 266, ii. pp. 540, 560, 609, 610, 628, iii. pp. 43, 170, 258, 318, 393, 394, 412, v. p. 726, vi. 250, 251, 260, vii. 496, 499, 565, 640, 641. (Heimbach, de Basil. Orig. pp. 76-79.) [J. T. G.]

ENAREPHORUS (Ἐναρφήροπος), a son of Hippocoön, was a most passionate suitor of Helen, when she was yet quite young. Tyndareus, therefore, entrusted the maiden to the care of Theseus. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 5; Plut. Thes. 31.) Enarephorus had a heroum at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 15. § 2.) [L. S.]

ENCELADUS (Ἐγκέλαδος), a son of Tartarus and Ge, and one of the hundred-armed giants who made war upon the gods. (Hygin. Fab. Præf. p. 1; Virg. Aen. iv. 179; Ov. Ep. ex Pont. ii. 2. 12, Amor. iii. 12. 27.) He was killed, according to some, by Zeus, by a flash of lightning, and buried under mount Aetna (Virg. Aen. iii. 578); and, according to others, he was killed by the chariot of Athena (Paus. viii. 47. § 1), or by the spear of Seilenus. (Eurip. Cyclops, 7.) In his flight Athena threw upon him the island of Sicily. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2.) There are two other fabulous beings of this name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 918.) [L.S.]

ENCO'LPIUS. [ΠΕΤΡΟΝΙΟΣ.]

ENCO'LPIUS is named by Lampridius as the author of a life of the emperor Alexander Severus, with whom he lived upon terms of intimacy. (Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 17, 48.)

A book published by Thomas Elyot, a man celebrated for his learning in the reign of Henry VIII., under the title "The Image of Governance (Imago Imperii) compiled of the Actes and Sentences notable of the most noble emperor Alexander Severus, translated from the Greek of Encolpius into English." Lond. 1540, 1541, 1544, 1549, 4to., 1556, 1594, 8vo., is a fabrication. [W. R.]

ENDEIS ('Ενδής), a daughter of Chiron, who was married to Aeneas, by whom she became the mother of Peleus and Telamon. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.) Pausanias (ii. 29. § 7) calls her a daughter of Sciron. [L.S.]

ENDIUS ('Ενδιος), of Sparta, son of Alcibiades, member of a family whose connexion with that of the Athenian Alcibiades had in a previous generation introduced into the latter this Lacedæmonian name. It is he apparently who was one of the three ambassadors sent by Sparta in 420 B. C. to dissuade Athens from the Argive alliance. They were chosen, says Thucydides, from the belief of their being acceptable to the Athenians, and possibly in particular with a view to conciliate his guest, Alcibiades, who probably made use of this very advantage in effecting the deception by which he defeated their purpose. He was elected ephor in the autumn of 413, the time of the Athenian disaster at Syracuse, and through him Alcibiades, now in exile, inflicted on his country the severe blow of bringing the Lacedæmonians to the coast of Ionia, which otherwise would at any rate have been postponed. His influence decided the government to lend its first succour to Chios; and when the blockade of their ships in Peirææus seemed likely to put a stop to all operations, he again persuaded Endius and his colleagues to make the attempt. Thucydides says, that Alcibiades was his παρὸς δὲ τὰ μέγιστα φίλος; so that probably it was with him that Alcibiades resided during his stay at Sparta. (Thuc. v. 44, viii. 6, 12.) To these facts we may venture to add from Diodorus (xiii. 52, 53) the further statement, that after the defeat at Cyzicus, B. C. 410, he was sent from Sparta at the head of an embassy to Athens with proposals for peace of the fairest character, which were, however, through the influence of the presumptuous demagogue Cleophon, rejected. Endius, as the friend of Alcibiades, the victor of Cyzicus, would naturally be selected; and the account of Diodorus, with the exception of course of the oration he writes for Endius, may, notwithstanding the silence of Xenophon, be received as true in the main. [A. H. C.]

ENDOEU8 ('Ενδῆος), an Athenian statuary, is called a disciple of Daedalus, whom he is said to have accompanied when he fled to Crete. This statement must be taken to express, not the time at which he lived, but the style of art which he practised. It is probable that he lived at the same period as Dipoenus and Scyllia, who are in the same way called disciples of Daedalus, namely, in the time of Peisistratus and his sons, about B. C. 560. (Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 124, 125.) His works were: 1. In the acropolis at Athens a sitting statue of Athena, in olive-wood, with an inscription to the effect that Callias dedicated it, and Endoeus made it. Hence his age is inferred, for the first Callias who is mentioned in history is the opponent of Peisistratus. (Herod. vi. 121.) 2. In the temple of Athena Polias at Erythrae in Ionia, a colossal wooden statue of the goddess, sitting on a throne, holding a distaff in each hand, and having a sun-dial (ῥολοῖον) on the head. 3. In connexion with this statue, there stood in the hypæthrum, before the visit of Pausanias to the temple, statues of the Graces and Hours, in white marble, also by Endoeus. 4. A statue of Athena Alea, in her temple at Tegea, made entirely of ivory, which was transported to Rome by Augustus, and set up in the entrance of his forum. (Paus. i. 26. § 5; vii. 5. § 4; viii. 46. § 2; Athenag. Legat. pro Christ. p. 293, a.) [P. S.]

ENDYMION ('Ενδυμιών), a youth distinguished for his beauty, and renowned in ancient story by the perpetual sleep in which he spent his life. Some traditions about Endymion refer us to Elis, and others to Caria, and others again are a combination of the two. According to the first set of legends, he was a son of Æthlius and Calyce, or of Zeus and Calyce, and succeeded Æthlius in the kingdom of Elis. (Paus. v. 1. § 2.) Others again say that he expelled Clymenus from the kingdom of Elis, and introduced into the country Æolian settlers from Thessaly. (Apollod. i. 7. § 5, &c.; Paus. v. 8. § 1.) Conon (Narrat. 14) calls him a son of Zeus and Protogeneia, and Hyginus (Fab. 271) a son of Aetolus. He is said to have been married to Asterodia, Chromia, Hyperippe, Neïs, or Iphianassa; and Aetolus, Pæon, Epæus, Eurydice, and Naxus are called his children. He was, however, especially beloved by Selene, by whom he had fifty daughters. (Paus. v. 1. § 2.) He caused his sons to engage in the race-course at Olympia, and promised to the victor the succession in his kingdom, and Epæus conquered his brothers, and succeeded Endymion as king of Elis. He was believed to be buried at Olympia, which also contained a statue of his in the treasury of the Metapontians. (Paus. vi. 19. § 8, 20. § 6.) According to a tradition, believed at Heracleia in Caria, Endymion had come from Elis to mount Latmus in Caria, whence he is called the Latmian (Latmīus; Paus. v. 1. § 4; Or Arm. As. iii. 83, Trist. ii. 299). He is described by the poets either as a king, a shepherd, or a hunter (Theocrit. iii. 49, xx. 37 with the Scholiast), and while he was alumbering in a cave of mount Latmus, Selene came down to him, kissed, and lay by his side. (Comp. Apollon. Rhod. iv. 57.) There also he had, in later times, a sanctuary, and his tomb was shewn in a cave of mount Latmus. (Paus. v. 1. § 4; Strab. xiv. p. 636.) His eternal sleep on Latmus is assigned to different causes in ancient story. Some said that Zeus had granted him a request, and that Endymion begged for immortality, eternal sleep, and everlasting youth (Apollod. i. 7. § 5.); others relate that he was received among the gods of Olympus, but as he there fell in love with Hera, Zeus, in his anger, punished him by throwing him into eternal sleep on mount Latmus. (Schol. ad Theocrit. iii. 49.) Others, lastly, state that Selene, charmed with his surpassing beauty, sent him to sleep, that she might be able to kiss him without being observed by him. (Cic. Tuscul. i. 38.) The stories of the fair sleeper, Endymion, the darling of Selene, are unquestionably poetical fictions, in which sleep is personified. His name and all his attributes confirm this opinion: Endymion signifies a being that gently comes over one; he is called a king, because he has power over all living creatures; a shepherd, because he slumbered in the cool caves of mount Latmus, that is, "the mount of oblivion." Nothing can be more beautiful, lastly, than the notion, that he is kissed by the soft rays of the moon. (Comp. Plat. Phaed. p. 72 b; Ov. Am. i. 13. 43.) There is a beautiful statue of a sleeping Endymion in the British Museum. [L. S.]

ENIPEUS (Ἐνίπεος), a river-god in Thessaly, who was beloved by Tyro, the daughter of Salmonesus. Poseidon, who was in love with her, assumed the appearance of Enipeus, and thus visited her, and she became by him the mother of twins, Pelias and Neleus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 8.) Ovid (Met. vi. 116) relates that Poseidon, having assumed the form of Enipeus, begot by Iphimedeia two sons, Otus and Ephialtes. Another river-god of the same name occurs in Elia, who is likewise connected with the legend about Tyro. (Strab. viii. p. 356.) [L. S.]

ENNIA, called ENNIA THRASYLLA by Dion Cassius, and ENNIA NAEVIA by Suetonius, was the wife of Macro and the mistress of Caligula. Her husband murdered Tiberius in order to accelerate the accession of Caligula; but this emperor, like a true tyrant, disliking to see those to whom he was under obligation, put to death Ennia and her husband. (Dion. Cass. lvi. 28, lix. 10; Tac. Ann. vi. 45; Suet. Cal. 12, 26.)

ENNIUS, whom the Romans ever regarded with a sort of filial reverence as the parent of their literature—nostrum Ennius, our own Ennius, as he is styled with fond familiarity—was born in the consulship of C. Mamilius Turpinus and C. Valerius Falto, B.C. 239, the year immediately following that in which the first regular drama had been exhibited on the Roman stage by Livius Andronicus. The place of his nativity was Rudiae, a Calabrian village among the hills near Brundisium. He claimed descent from the ancient lords of Messapia; and after he had become a convert to the Pythagorean doctrine, was wont to boast that the spirit which had once animated the body of the immortal Homer, after passing through many tenements, after residing among others in a peacock, and in the sage of Crotona, had eventually passed into his own frame. Of his early history we know nothing, except, if we can trust the loose poetical testimony of Silius and Claudian, that he served with credit as a soldier, and rose to the rank of a centurion. When M. Porcius Cato, who had filled the office of quaestor under Scipio in the African war, was returning home, he found Ennius in Sardinia, became acquainted with his high powers, and brought him in his train to Rome, our poet being at that time about the age of thirty-eight. But his military ardour was not yet quenched; for twelve years afterwards he accompanied M. Fulvius Nobilior during the Aetolian campaign, and shared his triumph. It is recorded that the victorious general, at the instigation probably of his literary friend, consecrated the spoils captured from the enemy to the Muses, and subsequently, when Censor, dedicated a joint temple to Hercules and the Nine. Through the son of Nobilior, Ennius, when far advanced in life, obtained the rights of a citizen, a privilege which at that epoch was guarded with watchful jealousy, and very rarely granted to an alien. From the period, however, when he quitted Sardinia, he seems to have made Rome his chief abode; for there his great poetical talents, and an amount of learning which must have been considered marvellous in those days, since he was master of three languages,—Oscan, Latin, and Greek,—gained for him the respect and favour of all who valued such attainments; and, in particular, he lived upon terms of the closest intimacy with the conqueror of Hannibal and other members of that distinguished family. Dwelling in a humble mansion on the Aventine, attended by a single female slave, he maintained himself in honourable poverty by acting as a preceptor to patrician youths; and having lived on happily to a good age, was carried off by a disease of the joints, probably gout, when seventy years old, soon after the completion of his great undertaking, which he closes by comparing himself to a race-horse, in these prophetic lines:—

Like some brave steed, who in his latest race
Hath won the Olympic wreath; the contest o'er, Sinks to repose, worn out by age and toil.

At the desire of Africanus, his remains were deposited in the sepulchre of the Scipios, and his bust allowed a place among the effigies of that noble house. His epitaph, penned by himself in the undoubting anticipation of immortal fame, has been preserved, and may be literally rendered thus:—

Romans, behold old Ennius! whose lays Built up on high your mighty fathers' praise!
Pour not the wail of mourning o'er my bier,
Nor pay to me the tribute of a tear:
Still, still I live! from mouth to mouth I fly!
Never forgotten, never shall I die!

The works of Ennius are believed to have existed entire so late as the thirteenth century (A. G. Cramer, Hauckronick, p. 228), but they have long since disappeared as an independent whole, and nothing now remains but fragments collected from other ancient writers. These amount in all to many hundred lines; but a large proportion being quotations cited by grammarians for the purpose of illustrating some rare form, or determining the signification of some obsolete word, are mere scraps, possessing little interest for any one but a philologist. Some extracts of a longer and more satisfactory character are to be found in Cicero, who gives us from the annals,—the dream of Ilia (18 lines); the conflicting auspices observed by Romulus and Remus (20 lines); and the speech of Pyrrhus with regard to ransoming the prisoners (8 lines): besides these, a passage from the Andromache (18 lines); a curious invective against itinerant fortune-tellers, probably from the Satires; and a few others of less importance. Aulus Gellius has saved eighteen consecutive verses, in which the duties and bearing of a humble friend towards his superior are bodied forth in very spirited phraseology, forming a picture which it was believed that the poet intended for a portrait of himself, while Macrobius presents us with a battle piece (8 lines), where a tribune is described as gallantly resisting the attack of a crowd of foes.

Although under these circumstances it is extremely difficult to form any accurate judgment with regard to his absolute merits as a poet, we are at least certain that his success was triumphant. For a long series of years his strains were read aloud to applauding multitudes, both in the metropolis and in the provinces; and a class of men arose who, in imitation of the Homeristæ, devoted themselves exclusively to the study and recitation of his works, receiving the appellation of Ennianistæ. In the time of Cicero he was still considered the prince of Roman song (Ennius summum Epicum postum—de Opt. G. O. I. Summus poeta noster—pro Balb. 22); Virgil was not ashamed to borrow many of his thoughts, and not a few of his expressions; and even the splendour of the Augustan age failed to throw him into the shade. And well did he merit the gratitude of his adopted countrymen; for not only did he lay the basis of their literature, but actually constructed their language. He found the Latin tongue a rough, meagre, uncultivated dialect, made up of ill-cemented fragments, gathered at random from a number of different sources, subject to no rules which might secure its stability, and destitute of any regular system of versification. He softened its asperities, he enlarged its vocabulary, he regulated its grammatical combinations, he amalgamated into one harmonious whole its various conflicting elements, and he introduced the heroic hexameter, and various other metres, long carefully elaborated by Grecian skill. Even in the disjointed and mutilated remains which have been transmitted to us, we observe a vigour of imagination, a national boldness of tone, and an energy of expression which amply justify the praises so liberally launched on his genius by the ancients; and although we are perhaps at first repelled by the coarseness, clumsiness, and antique fashion of the garb in which his high thoughts are invested, we cannot but feel that what was afterwards gained in smoothness and refinement is a poor compensation for the loss of that freshness and strength which breathe the hearty spirit of the brave old days of Roman simplicity and freedom. The criticism of Ovid, "Ennius ingenio maximus arte rudis," is fair, and happily worded; but the fine simile of Quintilian, "Ennius sicut sacros vetustate lucos adoremus, in quibus grandia et antiqua robora, jam non tantam habent speciem, quantum religionem," more fully embodies our sentiments.

We subjoin a catalogue of the works of Ennius, in so far as their titles can be ascertained.

I. Annalium Libri XVIII. The most important of all his productions was a history of Rome in dactylic hexameters, commencing with the loves of Mars and Rhea, and reaching down to his own times. The subject was selected with great judgment. The picturesque fables, romantic legends, and chivalrous exploits with which it abounded, afforded full scope for the exercises of his poetical powers; he was enabled to testify gratitude towards his personal friends, and to propitiate the nobles as a body, by extolling their own lofty deeds and the glories of their sires; and perhaps no theme could have been chosen so well calculated to awaken the enthusiasm of all ranks among a proud, warlike, and as yet unlettered people. His fancy was cramped by none of those fetters imposed by a series of well ascertained facts; he was left to work his will upon the rude ballads of the vulgar, the wild traditions of the old patrician clans, and the meagre chronicles of the priests. Niebuhr conjectures that the beautiful history of the kings in Livy may have been taken from Ennius. No great space, however, was allotted to the earlier records, for the contest with Hannibal, which was evidently described with great minuteness, commenced with the seventh book, the first Punic war being passed over altogether, as we are told by Cicero. (Brut. 19.)

II. Fabulæ. The fame of Ennius as a dramatist, was little inferior to his reputation as an epic bard. His pieces, which were very numerous, appear to have been all translations or adaptations from the Greek, the metres of the originals being in most cases closely imitated. Fragments have been preserved of the following tragedies: Achilles, Achilles (Aristarchi), Ajax, Alcmaeon, Alexander, Andromacha, Andromeda, Antiope, Athamas, Cerephontes, Dulocestes, Erectheus, Eumenides, Hectoris Lytra, Hecuba, Iliona (doubtful), Iphigenia, Medea, Medus, Melanippa or Melanippus, Nemea, Nooptolemus, Phoenix, Telamon, Telephus, Thyestes; and of the following comedies, belonging to the class of palliatæ: Ambrosia, Capimacula (perhaps Capriculus), Celestis (name very doubtful), Pancratistæ, a Pancratistæ.

For full information as to the sources from whence these were derived, consult the editions of Hesselius and Bothe, together with the dissertations of Ossann referred to at the end of this article.

III. Satiræ. In four (Porphyr. ad Hor. Sat. i. 10), or according to others (Donat. ad Terent. Phorm. ii. 2. 25) in six books, of which less than twenty-five scattered lines are extant, but from these it is evident that the Satiræ were composed in a great variety of metres, and from this circumstance, in all probability, received their appellation.

IV. Scipio. A panegyric upon the public career of his friend and patron, Africanus. The measure adopted seems to have been the trochaic tetrameter catalectic, although a line quoted, possibly by mistake, in Macrobius (Sat. vi. 4) is a dactylic hexameter. The five verses and a half which we possess of this piece do not enable us to decide whether Valerius Maximus was entitled to term it (viii. 14) rude et impositum præconium. (Suidas, s. v. Ennius; Schol. vet. ad Hor. Sat. ii. l. 16.) Some scholars have supposed that the Scipio was in reality a drama belonging to the class of the proælestasæ.

V. Asotus. Varro and Festus when examining into the meaning of certain uncommon words, quote from "Ennius in Asoto," or as Scaliger, very erroneously, insists "in Sotadico." The subject and nature of this piece are totally unknown. Many believe it to have been a comedy.

VI. Epicharmus. From a few remnants, amounting altogether to little more than twenty lines, we gather that this must have been a philosophical didactic poem in which the nature of the gods, the human mind and its phenomena, the physical structure of the universe and various kindred topics, were discussed. From the title we conclude, that it was translated or imitated from Epicharmus the comic poet, who was a disciple of Pythagoras and is known to have written De Rerum Natura.

VII. Phagetica, Phagesia, Hedyphagetica. These and many other titles have been assigned to a work upon edible fishes, which Ennius may perhaps have translated from Archestratus. [ARCHESTRATUS.] Eleven lines in dactylic hexameters have been preserved by Apuleius exhibiting a mere catalogue of names and localities. They are given, with some preliminary remarks, in Wernsdorff's Poet. Lat. Min. vol. i. pp. 157 and 187. See also Apuleius, Apolog. p. 299 ed. Elmenh.; P. Pithoeus, Epigramm. vet. iv. fin.; Parrhas. Epist. 65; Trillerus, Observat. crit. i. 14; Scaliger Catalect. vet. poet. p. 215; Turneb. Advers. xxi. 21; Salmas. ad Solin. p. 794, ed. Traj.; Burmann, Anthol. Lat. iii. 135; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. lib. iv. c. 1. § 7.

VIII. Epigrammata. Under this head we have two short epitaphs upon Scipio Africanus, and one upon Ennius himself, the whole in elegiac verse, extending collectively to ten lines.

IX. Protreptica. The title seems to indicate that this was a collection of precepts exhorting the reader to the practice of virtue. We cannot, however, tell much about it nor even discover whether it was written in prose or verse, since one word only is known to us, namely passibus quoted by Charisius.

X. Præcepta. Very probably the same with the preceding. From the remains of three lines in Priscian we conclude that it was composed in iambic trimeters.

XI. Sabinæ. Angelo Mai in a note on Cic. De Rep. ii. 8, gives a few words in prose from "Ennius in Sabinia" without informing us where he found them. Columna has pointed out that in Macrobius, Sat. vi. 5, we ought to read "Ennius in libro Saturnarum quarto" instead of Sabinarum as it stands in the received text.

XII. Euhemerus, a translation into Latin prose of the ἑρπυρία of Euhemerus [EUSEMERUS.] Several short extracts are contained in Lactantius, and a single word in the De Re Rustica of Varro.

Censorinus (c. 19) tells us, that according to Ennius the year consisted of 366 days, and hence it has been conjectured that he was the author of some astronomical treatise. But an expression of this sort may have been dropped incidentally, and is not sufficient to justify such a supposition without further evidence.

The first general collection of the fragments of Ennius is that contained in the "Fragmenta veterum Poetarum Latinorum" by Robert and Henry Stephens, Paris, 8vo. 1564. It is exceedingly imperfect and does not include any portion of the Euhemerus, which being in prose was excluded from the plan.

Much more complete and accurate are "Q. Ennii poetæ vetustissimi, quæ supersunt, fragmenta," collected, arranged, and expounded, by Hieronymus Columna, Neapol. 4to. 1590, reprinted with considerable additions, comprising the commentaries of Delrio and G. J. Voss, by Hesselius, professor of history and eloquence at Rotterdam, Amstel. 4to. 1707. This must be considered as the best edition of the collected fragments which has yet appeared.

Five years after Columna's edition a new edition of the Annales was published at Leyden (4to. 1595) by Paulinus Merula, a Dutch lawyer, who professed not only to have greatly purified the text, and to have introduced many important corrections in the arrangement and distribution of the different portions, but to have made considerable additions to the relics previously discovered. The new verses were gathered chiefly from a work by L. Calpurnius Piso, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, bearing the title De Continentia Veterum Poetarum ad Trajanum Principem, a MS. of which Merula tells us that he examined hastily in the library of St. Victor at Paris, accompanying this statement with an inexplicable and most suspicious remark, that he was afraid the volume would be stolen. It is certain that this codex, if it ever existed, has long since disappeared, and the lines in question are regarded with well-merited suspicion. (Niebuhr, Lectures on Roman History, edited by Dr. Schmitz, Intro. p. 35; Hoch, De Ennianorum Annalium Fragmentis a P. Merula auctis, Bonn, 1839.)

The Annales from the text of Merula are reprinted, but not very accurately, with some trifling additions, and with the fragments of the Punic war of Naevius, by E. S. (Ernst Spangenberg), 8vo. Lips. 1825.

The fragments of the tragedies were carefully collected and examined by M. A. Delrio in his Synlogia Tragoediarum Latinæ, vol. i. Antv. 4to. 1593; reprinted at Paris in 1607 and 1619: they will be found also in the Collectanea veterum Tragicorum of Scriverius, to which are appended the emendations and notes of G. J. Vossius, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1620. The fragments of both the tragedies and comedies are contained in Bothe, Poetarum Latiniæ sceniorum fragmenta, Halberst. 8vo. 1823. The fragments of the Medea, with a dissertation on the origin and nature of Roman tragedy, were published by H. Planck, Götting. 4to. 1805, and the fragments of the Medea and of the Hecuba, compared with the plays of Euripides bearing the same names, are contained in the Analecta Critica Poesiæ Romanorum scenicas reliquias illustrantis of Osann, Berolin. 8vo. 1816.

ENNODIVS, MAGNUS FELIX, was born at Arles about A. D. 476, of a very illustrious family, which numbered among its members and connexions many of the most illustrious personages of that epoch. Having been despoiled while yet a boy of all his patrimony by the Visigoths, he was educated at Milan by an aunt, upon whose death he found himself at the age of sixteen again reduced to total destitution. From this unhappy position he was extricated by a wealthy marriage, but having been prevailed upon by St. Epiphanius to renounce the pleasures of the world, he received ordination as a deacon, and induced his wife to enter a convent. His labours in the service of the Church were so conspicuous that he was chosen bishop of Pavia in A. D. 511, and in 514 was sent, along with Fortunatus, bishop of Catania, and others, by Pope Hormisdas to Constantinople in order to combat the progress of the Eutychian heresy. The embassy having proved unsuccessful in consequence of the emperor, who was believed to be favourable to the opinions in question, having refused to acknowledge the authority of the Roman pontiff, Ennodius was despatched a second time in 517, along with Peregrinus, bishop of Misenum, bearing a confession of faith, which the eastern churches were invited or rather required to subscribe. On this occasion the envoy was treated with great harshness by Anastasius, who not only dismissed him with ignominy, but even sought his life, by causing him to embark in a crazy vessel, which was strictly forbidden to touch at any Grecian port. Having escaped this danger, Ennodius returned to his diocese, where he occupied himself with religious labours until his death in A. D. 521, on the 17th of July, the day which after his canonization was observed as his festival.

1. Epistolarum ad Diversos Libri IX. A collection of 497 letters, including one composed by his sister, the greater number of them written during the pontificate of Symmachus (493—514). They for the most part relate to private concerns and domestic occurrences, and hence possess little general interest. They are remarkable for gentleness and piety of tone, but some persons have imagined that they could detect a leaning towards semipelagianism. The charge, however, has not been by any means substantiated.

2. Panegyricus Theodorico regi dictus. A complimentary address delivered in the presence of the Gothic monarch at Milan, or at Ravenna, or at Rome, probably in the year A. D. 507. It is sometimes included in the collections of the "Panegyrici Veteres," and is considered as one of the principal sources for the history of that period, although obviously no reliance can be placed on the statements contained in an effusion of such a character. [DREPMANUS.] It will be found, with notes, in Manso, Geschichte des Ostgoth. Reichs, p. 433.

3. Libellus adversus eos qui contra synodum scribere praesumerunt. A powerful and argumentative harangue, read before the fifth Roman synod held in A. D. 503, and adopted as part of their proceedings, in defence of the measures sanctioned by the synod of the previous year, against schismatics, and in support of the jurisdiction of the Roman pontiff generally.

4. Vita beatissimi viri Epiphanius Ticinensis episcopi. A biography of St. Epiphanius, his predecessor in the see of Pavia, who died in A. D. 496. This piece is valued on account of the light which it throws upon the history of the times, and is considered one of the most interesting and agreeable among the works of Ennodius, which, to say the truth, are for the most part rather repulsive. It will be found in the collections of Surius and the Bollandists under the 22nd of January.

5. Vita beati Antonii monachi Livinensis, a panegyric upon a holy man unknown save from this tract.

6. Eucharisticum de vita, a thanksgiving for recovery from a dangerous malady, during which the author was first led to those thoughts which eventually prompted him to devote his life to the service of God. It is dedicated to Elpidius, a deacon and physician.

7. Parænesis didascalica ad Ambrosium et Beatum, an exhortation, in which poetry is combined with prose, urging two youths to the practice of virtue.

8. Præceptum de cellulanis episcoporum. The cellulani were the contubernales whom bishops, presbyters, and deacons were required to retain as constant companions "ad amolendas maledicorum calumnias." (See Ducange, Glossar.) In this tract they are called concellanei.

9. Petitorium quo Gerontius puer Agopiti absolutus est. On the manumission of a slave by his master in the church.

10. Correi paschalis benedictiones duae.

11. Orationes. A series of short essays or declamations, twenty eight in number, which the author himself names dictiones, classified according to their subjects. Of these six are sacrae, seven scholasticae, ten controversiae, five ethicae.

12. Carmena. A large collection of poems, most of them short occasional effusions, on a multitude of different topics, sacred and profane. Fourteen are to be found interspersed among his epistles and other prose works, and one hundred and seventy-two form a separate collection.

The writings of Ennodius might serve as an exemplification of all the worst faults of a corrupt style. Nothing can be more affected than the form of expression, nothing more harsh than the diction. They are concise without being vigorous, obscure without being deep, while the use of figurative language, metaphors, and allegories, is pushed to such extravagant excess that whole pages wear the aspect of a long dull enigma.

A considerable number of the works of this father appeared in the "Monumenta S. Patrum Orthodoxographia," Basil. fol., 1569; they were first published separately by Andr. Schottus, Tornac. 8vo. 1611, but will be found in their most complete and best form in the edition of Sirmond, Paris. 8vo. 1611, and in his Opera, vol. i. fol., Paris. 1696, and Venet. 1729; also in the Bibl. Patr. Max. Lugdun. 1677, vol. ix., and in other large collections of the fathers.

Martenne and Durand (Collect. Monum. vol. v. p. 61) have added a new oration and a short letter to Venantius.

(See the Vita Ennodii prefixed to the edition of Sirmond. A very full biography is given by Funccius also, De inerti ac decrepita L. L. senectute, c. iii. § xx., c. vi. § viii., c. viii. § x., c. li. § xxxi.) [W. R.]

ENNOMUS (Ἐννομος), a Mysian and ally of the Trojans, who was killed by Achilles. (Hom. Il. ii. 858, xvii. 218.) Another person of this name occurs in the Odyssey (xi. 422). [L. S.]

ENORCHES (Ἐνὸρχος), a son of Thyestes by his sister Daeta, was born out of an egg, and built a temple to Dionysus, who was hence called Dionysus Enorches, though Enorches may also describe the god as the dancer. (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 212; Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

ENTELLUS, a Trojan, or a Sicilian hero from whom the town of Entella, in Sicily, was believed to have received its name. (Virg. Aen. v. 389, with Servius.) Tzetzes (ad Lycoph. 953) states, that Entella was so called from Entella, the wife of Aegestes. [L. S.]

ENTOCCHUS, a sculptor, whose Oceanus and Jupiter were in the collection of Asinius Pollio. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.) [P. S.]

ENTORIA ('Ἐντορία), the daughter of a Roman countryman. Cronos (Saturn) who was once hospitably received by him, became, by his fair daughter, the father of four sons, Janus, Hymnus, Faustus, and Felix. Cronos taught the father the cultivation of the vine and the preparation of wine, enjoining him to teach his neighbours the same. This was done accordingly, but the country people, who became intoxicated with their new drink, thought it to be poison, and stoned their neighbour to death, whereupon his grandsons hung themselves in their grief. At a much later time, when the Romans were visited by a plague, they were told by the Delphic oracle, that the plague was a punishment for the outrage committed on Entoria's father, and Latinius Catulus caused a temple to be erected to Cronos on the Tarpeian rock, and in it an altar with four faces. (Plut. Parall. Gr. et Rom. 9.) [L. S.]

ENYALÍUS ('Ἐνυάλιος), the warlike, frequently occurs in the Iliad (never in the Odyssey) either as an epithet of Ares, or as a proper name instead of Ares. (xvii. 211, ii. 651, vii. 166, viii. 264, xiii. 519, xvii. 259, xviii. 309, xx. 69; comp. Pind. Ol. xiii. 102, Nem. ix. 37.) At a later time, however, Enyalíus and Ares were distinguished as two different gods of war, and Enyalíus was looked upon as a son of Ares and Enyo, or of Cronos and Rhea. (Aristoph. Pax, 457; Dionys. A. R. iii. 48; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 944.) The name is evidently derived from Enyo, though one tradition derived it from a Thracian Enyalíus, who received into his house those only who conquered him in single combat, and for the same reason refused to receive Ares, but the latter slew him. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 673.) The youths of Sparta sacrificed young dogs to Ares under the name of Enyalíus (Paus. iii. 14. § 9), and near the temple of Hippodamia, at Sparta, there stood the ancient fettered statue of Enyalíus. (Paus. iii. 15. § 5; comp. ARRA.) Dionysus, too, is said to have been surnamed Enyalíus. (Macrob. Sat. i. 19.) [L. S.]

ENYO ('Ἐνϋ'), the goddess of war, who delights in bloodshed and the destruction of towns, and accompanies Mars in battles. (Hom. Il. v. 333, 592; Eustath. p. 140.) At Thebes and Orchomenos, a festival called Ἐνϋολία was celebrated in honour of Zeus, Demeter, Athena and Enyo, and Zeus was said to have received the surname of Homoloíus from Homoloís, a priestess of Enyo. (Suid. s. v.; comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 229, 2nd edit.) A statue of Enyo, made by the sons of Praxiteles, stood in the temple of Ares at Athens. (Paus. i. 8. § 5.) Among the Græcæ in Hesiod (Theog. 273) there is one called Enyo. Respecting the Roman goddess of war see BELLONA. [L. S.]

EOS ('Ἥως'), in Latin Aurora, the goddess of the morning red, who brings up the light of day from the east. She was a daughter of Hyperion and Theia or Euryphassa, and a sister of Helios and Selene. (Hes. Theog. 371, &c.; Hom. Hymn in Sol. ii.) Ovid (Met. ix. 420, Fast. iv. 373) calls her a daughter of Pallas. At the close of night she rose from the couch of her beloved Tithonus, and on a chariot drawn by the swift horses Lampus and Phaëton she ascended up to heaven from the river Oceanus, to announce the coming light of the sun to the gods as well as to mortals. (Hom. Od. v. 1, &c., xxiii. 244; Virg. Aen. iv. 129, Georg. i. 446; Hom. Hymn in Merc. 185; Theocrit. ii. 148, xiii. 11.) In the Homeric poems Eos not only announces the coming Helios, but accompanies him throughout the day, and her career is not complete till the evening; hence she is sometimes mentioned where one would have expected Helios (Od. v. 390, x. 144); and the tragic writers completely identify her with Hemea, of whom in later times the same myths are related as of Eos. (Paus. i. 3. § 1, iii. 18. § 7.) The later Greek and the Roman poets followed, on the whole, the notions of Eos, which Homer had established, and the splendour of a southern aurora, which lasts much longer than in our climate, is a favourite topic with the ancient poets. Mythology represents her as having carried off several youths distinguished for their beauty. Thus she carried away Orion, but the gods were angry at her for it, until Artemis with a gentle arrow killed him. (Hom. Od. v. 121.) According to Apollodorus (i. 4. § 4) Eos carried Orion to Delos, and was ever stimulated by Aphrodite. Cleitus, the son of Mantius, was carried by Eos to the seats of the immortal gods (Od. xv. 250), and Tithonus, by whom she became the mother of Emathion and Memnon, was obtained in like manner. She begged of Zeus to make him immortal, but forgot to request him to add eternal youth. So long as he was young and beautiful, she lived with him at the end of the earth, on the banks of Oceanus; and when he grew old, she nursed him, until at length his voice disappeared and his body became quite dry. She then locked the body up in her chamber, or metamorphosed it into a cricket. (Hom. Hymn in Ven. 218, &c.; Horat. Carm. i. 32. 8, ii. 16. 30; Apollod. iii. 12. § 4; Hes. Theog. 984; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 447, iii. 328, Aen. iv. 585.) When her son Memnon was going to fight against Achilles, she asked Hephaestus to give her arms for him, and when Memnon was killed, her tears fell down in the form of morning dew. (Virg. Aen. viii. 384.) By Astræus Eos became the mother of Zephyrus, Boreas, Notus, Heosphorus, and the other stars. (Hesiod. Theog. 378.) Cephalus was carried away by her from the summit of mount Hymettus to Syria, and by him she became the mother of Phaëton or Tithonus, the father of Phaëton; but afterwards she restored her beloved to his wife Procris. (Hes. Theog. 984; Apollod. iii. 14. § 3; Paus. i. 3. § 1; Or. Met. vii. 703, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 189; comp. CYPHALUS.) Eos was represented in the pediment of the king's stoa at Athens in the act of carrying off Cephalus, and in the same manner she was seen on the throne of the Amyclæan Apollo. (Paus. i. 3. § 1, iii. 18. § 7.) At Olympia she was represented in the act of praying to Zeus for Memnon. (v. 22. § 2.) In the works of art still extant, she appears as a winged goddess or in a chariot drawn by four horses. [L. S.]

EPACTAEUS or EPACTÍUS ('Ἐπακταῖος or 'Ἐπακτικός'), that is, the god worshipped on the coast, was used as a surname of Poseidon in Samos (Heych. s. v.), and of Apollo. (Orph. Argon. 1296; Apollon. Rhod. i. 404.) [L. S.]

EPAENETUS ('Ἐπαίνετος'), a culinary author frequently referred to by Athenæus, wrote one work "On Fishes" (Περὶ ὕψιδων, Athen. vii. p. 328, f.), and another "On the Art of Cookery" (Ὀψοποιετικά, Athen. ii. p. 58, b, iii. p. 88, c., vii. pp. 294, d., 297, c., 304, d., 305, e., 312, b., 313, b., ix. pp. 371, e., 395, f., xii. p. 516, e., xiv. p. 662, d.)

EPA'GATHUS, a profligate freedman, who along with Theocritus, a personage of the same class and stamp with himself, exercised unbounded influence over Caracalla, and was retained in the service of his successor. After the disastrous battle of Antioch, he was despatched by Macrinus to place Diadumenianus under the protection of the Parthian king, Artabanus; and at a subsequent period we find that the death of the celebrated Domitius Ulpianus was ascribed to his machinations, although the causes and circumstances of that event are involved in deep obscurity. Alexander Severus, apprehensive lest some tumult should arise at Rome, were he openly to take vengeance on Epagathus, nominated him Praefect of Egypt; but soon afterwards recalling him from thence, caused him to be conducted to Crete, and there quietly put to death. [MACRINUS; DIADUMENIANUS; ULPIANUS]. (Dion. Cass. lxxvii. 21, lxxviii. 39, lxxx. 2.) [W. R.]

EPAINE ('Εραϊνή), that is, the fearful, a surname of Persephone. (Hom. Il. ix. 457.) Plutarch (de Aud. poet. p. 23, a.) derives the name from alves, which suggests, that it might also be understood in a euphemistic sense as the praised goddess. [L. S.]

EPAMINONDAS (Ἐπαμεινώνδας, Ἐπαμεινώνδας), the Theban general and statesman, son of Polymnis, was born and reared in poverty, though his blood was noble. In his early years he is said to have enjoyed the instructions of Lysis of Tarentum, the Pythagorean, and we seem to trace the practical influence of this philosophy in several passages of his later life. (Plut. Pelop. 3, de Gen. Soc. 8, &c.; Ael. V. H. ii. 43, iii. 17, v. 5, xii. 43; Paus. iv. 31, viii. 52, ix. 13, C. Nep. Epam. 1, 2; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 851, and the works of Dodwell and Bentley there referred to.) His close and enduring friendship with Pelopidas, unbroken as it was through a long series of years, and amidst all the military and civil offices which they held together, strikingly illustrates the tendency which contrast of character has to cement attachments, when they have for their foundation some essential point of similarity and sympathy. According to some, their friendship originated in the campaign in which they served together on the Spartan side against Mantinea, where Pelopidas having fallen in a battle, apparently dead, Epaminondas protected his body at the imminent risk of his own life, B. C. 385. (Plut. Pelop. 4; Xen. Hell. v. 2. § 1, &c.; Diod. xv. 5, 12; Paus. viii. 8.) When the Theban patriots engaged in their enterprise for the recovery of the Cadmeia, in B. C. 379, Epaminondas held aloof from it at first, from a fear, traceable to his Pythagorean religion, lest innocent blood should be shed in the tumult. To the object of the attempt, however,—the delivery of Thebes from Spartan domination,—he was of course favourable. He had studiously exerted himself already to raise the spirit and confidence of the Theban youths, urging them to match themselves in gymnastic exercises with the Lacedaemonians of the citadel, and rebuking them, when successful in these, for the tameness of their submission to the invaders; and, when the first step in the enterprise had been taken, and Archias and Leontiades were slain, he came forward and took part decisively with Pelopidas and his confederates. (Plut. Pelop. 5, 12, de Gen. Soc. 3; Polyæn. ii. 2; Xen. Hell. v. 4. § 2, &c.) In B. C. 371, when the Athenian envoys went to Sparta to negotiate peace, Epaminondas also came thither, as an ambassador, to look after the interests of Thebes, and highly distinguished himself by his eloquence and ready wit in the debate which ensued on the question whether Thebes should be allowed to ratify the treaty in the name of all Boeotia, thus obtaining a recognition of her claim to supremacy over the Boeotian towns. This being refused by the Spartans, the Thebans were excluded from the treaty altogether, and Cleombrotus was sent to invade Boeotia. The result was the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedaemonians, in which the success of Thebes is said to have been owing mainly to the tactics of Epaminondas. He it was, indeed, who most strongly urged the giving battle, while he employed all the means in his power to raise the courage of his countrymen, not excluding even omens and oracles, for which, when unfavourable, he had but recently expressed his contempt. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. §§ 18—20, 4. §§ 1—15; Diod. xv. 38, 51—56; Plut. Ages. 27, 28, Pelop. 20—23, Cam. 19, Reg. et Imp. Apoph. p. 58, ed. Tauchn., De seips. cit. inv. laud. 16, De San. Tuend. Praec. 23; Paus. viii. 27, ix. 13; Polyæn. ii. 2; C. Nep. Epam. 6; Cic. Tusc. Disp. i. 46, de Off. i. 24; Suid. s. v. Ἐπαμεινώνδας.) The project of Lyscomedes for the founding of Megalopolis and the union of Arcadia was vigorously encouraged and forwarded by Epaminondas, B. C. 370, as a barrier against Spartan dominion, though we need not suppose with Pausanias that the plan originated with him. (Xen. Hell. vi. 5. § 6, &c.; Paus. viii. 27, ix. 14; Diod. xv. 59; Aristot. Polit. ii. 2, ed. Bekk.) In the next year, B. C. 369, the first invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Thebans took place, and when the rest of their generals were anxious to return home, as the term of their command was drawing to a close, Epaminondas and Pelopidas persuaded them to remain and to advance against Sparta. The country was ravaged as far as the coast, and the city itself, thrown into the utmost consternation by the unprecedented sight of an enemy's fires, and endangered also by treachery within, was saved only by the calm firmness and the wisdom of Agesilaus. Epaminondas, however, did not leave the Peloponnesus before he had inflicted a most serious blow on Sparta, and planted a permanent thorn in her side by the restoration of the Messenians to their country and the establishment of a new city, named Messene, on the site of the ancient Ithome,—a work which was carried into effect with the utmost solemnity, and, as Epaminondas wished to have it believed, not without the special interposition of gods and heroes. [ARISTOMENUS] Meanwhile the Lacedaemonians had applied successfully for aid to Athens; but the Athenian general, Iphicrates, seems to have acted on this occasion with less than his usual energy and ability, and the Theban army made its way back in safety through an unguarded pass of the Isthmus. Pausanias tells us that Epaminondas advanced to the walls of Athens, and that Iphicrates restrained his countrymen from marching out against him; but the several accounts of these movements are by no means clear. (Xen. Hell. vi. 5. § 22, &c., 33—52, vii. 1. § 27; Arist.

Pol. ii. 9, ed. Bekk.; Plut. Pol. 24, Ag. 31—34; Diod. xv. 62—67; Paus. iv. 26, 27, ix. 14; Polyb. iv. 33; C. Nep. Ep. 21.) On their return home Epaminondas and Pelopidas were impeached by their enemies on a capital charge of having retained their command beyond the legal term. The fact itself was true enough, but they were both honourably acquitted, Epaminondas having expressed his willingness to die if the Thebans would record that he had been put to death because he had humbled Sparta and taught his countrymen to face and to conquer her armies. Against his accusers he was philosophical and magnanimous enough, unlike Pelopidas, to take no measures of retaliation. (Plut. Pelop. 25, De seips. cit. inv. Lond. 4, Reg. et Imp. Apoph. p. 60, ed. Tauchn.; Paus. ix. 14; Ael. V. H. xiii. 42; C. Nep. Epam. 7, 8.) [PELOPIDAS; MENECELEIDAS.]

In the spring of 368 he again led a Theban army into the Peloponnesus, and having been vainly opposed at the Isthmus by the forces of Sparta and her allies, including Athens, he advanced against Sicyon and Pellene, and obliged them to relinquish their alliance with the Lacedæmonians; but on his return, he was repulsed by Chabrias in an attack which he made on Corinth. It seems doubtful whether his early departure home was owing to the rising jealousy of the Arcadians towards Thebes, or to the arrival of a force, chiefly of Celts and Iberians, sent by Dionysius I. to the aid of the Spartans. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 15—22; Diod. xv. 68—70; Paus. ix. 15.) In the same year we find him serving, but not as general, in the Theban army which was sent into Thessaly to rescue Pelopidas from Alexander of Phæra, and which Diodorus tells us was saved from utter destruction only by the ability of Epaminondas. According to the same author, he held no command in the expedition in question because the Thebans thought he had not pursued as vigorously as he might his advantage over the Spartans at the Isthmus in the last campaign. The disaster in Thessaly, however, proved to Thebes his value, and in the next year (367) he was sent at the head of another force to release Pelopidas, and accomplished his object, according to Plutarch, without even striking a blow, and by the mere prestige of his name. (Diod. xv. 71, 72, 75; Plut. Pelop. 28, 29.) It would appear—and if so, it is a noble testimony to his virtue—that the Thebans took advantage of his absence on this expedition to destroy their old rival Orchomenus,—a design which they had formed immediately after their victory at Leuctra, and which had been then prevented only by his remonstrances. (Diod. xv. 57, 79; Paus. ix. 15; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. pp. 120, 121.) In the spring of 366 he invaded the Peloponnesus for the third time, with the view chiefly of strengthening the influence of Thebes in Achaia, and so indirectly with the Arcadians as well, who were now more than half alienated from their former ally. Having obtained assurances of fidelity from the chief men in the several states, he did not deem it necessary to put down the oligarchical governments which had been established under Spartan protection; but the Arcadians made this moderation a ground of complaint against him to the Thebans, and the latter then sent harabos to the different Achaean cities, and set up democracy in all of them, which, however, was soon overthrown everywhere by a counter-revolution. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1.

§§ 41—43; Diod. xv. 75.) In a. c. 363, when the oligarchical party in Arcadia had succeeded in bringing about a treaty of peace with Elis, the Theban officer in command at Tegea at first joined in the ratification of it; but afterwards, at the instigation of the chiefs of the democratic party, he ordered the gates of Tegea to be closed, and arrested many of the higher class. The Mantineians protested strongly against this act of violence, and prepared to resent it, and the Theban then released the prisoners, and apologized for his conduct. The Mantineians, however, sent to Thebes to demand that he should be capitally punished; but Epaminondas defended his conduct, saying, that he had acted more properly in arresting the prisoners than in releasing them, and expressed a determination of entering the Peloponnesus to carry on the war in conjunction with those Arcadians who still sided with Thebes. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. §§ 12—40.) The alarm caused by this answer as symptomatic of an overbearing spirit of aggression on the part of Thebes, withdrew from her most of the Peloponnesians, though Argos, Messenia, Tegea, and Megalopolis still retained their connexion with her. It was then against a formidable coalition of states, including Athens and Sparta, that Epaminondas invaded the Peloponnesus, for the fourth time, in a. c. 362. The difficulties of his situation were great, but his energy and genius were fully equal to the crisis, and perhaps at no period of his life were they so remarkably displayed as at its glorious close. Advancing to Tegea, he took up his quarters there; but the time for which he held his command was drawing to an end, and it was necessary for the credit and interest of Thebes that the expedition should not be ineffectual. When then he ascertained that Agesilaus was on his march against him, he set out from Tegea in the evening, and marched straight on Sparta, hoping to find it undefended; but Agesilaus received intelligence of his design, and hastened back before his arrival, and the attempt of the Thebans on the city was baffled. [ARCHIDAMUS III.] They returned accordingly to Tegea, and thence marched on to Mantinea, whither their cavalry had preceded them. In the battle which ensued at this place, and in which the peculiar tactics of Epaminondas were brilliantly and successfully displayed, he himself, in the full career of victory, received a mortal wound, and was borne away from the throng. He was told that his death would follow directly on the javelin being extracted from the wound; but he would not allow this to be done till he had been assured that his shield was safe, and that the victory was with his countrymen. It was a disputed point by whose hand he fell: among others, the honour was assigned to Gryllus, the son of Xenophon. He was buried where he died, and his tomb was surmounted by a column, on which a shield was suspended, emblazoned with the device of a dragon—symbolical (says Pausanias) of his descent from the blood of the Zraprot, the children of the dragon's teeth. (Xen. Hell. vii. 5; Isocr. Ep. ad Arch. § 5; Diod. xv. 82—87; Plut. Ag. 34, 35, Apoph. 24; Paus. viii. 11, ix. 15; Just. vi. 7, 8; Cic. ad Fam. v. 12, de Fin. ii. 30; Suid. s. v. Ἐραμίνωνδας; C. Nep. Epam. 9; Polyb. iv. 33.) The circumstances of ancient Greece supplied little or no scope for any but the narrowest patriotism, and this evil is perhaps never more apparent than when we think of it in connexion with the noble mind of one like Epaminondas. We do indeed find him rising above it, as, for instance, in his preservation of Orchomenus; but this was in spite of the system under which he lived, and which, while it checked throughout the full expansion of his character, sometimes (as in his vindication of the outrage at Tegea) seduced him into positive injustice. At the best, amidst all our admiration of his genius and his many splendid qualities, we cannot forget that they were directed, after all, to the one petty object of the aggrandizement of Thebes. In the ordinary characters of Grecian history we look for no more than this;—it comes before us painfully in the case of Epaminondas. (Ael. V. H. vii. 14; Cic. de Orat. iii. 34, de Fin. ii. 19, Brut. 13, Tusc. Disp. i. 2; Polyb. vi. 43, ix. 8, xxxiii. 3, Fragm. Hist. 15; C. Nep. Epam. 10; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 42.) [E. E.]

EPAPHRODITUS (Ἐπαφρόδιτος). 1. A freedman of Caesar Octavianus; he was sent by Octavianus, together with C. Proculeius, to queen Cleopatra to prepare her for her fate. The two emissaries, however, made the queen their prisoner, and kept her in strict custody, that she might not make away with herself; but she nevertheless succeeded in deceiving her gaolers. (Dion Cass. li. 11, 13.)

2. A freedman and favourite of the emperor Nero, who employed him as his secretary. During the conspiracy which put an end to Nero's rule, Epaphroditus accompanied his master in his flight, and when Nero attempted to kill himself, Epaphroditus assisted him. For this service, however, he had afterwards to pay with his own life, for Domitian first banished and afterwards ordered him to be put to death, because he had not exerted himself to save the life of Nero. The philosopher Epictetus was the freedman of this Epaphroditus; but whether he is the same as the Epaphroditus to whom Josephus dedicated his "Jewish Antiquities," and on whom he pronounces in his preface a high eulogium for his love of literature and history, is very uncertain, and it is generally believed that Josephus is speaking of one Epaphroditus who lived in the reign of Trajan and was a freedman and procurator of this emperor. (Tac. Ann. xv. 55; Sueton. Nero, 49, Domit. 14; Dion Cass. lxxiii. 27, 29, lxxvii. 14; Arrian, Dissert. Epict. i. 26; Suidas, s. v. Ἐπίκρητος; comp. the commentators on Josephus.) From all these persons of the name of Epaphroditus, we must distinguish the one whom the Apostle Paul mentions as his companion. (Philipp. ii. 25, iv. 18.) [L. S.]

EPAPHRODITUS, M. METTIUS, of Chacronia, a Greek grammarian. He was a disciple of Archias of Alexandria, and became the slave and afterwards the freedman of Modestus, the praefect of Egypt, whose son Pitelinus had been educated by Epaphroditus. After having obtained his liberty, he went to Rome, where he resided in the reign of Nero and down to the time of Nerva, and enjoyed a very high reputation for his learning. He was extremely fond of books, and is said to have collected a library of 30,000 valuable books. He died of dropsy at the age of seventy-five. Suidas (s. v. Ἐπαφρόδιτος), from whom this account is derived, does not specify any work of our grammarian, but concludes his article by merely saying that he left behind him many good works. We know, however, from other sources, the titles of some grammatical works and commentaries: for example, on Homer's Iliad and Odyssey (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀειδῶν; Etym. M. s. v. ἀειδοί, Κεφαλληνία), an ἱερίησις εἰς Ὅμηρον καὶ Πίνδαρον (Eudoc. p. 128), a commentary on Hesiod's "Shield of Heracles," and on the Africa of Callimachus, which is frequently referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium and the Scholiast on Aeschylus. He is also mentioned several times in the Venetian Scholia on the Iliad. (Comp. Visconti, Iconograph. Graec. i. p. 266.) [L. S.]

E'PAPHUS (Ἐπαφος), a son of Zeus and Io, who was born on the river Nile, after the long wanderings of his mother. He was then concealed by the Curetes, by the request of Hera, but Io sought and afterwards found him in Syria. Epaphus, who subsequently became king of Egypt, married Memphis, the daughter of Nilus, or according to others, Cassiopeia, and built the city of Memphis. He had one daughter Libya, from whom Libya (Africa) received its name, and another bore the name of Lysianassa. (Apollod. ii. 1. §§ 3, 4, 5. § 11; Hygin. Fab. 145, 149, 275; comp. Herod. iii. 27, 28.) Another mythical being of this name is mentioned by Hyginus. (Fab. init.) [L. S.]

E'PAPHUS, is called a vir peritissimus, and seems to have written a work on Delphi, of which the seventeenth book is quoted. Servius (ad Aen. iii. 89) and Macrobius (Sat. iii. 6) both quote the same statement from his work. [L. S.]

EPA'RCHIDES (Ἐπαρχίδης), is mentioned as a writer by Athenaeus in two passages (i. p. 30, ii. p. 61), both of which relate to Icarus, but it is impossible to conjecture the nature of the work of Eparchides. [L. S.]

EPEIGEUS (Ἐπειγεύς), a Myrmidone and son of Ageles, who having killed his father, was obliged to flee from Budeion. He took refuge in the house of Peleus who sent him with Achilles to Troy, where he was killed by Hector. (Hom. Il. xvi. 870.) [L. S.]

EPEIUS (Ἐπειός) 1. A son of Endymion. [ENDYMION.]

2. A son of Panopeus, called the artist, who went with thirty ships from the Cyclades to Troy. (Dict. Cret. i. 17.) About the close of the Trojan war, he built the wooden horse under the protection and with the assistance of Athena. (Od. viii. 492, xi. 523; Il. xxiii. 664, &c., 840; Paus. ii. 29. § 4.) According to Justin (xx. 2) the inhabitants of Metapontum, which he was believed to have founded, shewed in a temple of Athena the tools which he had used in constructing the horse. In the Homeric poems he appears as a mighty and gallant warrior, whereas later traditions assign to him an inferior place among the heroes at Troy. Stesichorus (ap. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1325; Athen. x. p. 457) called him the water-bearer of the Atreidae, and as such he was represented in the temple of Apollo at Carthea. His cowardice, further, is said to have been so great, that it became proverbial. (Heyach. s. v.) According to Virgil (Aen. ii. 264), Epeius himself was one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse, and another tradition makes him the founder of Pisa in Italy. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 179.) There were at Argos very ancient carved images of Hermes and Aphrodite, which were believed to be the works of Epeius (Paus. ii. 19. § 6), and Plato (Ion, p. 553, a.) mentions him as a sculptor along with Daedalus and Theodorus of Samos. Epeius himself was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi in the act of throwing down the Trojan wall, above which rose the head of the wooden horse. (Paus. x. 26. § 1. [L. S.]

EPERATUS (Ἐπέρατος), of Pharsæ in Achaia, was elected general of the Achæans in B. C. 219, by the intrigues of Apelles, the adviser of Philip V. of Macedonia, in opposition to Timoxenus, who was supported by Aratus. Eperatus was held universally in low estimation, and was in fact totally unfit for his office, on which he entered in B. C. 218, so that, when his year had expired, he left numerous difficulties to Aratus, who succeeded him. (Polyb. iv. 82, v. 1, 5, 30, 91; Plut. Arat. 48.) [E. E.]

EPHEBUS (Ἐφεσος), a son of the river-god Caystrus, who was said, conjointly with Cressus, to have built the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and to have called the town after himself. (Paus. vii. 2. § 4.) [L. S.]

EPHIALTES (Ἐφιάλτης), one of the giants, who in the war against the gods was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of the right by Hercules. (Apollod. i. 6. § 2.) Respecting another personage of this name see ΑΛΟΚΙΔΑΞ. [L. S.]

EPHIALTES (Ἐφιάλτης). 1. A Malian, who, in B. C. 480, when Leonidas was defending the pass of Thermopylae, guided the body of Persians called the Immortals over the mountain path (the Anopæa), and thus enabled them to fall on the rear of the Greeks. Fearing after this the vengeance of the Spartans, he fled into Thessaly, and a price was set on his head by the Amphictyonic council. He ultimately returned to his country, and was put to death by one Athenades, a Trachinian, for some cause unconnected with his treason, but not further mentioned by Herodotus. (Her. vii. 213, &c.; Paus. i. 4; Strab. i. p. 20; Polyæn. vii. 15.)

2. An Athenian statesman and general, son of Sophonides, or, according to Diodorus, of Simonides, was a friend and partisan of Pericles, who is said by Plutarch to have often put him forward as the main ostensible agent in carrying political measures when he did not choose to appear prominently himself. (Ael. V. H. ii. 43, iii. 17; Plut. Peric. 7, Reip. Gerend. Proac. 15; Diod. xi. 77.) Thus, when the Spartans sent to ask the assistance of the Athenians against Ithome in B. C. 461, he endeavoured to prevent the people from granting the request, urging them not to raise a fallen rival, but to leave the spirit of Sparta to be trodden down; and we find him mentioned in particular as chiefly instrumental in that abridgment of the power of the Areiopagus, which inflicted such a blow on the oligarchical party, and against which the "Eumenides" of Aeschylus was directed. (Arist. Polit. ii. 12, ed. Bekk.; Diod. l. c.; Plut. Cim. 10, 15, 16, Peric. 7, 9; Cic. de Rep. i. 27.) By this measure Plutarch tells us that he introduced an un-mixed democracy, and made the city drunk with liberty; but he does not state clearly the precise powers of which the Areiopagus was deprived, nor is it easy to decide this point, or to settle whether it was the authority of the court or the council that Pericles and Ephialtes assailed. (For a full discussion of the question the reader is referred to Müller, Emen. §§ 35—37; Wachsmuth, Hist. Ant. vol. ii. p. 75, &c. Eng. transl.; Hermann, Opusc. vol. iv. pp. 299—302, where the passages of Demosthenes [c. Arist. p. 641] and of Lysias [de Cæd. Erat. p. 94] are ably and satisfactorily reconciled; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. pp. 23, 24; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Areiopagus; and the authors mentioned by C. F. Hermann, Pol. Ant. § 109, note 6.) The services of Ephialtes to the democratic cause excited the rancorous enmity of some of the oligarchs, and led to his assassination during the night, probably in B. C. 456. It appears that in the time of Antiphon (see de Cæd. Her. p. 137) the murderers had not been discovered; but we learn, on the authority of Aristotle (ap. Plut. Peric. 10), that the deed was perpetrated by one Aristodicus of Tanagra. The character of Ephialtes, as given by ancient writers, is a high and honourable one, inasmuch that he is even classed with Aristides for his inflexible integrity. Heraclides Ponticus tells us that he was in the habit of throwing open his grounds to the people, and giving entertainments to large numbers of them,—a statement which seems inconsistent with Aelian's account, possibly more rhetorical than true, of his poverty. (Plut. Cim. 10, Dem. 14; Ael. V. H. ii. 43, xi. 9, xiii. 39; Val. Max. iii. 8. Ext. 4; Heracl. Pont. 1.)

3. One of the Athenian orators whose surrender was required by Alexander in B. C. 335, after the destruction of Thebes, though Demades prevailed on the king not to press the demand against any but Charidemus. (Arr. Anab. i. 10; Plut. Dem. 23, Phoc. 17; Diod. xvii. 15; Suid. s. v. Ἀντίπατρος.)

4. Plutarch (Alex. 41) mentions Ephialtes and Cineas as those who brought to Alexander the intelligence of the treachery and flight of Harpalus in B. C. 324, and were thrown into prison by the king as guilty of calumny. The play of the comic poet Phrynichus, called "Ephialtes," does not seem to have had reference to any of the above persons, but rather to the Nightmare. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 152—154.) [E. E.]

EPHICIANUS. [EPICIANUS.]

EPHIPPIUS (Ἐφίππιος), of Olynthus, a Greek historian of Alexander the Great. It is commonly believed, though no reason is assigned, that Ephippus lived about or shortly after the time of Alexander. There is however a passage in Arrian (Anab. iii. 5. § 4) which would determine the age of Ephippus very accurately, if it could be proved that the Ephippus there mentioned is identical with the historian. Arrian says, that Alexander before leaving Egypt appointed Aeschylus (the Rhodian) and Ephippus τὸν Χαλκιδεὺς, superintendants (ἐπισκοποὶ) of the administration of Egypt. The reading τὸν Χαλκιδεὺς, though adopted by the recent editors of Arrian, is not in all MSS., and some editions read Χαλκιδόνα or Χαλκιδόνα; but if we might emend Χαλκιδεὺς, we should have reason for supposing that the person mentioned by Arrian is the same as Ephippus of Olynthus, for Olynthus was the principal town in Chalcidice, and Ephippus might just as well be called a native of Olynthus as of Chalcidice. If the Ephippus then in Arrian be the same as the historian, he was a contemporary of Alexander and survived him for some time, for he wrote an account of the king's burial. The work of Ephippus is distinctly referred to by Athenæus only, though Diodorus and others also seem to have made use of it. Athenæus calls it in some passages περὶ τῆς Ἀλεξάνδρου καὶ Ἡφαιστίου μεταλλαγῆς, and in others he has ταφῆς or τελευτῆς instead of μεταλλαγῆς, so that at all events we must conclude that it contained an account of the burial of Alexander as well as of his death. From the few fragments still extant, it would appear that Ephippus described more the private and personal character of his heroes than their public careers. (Athen. iii. p. 120, iv. p. 146, x. p. 434, xii. pp. 537, 538.) It should be remarked that by a singular mistake Suidas in his article Ephippus gives an account of Ephorus of Cumae. Pliny (Elench. lib. xii., xiii.) mentions one Ephippus among the authorities he consulted upon plants, and it is generally believed that he is a different person from our historian; but all the writers whom Pliny mentions along with him, belong to the period of Alexander, so that it is by no means improbable that he may be Ephippus of Olynthus. All that is known about Ephippus and the fragments of his work, is collected by R. Geier, in his Alexandri Magni Histor. Scriptores, adale supplem., Lips. 1844, pp. 309—317. [L. S.]

EPHIPPIUS (Ἐφίππιος), of Athens, was a comic poet of the middle comedy, as we learn from the testimonies of Suidas (s. v.), and Antiochus of Alexandria (Athen. xi. p. 482, c.), and from the allusions in his fragments to Plato, and the Academic philosophers (Athen. xi. p. 809, c. d.), and to Alexander of Phœræ and his contemporaries, Dionysius the Elder, Cotty, Theodorus, and others. (Athen. iii. p. 112, f. xi. p. 482, d.) The following are the known titles of his plays: Ἀπρεμύς, Βούσιππος, Γυνώσκων, Ἑμπαλῆ, Ἐφίβητος, Κίρκη, Κέδων, Ναυαγός, Ὀβελισφόρος, Ὀμοιοί, Πελασστής, Σαφώ, Φιλόκλα. An epigram which Eustathius ascribes to Ephippus (ad Iliad. xi. 697, p. 879. 38) is not his, but the production of some unknown author. (Comp. Athen. x. p. 442, d.) There are some fragments also extant from the unknown plays of Ephippus. (Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 351—354, iii. pp. 322—340; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 297, 298, 440.) [P. S.]

EPHORUS (Ἐφορος). 1. Of Cumæ, a celebrated Greek historian, was, according to Suidas, to whom we are indebted for our information respecting his life, a son either of Demophilus or Antiochus; but as Plutarch (Ei ap. Delph. p. 389, a.) mentions only the former name, and as Ephorus's son was called Demophilus (Athen. vi. p. 232), we must believe that the father of Ephorus was called Demophilus. Ephorus was a contemporary of Theopompus, and lived about s. c. 408, a date which Marx, one of his editors, strangely mistakes for the time at which Ephorus was born. Ephorus must have survived the accession of Alexander the Great, for Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 403) states that Ephorus reckoned 735 years from the return of the Heracleidae down to s. c. 333, or the year in which Alexander went to Asia. The best period of his life must therefore have fallen in the reign of Philip. Ephorus was a pupil of Isocrates in rhetoric, at the time when that rhetorician had opened his school in the island of Chios; but not being very much gifted by nature, like most of his countrymen, he was found unfit for entering upon life when he returned home, and his father therefore sent him to school a second time. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 839, a.) In order not to disappoint his father again, Ephorus now zealously devoted himself to the study of oratory, and his efforts were crowned with success, for he and Theopompus were the most distinguished among the pupils of Isocrates (Menand. Rhet. Διαφύ.

διωδεκτ. p. 626, ed. Aldus), and from Seneca (de Transg. Anim. 6) it might almost appear, that Ephorus began the career of a public orator. Isocrates, however, dissuaded him from that course, for he well knew that oratory was not the field on which Ephorus could win laurels, and he exhorted him to devote himself to the study and composition of history. As Ephorus was of a more quiet and contemplative disposition than Theopompus, Isocrates advised the former to write the early history of Greece, and the latter to take up the later and more turbulent periods of history. (Suidas; Cic. de Orat. iii. 9; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 176, 260.) Plutarch (de Stoic. Repugn. 10) relates that Ephorus was among those who were accused of having conspired against the life of king Alexander, but that he successfully refuted the charge when he was summoned before the king.

The above is all that is known respecting the life of Ephorus. The most celebrated of all his works, none of which have come down to us, was—1. A History (Ἱστορίαι) in thirty books. It began with the return of the Heracleidae, or, according to Suidas, with the Trojan times, and brought the history down to the siege of Perinthus in s. c. 341. It treated of the history of the barbarians as well as of that of the Greeks, and was thus the first attempt at writing a universal history that was ever made in Greece. It embraced a period of 750 years, and each of the thirty books contained a compact portion of the history, which formed a complete whole by itself. Each also contained a special preface and might bear a separate title, which either Ephorus himself or some later grammarian seems actually to have given to each book, for we know that the fourth book was called Εὐρώπη. (Diod. iv. i. v. l. xvi. 14, 26; Polyb. v. 33, iv. 3; Strab. vii. p. 302; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 403.) Ephorus himself did not live to complete his work, and it was finished by his son Demophilus. [DEMOPHILUS, No. 1.] Diyllus began his history at the point at which the work of Ephorus left off. As the work is unfortunately lost, and we possess only isolated fragments of it, it is not possible in all cases to determine the exact contents of each book; but the two collectors and editors of the fragments of Ephorus have done so, as far as it is feasible. Among the other works of Ephorus we may mention—2. Περὶ εὐρημάτων, or on inventions, in two books. (Suidas; Athen. iv. p. 182, viii. p. 352, xiv. p. 637; Strab. xiii. p. 622.) 3. Συνταγμα ἐπιχρόμιον. (Plut. de Vit. et Poes. Homer. 2.) This work, however, seems to have been nothing but a chapter of the fifth book of the Ἱστορίαι. 4. Περὶ λέξεως. (Theon, Progym. 2, 22; comp. Cic. Orat. 57.) This work, too, like a few others which are mentioned as separate productions, may have been only a portion of the History. Suidas mentions some more works, such as Περὶ ἀγαθῶν καὶ κακῶν, and Παραδόξων τῶν ἑκασταχοῦ βιβλία, of which, however, nothing at all is known, and it is not impossible that they may have been excerpts or abridgments of certain portions of the History, which were made by late compilers and published under his name.

As for the character of Ephorus as an historian, we have ample evidence that, in accordance with the simplicity and sincerity of his character, he desired to give a faithful account of the events he had to relate. He shewed his good sense in not attempting to write a history of the period previous to the return of the Heraclidae; but the history of the subsequent time is still greatly intermixed with fables and mythical traditions; and it must be acknowledged that his attempts to restore a genuine history by divesting the traditions from what he considered mythical or fabulous, were in most cases highly unsuccessful, and sometimes even absurd and puerile. He exercised a sort of criticism which is anything but that of a real historian (Strab. xii. p. 550), and in some instances he forced his authorities to suit his own views. For the early times he seems to have preferred the logographers to the epic poets, though the latter, too, were not neglected. Even the later portions of his history, where Ephorus had such guides as Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon, contained such discrepancies from his great predecessors, and on points on which they were entitled to credit, that Ephorus, to say the least, cannot be regarded as a sound and safe guide in the study of history. The severest critic of Ephorus was Timæus, who never neglected an opportunity of pointing out his inaccuracies; several authors also wrote separate books against Ephorus, such as Alexinus, the pupil of Eubulides (Diog. Laërt. ii. 106, 110), and Strato the Peripatetic (Diog. Laërt. v. 59.) Porphyrius (ap. Euseb. Præp. Evang. x. 2) charges Ephorus with constant plagiarisms; but this accusation is undoubtedly very much exaggerated, for we not only find no traces of plagiarism in the fragments extant, but we frequently find Ephorus disputing the statements of his predecessors. (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 3.) Polybius (xii. 25) praises him for his knowledge of maritime warfare, but adds that he was utterly ignorant of the mode of warfare on land; Strabo (viii. p. 332) acknowledges his merits, by saying that he separated the historical from the geographical portions of his work; and, in regard to the latter, he did not confine himself to mere lists of names, but he introduced investigations concerning the origin of nations, their constitutions and manners, and many of the geographical fragments which have come down to us contain lively and beautiful descriptions. (Polyb. ix. 1; Strab. ix. p. 400, &c., x. pp. 465, 479, &c.) As regards the style of Ephorus, it is such as might be expected from a disciple of Isocrates: it is clear, lucid, and elaborately polished, but at the same time diffuse and deficient in power and energy, so that Ephorus is by no means equal to his master. (Polyb. xii. 28; Dionys. de Comp. Verb. 26; Demetr. Περὶ ῥήτων, § 68; Dion Chrysost. Orat. xviii. p. 256, ed. Morel; Plut. Peric. 28; Philost. Vit. Soph. i. 17; Cic. Orat. 51; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 176.) The fragments of the works of Ephorus, the number of which might probably be much increased if Diodorus had always mentioned his authorities, were first collected by Meier Marx, Carlsruhe, 1813, 8vo., who afterwards published some additions in Friedemann and Seebode's Miscellanea Crit. ii. 4, p. 754, &c. They are also contained in C. and Th. Müller's Fragm. Historicor. Græc. pp. 234—277, Paris, 1841, 8vo. Both editors have prefixed to their editions critical dissertations on the life and writings of Ephorus.

2. Of Cumæ, called the Younger, was likewise an historian, but he is mentioned only by Suidas, according to whom he wrote a history of Galienus in twenty-seven books, a work on Corinth, one on the Alexandæ, and a few others. The name

Galienus in this account, it should be observed, is only a correction of Volaterranus, for the common reading in Suidas is Γαληνού. (Comp. Marx, Ephor. Fragm. p. 7.) [L. S.]

EPHORUS, an Ephesian painter, and teacher of APOLLIS. (Suid. s. v. Ἀρελλῆς.) [P. S.]

EPHRAËM. The name is variously written Ephraem, Ephraemus, Ephraim, Ephraimius, Ephrem, Ephremus, and Euphraimius: it belongs to several ecclesiastical writers of the Greek and Oriental churches.

1. EPHREMUUS. To a writer so called, and to whose name no distinctive epithet can be attached, is ascribed the account of Saints Abram and Mary (Acta SS. Abramii et Mariæ) in the Acta Sanctorum Martii, vol. ii. p. 436, &c. Papebroche, in his introduction to the account, conjectures that the writer lived about the middle of the sixth century. The account, of which he is the author, is sometimes ascribed (as in the Catalogue of the King's Library at Paris A. D. 1740) but incorrectly to Ephraem the Syrian. It has also been ascribed, but incorrectly, to Ephrem of Caria and Ephrem of Mylassa. [Nos. 3 and 7 below.]

2. EPHRAÏMIUS (Ἐφραίμιος), or, as Theophanes writes the name, EUPHRAÏMIUS (Εὐφραίμιος), patriarch of ANTIOCH, or, as it was then called, Theopolis. If the designation given him by Theophanes (ὁ Ἀμίδιος) indicates the place of his birth, he was a native of Amida in Armenia, near the source of the Tigris. His first employments were civil: and in the reign of the emperor Justin I. he attained to the high dignity of Count of the East. While in this office he received, according to a curious story, recorded in the Λειτουργίαι, or Præstem Spirituale, written by Joannes Moschus, but erroneously ascribed, by ancient as well as modern writers, to Sophronius patriarch of Jerusalem, an intimation of the ecclesiastical dignity to which he was destined to attain. In the years 525 and 526, Antioch was nearly destroyed by successive shocks of an earthquake, and by a fire which had been occasioned by the overthrow of the buildings. Among the sufferers was Euphrasius the patriarch, who was buried in the ruins of the falling edifices; and the people, grateful for the compassionate care which Ephraimius manifested for them in their distress, chose him successor to the deceased prelate. His elevation to the patriarchate is generally placed in the year 526, but perhaps did not take place till the year following. His conduct as patriarch is highly eulogized by ecclesiastical writers, who speak especially of his charity to the poor, and of the zeal and firmness with which he opposed heresy. His zeal against heretics was manifested in a curious encounter with an heretical stylite, or pillar-saint, in which the heretic is said to have been converted by the miraculous passing of the patriarch's robe, unconsumed, through the ordeal of fire. He condemned, in a synod at Antioch, those who attempted to revive the obnoxious sentiments of Origen; and wrote various treatises against the Nestorians, Eutychians, Severians, and Acephali, and in defence of the Council of Chalcedon. But, toward the close of his life, he was obliged by the Emperor Justinian, under a threat of deposition, to subscribe the condemnation of three of the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, which he had hitherto so earnestly supported. Facundus of Hermia, the strenuous advocate of the condemned decrees, reproaches Ephraïmus on this occasion, and with justice, as more solicitous for the preservation of his office than for the interests of what he deemed divine and important truth. Ephraïmus died soon after this transaction, A. D. 546, or perhaps 545, after a patriarchate, according to Theophanes, of eighteen years, or, according to other calculations, of twenty years.

The works of Ephraïmus are known to us only by the account of them preserved in the Bibliotheca of Photius, who says that three volumes written in defence of the dogmas of the Church, and especially of the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, had come down to his day; but he gives an account only of two. The first comprehended, 1. An epistle to Zenobius, a scholastic or advocate of Emesa, and one of the sect of the Acephali; 2. Some epistles to the emperor Justinian; 3. Epistles to Anthimus, bishop of Trapezus, Domestianus Syncreticus, metropolitan of Tarsus, Brazes the Persian, and others; 4. An act of a synod (συνodus) ἡρώδης held by Ephraïmus respecting certain unorthodox books; and 5. Panegyric and other discourses. The second volume contained a treatise in four books, in which were defences of Cyril of Alexandria and the synod of Chalcedon against the Nestorians and Eutychians; and answers to some theological questions of his correspondent the advocate Anatolius. (Phot. Bibl. Codd. 228, 229; Facundus, iv. 4; Evagrius, Eccles. Hist. iv. 5, 6; Joannes Moschus (commonly cited as Sophronius) Pratum Spirituale, c. 36, 37 in Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xiii. ed. Paris, 1654; Theophanes, Chronograph. ad Ann. 519 (Alex. Era=526 Common Era) and table ad Ann. 537, 538; Baronius, Annales; Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. i. p. 507, ed. 1740-3; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 750.)

3. EPHREM, or rather EPHRAEM (Ἐφραίμ), of CARIA, a monk of unknown date, writer of a Greek hymn or prayer given by Raynaeus (Dissert. Prelim. de Acoluthis Officii Græci, p. lxxviii. in the Acta Sanctorum Junii, vol. ii.) This Ephrem is not to be confounded with Nos. 1 and 7.

4. EPHRAIM (Ἐφραίμ), bishop of Cherson. In the title of his only published work he is called archbishop, and some moderns style him "martyr." He is the author of an account of a miracle wrought by the relics or the interposition of Clement of Rome, on the body of a child, who had been overwhelmed by the sea in a pilgrimage to Clement's submarine tomb. The account is printed in the Patres Apostolici of Cotelierius (vol. i. p. 815. ed. Amsterdam, 1724,) and in the De Probatis Sanctorum Vitæ, of Surin, 29 Nov. Another piece of Ephraim on the Miracles of St. Clement, evidently different from the foregoing, is noticed by Leo Allatius, who calls the writer Ephraemius; but Cotelierius was not able to obtain it, or he would have printed it with the foregoing. (Cotelierius, l.c.; Allatius, De Symeonis Scriptis, pp. 90, 96; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 21, viii. 254; Catal. MSS. Biblioth. Regiæ, Paris, 1740.)

5. EPHRAEM of CONSTANTINOPLE, a chronographer who flourished apparently about the beginning of the fourteenth century. His chronicle, written in Iambic verse, is repeatedly cited by Allatius (De Pællis, p. 22, Diatriba de Georgiis, pp. 327, 341, 354, &c., ed. Paris, 1651), and is probably extant in the Vatican Library in MS. but has never been published. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 472, viii. 79, 254.)

7. EPHREM, bishop of MYLASSA in CARIA [see Nos. 1 and 3]. The time when he lived is uncertain; but religious honours were paid to his memory in the fifth century at Leuce (near Mylassa), where his body was buried. (Acta Synodorum, S. Eusebii Vita, cap. 3, Januar. vol. ii. p. 600.) [J. C. M.]

EPHRAEM or EPHRAIM, a Syrian, born at Nisibis, flourished A. D. 370. He spent his youth in diligent study, and devoted himself at first to a monastic life, but afterwards went to Edessa, where he was ordained deacon. He refused to proceed to the higher orders of the ministry, and is even said to have played the part of Brutus, by feigning madness in order to avoid elevation to the bishopric. He formed a close friendship with Basil, bishop of Caesarea, and shared his acrimony against the Arians and other heretics, whom he attacks with the violence characteristic of his age. He appeared in a truly Christian light at the time of a famine at Edessa, when he not only assisted the suffering poor with the greatest energy and most zealous kindness, but also actively exerted himself in urging the rich to deny themselves for their brethren's good. Sozomen (iii. 15) speaks with admiration of the manner in which Christianity had subdued in him a naturally irascible temper, and illustrates it by a pleasing anecdote, amusing from its quaint simplicity. At the conclusion of a long fast, Ephraem's servant let the dish in which he was bringing him some food. His alarm at having thus spoiled his master's dinner was removed by hearing him say, "Never mind, since the food has not come to us, we will go to it." Whereupon Ephraem sat down on the floor and ate the scraps left in the fragments of the broken dish. He died about A. D. 378, and in his last illness forbade the recitation of any funeral oration over his remains, and desired that his obsequies should be conducted in the simplest manner. He knew no language but his native Syrian, though nearly all his works are translated into Greek, and were formerly held in such high esteem, that portions of them were sometimes read in churches after the gospel for the day. Most of his writings were collected by Gerard Voss, who turned them into Latin, and published them (1) at Rome A. D. 1589-93-97, (2) at Cologne in 1603, (3) at Antwerp in 1619. Voss's edition is in three volumes. The first consists of various treatises, partly on subjects solely theological, as the Priesthood, Prayer, Fasting, &c., with others partly theological and partly moral, as Truth, Anger, Obedience, Envy. The second contains many epistles and addresses to monks, and a collection of apophthegma. The third consists of several treatises or homilies on parts of Scripture and characters in the Old Testament, as Elijah, Daniel, the Three Children, Joseph, Noah. Photius gives a list of 49 homilies of Ephraem (Cod. 196), but which of these are included in Voss's edition it is impossible to ascertain, though it is certain that many are not. Another edition of Ephraem's works in Syriac, Greek, and Latin, was published also at Rome with notes, prefaces, and various readings, "studio Sim. Assemani, P. Benedicti et Steph. Evodii Assemani," 6 vols. fol. 1732-46. The Greek version of several of his writings, from eighteen MSS. in the Bodleian library, was pub-ished by Edw. Thwaites at Oxford, 1709. There have been several editions of separate works.

Ephraem is also said to be the author of an immense number of songs. He began to write them in opposition to Harmonius, the son and disciple of Bardesanes the heretic, who composed poetry involving many serious errors of doctrine, some of which were not only of an heretical but even of an heathen character, denying the resurrection of the body, and containing views about the nature of the soul extracted from the writings of pagan philosophers. These songs had become great favourites among the common people, and Ephraem, to oppose their evil tendency, wrote other songs in similar metres and adapted to the same music of a pious and Christian character. (Sozomen, l. c.; Theodoret, iv. 27; Cave, Script. Eccl. Hist. Liter. part 1. sec. 4.; *c. [G. E. L. C.]

EPHYRA ('Εφύρα), a daughter of Oceanus, from whom Ephyraea, the ancient name of Corinth was derived. (Paus. ii. 1. § 1; Virg. Georg. iv. 343.) [L. S.]

EPIBATERIUS ('Επιβάτης), the god who conducts men on board a ship, a surname of Apollo, under which Diomedes on his return from Troy built him a temple at Troezena. (Paus. ii. 32. § 1.) In the same sense Apollo bore the surname of Ευβάτης. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 404.) [L. S.]

EPICASTE ('Επικαστή), a daughter of Menoeceus, and wife of Laius, by whom she became the mother of Oedipus, whom she afterwards unwittingly married. She is more commonly called Jocaste. (Hom. Od. xi. 271; Apollod. iii. 5. § 7, &c.; see ODEIPUS.) Respecting Epicaste, the daughter of Caldon, see AGORON, No. 4; a third Epicaste is mentioned by Apollodorus. (ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

EPICELEUSTUS ('Επιελεύστος), a native of Crete, who lived probably in the second or first century B. C. He is mentioned by Erotianus (Gloss. Hippocr. p. 8) as having abridged and differently arranged the work by Baccheius on the obsolete words found in the writings of Hippocrates. [W. A. G.]

EPICHARIS ('Επιχαρίς), a freedwoman of bad repute, who was implicated in the conspiracy of Piso against the life of Nero, in A. D. 65, in which the philosopher Seneca also was involved. According to Polyænus (viii. 62), she was the mistress of a brother of Seneca, and it may be that through this connexion she became acquainted with the plot of the conspirators, though Tacitus says that it was unknown by what means she had acquired her knowledge of it. She endeavoured by all means to stimulate the conspirators to carry their plan into effect. But as they acted slowly and with great hesitation, she at length grew tired, and resolved upon trying to win over the sailors of the fleet of Misenum in Campania, where she was staying. One Volusius Proculus, a chiliarch of the fleet, appears to have been the first that was initiated by her in the secret, but no names were mentioned to him. Proculus had no sooner obtained the information than he betrayed the whole plot to Nero. Epicharis was summoned before the emperor, but as no names had been mentioned, and as no witnesses had been present at the communication, Epicharis easily refuted the accusation. She was, however, kept in custody. Subsequently, when the conspiracy was discovered, Nero ordered her to be tortured because she refused naming any of the accomplices; but neither blows, nor fire, nor the increased fury of her tormentors, could extort any confession from her. When on the second or third day after she was carried in a sedan-chair—for her limbs were already broken—to be tortured a second time, she strangled herself on her way by her girdle, which she fastened to the chair. She thus acted, as Tacitus says, more nobly than many a noble eques or senator, who without being tortured betrayed their nearest relatives. (Tac. Ann. xv. 51, 57; Dion Cass. lxii. 27.) [L. S.]

EPICHARMUS ('Επιχαρμος), the chief comic poet among the Dorians, was born in the island of Cos about the 60th Olympiad (B. C. 540). His father, Ellothales, was a physician, of the race of the Asclepiads, and the profession of medicine seems to have been followed for some time by Epicharmus himself, as well as by his brother.

At the age of three months he was carried to Megara, in Sicily; or, according to the account preserved by Suidas, he went thither at a much later period, with Cadmus (B. C. 484). Thence he removed to Syracuse, with the other inhabitants of Megara, when the latter city was destroyed by Gelon (B. C. 484 or 483). Here he spent the remainder of his life, which was prolonged throughout the reign of Hieron, at whose court Epicharmus associated with the other great writers of the time, and among them, with Aeschylus, who seems to have had some influence on his dramatic course. He died at the age of ninety (B. C. 450), or, according to Lucian, ninety-seven (B. C. 443). The city of Syracuse erected a statue to him, the inscription on which is preserved by Diogenes Laërtius. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 78; Suid. s. v.; Lucian, Macrob. 25; Aelian, V. H. ii. 34; Plut. Moral. pp. 68, a., 175, c.; Marmor Parium, No. 55.)

In order to understand the relation of Epicharmus to the early comic poetry, it must be remembered that Megara, in Sicily, was a colony from Megara on the Isthmus, the inhabitants of which disputed with the Athenians the invention of comedy, and where, at all events, a kind of comedy was known as early as the beginning of the sixth century B. C. [SUZARION.] This comedy (whether it was lyric or also dramatic, which is a doubtful point) was of course found by Epicharmus existing at the Sicilian Megara; and he, together with Phormis, gave it a new form, which Aristotle describes by the words τὸ μῦθον ποιῶν (Poët. 6 or 5, ed. Ritter), a phrase which some take to mean comedies with a regular plot; and others, comedies on mythological subjects. The latter seems to be the better interpretation; but either explanation establishes a clear distinction between the comedy of Epicharmus and that of Megara, which seems to have been little more than a sort of low buffoonery.

With respect to the time when Epicharmus began to compose comedies, much confusion has arisen from the statement of Aristotle (or an interpolator), that Epicharmus lived long before Chionides. (Poët. 3; CHIONIDES.) We have, however, the express and concurrent testimonies of the anonymous writer On Comedy (p. xxviii.), that he flourished about the 73rd Olympiad, and of Suidas (s. v.), that he wrote six years before the Persian war (a. c. 485-4). Thus it appears that, like Cratinus, he was an old man before he began to write comedy; and this agrees well with the fact that his poetry was of a very philosophic character. (Anon. de Com. l. c.) The only one of his plays, the date of which is certainly known, is the Násoi, B. c. 477. (Schol. Pind. Pyth. i. 98; Clinton, sub ann.) We have also express testimony of the fact that Elothales, the father of Epicarmus, formed an acquaintance with Pythagoras, and that Epicarmus himself was a pupil of that great philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Suid. s. v.; Plut. Numa, 8.) We may therefore consider the life of Epicarmus as divisible into two parts, namely, his life at Megara up to a. c. 484, during which he was engaged in the study of philosophy, both physical and metaphysical, and the remainder of his life, which he spent at Syracuse, as a comic poet. The question respecting the identity of Epicarmus the comedian and Epicarmus the Pythagorean philosopher, about which some writers, both ancient and modern, have been in doubt, may now be considered as settled in the affirmative. (Menag. ad Laërt. l. c.; Perizon. ad Aelian. V. H. ii. 34; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. ii. Introd. p. xxxvi.)

The number of the comedies of Epicarmus is differently stated at 52 or at 35. There are still extant 35 titles, of which 26 are preserved by Athenæus. The majority of them are on mythological subjects, that is, travesties of the heroic myths, and these plays no doubt very much resembled the satyric drama of the Athenians. The following are their titles:—Ἀλκίον, Ἄμκος, Βάκχα, Βούσιρις, Δευκαλίων, Διδόνισσι, Ἡῆς γάμος, Ἡφαιστος ἢ Κωμασταί, Κύκλωψ, Λόγος καὶ Λογίνα, Ὀδυσσεύς αὐτόματος, Ὀδυσσεύς ναυαγός, Ξερίνης, Ξίρων, Ξίριγγ, Τρώες, Φιλοκλήτης. But besides mythology, Epicarmus wrote on other subjects, political, moral, relating to manners and customs, and, it would seem, even to personal character; those, however, of his comedies which belong to the last head are rather general than individual, and resembled the subjects treated by the writers of the new comedy, so that when the ancient writers enumerated him among the poets of the old comedy, they must be understood as referring rather to his antiquity in point of time than to any close resemblance between his works and those of the old Attic comedians. In fact, we have a proof in the case of CRATES that even among the Athenians, after the establishment of the genuine old comedy by Cratinus, the mythological comedy still maintained its ground. The plays of Epicarmus, which were not on mythological subjects, were the following:—Ἀγρωστίνος (Sicilian Greek for Ἀγροίκος), Ἀρχαγαί, Γὰ καὶ Θάλασσα, Δίφιλος, Ἐκπὶς ἢ Πλούτος, Ἑορὰ καὶ Νάσοι, Ἐπινίκιος, Ἡράκλειτος, Θεῶροι, Μεγαρίς, Μῆνες, Ὀρὰ, Περὶ ἄλλος, Πέρσαι, Πῖθων, Τριακάδες, Χορεύοντες, Χύτραι. A considerable number of fragments of the above plays are preserved, but those of which we can form the clearest notion from the extant fragments are the Marriage of Hebe, and Hephaestus or the Revellers. Müller has observed that the painted vases of lower Italy often enable us to gain a complete and vivid idea of those theatrical representations of which the plays of Epicarmus are the type.

The style of his plays appears to have been a curious mixture of the broad buffoonery which distinguished the old Megarian comedy, and of the sententious wisdom of the Pythagorean philosopher. His language was remarkably elegant: he was celebrated for his choice of epithets: his plays abounded, as the extant fragments prove, with γνῶμαι, or philosophical and moral maxims, and long speculative discourses, on the instinct of animals for example. Müller observes that "if the elements of his drama, which we have discovered singly, were in his plays combined, he must have set out with an elevated and philosophical view, which enabled him to satirize mankind without disturbing the calmness and tranquillity of his thoughts; while at the same time his scenes of common life were marked with the acute and penetrating genius which characterized the Sicilians." In proof of the high estimate in which he was held by the ancients, it may be enough to refer to the notices of him by Plato (Theæt. p. 152, a.) and Cicero. (Tusc. i. 8, ad Att. i. 19.) It is singular, however, that Epicarmus had no successor in his peculiar style of comedy, except his son or disciple Deinolochus. He had, however, distinguished imitators in other times and countries. Some writers, making too much of a few words of Aristotle, would trace the origin of the Attic comedy to Epicarmus; but it can hardly be doubted that Crates, at least, was his imitator. That Plautus imitated him is expressly stated by Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 58).—

"Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicarmi."

The parasite, who forms so conspicuous a character in the plays of the new comedy, is first found in Epicarmus.

The formal peculiarities of the dramas of Epicarmus cannot be noticed here at any length. His ordinary metre was the lively Trochaic Tetrameter, but he also used the Iambic and Anapaestic metres. The questions respecting his scenes, number of actors, and chorus, are fully treated in the work of Grysar.

Some writers attribute to Epicarmus separate philosophical poems; but there is little doubt that the passages referred to are extracts from his comedies. Some of the ancient writers ascribed to Epicarmus the invention of some or all of those letters of the Greek alphabet, which were usually attributed to Palamedes and Simonides.

The fragments of Epicarmus are printed in the collections of Morellius (Sententiae vet. Comic., Paris, 1553, 8vo.), Hertelius (Collect. Fragm. Comic., Basil. 1560, 8vo.), H. Stephanus (Poësis Philosophica, 1573, 8vo.), and Hugo Grotius (Excerpt. ex Trag. et Comœd., Paris, 1626, 4to.), and separately by H. P. Kruseman, Harlem. 1834. Additions have been made by Welcker (Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft, 1835, p. 1123), and others. The most important modern work on Epicarmus is that of Grysar, de Doricis Comœdiis, Colon. 1828; the second volume, containing the fragments, has not yet appeared. (See also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 298; Harless, de Epicarmo, Esen, 1822; Müller, Dorians, bk. iv. c. 7; Bode, Geschichte d. Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part i. p. 36.) [P. S.]

EPICLEIDAS (Ἐπικλείδης), brother of Cleomenes III., king of Sparta. According to Pausanias (ii. 9. § 1. 3), Cleomenes poisoned Eurydamidas, his colleague of the house of Proclus, and shared the royal power with his brother Epicleidas. The latter afterwards fell in the battle of Sellasia, B. c. 222. [C. P. M.]

EPICLES (Ἐπίκλης), a medical writer quoted by Erotianus (Gloss. Hippocr. p. 16), who wrote a commentary on the obsolete words found in the writings of Hippocrates, which he arranged in alphabetical order. He lived after Baccheius, and therefore probably in the second or first century B. C.

[W. A. G.]

EPICRATES (Ἐπικράτης), an Athenian, who took a prominent part in public affairs after the end of the Peloponnesian war. He was a zealous member of the democratical party, and had a share in the overthrow of the Thirty Tyrants (Dem. de Fals. Legat. p. 430); but afterwards, when sent on an embassy to the Persian king Artaxerxes, he was accused not only of corruption, in receiving money from Artaxerxes, but also of peculation. (Lys. Or. 27, c. Epiceratem, p. 806, &c.) Hegesander (ap. Athen. vi. p. 251, a.) and Plutarch (Peiop. 30) say, that he so grossly flattered Artaxerxes as to propose that instead of nine archons, nine ambassadors to the Persian king should be annually chosen by the Athenians. Plutarch also says that he did not deny the charge of corruption. He seems, however, to have been acquitted (Plut. and Ath. U. cc.) probably through the powerful interest possessed by himself and by his fellow criminal, Phormisius (Dionys. Vit. Lys. 32.) He had been guilty of corruption on a former occasion also, but had been equally fortunate in escaping punishment. (Lys. l. c.) This first offence of his was probably on the occasion when Timocrates the Rhodian was sent by Tithraustes to bribe the Greek states to attack Sparta (a. c. 395); for though Xenophon (Hell. iii. 5. § 1.) asserts, that the Athenians did not receive any money from Timocrates (a statement suspicious on the face of it), Pausanias (iii. 9. § 4) has preserved an account that at Athens bribes were taken by Cephalus and Epicrates.

The above statement of the acquittal of Epicrates on the charge of corruption in his embassy to Artaxerxes, seems at first sight opposed to the statement of Demosthenes (de Fals. Legat. pp. 430, 431), that he was condemned to death, and that he was actually banished. But, in fact, Demosthenes seems to be referring to a distinct and third occasion on which Epicrates was charged with corruption; for in his repetition of the charge there is the important head, καταφρονέμενοι τῶν συμμάχων, of which we find nothing in the oration of Lysias, but which is just the charge we should expect to be made against the Athenian envoy who took part in accepting the peace of Antalcidas (a. c. 387); and that Epicrates was really that envoy is the more probable from the fact, which is expressly stated, that it was Epicrates who recommended that peace to the Athenians. (Schol. Aristeid. i. p. 283, ed. Dindorf.)

Epicrates and Phormisius were attacked by Aristophanes (Eccles. 68—72, Ran. v. 965, and Schol.) and by Plato, the comic poet, who made their embassy the subject of a whole play, the Πίσωβου. Both are ridiculed for their large beards, and for this reason Epicrates was called οὐκαστοπέδης. (Comp. Etym. Mag. s. v.; Suid. s. v., and s. v. πύγων; Harpocrat. s. v. p. 162, cum not. Manass. et Vales.; Epist. Socrat. 13. p. 29; Plat. Phædrus. p. 227, b.; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. pp. 182, 183; Bergk, de Reliqu. Com. Att. Ant. pp. 389—394.) [P. S.]

an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, according to the testimony of Athenæus (x. p. 422, f.), confirmed by extant fragments of his plays, in which he ridicules Plato and his disciples, Speusippus and Menedemus, and in which he refers to the courtizan Laïs, as being now far advanced in years. (Athen. ii. p. 59, d., xiii. p. 570, h.) From these indications Meineke infers that he flourished between the 101st and 108th Olympiads (a. c. 376—348). Two plays of Epicrates, Ἐμφορος and Ἀνταλάς are mentioned by Suidas (s. v.), and are quoted by Athenæus (xiv. p. 655, f., xiii. pp. 570, b., 605, c.), who also quotes his Ἀμαζόνες (x. p. 422, f.) and Δόσπατος (vi. p. 262, d.), and informs us that in the latter play Epicrates copied some things from the Δόσπατος of Antiphanes. Aelian (N. A. xii. 10) quotes the Χορός of Epicrates. We have also one long fragment (Athen. ii. p. 59, c.), and two shorter ones (Athen. xi. p. 782, f.; Pollux. iv. 121) from his unknown plays. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. p. 414, 415, vol. iii. pp. 365—373; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 440, 441.) [P. S.]

EPICTETUS (Ἐπίκτητος), of Hierapolis in Phrygia, a freedman of Epaphroditus, who was himself a freedman and a servile favourite of Nero, lived and taught first at Rome, and, after the expulsion of the philosophers by Domitian, at Nicopolis, a town in Epeirus, founded by Augustus in commemoration of his victory at Actium. Although he was favoured by Hadrian (Spartian, Hadr. 16)—which gave occasion to a work which was undoubtedly written at a much later time, the “Alteratio Hadriani cum Epicteto” (see especially Heumann, Acta Philos. i. 734)—yet he does not appear to have returned to Rome; for the discourses which Arrian took down in writing were delivered by Epictetus when an old man at Nicopolis. (Dissert. i. 25, 19, with Schweighäuser's note.) The statement of Themistius (Orat. v. p. 63, ed. Harduin) that Epictetus was still alive in the reign of the two Antonines, which is repeated by Suidas (s. v.), seems to rest upon a confusion of names, since M. Aurelius Antoninus, who was an enthusiastic admirer of Epictetus, does not mention him, but Junius Rusticus, a disciple of Epictetus, among his teachers; in like manner, A. Gellius, who lived in the time of the Antonines, speaks of Epictetus as belonging to the period which had just passed away. (M. Antonin. i. 7, vii. 29, with Gataker's note; Gellius. vii. 19.) Besides what is here mentioned, only a few circumstances of the life of Epictetus are recorded, such as his lameness, which is spoken of in very different ways, his poverty, and his few wants. The detailed biography written by Arrian has not come down to us. (Simplic. Proem. Comment. in Epictet. Enchirid. iv. p. 5, ed. Schweigh.)

It is probable that he was still a slave (Arrian, Dissert. i. 9, 29) when C. Musonius Rufus gained him for the philosophy of the Porch, of which he remained a faithful follower throughout life. In what manner he conceived and taught it, we see with satisfactory completeness from the notes which we owe to his faithful pupil, Arrian; although of Arrian's eight books of commentaries four are lost, with the exception of a few fragments. Epictetus himself did not leave anything written behind him, and the short manual or collection of the most essential doctrines of Epictetus, was compiled from his discourses by Arrian. (Simplic. in Enchirid.

Proem.) The manual (Enchiridion) and commentaries of Arrian, together with the explanations of Simplicius to the former, and some later paraphrases, have been edited by Schweighäuser, who has added the notes of Upton, his own, and those of some other commentators. (Epictetæ Philosophiæ Monumenta, post J. Uptoni aliorumque curas, editi et illustrati J. Schweighäuser, Lipsiæ, 1799, 1800, 6 vols. 8vo.)

We may apply to Epictetus himself what he says of his Stoic master, viz. that he spoke so impressively, and so plainly described the wickedness of the individual, that every one felt struck, as though he himself had been spoken to personally. (Dissert. iii. 23, 29, comp. c. 15, i. 9.) Being deeply impressed with his vocation as a teacher, he aimed in his discourses at nothing else but winning the minds of his hearers to that which was good, and no one was able to resist the impression which they produced. (Arrian, Ep. ad L. Gell. i. p. 4.) Far from any contempt of knowledge, he knows how to value the theory of forming conclusions and the like. (Dissert. i. 7, 1, &c., comp. i. 8, 1, &c., i. 17, ii. 23, 25.) He only desired that logical exercises, the study of books and of eloquence, should not lead persons away from that of which they were merely the means, and that they should not minister to pride, haughtiness, and avarice. (i. 8. 6, &c., 29. 55, ii. 4. 11, 9. 17, 16. 34, 17. 34, 21. 20, iii. 2. 23, 17. 28, 24. 78.) He never devotes any time to disquisitions which do not, either directly or indirectly, contribute towards awakening, animating, and purifying man's moral conduct. (i. 17. 15, 29. 58, ii. 19. 10; comp. iv. 8. 24, 6. 24.)

The true Cynic—and he is the same as the Stoic, the philosopher,—is in the opinion of Epictetus a messenger of Zeus, sent to men to deliver them from their erroneous notions about good and evil, and about happiness and unhappiness (iii. 22. 23), and to lead them back into themselves. (ib. 39.) For this purpose he requires natural gracefulness and acuteness of intellect (ib. 90), for his words are to produce a lively impression.

The beginning of philosophy, according to him, is the perception of one's own weakness and of one's inability to do that which is needful. (ii. 11. 1; comp. iii. 23. 34, ii. 17. 1.) Along with this perception we become aware of the contest which is going on among men, and we grow anxious to ascertain the cause of it, and consequently to discover a standard by which we may give our decision (ii. 11. 13, &c.): to meditate upon this and to dwell upon it, is called philosophizing. (ib. 24; comp. iii. 10. 6.) The things which are to be measured are conceptions, which form the material; the work which is to be constructed out of them, is their just and natural application, and a control over them. (iii. 22. 20, 23. 42.) This just choice of conceptions and our consent to or decision in their favour (σπουδαίς, συγκατάθεσις), constitute the nature of good. (ii. 1. 4, 19. 32.) Only that which is subject to our choice or decision is good or evil; all the rest is neither good nor evil; it concerns us not, it is beyond our reach (i. 13. 9, 25. 1, ii. 5. 4); it is something external, merely a subject for our choice (i. 29. 1, ii. 16. 1, 19. 32, iv. 10. 26): in itself it is indifferent, but its application is not indifferent (ii. 5. 1, 6. 1), and its application is either consistent with or contrary to nature. (ii. 5. 24.) The choice, and consequently our opinion upon it, are in our power (i. 12. 8<sup>7</sup>; in our choice we are free (i. 12. 9, 17. 28, 19. 9); nothing that is external of us, not even Zeus, can overcome our choice: it alone can control itself. (i. 29. 12, ii. 1. 22, iv. 1, ii. 2. 3, iii. 8. 10, i. 23, iv. 1. 69.) Our choice, however, is determined by our reason, which of all our faculties sees and tests itself and everything else. (i. 1. 4, i. 20.) Reason is our guide (τὸ ἡγούμενον), and capable of conquering all powers which are not subject to freedom (ii. 1. 39; comp. iii. 3); it is the governing power given to man (τὸ κρείττον, i. 1. 7, 17. 21); hence only that which is irrational cannot be endured by it. (i. 2.) It is by his reason alone that man is distinguished from the brute (ii. 9. 2, iii. 1. 25): he who renounces his reason and allows himself to be guided by external things, is like a man who has forgotten his own face (i. 2. 14); and he who desires or repudiates that which is beyond his power, is not free. (i. 4. 19.)

That which is in accordance with reason coincides with that which is in accordance with nature and pleasing to God. (i. 12. 9, 26. 2, iii. 20. 13, ii. 10. 4, i. 12. 8.) Our resemblance to God (i. 12. 27), or our relationship to the Deity (i. 9. 1, 11), and the coincidence of our own will with the will of God (ii. 17. 22, comp. 19. 26, iii. 24. 95, iv. 1. 89, 103, 4. 39), consist in our acting in accordance with reason and in freedom. Through reason our souls are as closely connected and mixed up with the Deity, as though they were parts of him (i. 14. 6, ii. 8. 11, 13, 17. 33); for mind, knowledge, and reason, constitute the essence of God, and are identical with the essence of good. (ii. 8. 1, &c.) Let us therefore invoke God's assistance in our strife after the good (ii. 18. 29, comp. i. 6. 21), let us emulate him (ii. 14. 13), let us purify that which is our guide within us (iii. 22. 19), and let us be pure with the pure within us, and with the Deity! (ii. 18. 19.)

The prophet within us, who announces to us the nature of good and evil (ii. 7. 2), is the daemon, the divine part of every one, his never-resting and incorruptible guardian. (i. 14. 12.) He manifests himself in our opinions, which have something common with one another and are agreeing with one another (i. 22. 1); for they are the things which are self-evident, and which we feel obliged to carry into action, though we may combat them. (ii. 20. 1.) That which is good we must recognize as such a thing: wherever it appears, it draws us towards itself, and it is impossible to reject the conception of good. (iii. 3. 4, comp. i. 4. 1.) The opinions just described are the helps which nature has given to every one for discovering that which is true. (iv. 1. 51.) Wherever they are not recognized, as is the case with the followers of the New Academy, our mind and modesty become petrified. (i. 5. 3.) To investigate this criticism of what is in accordance with nature, and to master it in its application to individual things, is the object of all our scientific endeavours (i. 11. 15), and the mastery is obtained only by the cultivation of our mind and by education. (παιδεία; i. 2. 6, 22. 9, ii. 17. 7.) The practice in theory is the easier part; the application in life is the more difficult one, and is the object of all theory. (i. 26. 3, 29. 35.) We find that as far as practical application is concerned, many men are Epicureans and effeminate Peripatetics, though they profess the doctrines of the Stoics and Cynics. (ii. 19. 20, 12.

i. 18. 26. iii. 26. 13. iv. 1. 138. 4. 14. 43. 6. 15.) In order to obtain a mastery in the application of moral principles to life, a continued practice is required; but this practice is first and chiefly to be directed towards a control of our conceptions, and thereby also of our passions and desires, which are themselves only modes of conception (ii. 18. 1, &c., 29. iv. 10. 26), and as such they press and force us; one person being more under the influence of this kind, and another more under the influence of another kind; for which reason every one, according to his personal peculiarity, must oppose to them a continued practice. (i. 25. 26. ii. 16. 22.) This first and most essential practice must be accompanied by a second, which is directed towards that which is appropriate (duty), and a third, the object of which is surety, truth, and certainty; but the latter must not pretend to supplant the former. (iii. 2. 6. 12. 12. &c.) The unerring desire after what is good, the absolute avoidance of what is bad, the desire ever directed towards the appropriate, carefully-weighed resolutions, and a full consent to them, are the nerves of the philosopher. (ii. 8. 29.) Through them he acquires freedom and entire independence of everything which is not subject to his choice (iv. 4. 39. iii. 22. 13), and in confiding submission he leaves the management of it to Providence, whose universal rule cannot escape the eye of an unbiassed and grateful observer of the occurrences in the world. (i. 6. 9. 4. 12. 13. 14. 16. 30. ii. 14. 26. iii. 17.) In this submissive confidence, and the consciousness of its necessity, in order to be able to preserve unchanged our outward peace of mind in all the occurrences of life, in sorrow and in want, we see the spirit of the modern, and we may say, ennobled Porch; the same spirit is expressed in the energy and purity of its sentiments, and in the giving up of principles whose harshness and untenableness arose from the inflexible and abstract consistency of the earlier Porch.

Epictetus is well aware, that man, as such, is a member of the great cosmic community of gods and men, and also that he is a member of the communities of state and family, and that he stands to them in the same relation as a limb to the whole organic body, and that therefore he can attain his full development only with them. (ii. 5. 26. 10. 3. &c., 2. 19. 13.) He recognizes the necessity of love and confidence (ii. 22. 4. 1), and he demands of the Cynic, that is, the true philosopher, to renounce marriage and family life, only that he may devote himself with all his powers to the service of the deity, and to the duties of an unlimited philanthropy. (iii. 22. 67. &c.) It is true that with Epictetus, too, the place of a political system and a considerable portion of ethics, are supplied by the ideal of a philosopher,—but how could a living consciousness of the nature of a state have been formed in his time and in his circumstances? In his endeavours to establish in himself and others a moral standard, unaffected by the corruptions of his age, he does not perceive its close and necessary connexion with the active and unchecked scientific and artistic efforts. But he acknowledges their moral importance more than his predecessors, and he is impressed with the conviction, that the individual must live for the whole, although he is not able to determine the how in a manner productive of great results. Above all things, however, he gave up the proud self-sufficiency which the Stoic philosopher was expected to shew in his relation to the vicissitudes of the world and of man. The maxim suffer and abstain (from evil) (Fragm. 179; comp. Dissert. iv. 8. 25; Gell. xvii. 19), which he followed throughout his life, was based with him on the firm belief in a wise and benevolent government of Providence; and in this respect he approaches the Christian doctrine more than any of the earlier Stoics, though there is not a trace in the Epictetus to shew that he was acquainted with Christianity, and still less, that he had adopted Christianity, either in part or entirely. (Chr. Crelius, De ἀρεσώτοις et ἀσώτοις Epicteti Dissertat. Lipsiæ, 1711—16; comp. Brucker in Temp. Helvet. iii. 2. p. 260.) [CH. A. B.]

EPICTETUS (Ἐπίκτητος), a physician mentioned by Symmachus (Epist. x. 47), who attained to the title and dignity of Archiater in the time of Theodosius the Great, A. D. 379–395. [W. A. G.]

EPICURIUS (Ἐπικουρίος), the helper, a surname of Apollo, under which he was worshipped at Bassæ in Arcadia. Every year a wild boar was sacrificed to him in his temple on mount Lycæus. He had received this surname because he had at one time delivered the country from a pestilence. (Paus. viii. 38. § 6, 41. § 5.) [L. S.]

EPICURUS (Ἐπίκουρος), a celebrated Greek philosopher and the founder of a philosophical school called after him the Epicurean. He was a son of Neocles and Chærestrata, and belonged to the Attic demos of Gargettus, whence he is sometimes simply called the Gargettian. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 16.) He was born, however, in the island of Samos, in A. C. 342, for his father was one of the Athenian cleruchi, who went to Samos and received lands there. Epicurus spent the first eighteen years of his life at Samos, and then repaired to Athens, in A. C. 323, where Xenocrates was then at the head of the academy, by whom Epicurus is said to have been instructed, though Epicurus himself denied it. (Diog. Laërt. x. 13; Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 26.) He did not, however, stay at Athens long, for after the outbreak of the Lamiæ war he went to Colophon, where his father was then residing, and engaged in teaching. Epicurus followed the example of his father: he collected pupils and is said to have instructed them in grammar, until gradually his attention was drawn towards philosophy. Epicurus himself asserted that he had entered upon his philosophical studies at the early age of fourteen, while according to others it was not till five or six years later. Some said that he was led to the study of philosophy by his contempt of the rhetoricians and grammarians who were unable to explain to him the passage in Hesiod about Chaos; and others said that the first impulse was given to him by the works of Democritus, which fell into his hands by accident. It is at any rate undeniable that the atomistic doctrines of Democritus exercised a very great influence upon Epicurus, though he asserted that he was perfectly independent of all the philosophical schools of the time, and endeavoured to solve the great problems of life by independent thought and investigation. From Colophon Epicurus went to Mytilene and Lampascus, in which places he was engaged for five years in teaching philosophy. In A. C. 306, when he had attained the age of 35, he again went to Athens. He there purchased for eighty minæ a garden—the famous Κήποι Ἐπικούρου—which apparently was situated in the heart of the city, and in which he established his philosophical school. Surrounded by numerous friends and pupils and by his three brothers, Neocles, Charidemus, and Aristobolus, who likewise devoted themselves to the study of philosophy, Epicurus spent the remainder of his life in his garden at Athens. His mode of living was simple, temperate, and cheerful, and the aspersions of comic poets and of later philosophers who were opposed to his philosophy and describe him as a person devoted to sensual pleasures, do not seem entitled to the least credit, although they have succeeded in rendering his name proverbial with posterity for a sensualist or debauchee. The accounts of his connexion with Leontium, Marmarium, and other well known hetærae of the time, perhaps belong to the same kind of slander and calumny in which his enemies indulged. The life in Diogenes Laërtius affords abundant proof that Epicurus was a man of simple, pure, and temperate habits, a kind-hearted friend, and even a patriotic citizen. He kept aloof from the political parties of the time, and took no part in public affairs. His maxim was ἀδελφὺς βίωσας, which was partly the result of his peculiar philosophy, and partly of the political condition of Athens, which drove men to seek in themselves happiness and consolation for the loss of political freedom. During the latter period of his life Epicurus was afflicted with severe sufferings, and for many years he was unable to walk. In the end his sufferings were increased by the formation of a stone in his bladder, which terminated fatally after a severe illness of a fortnight. He bore his sufferings with a truly philosophical patience, cheerfulness, and courage, and died at the age of 72, in Olymp. 127. 2, or A.C. 270. His will, which is preserved in Diogenes Laërtius (x. 16, &c.), shews the same mildness of character and the same kind disposition and attachment to his friends, which he had manifested throughout life. Among his many pupils Epicurus himself gave the preference to Metrodorus of Lampascus, whom he used to call the philosopher, and whom he would have appointed to succeed him (Diog. Laërt. x. 22, &c.); but Metrodorus died seven years before his master, and in his will Epicurus appointed Hermarchus of Mytilene his successor in the management of his school at Athens. Apollodorus, the Epicurean, wrote a life of Epicurus, of which Diogenes made great use in his account of Epicurus, but this is now lost, and our principal source of information respecting Epicurus is the tenth book of Diogenes Laërtius, who however, as usual, only puts together what he finds in others; but at the same time he furnishes us some very important documents, such as his will, four letters and the κύρια δόξαι, of which we shall speak below. With the account of Diogenes we have to compare the philosophical poem of Lucræti, and the remarks and criticisms which are scattered in the works of later Greek and Roman writers, nearly all of whom, however, wrote in a hostile spirit about Epicurus and his philosophy and must therefore be used with great caution. Among them we must mention Cicero in his philosophical treatises, especially the De Finibus, and the De Natura Deorum; Seneca in his letter to Lucilius, and some treatises of Plutarch in his so-called Moralia.

Epicurus appears to have been one of the most prolific of all the ancient Greek writers. Diogenes Laërtius (x. 26), who calls him πολυγραφώτατος, states that he wrote about 300 volumes (κλίθρον). His works, however, are said to have been full of repetitions and quotations of authorities. A list of the best of his works is given by Diogenes (x. 27, &c.), and among them we may mention the Περὶ φύσεως in 37 books, Περὶ ἀτόμων καὶ κενοῦ, Ἐκτίσθη τῶν πρὸς φαντασίαις, Πρὸς τοὺς Μεγαρίκοις διαπορίαις, Κύρια δόξαι, Περὶ τέλους, Περὶ κριτηρίου ἢ κανόνος, Χαίρωνος ἢ περὶ δαῶν, Περὶ βίον in three books, Περὶ τῆς ἐν τῇ ἀτόμῳ γνῶσεως, Περὶ εἰμαρμένης, Περὶ εἰδῶλων, Περὶ δικαιοσύνης καὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἀρετῶν, and Ἐπιστολαί. Of his epistles four are preserved in Diogenes. (x. 22, 35, &c., 84, &c., 122, &c.) The first is very brief and was addressed by Epicurus just before his death to Idomeneus. The three others are of far greater importance: the first of them is addressed to one Herodotus, and contains an outline of the Canon and the Physics; the second, addressed to Pythocles, contains his theory about meteors, and the third, which is addressed to Menoeceus, gives a concise view of his ethics, so that these three Epistles, the genuineness of which can scarcely be doubted, furnish us an outline of his whole philosophical system. An abridgement of them is preserved in Endocia, p. 173, &c. They were edited separately by Nürnberger in his edition of the tenth book of Diogenes Laërtius, Nürnberg., 1791, 8vo. The letters, to Herodotus and Pythocles were edited separately by J. G. Schneider under the title of Epicuri Physica et Meteorologica duabus Epistolis comprehensa, Leipzig, 1813, 8vo. These letters, together with the above mentioned Κύρια δόξαι, that is, forty-four propositions containing the substance of the ethical philosophy of Epicurus, which are likewise preserved in Diogenes, must be our principal guides in examining and judging of the Epicurean philosophy. All the other works of Epicurus have perished, with the exception of a considerable number of fragments. Some parts of the above-mentioned work, Περὶ φύσεως, especially of the second and eleventh books, which treat of the εἰδῶλα, have been found among the rolls at Herculaneum, and are published in C. Corsini's Volsin. Hercul. vol. ii. Naples, 1809, from which they were reprinted separately by J. C. Orelli, Leipzig, 1818, 8vo. Some fragments of the tenth book of the same work have been edited by J. Th. Kreissig in his Comment. de Sallust. Histor. Fragm. p. 237, &c. If we may judge of the style of Epicurus from these few remains, it must be owned that it is clear and animated, though it is not distinguished for any other peculiar merits.

With regard to the philosophical system of Epicurus, there is scarcely a philosopher in all antiquity who boasted so much as Epicurus of being independent of all his predecessors, and those who were believed to have been his teachers were treated by him with scorn and bitter hostility. He prided himself upon being an αὐτοδίδακτος, but even a superficial glance at his philosophy shews that he was not a little indebted to the Cyrenaics on the one hand and to Democritus on the other. As far as the ethical part of his philosophy is concerned thus much may be admitted, that, like other systems of the time, it arose from the peculiar circumstances in which the Greek states were placed. Thinking men were led to seek within them that which they could not find without. Political freedom had to a great extent disappeared, and philosophers endeavoured to establish an internal freedom based upon ethical principles, and to maintain it in spite of outward oppression, no less than to secure it against man's own passions and evil propensities. Perfect independence, self reliance, and contentment, therefore, were regarded as the highest good and as the qualities which alone could make men happy, and as human happiness was with Epicurus the ultimate end of all philosophy, it was necessary for him to make ethics the most essential part, and as it were the centre of his whole philosophy. He had little esteem for logic and dialectics, but as he could not altogether do without them, he prefixed to his ethics a canon, or an introduction to ascertain the criterion which was to guide him in his search after truth and in distinguishing good from evil. His criteria themselves were derived from sensuous perception combined with thought and reflection. We obtain our knowledge and form our conceptions of things, according to him, through εἰδωλα, i. e. images of things which are reflected from them, and pass through our senses into our minds. Such a theory is destructive of all absolute truth, and a mere momentary impression upon our senses or feelings is substituted for it. His ethical theory was based upon the dogma of the Cyrenaics, that pleasure constitutes the highest happiness, and must consequently be the end of all human exertions. Epicurus, however, developed and ennobled this theory in a manner which constitutes the peculiarity and real merit of his philosophy, and which gained for him so many friends and admirers both in antiquity and in modern times. Pleasure with him was not a mere momentary and transitory sensation, but he conceived it as something lasting and imperishable, consisting in pure and noble mental enjoyments, that is, in δραστήρια and δωρία, or the freedom from pain and from all influences which disturb the peace of our mind, and thereby our happiness, which is the result of it. The summum bonum, according to him, consisted in this peace of mind; and the great problem of his ethics, therefore, was to shew how it was to be attained, and ethics was not only the principal branch of philosophy, but philosophy itself, and the value and importance of all other kinds of knowledge were estimated by the proportion in which they contributed towards that great object of human life, or in which they were connected with ethics. His peace of mind was based upon φρόνησις, which he described as the beginning of everything good, as the origin of all virtues, and which he himself therefore occasionally treated as the highest good itself.

In the physical part of his philosophy, he followed the atomistic doctrines of Democritus and Diogenes. His views are well known from Lucretius's poem De Rerum Natura. It would, however, appear that sometimes he misunderstood the views of his predecessors, and distorted them by introducing things which were quite foreign to them; sometimes he appears even in contradiction with himself. The deficiencies are most striking in his views concerning the gods, which drew upon him the charge of atheism. His gods, like everything else, consisted of atoms, and our notions of them are based upon the εἰδωλα which are reflected from them and pass into our minds. They were and always had been in the enjoyment of perfect happiness, which had not been disturbed by the laborious business of creating the world; and as the government of the world would interfere with their happiness, he conceived the gods as exercising no influence whatever upon the world or man.

The number of pupils of Epicurus who propagated his doctrines, was extremely great; but his philosophy received no further development at their hands, except perhaps that in subsequent times his lofty notion of pleasure and happiness was reduced to that of material and sensual pleasure. His immediate disciples adopted and followed his doctrines with the most scrupulous conscientiousness: they were attached and devoted to their master in a manner which has rarely been equalled either in ancient or modern times: their esteem, love, and veneration for him almost bordered upon worship; they are said to have committed his works to memory; they had his portrait engraved upon rings and drinking vessels, and celebrated his birthday every year. Athens honoured him with bronze statues. But notwithstanding the extraordinary devotion of his pupils and friends, whose number, says Diogenes, exceeded that of the population of whole towns, there is no philosopher in antiquity who has been so violently attacked, and whose ethical doctrines have been so much mistaken and misunderstood, as Epicurus. The cause of this singular phenomenon was partly a superficial knowledge of his philosophy, of which Cicero, for example, is guilty to a very great extent, and partly also the conduct of men who called themselves Epicureans, and, taking advantage of the facility with which his ethical theory was made the handmaid of a sensual and debauched life, gave themselves up to the enjoyment of sensual pleasures. At Rome, and during the time of Roman ascendancy in the ancient world, the philosophy of Epicurus never took any firm root; and it is then and there that, owing to the paramount influence of the Stoic philosophy, we meet with the bitterest antagonists of Epicurus. The disputes for and against his philosophy, however, are not confined to antiquity; they were renewed at the time of the revival of letters, and are continued to the present day. The number of works that have been written upon Epicurus and his philosophy is prodigious (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 584, &c.); we pass over the many histories of Greek philosophy, and mention only the most important works of which Epicurus is the special subject. Peter Gassendi, de Vita et Moribus Epicuri commentarius libri octo constans, Lugdun. 1647, and Hag. Comit. 1656, 4to.; Gassendi, Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicuri, Hag. Comit. 1659, 4to., London, 1668, 12mo., Amsterdam, 1684; J. Rondel, La Vie d'Epicure, Paris, 1679, 12mo.; La Haye, 1686, 12mo.; a Latin translation of this work appeared at Amsterdam, 1693, 12mo., and an English one by Digby, London, 1712, 8vo.; Batteux, La Morale d'Epicure, Paris, 1758, 8vo.; Bremer, Versuch einer Apologie des Epicur, Berlin, 1776, 8vo.; Warnekros, Apologie und Leben Epicurs, Greifswald, 1795, 8vo.; and especially Steinhart in Erch u. Gruber, Allgem. Encyclop. vol. xxxv. p. 459, &c.

Diogenes Laërtius (x. 26) mentions three other persons of the name of Epicurus, and Menage on that passage points out three more; but all of them are persons concerning whom nothing is known.

EPICYDES ('Επικύδης). 1. A Syracusan by origin, but born and educated at Carthage, and the son of a Carthaginian mother, his grandfather having been banished by Agathocles, and having settled at Carthage. (Polyb. vii. 2; Liv. xxiv. 6.) He served, together with his elder brother Hippocrates, with much distinction in the army of Hannibal, both in Spain and Italy; and when, after the battle of Cannae, Hieronymus of Syracuse sent to make overtures to Hannibal, that general selected the two brothers as his envoys to Syracuse. They soon gained over the wavering mind of the young king, and induced him to desert the Roman alliance. (Polyb. vii. 2-5; Liv. xxiv. 6-7.) But the murder of Hieronymus shortly after, and the revolution that ensued at Syracuse, for a time deranged their plans: they at first demanded merely a safe-conduct to return to Hannibal, but soon found that they could do more good by their intrigues at Syracuse, where they even succeeded in procuring their election as generals, in the place of Andranodorus and Themistus. But the Roman party again obtained the upper hand; and Hippocrates having been sent with a force to Leontini, Epicydes joined him there, and they set at defiance the Syracusan government. Leontini was, indeed, quickly reduced by Marcellus, but his cruelties there alienated the Syracusans, and still more the foreign mercenaries in their service; a disposition of which Hippocrates and Epicydes (who had made their escape to Erbesus) ably availed themselves, induced the troops sent against them to mutiny, and returned at their head to Syracuse, of which they made themselves masters with little difficulty, a. c. 214. (Liv. xxiv. 21-32.) Marcellus immediately proceeded to besiege Syracuse, the defence of which was conducted with ability and vigour by the two brothers, who had been again appointed generals. When the Roman commander found himself obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, Epicydes continued to hold the city itself, while Hippocrates conducted the operations in other parts of Sicily. The former was, however, unable to prevent the surprise of the Epipolae, which were betrayed into the hands of Marcellus; but he still exerted his utmost efforts against the Romans, and co-operated zealously with the army from without under Himilco and Hippocrates. After the defeat of the latter he went in person to meet Bomilcar, who was advancing with a Carthaginian fleet to the relief of the city, and hasten his arrival; but, after the retreat of Bomilcar, he seems to have regarded the fall of Syracuse as inevitable, and withdrew to Agrigentum. (Liv. xxiv. 33-39, xxv. 23-27.) Here he appears to have remained and co-operated with the Numidian Mutines, until the capture of Agrigentum (a. c. 210) obliged him to fly with Hanno to Carthage, after which his name is not again mentioned. (Liv. xxvi. 40.)

2. A Syracusan, surnamed Sindon, one of the lieutenants of the preceding, who were left by him in command of Syracuse when he retired to Agrigentum: he was put to death by the Roman party, together with his colleagues. (Liv. xxv. 28.)

3. Of Olynthus, a general under Ophellias of Cyrene, who took Thimbron prisoner at Teuchira. (Arr. ap. Phot. p. 70, a.) [E. H. B.]

EPIDAUROS (Ἐπίδαυρος), the mythical founder of Epidaurus, a son of Argos and Evadne, but according to Argive legends a son of Pelops, and according to those of Elis a son of Apollo. (Apol. lod. ii. 1. § 2; Paus. ii. 26. § 3.) [L. S.]

EPI'DIUS, a Latin rhetorician who taught the art of oratory towards the close of the republic, numbering M. Antonius and Octavianus among his scholars. His skill, however, was not sufficient to save him from a conviction for malicious accusation (calumniæ). We are told that he claimed descent from Epidius Nuncius (the name is probably corrupt), a rural deity, who appears to have been worshipped upon the banks of the Sarnus. (Sueton. de Clar. Rhet. 4.) [W. R.]

C. EPI'DIUS MARULLUS. [MARULLUS.]

EPI'DOTES (Ἐπίδοτες), a divinity who was worshipped at Laedaemon, and averted the anger of Zeus Hicæus for the crime committed by Pan-sanias. (Paus. iii. 17. § 8.) Epidotes, which means the "liberal giver," occurs also as a surname of other divinities, such as Zeus at Mantinea and Sparta (Paus. viii. 9. § 1; Hesych. s. v.), of the god of sleep at Sicyon, who had a statue in the temple of Asclepius there, which represented him in the act of sending a lion to sleep (Paus. ii. 10. § 3), and lastly of the beneficent god, to whom Antoninus built a sanctuary at Epidaurus. (Paus. ii. 27. § 7.) [L. S.]

EPI'GENES (Ἐπίγηνες), son of Antiphon, of the demus of Cephisia, is mentioned by Plato among the disciples of Socrates who were with him in his last moments. Xenophon represents Socrates as remonstrating with him on his neglect of the bodily exercises requisite for health and strength. (Plat. Apol. p. 33, Phaed. p. 59; Xen. Mem. iii. 12.) [E. E.]

EPI'GENES (Ἐπίγηνες). 1. An Athenian poet of the middle comedy. Pollux indeed (vii. 29) speaks of him as νέος τις κομικῶν, but the terms "middle" and "new," as Clinton remarks (R. H. vol. ii. p. xlix.), are not always very carefully applied. (See Arist. Etik. Nic. iv. 8. § 6.) Epigenes himself, in a fragment of his play called Μνηστῆριον (ap. Ath. xi. p. 472, f.) speaks of Pixodarus, prince of Caria, as "the king's son"; and from this Meineke argues (Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 354), that the comedy in question must have been written while Hecatomnus, the father of Pixodarus, was yet alive, and perhaps about a. c. 380. We find besides in Athenæus (ix. p. 409, d.), that there was a doubt among the ancients whether the play called Ἀγρυπλιὸν ὁπάρισμός should be assigned to Epigenes or Antiphanes. These poets therefore must have been contemporaries. [See vol. i. p. 204, b.] The fragments of the comedies of Epigenes have been collected by Meineke (vol. iii. p. 537; comp. Poll. vii. 29; Ath. iii. p. 75, c., ix. p. 384, a., xi. pp. 469, c., 474, a., 480, a., 486, c., 502, e.).

2. Of Sicyon, who has been confounded by some with his namesake the comic poet, is mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Θέτιος) as the most ancient writer of tragedy. By the word "tragedy" here we can understand only the old dithyrambic and satyrical τραγῳδία, into which it is possible that Epigenes may have been the first to introduce other subjects than the original one of the fortunes of Dionysus, if at least we may trust the account which we find in Apostolius, Photinus, and Suidas, of the origin of the proverb οὐδὲν ὑπὲρ τὸν Ἀδύριστον. This would clearly be one of the earliest steps in the gradual transformation of the old dithyrambic performance into the dramatic tragedy of later times, and may tend to justify the state-

most which ascribes the invention of tragedy to the Sicyonians. We do not know the period at which Epigenes flourished, and the point was a doubtful one in the time of Suidas, who says (s. v. Θίγρης) that, according to some, he was the 16th before Theopis, while, according to others, he almost immediately preceded him. (See Müller, Der. iv. 7. § 8; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 384; Arist. Poet. 3; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 160, 303, vol. iv. p. 10; Dict. of Ant. p. 380, a.) [E. E.]

EPIGENES (Ἐπίγηνες) of Byzantium is supposed to have lived about the time of Augustus by name, and several centuries earlier by others; nothing, in fact, is known of his date, except what may be inferred from the slight mention of him by Seneca, Pliny, and Censorinus. According to Seneca (Nat. Quaest. vii. 30.), Epigenes professed to have studied in Chaldaea, from whence he brought, among other things, the notions of the Chaldeans on comets, in his account of which he is held to differ much from Apollonius Myndius (see his life), though it is not, we think, difficult to reconcile the two. Pliny (H. N. vii. 56) has a passage about Epigenes, which states that he asserts the Chaldeans to have had observations recorded on brick (coccibus laterculis) for 720 (?) years, and that Berosus and Critodemus say 420 (?) years. But among the various readings are found 720 thousand and 420 thousand, which seem to be the true ones, for on them Pliny goes on to remark "Ex quo apparet aeternus litterarum usus." Fabricius and Bayle (Dict. art. Babylon) adopt the larger readings, and also Bailly, who takes them to mean days. Pliny may perhaps seem to say that Epigenes is the first author of note who made any such assertion about the Chaldeans: "Epigenes . . . docet gravis auctor imprimis;" and thus interpreted, he is made to mean that Epigenes was older than Berosus, and therefore than Alexander the Great. Weidler adopts this conclusion on different and rather hypothetical grounds.

[A. De M.]

EPIGENIUS, comes et magister memoriae, one of the commission of sixteen, appointed by Theodosius in A. D. 435, to compile the Theodosian Code, and one of the eight who actually signalized themselves in its composition. [Diodorus, vol. i. p. 1018.] [J. T. G.]

EPIGONI (Ἐπίγονοι), that is, the heirs or descendants. By this name ancient mythology understands the sons of the seven heroes who had undertaken an expedition against Thebes, and had perished there. [ADRASTUS.] Ten years after that catastrophe, the descendants of the seven heroes went against Thebes to avenge their fathers, and this war is called the war of the Epigoni. According to some traditions, this war was undertaken at the request of Adrastus, the only survivor of the seven heroes. The names of the Epigoni are not the same in all accounts (Apollod. iii. 7. § 2, &c.; Diod. iv. 66; Paus. x. 10. § 2; Hygin. Poet. 71); but the common lists contain Alcmaeon, Aegialeus, Diomedes, Promachus, Sthenelus, Thersites, and Euryalus. Alcmaeon undertook the command, in accordance with an oracle, and collected a considerable band of Argives. The Thebans marched out against the enemy, under the command of Laodamas, after whose fall they took to flight to protect themselves within their city. On the part of the Epigoni, Aegialeus had fallen. The seer Teiresias, however, induced the Thebans to quit their town, and take their wives and children with them, while they sent ambassadors to the enemy to sue for peace. The Argives, however, took possession of Thebes, and razed it to the ground. The Epigoni sent a portion of the booty and Manto, the daughter of Teiresias, to Delphi, and then returned to Peloponnesus. The war of the Epigoni was made the subject of epic and tragic poems. (Paus. ix. 9. § 3.) The statues of the seven Epigoni were dedicated at Delphi. (Paus. x. 10. § 2.) [L. S.]

EPIGONUS (Ἐπίγονος) of Thessalonica, the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck. Anol. vol. ii. p. 306; Jacobs, vol. iii. p. 19, vol. xiii. p. 889.) [P. S.]

EPIGONUS, a Greek statuarius, whose works were chiefly in imitation of other artists, but who displayed original power in two works, namely, a trumpeter, and an infant caressing its slain mother. It is natural to suppose that the latter work was an imitation of the celebrated picture of Aristides. (Plin. xxiv. 8. a. 19. § 29.) [P. S.]

EPILYCUS (Ἐπίλυκος), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, who is mentioned by an ancient grammarian in connexion with Aristophanes and Philyllius, and of whose play Κεφαλίσκος a few fragments are preserved. (Suid. s. v.; Athen. iv. pp. 153, b., 140, a., xiv. p. 650, c., xv. p. 691, c.; Bekker, Anecd. p. 411. 17; Phot. Lex. s. v. ῥεττιγόνιον; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 269, ii. pp. 887, 889; Bergk, de Reliq. Com. Att. Ant. p. 431.) An epic poet of the same name, a brother of the comic poet Crates, is mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Κράτης). [P. S.]

EPI'MACHUS, a distinguished Athenian architect and engineer, built the Helepolis of Demetrius Poliorcetes. (Vitruv. x. 2.) [P. S.]

EPIME'NIDES (Ἐπιμένιδης). 1. A poet and prophet of Crete. His father's name was Dosiares or Agosarces. We have an account of him in Diogenes Laërtius (i. c. 10), which, however, is a very uncritical mixture of heterogeneous traditions, so that it is difficult, if not altogether impossible, to discover its real historical substance. The mythical character of the traditions of Epimenides is sufficiently indicated by the fact of his being called the son of a nymph, and of his being reckoned among the Curetes. It seems, however, pretty clear, that he was a native of Phaestus in Crete (Diog. Laërt. i. 109; Plat. Sol. 12; de Defect. Orac. 1), and that he spent the greater part of his life at Cnossus, whence he is sometimes called a Cnossian. There is a story that when yet a boy, he was sent out by his father to fetch a sheep, and that seeking shelter from the heat of the mid-day sun, he went into a cave. He there fell into a sleep in which he remained for fifty-seven years. On waking he sought for the sheep, not knowing how long he had been sleeping, and was astonished to find everything around him altered. When he returned home, he found to his great amazement, that his younger brother had in the meantime grown an old man. The time at which Epimenides lived, is determined by his invitation to Athens,

when he had already arrived at an advanced age. He was looked upon by the Greeks as a great sage and as the favourite of the gods. The Athenians who were visited by a plague in consequence of the crime of Cylon [CYLON], consulted the Delphic oracle about the means of their delivery. The god commanded them to get their city purified, and the Athenians sent out Nicias with a ship to Crete to invite Epimenides to come and undertake the purification. Epimenides accordingly came to Athens, about B.C. 596 or Olymp. 46, and performed the desired task by certain mysterious rites and sacrifices, in consequence of which the plague ceased. The grateful Athenians decreed to reward him with a talent and the vessel which was to carry him back to his native island. But Epimenides refused the money, and only desired that a friendship should be established between Athens and Cnossus. Whether Epimenides died in Crete or at Sparta, which in later times boasted of possessing his tomb (Diog. Laërt. i. 115), is uncertain, but he is said to have attained the age of 164, 157, or even of 299 years. Such statements, however, are as fabulous as the story about his fifty-seven years' sleep. According to some accounts, Epimenides was reckoned among the seven wise men of Greece (Diog. Laërt. Proöm. § 13; Plut. Sol. 12); but all that tradition has handed down about him suggests a very different character from that of those seven, and he must rather be ranked in the class of priestly bards and sages who are generally comprised under the name of the Orphici; for everything we hear of him, is of a priestly or religious nature: he was a purifying priest of superhuman knowledge and wisdom, a seer and a prophet, and acquainted with the healing powers of plants. These notions about Epimenides were propagated throughout antiquity, and it was probably owing to the great charm attached to his name, that a series of works, both in prose and in verse, were attributed to him, though few, if any, can be considered to have been genuine productions of Epimenides, the age at which he lived was certainly not an age of prose composition in Greece. Diogenes Laërtius (i. 112) notices as prose works, one on sacrifices, and another on the Political Constitution of Crete. There was also a Letter on the Constitution which Minos had given to Crete; it was said to have been addressed by Epimenides to Solon; it was written in the modern Attic dialect, and was proved to be spurious by Demetrius of Magnesia. Diogenes himself has preserved another letter, which is likewise addressed to Solon; it is written in the Doric dialect, but is no more genuine than the former. The reputation of Epimenides as a poet may have rested on a somewhat surer foundation; it is at any rate more likely that he should have composed such poetry as Χρησμοί and Καθαρμοί than any other. (Suidas, s. v. Ἐπιμενίδης; Strab. x. p. 479; Paus. i. 14. § 4.) It is, however, very doubtful whether he wrote the Γένεσις and Θεογονία of the Curetes and Corybantes in 5000 verses, the epic on Jason and the Argonauts in 6500, and the epic on Minos and Rhadamanthys in 4000 verses; all of which works are mentioned by Diogenes. There cannot, however, be any doubt but that there existed in antiquity certain old-fashioned poems written upon skins; and the expression, Ἐπιμενίδειον δέγμα was used by the ancients to designate anything old-fashioned, obsolete, and curious. An allusion to Epimenides seems to be made in St. Paul's Epistle to Titus (i. 12). Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 30, &c., 844; Höckh, Kreta, vol. iii. p. 246, &c.; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtk. vol. i. p. 463, &c., and more especially C. F. Heinrich, Epimenides aus Kreta, Leipzig, 1801, 8vo.

2. The author of a History of Rhodes, which was written in the Doric dialect. (Diog. Laërt. i. 115; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii. 24, ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1125, iii. 241, iv. 57; Eudoc. p. 81; Heinrich, Epimenid. p. 134.)

3. The author of a work on genealogies. (Diog. Laërt. i. 115.) [L. S.]

EPI METHEUS. [PROMETHEUS and PANDORA.]

EPI NTOS (Ἐπι ντος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, two of whose plays are mentioned, Ἐπὶ βαλλόμενοι and Μηστρόπλομοι. The latter title determines his date to the time of Antiochus the Great, about B.C. 217, for Mnesip- tolemus was an historian in great favour with that king. (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 166; Athen. x. p. 432, b, xi. pp. 469, a, 497, a, 500, f.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 481, iv. pp. 505-508.) [P. S.]

EPI PHANES, a surname of Antiochus IV. and Antiochus XI., kings of Syria, [see vol. i. pp. 198, 199], and also of Antiochus IV. king of Commagene, one of whose sons had likewise the same surname, and is the one meant by Tacitus, when he speaks (Hist. ii. 25) of "Rex Epiphanes." [See vol. i. p. 194.]

EPI PHANIUS (Ἐπι φανος). 1. Of ALEXANDRIA, son of the mathematician Theon, who addresses to him his commentaries on Ptolemy. (Theon, Commentary on Ptolemy, ed. Halm, Paris, 1821-22.) Possibly this Epiphanius is one of the authors of a work περί βροτῶν καὶ ἀστυγῶν, by Epiphanius and Andreas, or Andrew, formerly in the library of Dr. George Wheeler, canon of Durham. (Catal. MSS. Angliae et Hiberniae, Oxon. 1697.)

2. Bishop of CONSTANTIA (the ancient Salamis), and metropolitan of CYPRUS, the most eminent of all the persons of the name of Epiphanius. (See below.)

3. Of CONSTANTIA and metropolitan of CYPRUS, distinguished from the preceding as the Younger, was represented at the third council of Constantinople (the sixth general council) by the bishop of Trimithus, one of his suffragans. Several of the discourses which have been regarded as written by the great Epiphanius are by acuter judges ascribed either to this Epiphanius, or to a third of the same name and bishopric. [No. 4 below.] A work extant in MS. in the Library of St. Mark at Venice, and in the Imperial Library at Vienna, is also by some ascribed to this writer or the following. (Labbe, Concilia, vol. vi. col. 1058; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. pp. 258, 273, &c., x. pp. 249, 276, 279, 302; Petavius, Preface to the second volume of his edition of Epiphanius; Oudin, Commentarius de Scriptore. Eccles. vol. ii. 318, 19.)

4. Third bishop of CONSTANTIA of the name. A letter of his, congratulating Joannes or John on his restoration to the patriarchate of Constantinople (A.D. 867), is given, with a Latin version, by Labbe. (Concilia, vol. viii. col. 1276.) See the preceding article.

5. Of CONSTANTINOPLÉ. On the death of Joannes or John II., the Cappadocian, patriarch of Constantinople, Epiphanius, then a presbyter, was chosen to succeed him: he had been the "syncellus" or personal attendant (the functions of the syncellus are not determined) of his predecessor. The election of Epiphanius is stated by Theophanes to have taken place in Feb. A. D. 512 of the Alexandrian computation, equivalent to A. D. 519 or probably 520 of the common era; the account, transmitted only four days after his ordination, to pope Hormisdas, by the deacon Dioscurus, then at Constantinople, as one of the legates of the Roman see, given by Labbe (Concilii, vol. iv. p. 1523), was received at Rome on the 7th of April, A. D. 520, which must therefore have been the year of his election. He occupied the see from A. D. 520 till his death in A. D. 535. Theophanes places his death in June, A. D. 529, Alex. comput. = A. D. 536 of the common era, after a patriarchate of sixteen years and three months; but Pagi (Critic. in Baronii Annal. ad ann. 535, No. lviii.) shortens this calculation by a year. Epiphanius was one of the mints of the Greek calendar, and is mentioned in the Mesologium translated by Sirletus, but not in that of the emperor Basil. He was succeeded by Anthimus, bishop of Trapesus.

Some Letters of Epiphanius to pope Hormisdas, and of the pope to him, are extant in Labbe's Concilii, vol. iv. col. 1533-4-7, 1545-6, 1554-5; and in the Concilii of Binus, vol. ii. pp. 360-61-64-65-68 (edit. 1606); in the latter they are given only in Latin. A decree of Epiphanius, and of a council in which he presided (apparently the council of Constantinople in A. D. 520, during the continuance of which he was elected to the patriarchate), condemning and anathematizing for heresy Severus, patriarch of Antioch, Petrus or Peter, bishop of Apamea, and Zozaras, was read at a subsequent council of Constantinople, A. D. 536, under Menas or Mennas, successor of Anthimus, and appears in Labbe's Concilii, vol. v. col. 251, seq. Some laws and constitutions of Justinian are addressed to Epiphanius. (Justin. Cod. i. tit. 3. a. 42; de Episcopis et Clericis; Novellae, 3, 5.)

In the library of the king of Bavaria at Munich is a Greek MS. described (Hardt. Catalogus MSS. Graec. &c. Cod. cclvi.) as containing, among other things, a treatise by Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople, on the separation of the Latin and Greek churches; and a MS. in the Bodleian Library, Baroc. cxiv. (Catal. MSS. Angliæ et Hiberniæ, Oxon. 1697) contains, with other things, a work by Epiphanius the patriarch On the communication of the Latins by the Greeks on account of the Controversy concerning the Procession of the Holy Spirit. Allsius also (adv. Creyghlonum) cites Epiphanius Patriarcha, de Originis disceptatione inter Graecos et Latinos, probably the same work as that in the Bavarian MS. But the subjects of these treatises shew they were of later date than our patriarch, nor have we the means of determining their authorship. An Arabic MS. in the King's Library at Paris (Catal. MSS. Regiae, vol. i. p. 114, Codes cxviii.) contains what is described as Canonicum Epitome nec accurata nec antiqua, ascribed to Epiphanius.

The account of Epiphanius by Evagrius contains two errors. He makes him the successor of Anthimus instead of the predecessor; and to have been succeeded by Menas or Mennas, who was the successor, not of Epiphanius, but of Anthimus. (Labbe and Binus, l. c.; Theophanes, Chronographia, ad annos citat.; Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. iv.

6. OF CONSTANTINOPLE (2). The life of St. Andreas or Andrew, o ἁγῶς (the fool), by his contemporary and friend Nicephorus, contains various particulars of the history and character of Epiphanius, a young Constantinopolitan, who is described as possessed of every desirable endowment of mind and body, and as having manifested the strongest affection and regard for the saint who foretold his elevation to the patriarchate of Constantinople. Nicephorus declares that he lived to see this prophecy fulfilled in the elevation of Epiphanius to that metropolitan dignity, but intimates that he changed his name. The Epiphanius of this narrative has been by Fabricius confounded with the subject of the preceding article; but Janninghus has shewn that as St. Andrew did not live till late in the ninth century and the earlier part of the tenth, the Epiphanius of Nicephorus must have lived long after the other. As he changed his name, he cannot be certainly identified with any of the patriarchs of Constantinople. Janninghus conjectures that he is identical with Polyuctus or Antonius III. (Studita), who occupied the see in the latter half of the tenth century. (Nicephorus, S. Andreas Vita, with the Commentarius Praefatus of Janninghus, in the Acta Sanctorum Maii, vol. vi. ad fin.; Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 257; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 505, ed. Oxford, 1740—43.)

7. HAGIOPOLITA, or of JERUSALEM. See below, No. 8.

8. Described as a MONK and PRESBYTER. Allatius (de Symeonum Scriptis, p. 106) gives an account of and extract from a life of the Virgin by this Epiphanius, which extract is also given by Fabricius, in his Codes Apocryph. N. T. The entire work has since been published in the Anecdota Literaria of Amadutius (vol. iii. p. 39, &c.) with a Latin version and introduction. When he lived is not known: it is conjectured that it was in the twelfth century, as he mentions Joannes of Thessalonica and Andreas of Crete (who lived near the end of the seventh century) among "the fathers," and is himself quoted by Nicephorus Callisti (Eccles. Hist. ii. 23) in the earlier half of the fourteenth century. He wrote also a History of the Life and acts of St. Andrew the Apostle (Allatius, de Symeon. p. 90); and he is probably the author of an account of Jerusalem and of parts of Syria (by "Epiphanius Hagropolitae," i. e. inhabitant of the Holy City), which he describes as an eye-witness. This account was published, with a Latin version, by Fed. Morellus, in his Expositio Thematium, Paris, 1620, and again by Allatius, in his Expositiones. It may be observed, that Morellus published two editions of the Expositio Thematium in the above year, one without the Greek text of Epiphanius, and one with it. A MS. in the Bodleian Library (Baroc. cxlii. No. 20) is described as containing "Epiphanius Monachi et Presbyteri Character B. Virginis et Domini Nostri" (a different work from that mentioned above); and "ejusdem, ut videtur, de Disputatione Quatuor Evangelistarum circa Resurrectionem Christi." (Catal. MSS. Angl. et Hibern. Oxford, 1697.) Some have confounded him with Epiphanius the friend and disciple of St. Andreas the fool, noticed above, No. 6. (Oudin, Comment. de Scriptor. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. ii. pp. 455-6.)

9. Called erroneously THE PATRIARCH, author of some works on the schism of the Eastern and Western churches. See above, No. 5.

10. Of PETRA, son of Ulpianus, was a sophist or rhetorician of considerable reputation. He taught rhetoric at Petra and at Athens. He lived also at Laodicea in Syria, where he was very intimate with the two Apollinarii, father and son, of whom the latter afterwards became the founder of the sect of the Apollinarianæ. The Apollinarii were excommunicated by the bishop of Laodicea on account of their intimacy with Epiphanius, who, it was feared would convert them to the religion of the Greeks; from which it appears that Epiphanius was a heathen. While he was at Athens, Libanius, then a young man, came thither, but did not apply for instruction to Epiphanius, then in the height of his reputation, though they were both from Syria; neither is this Epiphanius the person to whom Libanius wrote. (Libanius, Epist. 831.) Epiphanius did not live to be very old; and both he and his wife, who was eminent for her beauty, died of the same disease, an affection of the blood. He wrote many works, which are enumerated by Suidas. They are as follows: 1. Περὶ κυριότητος καὶ διαφοράς τῶν ὁρίσεων. 2. Προγυμνάσματα. 3. Μελέται. 4. Διήρητοι. 5. Πολυμαρχικός. 6. Λόγοι Ἐπιδευκτικοί; and, 7. Miscellanies. Socrates mentions a hymn to Bacchus, recited by him, attendance on which recitation was the immediate occasion of the excommunication of the Apollinarii. (Socrates, Hist. Eccl. ii. 46; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. v. 25; Eunapius, Sophist. Vitæ (Epiphanius and Libanius); Eudocia, Ἱστορία, in the Anecdota Græca of Villoison, vol. i.; Suidas, s. v. Ἐπιφάνιος; the passages in Suidas and Eudocia are the same.)

11. Described as SCHOLASTICUS. Sixtus of Sena calls him a Greek, but Ceillier (Auteurs Sacrés, vol. xvi.) and Cave (Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 405) call him an Italian. He lived about the beginning of the sixth century. He was the friend of Cassiodorus [CASSIODORUS], at whose request he translated from Greek into Latin the Commentary of Didymus on the Proverbs and on Seven of the Canonical Epistles [DIDYMUS, No. 4.], the Exposition of Solomon's Song, said by Cassiodorus to be by Epiphanius of Constantia or Salamis. Garetius thinks this exposition was probably written by Philo of Carpasus or Carpathus; but Foggini vindicates the title of Epiphanius to the authorship. Whether Epiphanius Scholasticus was concerned in the translation of the Jewish Antiquities of Josephus, and of the Notes on some of the Catholic Epistles, from the writings of Clement of Alexandria, which Cassiodorus procured to be made, can only be conjectured, as Cassiodorus does not name the translators. Sixtus of Sena ascribes to Epiphanius Scholasticus a Catenæ (or compilation of comments) on the Psalms, from the Greek Fathers; but we know not on what authority. But his principal work was translating and combining into one the Ecclesiastical Histories of Sozomen, Socrates, and Theodoret. The Historia Tripartita of Cassiodorus was digested from this combined version. He also translated, by desire of Cassiodorus, the Codex Encyclicus, a collection of letters, chiefly synodal, in defence of the council of Chalcedon, which collection has been reprinted in the Concilia of Binus, Labbe, Coletus, and Harduin, but most correctly by the last two. The version of the

Commentary of Didymus on the Canonical Epistles is said [DIDYMUS, No. 4.] to be that given in the Bibliotheca Patrum; but that on the Proverbs has not, we believe, been printed; the versions of Epiphanius, Josephus, and Clement of Alexandria, have been printed. That of Epiphanius on Solomon's Song was first published by Foggini, at Rome, in 1750, with a preface and notes. (Cassiodorus, Præf. in Histor. Tripartit., De Institutione Divinar. Literar. cc. 5, 8, 11, 17, with the notes of Garetius; Sixtus Senensis, Bibliotheca Sancta, lib. iv.; Fabric. Biblioth. Med. et Inf. Latinitatis, vol. ii. p. 101, ed. Manai, Biblioth. Græc. vol. vii. p. 425, vol. viii. p. 257, vol. xii. p. 299; Cave, Ceillier, and Foggini, ll. cc.)

Beside the foregoing, there are many persons of the name of Epiphanius of whom little or nothing is known but their names. The ecclesiastics of the name, who appear in the records of the ancient councils, may be traced by the Index in Labbe's Concilia, vol. xvi. [J. C. M.]

EPIPHANIUS (Ἐπιφάνιος), bishop of CONSTANTIA and metropolitan of Cyprus, was born at Bezanduca, a small town in Palestine, in the district of Eleutheropolis, in the first part of the fourth century. (Sozomen. vi. 52.) His parents were Jews. He went to Egypt when young, and there appears to have been tainted with Gnostic errors, but afterwards fell into the hands of some monks, and by them was made a strong advocate for the monastic life, and strongly imbued with their own narrow spirit. He returned to Palestine, and lived there for some time as a monk, having founded a monastery near his native place. In A.D. 367 he was chosen bishop of Constantia, the metropolis of the Isle of Cyprus, formerly called Salamis. His writings shew him to have been a man of great reading; for he was acquainted with Hebrew, Syriac, Egyptian, Greek, and Latin, and was therefore called πεντάγλωσσος. But he was entirely without critical or logical power, of real piety, but also of a very bigoted and dogmatical turn of mind, unable to distinguish the essential from the non-essential in doctrinal differences, and always ready to suppose that some dangerous heresy lurked in any statement of belief which varied a little from the ordinary form of expression. It was natural that to such a man Origen, whom he could not understand, should appear a dangerous teacher of error; and accordingly in his work on heresies he thinks it necessary to give an essential warning against him. A report that Origen's opinions were spreading in Palestine, and sanctioned even by John, bishop of Jerusalem, excited Epiphanius to such a pitch, that he left Cyprus to investigate the matter on the spot. At Jerusalem he preached so violent a sermon against any abettors of Origen's errors, and made such evident allusions to the bishop, that John sent his Archdeacon to beg him to stop. Afterwards, when John preached against anthropomorphism (of a tendency to which Epiphanius had been suspected) he was followed up to the pulpit by his undaunted antagonist, who announced that he agreed in John's censure of Anthropomorphites, but that it was equally necessary to condemn Origenists. Having excited sufficient commotion at Jerusalem, Epiphanius repaired to Bethlehem, where he was all-powerful with the monks; and there he was so successful in his denunciation of heresy, that he persuaded came to renounce their connexion with the bishop of Jerusalem. After this he allowed his seal to get the better of all considerations of church order and decency, to such an extent, that he actually ordained Paulinianus to the office of presbyter, that he might perform the ministerial functions for the monks (who, as usual at that time, were laymen), and so prevent them from applying to Jerusalem to supply this want. John naturally protested loudly against this interference with his diocese, and appealed for help to the two patriarchal sees of Alexandria and Rome. Peace was not restored to the Church for some time. The next quarrel in which Epiphanius was involved was with Chrysostom. Some monks of Nitria had been expelled by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, as Origenists, but were received and protected at Constantinople [CHRYSOStOMUS]. Upon this Theophilus persuaded Epiphanius, now almost in his dotage, to summon a council of Cyprian bishops, which he did A.D. 401. This assembly passed a sentence of condemnation on Origen's books, which was made known to Chrysostom by letter; and Epiphanius proceeded in person to Constantinople, to take part in the pending dispute. Chrysostom was irritated by Epiphanius interfering in the government of his diocese; and the latter, just before his return home, is reputed to have given vent to his bad feeling by the scandalous malediction, "I hope that you will not die a bishop!" upon which Chrysostom replied,—"I hope you will never get home!" (Sozomen. viii. 15.) For the credit of that really great and Christian man, it is to be hoped that the story is incorrect; and as both wishes were granted, it bears strong marks of a tale invented after the deaths of the two disputants. Epiphanius died on board the ship, which was conveying him back to Cyprus, A.D. 402, leaving us a melancholy example of the unchristian excesses into which bigotry may hurry a man of real piety, and a sincere desire to do God service.

The extant works of Epiphanius are (1) Anacoreta, a discourse on the faith, being an exposition of the doctrine of the Trinity; (2) Pasarius, a discourse against Heresies, of which he attacks no less than eighty; (3) An epitome of 2, called Anacrophalaecosis; (4) De Ponderibus et Mensuris Liber; (5) Two Epistles; the first to John bishop of Jerusalem, translated by Jerome into Latin; the second to Jerome himself, in whose works they are both found. A great number of Epiphanius's writings are lost. The earliest editions were at Beale, in Latin, translated by Corsarius, 1543, and again in the following year sunt et typis Jo. Hervagii. The edition of Diosyncorus Petavins, in Greek and Latin, appeared at Paris, 1622, 2 vols. fol., and at Leipzig, 1682, with a commentary by Valeusius. (Sozomen. l. c.; Hieronym. Apol. 1. adv. Rufin. p. 222; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i.; Neander, Kirchengeschichte, vol. ii. p. 1414, &c.) [G. E. L. C.]

EPIPOLE (Ἐπιπόλη), a daughter of Trachion, of Carystus in Euboea. In the disguise of a man she went with the Greeks against Troy; but when Palamedes discovered her sex, she was stoned to death by the Greek army. (Ptolem. Hephaest. 5.) Epipole was also a surname of Demeter at Lacedaemon. (Hesych. s. v. Ἐπιπολλή.) [L. S.]

Cunaxa, and is mentioned by Xenophon as an able officer. His name occurs again in the march of the Greeks through Armenia. (Xen. Anab. i. 10. § 7, iv. 6. § 1.) [E. E.]

EPISTROPHUS (Ἐπίστροφος), three mythical personages of this name are mentioned in the Iliad. (ii. 516, &c., 692, 856.) [L. S.]

EPITADAS (Ἐπιτάδας), son of Molobrus, was the commander of the 420 Lacedaemonians who were blockaded in the island of Sphacteria in the 7th year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 425. He appears to have executed his difficult task with prudence and ability, and was spared by death in the final combat the disgrace of surrender. (Thuc. iv. 8, 31, 38.) [A. H. C.]

EPITHERSE (Ἐπιθέρσης), of Nicaea, a grammarian, who wrote on Attic comic and tragic words (περὶ Ἀττικῶν Ἀττικῶν καὶ Κωμικῶν καὶ Τραγικῶν); Steph. Byz. s. v. Nicaea; Erotian. s. v. Ἀμφὴν, p. 88, who gives the name wrongly Ἐπίρσης. If he be the same as the father of the rhetorician Aemilianus, he must have lived under the Emperor Tiberius. (Plut. de Def. Orac. p. 419, b.) [P. S.]

EPOCILLUS (Ἐποκύλλος), a Macedonian, was commissioned by Alexander, in B. C. 330, to conduct as many of the Thessalian cavalry and of the other allied troops as wished to return home, as far as the sea-coast, where Menes was desired to make arrangements for their passage to Euboea. In B. C. 328, when Alexander was in winter quarters at Nautaca, he sent Epocillus with Sopolis and Menidas to bring reinforcements from Macedonia. (Arr. Anab. iii. 19, iv. 18.) [E. E.]

EPO'NA (Ἐπώνα), from epos (ἔπος), that is, equus, was regarded as the protectress of horses. Images of her, either statues or paintings, were frequently seen in niches of stables. She was said to be the daughter of Fulvius Stellus by a mare. (Juvén. viii. 157; Plut. Parall. Gr. et Rom. p. 312; Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 154.) [L. S.]

EPOPEUS (Ἐπώπεις), a son of Poseidon and Canace. He came from Thessaly to Sicily, where he succeeded in the kingdom, as Corax died without leaving any heir to his throne. He carried away from Thebes the beautiful Antiope, the daughter of Nycteus, who therefore made war upon Epopeus. The two hostile kings died of the wounds which they received in the war; but previous to his death Epopeus dedicated a temple to Athena. (Paus. ii. 6. § 1; Apollod. i. 7. § 4.) A different tradition about Epopeus is related under AMPHIUN, No. 1. Pausanias (ii. 1. § 1) calls him a son of Aloeus, whereas he is commonly described as a brother of Aloeus. The temple of Athena which he had built at Sicily was destroyed by lightning, but his tomb was preserved and shown there to a very late period. (Paus. ii. 11. § 1.) Another mythical being of this name occurs in Ovid. (Met. iii. 618, &c.) [L. S.]

EPOPSIUS (Ἐπόψιος), that is, the superintendent, occurs as a surname of several gods, such as Zeus (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1124), Apollo (Hesych. s. v.; comp. Soph. Philoct. 1040), and of Poseidon at Megalopolis. (Paus. viii. 30. § 1.) [L. S.]

EPOREDORIX, a chieftain of the Aedui, was one of the commanders of the Aeduan cavalry, which, in compliance with Caesar's requisition, was sent to the aid of the Romans against Verugetorix, in B. C. 52. He also informed Caesar of the designs of Litavicus, who was endeavouring to draw the Aedui into the Gallic confederacy against Rome, and enabled him at first to counteract them. But soon afterwards he himself revolted, together with Viridomarus, and this completed the defection of his countrymen. Ambition was clearly his motive, for he was much mortified when the Gauls chose Vercingetorix for their commander-in-chief. (Caes. B. G. vii. 34, 38—40, 54, 55, 63; Plut. Caes. 26, 27; Dion Cass. xl. 57.) He appears to have been the person who was sent in command of an Aeduan force to the relief of Vercingetorix at Alesia, and a different one from the Eporedorix, who was previously taken prisoner by the Romans in a battle of cavalry, and who is mentioned as having commanded the Aedui in a war with the Sequani some time before Caesar's arrival in Gaul. (Caes. B. G. vii. 67, 76; Dion Cass. xl. 40.) [E. E.]

M. EPPIUS M. F., a Roman senator, and a member of the tribe Terentina, took an active part in favour of Pompey on the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 49. He was one of the legates of Q. Metellus Scipio in the African war, and was pardoned by Caesar, with many others of his party, after the battle of Thapsus in B. C. 46. His name occurs as one of Scipio's legates on a coin, which is figured below. The obverse represents a woman's head, covered with an elephant's skin, and likewise an ear of corn and a plough, all of which have reference to the province of Africa, with Q. METELLUS SCIPIO IMP. On the reverse there is a figure of Hercules, with EPPIVS LEG. F. C. The last two letters probably represent Faciundum or Ferundum Curavit, or Flandum Curavit, and indicate that the denarius was struck by order of Eppius.

It appears from another coin, in which his name occurs as the legate of Pompey, that after he had been pardoned by Caesar he went into Spain and renewed the war under Sex. Pompey in B. C. 46 and 45. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 8, §§ 5, 6, where the old editions incorrectly read M. Oppius, ad Att. viii. 11, B.; Hirtius, Bell. Afric. 89; Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 206, 207.)

EPPONINA. [SABINUS, JULIUS.]

EPRIVS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

EPTYTUS, a Trojan, who clung to Aeneas in the night, when Troy was destroyed. He was the father of Periphas, who was a companion of Julius, and who is called by the patronymic Epytides. (Virg. Aen. ii. 340, v. 547, 579; Hom. Il. xvii. 923.) [L. S.]

EQUESTER, and in Greek ἵππιος, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Poseidon (Neptune), who had created the horse, and in whose honour horse-races were held (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 12; Liv. i. 9; Paus. v. 15. § 4), of Aphrodite (Serv. ad Aen. i. 724), Hera (Paus. v. 15. § 4), Athena (Paus. i. 30. § 4, 31. § 3, v. 15. § 4, viii. 47. § 1), and Ares. (Paus. v. 15. § 4.) The Roman goddess Fortuna bore the same surname, and the consul Flaccus vowed a temple to her in B. C. 180, during a battle against the Celtiberians. (Liv. xl. 40, xlii. 3.) Tacitus

L. EQUITIUS, said to have been a runaway slave, gave himself out as a son of Ti. Gracchus, and was in consequence elected tribune of the plebs for B. C. 99. While tribune designatus, he took an active part in the designs of Saturninus, and was killed with him in B. C. 100: Appian says that his death happened on the day on which he entered upon his office. (Appian, B. C. i. 32, 33; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 18; Cic. pro Sest. 47, who calls him insitutus Gracchus, and pro C. Rabir. 7, where he is described as ille ex compedibus atque ergastulo Gracchus.)

ERASINIDES (Ἐρασινίδης), was one of the ten commanders appointed to supersede Alcibiades after the battle of Notium, B. C. 407. (Xen. Hell. i. 5. § 16; Diod. xiii. 74; Plut. Alc. 36.) According to the common reading in Xenophon (Hell. i. 6. § 16), he and Leon were with Conon when he was chased by Callistratas to Mytilene. But we find Erasimides mentioned afterwards as one of the eight who commanded at Arginusae (Xen. Hell. i. 6. § 29; Aristoph. Ran. 1194); either, therefore, as Morus and Schneider suggest, Archesistratus must be substituted for both the above names in the passage of Xenophon, or we must suppose that Erasimides commanded the trireme which escaped to Athens with the news of Conon's blockade. (Xen. Hell. i. 6. §§ 19—22; Lys. Arceol. Sappho, p. 162; Schneid. ad Xen. Hell. i. 6. § 16; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iv. p. 119, note 3.) Erasimides was among the six generals who returned to Athens after the victory at Arginusae and were put to death, B. C. 406. Archdemus, in fact, took the first step against them by imposing a fine (ἑτίμωσι) on Erasimides, and then calling him to account before a court of justice for retaining some public money which he had received in the Hellespont. On this charge Erasimides was thrown into prison, and the success of the prosecution in the particular case paved the way to the more serious attack on the whole body of the generals. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. §§ 1—34; Diod. xiii. 101.) [E. E.]

ERASISTRATUS (Ἐρασιστράτος), one of the most celebrated physicians and anatomists of antiquity, is generally supposed to have been born at Julis in the island of Ceos (Suidas, s. v. Ἐρασιστρ.; Strab. x. 5, p. 389, ed. Tauchn.), though Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Κῶς) calls him a native of Cos, Galen of Chios (Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683), and the emperor Julian of Samos. (Misopog. p. 347.) Pliny says he was the grandson of Aristotle by his daughter Pythias (H. N. xxix. 3), but this is not confirmed by any other ancient writer; and according to Suidas, he was the son of Cretoxena, the sister of the physician Medius, and Cleombrotus; from which expression it is not quite clear whether Cleombrotus was his father or his uncle. He was a pupil of Chrysaippus of Cnidos (Diog. Laërt. vii. 7. § 10, p. 186; Plin. H. N. xxix. 3; Galen, de Ven. Sect. adv. Erastistr. c. 7, vol. xi. p. 171), Metrodorus (Sext. Empir. c. Mathem. i. 12, p. 271, ed. Fabric.) and apparently Theophrastus. (Galen, de Sang. in Arter. c. 7, vol. iv. p. 729.) He lived for some time at the court of Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, where he acquired great reputation by discovering the disease of Antiochus, the king's eldest son, probably A. C. 294. Seleucus in his old age had lately married Stratonice, the young and beautiful daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and she had already borne him one child. (Plut. Demetr. c. 38; Appian, de Rebus Syr. c. 59.) Antiochus fell violently in love with his mother-in-law, but did not disclose his passion, and chose rather to pine away in silence. The physicians were quite unable to discover the cause and nature of his disease, and Erasistratus himself was at a loss at first, till, finding nothing amiss about his body, he began to suspect that it must be his mind which was diseased, and that he might perhaps be in love. This conjecture was confirmed when he observed his skin to be hotter, his colour to be heightened, and his pulse quickened, whenever Stratonice came near him, while none of these symptoms occurred on any other occasion; and accordingly he told Seleucus that his son's disease was incurable, for that he was in love, and that it was impossible that his passion could be gratified. The king wondered what the difficulty could be, and asked who the lady was. "My wife," replied Erasistratus; upon which Seleucus began to persuade him to give her up to his son. The physician asked him if he would do so himself if it were his wife that the prince was in love with. The king protested that he would most gladly; upon which Erasistratus told him that it was indeed his own wife who had inspired his passion, and that he chose rather to die than to disclose his secret. Seleucus was as good as his word, and not only gave up Stratonice, but also resigned to his son several provinces of his empire. This celebrated story is told with more or less variation by many ancient authors, (Appian, de Rebus Syr. c. 59—61; Galen, de Praenot. ad Epig. c. 6. vol. xiv. p. 630; Julian, Misopog. p. 347, ed. Spanheim; Lucian, de Syria Dea, §§ 17, 18; Plin. H. N. xxix. 3; Plut. Demetr. c. 38; Suidas, s. v. 'Epastrōp; Jo. Tzet. Chil. vii. Hist. 118; Valer. Max. v. 7), and a similar anecdote has been told of Hippocrates (Soranus, Vita Hippocr. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 352), Galen (de Praenot. ad Epig. c. 6. vol. xiv. p. 630), Avicenna (see Biogr. Dict. of the Unif. Koerl. Soc.), and (if the names be not fictitious) Panacius (Aristaen. Epist. i. 13) and Aecetinus. (Heliad. Aethiop. iv. 7. p. 171.) If this is the anecdote referred to by Pliny (l. c.), as is probably the case, Erasistratus is said to have received one hundred talents for being the means of restoring the prince to health, which (supposing the Attic standard to be meant, and to be equal to 243*l.* 15*s.*) would amount to 24,375*l.*—one of the largest medical fees upon record.

Very little more is known of the personal history of Erasistratus: he lived for some time at Alexandria, which was at that time beginning to be a celebrated medical school, and gave up practice in his old age, that he might pursue his anatomical studies without interruption. (Galen, de Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. vii. 3, vol. v. p. 602.) He prosecuted his experiments and researches in this branch of medical science with great success, and with such ardour that he is said to have dissected criminals alive. (Cels. de Medic. i. praef. p. 6.) He appears to have died in Asia Minor, as Suidas mentions that he was buried by mount Mycale in Ionia. The exact date of his death is not known, but he probably lived to a good old age, as, according to Eusebius, he was alive B. C. 268, about forty years after the marriage of Antiochus and Stratonice. He had numerous pupils and followers, and a medical school bearing his name continued to exist at Smyrna in Ionia nearly till the time of Strabo, about the beginning of the Christian era. (Strab. xii. 8, sub fin.) The following are the names of the most celebrated physicians belonging to the sect founded by him: Apocemantes (Galen, de Venas Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 2, vol. xi. p. 151), Apollonius Memphites, Apollonophanes (Cael. Aurel. de Morb. Acut. ii. 33, p. 150) Artemidorus, Charidemus, Chrysippus, Heracides, Hermogenes, Hicesius, Martialis, Menodorus, Ptolemaeus, Strato, Xenophon. He wrote several works on anatomy, practical medicine, and pharmacy, of which only the titles remain, together with a great number of short fragments preserved by Galen, Caelius Aurelianus, and other ancient writers: these, however, are sufficient to enable us to form a tolerably correct idea of his opinions both as a physician and an anatomist. It is in the latter character that he is most celebrated, and perhaps there is no one of the ancient physicians that did more to promote that branch of medical science. He appears to have been very near the discovery of the circulation of the blood, for in a passage preserved by Galen (de Usu Part. vi. 12, vol. iii. p. 465) he expresses himself as follows:—"The vein* arises from the part where the arteries, that are distributed to the whole body, have their origin, and penetrates to the sanguineous [or right] ventricle [of the heart]; and the artery [or pulmonary vein] arises from the part where the veins have their origin, and penetrates to the pneumatic [or left] ventricle of the heart." The description is not very clear, but seems to shew that he supposed the venous and arterial systems to be more intimately connected than was generally believed; which is confirmed by another passage in which he is said to have differed from the other ancient anatomists, who supposed the veins to arise from the liver, and the arteries from the heart, and to have contended that the heart was the origin both of the veins and the arteries. (Galen, de Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. vi. 6, vol. v. p. 552.) With these ideas, it can have been only his belief that the arteries contained air, and not blood, that hindered his anticipating Harvey's celebrated discovery. The tricuspid valves of the heart are generally said to have derived their name from Erasistratus; but this appears to be an oversight, as Galen attributes it not to him, but to one of his followers. (De Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. vi. 6, vol. v. p. 548.) He appears to have paid particular attention to the anatomy of the brain, and in a passage out of one of his works preserved by Galen (ibid. vii. 3, vol. v. p. 603) speaks as if he had himself dissected a human brain. Galen says (ibid. p. 602) that before Erasistratus had more closely examined into the origin of the nerves, he imagined that they arose from the dura mater and not from the substance of the brain; and that it was not till he was advanced in life that he satisfied himself by actual inspection that such was not the case. According to Rufus Ephesius, he divided the nerves into those of sensation and those of motion, of which the former he considered to be hollow and to arise from the membranes of the brain, the latter from the substance of the brain itself and of the cerebellum. (De Appell. Part. &c. p. 65.) It is a remarkable instance at once of blindness and presumption, to find this acute physiologist venturing to assert, that the spleen (Galen, de Atra Bile, c. 7. vol. v. p. 181), the bile (id. de Facult. Natur. ii. 2, vol. ii. p. 78), and several other parts of the body (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Alim." iii. 14. vol. xv. p. 308), were entirely useless to animals. In the controversy that was carried on among the ancients as to whether fluids when drunk passed through the trachea into the lungs, or through the oesophagus into the stomach, Erasistratus maintained the latter opinion. (Plut. Sympos. vii. 1; Gell. xvii. 11, Macrob. Satur. vii. 15.) He is also supposed to have been the first person who added to the word dormia, which had hitherto designated the canal leading from the mouth to the lungs, the epithet πνεύμα, to distinguish it from the arteries, and hence to have been the originator of the modern name trachea. He attributed the sensation of hunger to vacuity of the stomach, and said that the Scythians were accustomed to tie a belt tightly round their middle, to enable them to abstain from food for a longer time without suffering inconvenience. (Gell. xvi. 3.) The πνεύμα, or spiritual substance, played a very important part both in his system of physiology and pathology: he supposed it to enter the lungs by the trachea, thence to pass by the pulmonary veins into the heart, and thence to be diffused throughout the whole body by means of the arteries (Galen, de Differ. Puls. iv. 2, vol. viii. p. 703, et alibi); that the use of respiration was to fill the arteries with air (id. de Usu Respir. c. 1. vol. iv. p. 471); and that the pulsation of the arteries was caused by the movements of the pnuma. He accounted for diseases in the same way, and supposed that as long as the pnuma continued to fill the arteries and the blood was confined to the veins, the individual was in good health; but that when the blood from some cause or other got forced into the arteries, inflammation and fever was the consequence. (Galen, de Venae Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 2. vol. xi. p. 153, &c.; Plut. de Philosoph. Plac. v. 29.) Of his mode of cure the most remarkable peculiarity was his aversion to blood-letting and purgative medicines: he seems to have relied chiefly on diet and regimen, bathing, exercise, friction, and the most simple articles of the vegetable kingdom. In surgery he was celebrated for the invention of a catheter that bore his name, and was of the shape of a Roman S. (Galen, Introd. c. 13. vol. xiv. p. 751.) Further information respecting his medical and anatomical opinions may be found in Le Clerc, Hist. de la Méd.; Haller, Biblioth. Anat. and Biblioth. Medic. Pract.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; and also in the following works, which the writer has never seen: Jo. Frid. Henr. Hieronymi Dissert. Inaug. exhibens Erasistrati Erasistrateorumque Historiam, Jen. 1790, 8vo.; F. H. Schwartz, Herophilus und Erasistratus, eine historische Parallele, Inaug. Abhandl., Würzburg, 1826, 8vo.; Jerem. Rud. Lichtenstadt, Erasistratus als Vorgänger von Broussais, in Hecker's Annal. der Heilkunde, 1830, xvii. 153.

2. Erasistratus of Sicily, must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Asclepiades Pharmacion (apud Galen. de Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, x. 3, vol. xiii. p. 356). [W. A. G.]

ERASTUS (Ἐραστος), of Scepsis in Troas, is mentioned along with Coriscus, a native of the same place, among the disciples of Plato (Diog. Laërt. iii. 46); and the sixth among the letters attributed to Plato is addressed to those two Scepsians. Strabo (xiii. p. 608) classes both men among the Socratic philosophers. (Astr. Platon's Leben u. Schrift, p. 519; C. F. Hermann, Gesch. u. System d. Plat. Philos. i. pp. 425, 592, &c.) [L. S.]

ERATIDÆ (Ἐρατίδαι), an ancient illustrious family in the island of Rhodes. The Eratidae of Ialysus in Rhodes are described by Pindar (Ol. vii. 20, &c.; comp. Böckh, Explicat. p. 165) as descended from Tlepolemus and the Heracleidae, of whom a colony seems to have gone from Argos to Rhodes. Damagetus and his son Diagoras belonged to the family of the Eratidae. [DAMAGETUS, DIAGORAS.] [L. S.]

ERATO (Ἐρατώ), a nymph and the wife of Arcas, by whom she became the mother of Elatus, Apheidas, and Azan. She was said to have been a prophetic priestess of the Arcadian Pan. (Paus. viii. 27. § 9; ARCAS.) There are two other mythical personages of this name, the one a Muse and the other a Nereid. (Apollod. i. 3. § 1, 2. § 6; Hes. Theog. 247.) [L. S.]

ERATOSTHENES (Ἐρατοσθένης). 1. One of the Thirty Tyrants. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2.) There is an oration of Lysias against him (Or. 12), which was delivered soon after the expulsion of the Thirty and the return of Lysias from exile. (Clinton, F. H. sub ann. b. c. 403.) 2. The person for whose slaughter by Euphiletus, the first oration of Lysias is a defence. (Lys. p. 2, &c.) [P. S.]

ERATOSTHENES (Ἐρατοσθένης), of Cyrene, was, according to Suidas, the son of Aglaüs, according to others, the son of Ambrosius, and was born b. c. 276. He was taught by Ariston of Chius, the philosopher, Lysanias of Cyrene, the grammarian, and Callimachus, the poet. He left Athens at the invitation of Ptolemy Evergetes, who placed him over the library at Alexandria. Here he continued till the reign of Ptolemy Epiphanes. He died at the age of eighty, about b. c. 196, of voluntary starvation, having lost his sight, and being tired of life. He was a man of very extensive learning: we shall first speak of him as a geometer and astronomer.

It is supposed that Eratosthenes suggested to Ptolemy Evergetes the construction of the large armillæ or fixed circular instruments which were long in use at Alexandria: but only because it is difficult to imagine to whom else they are to be assigned; for Ptolemy (the astronomer), though he mentions them, and incidentally their antiquity, does not state to whom they were due. In these circles each degree was divided into six parts. We know of no observations of Eratosthenes in which they were probably employed, except those which led him to the obliquity of the ecliptic, which he must have made to be 23° 51' 20"; for he states the distance of the tropics to be eleven times the eighty-third part of the circumference. This was a good observation for the time: Ptolemy (the astronomer) was content with it, and, according to him, Hipparchus used no other. Of his measure of the earth we shall presently speak. According to Nicomachus, he was the inventor of the κρίνων or Orisbrum Arithmeticum, as it has since been called, being the well known method of detecting the prime numbers by writing down all odd numbers which do not end with 5, and striking out successively the multiples of each, one after the other, so that only prime numbers remain.

We still possess under the name of Eratosthenes a work, entitled Καταστερησις, giving a slight account of the constellations, their fabulous history, and the stars in them. It is, however, acknowledged on all hands that this is not a work of Eratosthenes. It has been shewn by Bernhardt in his Eratosthenica (p. 110, &c., Berlin, 1822, 8vo.) to be a miserable compilation made by some Greek grammarian from the Ποιτικὴν Ἀστρονομικὴν of Hyginus. This book was printed (Gr.) in Dr. Fell's, or the Oxford, edition of Aratus, 1762, 8vo.; again (Gr. Lat.) by Thomas Gale, in the Opuscula Physica et Ethica, Amsterdam, 1688, 8vo.; also by Schaubach, with notes by Heyne, Göttingen, 1795, 8vo.; also by F. K. Matthiæ, in his Aratus, Frankfurt, 1817, 8vo., and more recently by A. Westermann, in his Scriptores Historiæ poeticæ Græci, pp. 239—267. The short comment on Aratus, attributed to Eratosthenes, and first printed by Peter Victorius, and afterwards by Petavius in his Uranologion (1630, fol.), is also named in the title of both as being attributed to Hipparchus as well as to Eratosthenes. Petavius remarks (says Fabricius) that it can be attributed to neither; for Hipparchus is mentioned by name, also the month of July, also the barbarous word ἀερινόδιον for Orion, which the more recent Greeks never used: these reasons do not help each other, for the second shews the work to be posterior to Eratosthenes, if anything, and the third shews it to be prior. But on looking into this comment we find that ἀερινόδιον and July (and also August) are all mentioned in one sentence, which is evidently* an interpolation; and the constellation Orion is frequently mentioned under that name. But Hipparchus certainly is mentioned.

The only other writing of Eratosthenes which remains is a letter to Ptolemy on the duplication of the cube, for the mechanical performance of which he had contrived an instrument, of which he seems to contemplate actual use in measuring the contents of vessels, &c. He seems to say that he has had his method engraved in some temple or public building, with some verses which he adds. Eutocius has preserved this letter in his comment on book ii. prop. 2 of the sphere and cylinder of Archimedes.

The greatest work of Eratosthenes, and that which must always make his name conspicuous in scientific history, is the attempt which he made to measure the magnitude of the earth,—in which he brought forward and used the method which is employed to this day. Whether or no he was successful cannot be told, as we shall see; but it is not the less true that he was the originator of the process by which we now know, very nearly indeed, the magnitude of our own planet. Delambre says that if it were he who advised the erection of the circular instruments above alluded to, he must be considered as the founder of astronomy: to which it may be added that he was the founder of geodesy, without any if in the case. The number of ancient writers who have alluded to this remarkable operation (which seems to have obtained its full measure of fame) is very great, and we shall not attempt to combine their remarks or surmises: it is enough to say that the most distinct account, and one of the earliest, is found in the remaining work of CLEOMEDES.

At Syene, in Upper Egypt, which is supposed to be the same as, or near to, the town of Assuan (Lat. 24° 10' N., Long. 32° 59' E. of Greenwich), Eratosthenes was told (that he observed is very doubtful), that deep wells were enlightened to the bottom on the day of the summer solstice, and that vertical objects cast no shadows. He concluded, therefore, that Syene was on the tropic, and its latitude equal to the obliquity of the ecliptic, which, as we have seen, he had determined: he presumed that it was in the same longitude as Alexandria, in which he was out about 3°, which is not enough to produce what would at that time have been a sensible error. By observations made at Alexandria, he determined the zenith of that place to be distant by the fiftieth part of the circumference from the solstice, which was equivalent to saying that the arc of the meridian between the two places is 7° 12'. Cleomedes says that he used the σφαῖρα, or hemispherical dial of Berosus, in the determination of this latitude. Delambre rejects the idea with infinite scorn, and pronounces Cleomedes unworthy of credit; and, indeed, it is not easy to see why Eratosthenes should have rejected the gnomon and the large circular instruments, unless, perhaps, for the following reason: There is a sentence of Cleomedes which seems to imply that the disappearance of the shadows at Syene on the day of the summer solstice was noticed to take place for 300 stadia every way round Syene. If Eratosthenes took his report about the phenomenon (and we have no evidence that he went to Syene himself) from those who could give no better account than this, we may easily understand why he would think the σφαῖρα quite accurate enough to observe with at his own end of the arc, since the other end of it was uncertain by as much as 300 stadia. He gives 5000 stadia for the distance from Alexandria to Syene, and this round number seems further to justify us in concluding that he thought the process to be as rough as in truth it was. Martianus Capella (p. 194) states that he obtained this distance from the measures made by order of the Ptolemies (which had been commenced by Alexander); this writer then implies that Eratosthenes did not go to Syene himself.

The result is 250,000 stadia for the circumference of the earth, which Eratosthenes altered into 252,000, that his result might give an exact number of stadia for the degree, namely, 700; this, of course, should have been 694 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Pliny (H. N. ii. 108) calls this 31,500 Roman miles, and therefore supposes the stadium to be the eighth part of a Roman mile, or takes for granted that Eratosthenes used the Olympic stadium. It is likely enough that the Ptolemies naturalized this stadium in Egypt; but, nevertheless, it is not unlikely that an Egyptian stadium was employed. If we assume the Olympic stadium (202½ yards), the degree of Eratosthenes is more than 79 miles, upwards of 10 miles\* too great. Nothing is known of any Egyptian stadium. Pliny (l. c.) asserts that Hipparchus, but for what reason he does not say, wanted to add 25,000 stadia to the circumference as found by Eratosthenes.

* These are the only months mentioned in the comment: Orion, which the vulgar call ἀερινόδιον, first rises in July, and Procyon in August. It is not stated anywhere else in what month a star first rises, nor is any other month mentioned at all. Probably some interpolator, subsequent to Augustus, introduced this sentence rather to fix the astronomical character of the new named months in his own or his reader's mind, than to give information on the constellations. It also appears that ἀερινόδιον was the word which was used by the vulgar (idiotras) for Orion, after July and August had received their imperial names.

According to Plutarch (de Plac. Phil. ii. 81), Eratosthenes made the sun to be 804 millions of stadia from the earth, and the moon 780,000; according to Macrobius (in Somn. Scip. i. 20), he made the diameter of the sun to be 27 times that of the earth. (Weidler, Hist. Astron.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 117, &c.; Delambre, Hist. de l'Astron. Anc.; Petavius, Uranologion.) [A. D. M.]

With regard to the other merits of Eratosthenes, we must first of all mention what he did for geography, which was closely connected with his mathematical pursuits. It was Eratosthenes who raised geography to the rank of a science; for, previous to his time, it seems to have consisted, more or less, of a mass of information scattered in books of travel, descriptions of particular countries, and the like. All these treasures were accessible to Eratosthenes in the libraries of Alexandria; and he made the most profitable use of them, by collecting the scattered materials, and uniting them into an organic system of geography in his comprehensive work entitled Γεωγραφικά, or as it is sometimes, but erroneously, called, γεωγραφόμενα or γεωγραφία. (Strab. l. p. 29, ii. p. 67, xv. p. 688; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 259, 284, 310.) It consisted of three books, the first of which, forming a sort of introduction, contained a critical review of the labours of his predecessors from the earliest to his own times, and investigations concerning the form and nature of the earth, which, according to him, was an immovable globe, on the surface of which traces of a series of great revolutions were still visible. He conceived that in one of these revolutions the Mediterranean had acquired its present form; for, according to him, it was at one time a large lake covering portions of the adjacent countries of Asia and Libya, until a passage was forced open by which it entered into communication with the ocean in the west. The second book contained what is now called mathematical geography. His attempt to measure the magnitude of the earth has been spoken of above. The third book contained the political geography, and gave descriptions of the various countries, derived from the works of earlier travellers and geographers. In order to be able to determine the accurate site of each place, he drew a line parallel with the equator, running from the pillars of Hercules to the extreme east of Asia, and dividing the whole of the inhabited earth into two halves. Connected with this work was a new map of the earth, in which towns, mountains, rivers, lakes, and climates were marked according to his own improved measurements. This important work of Eratosthenes forms an epoch in the history of ancient geography; but unfortunately it is lost, and all that has survived consists in fragments quoted by later geographers and historians, such as Polybius, Strabo, Marcianus, Pliny, and others, who often judge of him unfavourably, and controvert his statements; while it can be proved that, in a great many passages, they adopt his opinions without mentioning his name. Marcianus charges Eratosthenes with having copied the substance of the work of Timosthenes on Ποταμ. (ῥεῖα) Λιμῆων, to which he added but very little of his own. This charge may be well-founded, but cannot have diminished the value of the work of Eratosthenes, in which that of Timosthenes can have formed only a very small portion. It seems to have been the very overwhelming importance of the geography of Eratosthenes that called forth a number of opponents, among whom we meet with the names of Polemon, Hipparchus, Polybius, Serapion, and Marcianus of Heracleia. The fragments of this work were first collected by L. Ancher, Diatribe in Fragm. Geograph. Eratosth., Göttingen, 1770, 4to., and afterwards by G. C. F. Seidel, Eratosth. Geograph. Fragm. Göttingen, 1789, 8vo. The best collection is that of Bernhardt in his Eratosthenica.

Another work of a somewhat similar nature, entitled Ἐπιμῆ (perhaps the same as the Κατασκευασμοί mentioned above), was written in verse and treated of the form of the earth, its temperature, the different zones, the constellations, and the like. (Bernhardt, Eratosth. p. 110, &c.) Another poem, Ἡρώδης, is mentioned with great commendation by Longinus. (De Sublim. 33. 5; comp. Schol. ad Hom. Il. x. 29; Bernhardt, l. c. p. 150, &c.)

Eratosthenes distinguished himself also as a philosopher, historian, and grammarian. His acquirements as a philosopher are attested by the works which are attributed to him, though we may not believe that all the philosophical works which bore his name were really his productions. It is, however, certain that he wrote on subjects of moral philosophy, s. g. a work Περὶ Ἀγαθῶν καὶ Κακῶν (Harporat. s. v. ἀποκρίται; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 496), another Περὶ Πλούτου καὶ Πενίας (Diog. Laërt. ix. 66; Plut. Themist. 27), which some believe to have been only a portion of the preceding work, just as a third Περὶ Ἀλκυίας, which is mentioned by Suidas. Some other works, on the other hand, such as Περὶ τῶν κατὰ Φιλοσοφίαν Αἰδέσεων, Μελέτραι, and Διδάλογοι, are believed to have been erroneously attributed to him. Athenæus mentions a work of Eratosthenes entitled Ἀρσινόη (vii. p. 276), Epistles (x. p. 418), one Epistle addressed to the Laocadaemonian Agator (xi. p. 482), and lastly, a work called Ἀρίστην, after his teacher in philosophy. (vii. p. 281.)

His historical productions are closely connected with his mathematical pursuits. He is said to have written on the expedition of Alexander the Great (Plut. Alex. 3, 31, &c.; Arrian, Anab. v. 5. § 3); but the statements quoted from it belonged in all probability to his geographical or chronological work. Another on the history of the Galatians (Γαλατικά), of which the 33rd book is quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Τόρυλα), was undoubtedly the work of another Eratosthenes. (Schmidt, de Gall. Exped. p. 15, &c.; Bernhardt, l. c. p. 243, &c.) There was, however, a very important chronological work, entitled Χρονογραφία or Χρονογραφίαι, which was unquestionably the production of our Eratosthenes. In it the author endeavoured to fix the dates of all the important events in literary as well as political history. (Harpocraz. s. v. Εἰρηός; Dionys. i. 46; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 145.) This work, of which some fragments are still extant, formed a comprehensive chronological history, and appears to have been held in high esteem by the ancients. Apollodorus and Eusebius made great use of it, and Syncellus (p. 96, c.) has preserved from it a list of 38 kings of the Egyptian Thebes. (Comp. Bernhardt, l. c. p. 243, &c.) Another work, likewise of a chronological kind, was the Ὀλυμπιονίκαι. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 51; Athen. iv. p. 154; Schol. ad Eurip. Hecab. 569.) It contained a chronological list of the victors in the Olympic games, and other things connected with them. (Bernhardt, p. 247, &c.)

Among his grammatical works we notice that On the Old Attic Comedy (Περὶ τῆς Ἀρχαίας Κωμῳδίας, sometimes simply Περὶ Κωμῳδίας, or Κωμῳδία), a very extensive work, of which the twelfth book is quoted. It contained everything that was necessary to arrive at a perfect understanding of those poetical productions. In the first part of the work, Eratosthenes appears to have entered even into discussions concerning the structure of theatres, the whole scenic apparatus, the actors, their costumes, declamation, and the like; and it is therefore not improbable that the Ἀρχαιοτροπικὰς (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 567, iii. 232) and συναρπαστικὰς (Pollux, x. 1), which are mentioned as separate works, were only portions of the first part of his work on the Old Comedy. After this general introduction, Eratosthenes discussed the works of the principal comic poets themselves, such as Aristophanes, Cratinus, Eupolis, Pherecrates, and others, entering into detailed criticism, and giving explanations both of their language and the subjects of their comedies. We still possess a considerable number of fragments of this work (collected in Bernhardt, l. c. pp. 205—237); and from what he says about Aristophanes it is evident that his judgment was as sound as his information was extensive. He is further said to have been engaged in the criticism and explanation of the Homeric poems, and to have written on the life and productions of that poet; but nothing certain is known in this respect. For more complete lists of the works attributed to Eratosthenes, see the Eratosthenicus of Bernhardt. [L. S.]

ERATO'STHENES SCHOLASTICUS, the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Brunck. Anth. vol. iii. p. 123; Jacobs, vol. iv. p. 93), to which may be added, on the authority of the Vatican MS., a fifth, which stands in the Anthology among those of Paul the Silentiary (No. 88). In all probability, Eratosthenes lived under the emperor Justinian. (Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 890; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 174.) [P. 4.]

ERATO'STRATUS. [HEROSTRATUS.]

ERATUS (Ἐρατός), a son of Heracles by Dynamis, was king of Argos, and made a successful expedition against Asine, which was besieged and taken. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8; Paus. ii. 36. § 4.) [L. S.]

EREBOS (Ἐρεβός), a son of Chaos, begot Aether and Hecera by Nyx, his sister. (Hesiod. Theog. 123.) Hyginus (Fab. p. 1) and Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 17) enumerate many personifications of abstract notions as the offspring of Erebo. The name signifies darkness, and is therefore applied also to the dark and gloomy space under the earth, through which the shades pass into Hades. (Hom. Il. viii. p. 368; comp. HADÉS. [L. S.]

ERECHTHEUS. [ERICHTHONIUS.]

ERESUS (Ἐρεσός), a son of Macar, from whom the town of Eresus in Lesbos derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) A second otherwise unknown person of this name was painted in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 27.) [L. S.]

EREUTHA'LION (Ἐρευθαλίον), an Arcadian, who, in the armour of Areithous, which Lycurgus had given him, fought against the Pylians, but was slain by Nestor. (Hom. Il. iv. 319, vii. 134, &c.) [L. S.]

ERGA'MENES (Ἐργάμενης), a king of Me-roe, an Ethiopian by birth, but who had received a Greek education. He was the first who overthrew the power of the priests, which had been paramount to that of the sovereign, and established a despotic authority. He was contemporary with Ptolemy Philadelphus, but we know nothing of the relations in which he stood towards that monarch. His name has been discovered in the hieroglyphics at Dakkeh, whence it is inferred that his dominions extended as far north as that point. (Diod. iii. 6; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. p. 49, 278.) [E. H. B.]

ERGANE (Ἐργάνη) or ERGATIS, that is, the worker, a surname of Athena, who was believed to preside over and instruct man in all kinds of arts. (Paus. v. 14. § 5, i. 24. § 3; Plut. de Fort. p. 99, a.; Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

ERGIAS (Ἐργίας) of Rhodes, is mentioned as the author of a work on his native island. (Athen. viii. p. 360.) Gesner and others are of opinion that Ergias is the same person as Erxias, who was the author of Κολοφωναία. (Athen. xiii. p. 561.) But which of the two names, Ergias or Erxias, is the correct one, cannot be determined. [L. S.]

ERGINUS (Ἐργίνος), a son of Clymenus and Busyge or Budeia, was king of Orchoemenos. After Clymenus was killed by Perieres at the festival of the Onchestian Poseidon, Erginus, his eldest son, who succeeded him as king, undertook to avenge the death of his father. He marched against Thebes, and surpassing the enemy in the number of his horsemen, he killed many Thebans, and compelled them to a treaty, in which they bound themselves to pay him for twenty years an annual tribute of 100 oxen. Heracles once met the heralds of Erginus, who were going to demand the usual tribute: he cut off their ears and noses, tied their hands behind their backs, and thus sent them to Erginus, saying that this was his tribute. Erginus now undertook a second expedition against Thebes, but was defeated and slain by Heracles, whom Athena had provided with arms. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 11; Diod. iv. 10; Strab. ix. p. 414; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 272; Eurip. Herc. fur. 220; Theocrit. xvi. 105.) Pausanias (ix. 37. § 2, &c.), who agrees with the other writers in the first part of the mythos, states, that Erginus made peace with Heracles, and devoted all his energy to the promotion of the prosperity of his kingdom. In this manner Erginus arrived at an advanced age without having either wife or children: but, as he did not wish any longer to live alone, he consulted the Delphic oracle, which advised him to take a youthful wife. This he did, and became by her the father of Trophonius and Agamedea, or, according to Eustathius (l. c.) of Azeus. Erginus is also mentioned among the Argonauts, and is said to have succeeded Tiphys as helmsman. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 185, ii. 896.) When the Argonauts took part in the funeral games which Hypsipyle celebrated at Lemnos in honour of her father Thoas, Erginus also contended for a prize; but he was ridiculed by the Lemnian women, because, though still young, he had grey hair. However, he conquered the sons of Boreas in the foot-race. (Pind. Ol. iv. 29, &c., with the Schol.) Later traditions represent our Erginus as a Milesian and a son of Poseidon. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 185, &c.; Orph. Argon. 150; Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Hygin. Fab. 14; comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 179, &c. 2nd edit.) [L. S.]

ERGINUS (Ἐργινός), a Syrian Greek, who betrayed the citadel of Corinth into the hands of Aratus, by informing him of a secret path by which it was accessible. For this service he received 60 talents from Aratus. At a subsequent period he made an attempt to surprise the Peirææus, in order to free the Athenians from the yoke of Antigonus Gonatas; but failed in the enterprise, which was disavowed by Aratus. (Plut. Arat. cc. 18—22, 33.) [E. H. B.]

ERIBOEAE (Ἐριβοία). There are three mythical personages of this name. One was the wife of Aloeus (Hom. Il. v. 385, &c.), the second the wife of Telamon (Soph. Ajax, 562; Pind. Isthm. vi. 42), and the third an Amazon. (Diod. iv. 16.) [L. S.]

ERIBOTES (Ἐριβότης), the son of Teleon, was one of the Argonauts, and appears to have acted as surgeon, as he is represented as attending on Oileus when he was wounded. (Apollon. Rhod. Argon. i. 73, ii. 1040; Hygin. Fab. 14; Valer. Flacc. Argon.) [W. A. G.]

ERICHTHONIUS (Ἐριχθόνιος). 1. There can be little doubt but that the names Erichthonius and Erechtheus are identical; but whether the two heroes mentioned by Plato, Hyginus, and Apollodorus, the one of whom is usually called Erichthonius or Erechtheus I. and the other Erechtheus II., are likewise one and the same person, as Müller (Orchom. p. 117, 2d edit.) and others think, is not so certain, though highly probable. Homer (Il. ii. 547, &c., Od. vii. 81) knows only one Erechtheus, as an autochthon and king of Athens; and the first writer who distinguishes two personages is Plato. (Crit. p. 110, a.) The story of Erichthonius is related thus: When Hephaestus wished to embrace Athena, and the goddess repulsed him, he became by Ge or by Atthis, the daughter of Cranaus, the father of a son, who had either completely or only half the form of a serpent. Athena reared this being without the knowledge of the other gods, had him guarded by a dragon, and then entrusted him to Agraëus, Pandrosos, and Herse, concealed in a chest, and forbade them to open it. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 13.) But this command was neglected; and on opening the chest and seeing the child in the form of a serpent, or entwined by a serpent, they were seized with madness, and threw themselves down the rock of the acropolis, or, according to others, into the sea. The serpent escaped into the shield of Athena, and was protected by her. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 6; Hygin. Fab. 166; Paus. i. 2. § 5, 18. § 2; Eurip. Ion, 260, &c.; Ov. Met. ii. 554.) When Erichthonius had grown up, he expelled Amphictyon, and usurped the government of Athens, and his wife Pasithea bore him a son Pandion. (Apollod. l. c.) He is said to have introduced the worship of Athena, to have instituted the festival of the Panathenæa, and to have built a temple of Athena on the acropolis. When Athena and Poseidon disputed about the possession of Attica, Erichthonius declared in favour of Athena. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 1.) He was further the first who used a chariot with four horses, for which reason he was placed among the stars as auriga (Hygin. P. A. l. c.; Virg. Georg. i. 205, iii. 113; Aelian, V. H. iii. 38); and lastly, he was believed to have made the Athenians acquainted with the use of silver, which had been discovered by the Scythian king Indus. (Hygin. Fab. 274.) He was buried in the temple of Athena, and his worship on the acropolis was connected with that of Athena and Poseidon. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 6; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 761.) His famous temple, the Erechtheum, stood on the acropolis, and in it there were three altars, one of Poseidon, on which sacrifices were offered to Erechtheus also, the second of Butea, and the third of Hephaestus. (Paus. i. 26. § 6.)

Erechtheus II., as he is called, is described as a grandson of the first, and as a son of Pandion by Zeuxippe, so that he was a brother of Butea, Proene, and Philomela. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 8; Paus. i. 5. § 3.) After his father's death, he succeeded him as king of Athens, and was regarded in later times as one of the Attic eponyms. He was married to Praxithea, by whom he became the father of Cecrops, Pandoros, Metion, Orneus, Proeria, Creusa, Chthonia, and Oreithyia. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 1; Paus. i. 25. § 5; Ov. Met. vi. 676.) His four daughters, whose names and whose stories differ very much in the different traditions, agreed among themselves to die all together, if one of them was to die. When Eumolpus, the son of Poseidon, whose assistance the Eleusinians had called in against the Athenians, had been killed by the latter, Poseidon or an oracle demanded the sacrifice of one of the daughters of Erechtheus. When one was drawn by lot, the others voluntarily accompanied her in death, and Erechtheus himself was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning at the request of Poseidon. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 4; Hygin. Fab. 46, 238; Plut. Parall. Gr. et Rom. 20.) In his war with the Eleusinians, he is also said to have killed Immaradus, the son of Eumolpus. (Paus. i. 5. § 2; comp. AGRAULOS.) According to Diodorus (i. 29), Erechtheus was an Egyptian, who during a famine brought corn to Athens, instituted the worship of Demeter, and the Eleusinian mysteries.

2. A son of Dardanus and Batea. He was the husband of Astyoche or Callirhoë, and father of Troas or Assaracus, and the wealthiest of all mortals, for 3000 mares grazed in his fields, which were so beautiful, that Boreas fell in love with them. He is mentioned also among the kings of Crete. (Hom. Il. xx. 220, &c.; Apollod. iii. 12. § 2; Dionys. i. 62; Ov. Fast. iv. 33; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 130; Strab. xiii. p. 604.) [L. S.]

ERIDANUS (Ἠριδανός), a river god, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Zeuxippe. (Hesiod. Theog. 338; Hygin. Fab. 14.) He is called the king of rivers, and on its banks amber was found. (Virg. Georg. i. 482; Ov. Met. ii. 324.) In Homer the name does not occur, and the first writer who mentions it is Hesiod. Herodotus (iii. 15) declares the name to be barbarous, and the invention of some poet. (Comp. Strab. v. p. 215.) The position which the ancient poets assign to the river Eridannus differed at different times. [L. S.]

ERIGONE (Ἐριγόνη). 1. A daughter of Icarus, seduced by Bacchus, who came into her father's house. (Ov. Met. vi. 125; Hygin. Fab. 130; comp. ICARIUS.)

2. A daughter of Aegisthus and Clytemnestra, and by Orestes the mother of Penthilus. (Paus. ii. 18. § 5.) Hyginus (Fab. 122), on the other hand, relates that Orestes wanted to kill her like her mother, but that Artemis removed her to Attica, and there made her her priestess. Others state, that Erigone put an end to herself when she heard that Orestes was acquitted by the Areiopagus. (Dict. Cret. vi. 4.) A third Erigone is mentioned by Servius. (Ad Virg. Elog. iv. 6.) [L. S.]

ERIGONUS, originally a colour-grinder to the painter Neleus, obtained so much knowledge of his master's art, that he became the teacher of the celebrated painter Pausias, the brother of the modeller Aegineta. (Plin. xxxv. 11, a. 40. § 41.) From this statement it follows that he flourished about B. C. 240. [ÆGINETA.] [P. S.]

ERIGYIUS (Ἐριγύιος, Ἐργύβιος), a Mytilenean, son of Larichus, was an officer in Alexander's army. He had been driven into banishment by Philip because of his faithful attachment to Alexander, and returned when the latter came to the throne in B. C. 336. At the battle of Arbela, A. C. 331, he commanded the cavalry of the allies, as he did also when Alexander set out from Ecbatana in pursuit of Darius, B. C. 330. In the same year Erigyius was entrusted with the command of one of the three divisions with which Alexander invaded Hyrcania, and he was, too, among the generals sent against Satibarzanes, whom he slew in battle with his own hand. [CARANUS, No. 3.] In 329, together with Craterus and Hephaestion, and by the assistance of Aristander the soothsayer, he endeavoured to dissuade Alexander from crossing the Jaxartes against the Scythians. In 328 he fell in battle against the Bactrian fugitives. (Arr. Anab. iii. 6, § 1, 20, 23, 28, iv. 4; Diod. xvii. 57; Curt. vi. 4. § 3, vii. 3. § 2, 4. §§ 32-40, 7. §§ 6-29, viii. 2. § 40.) [E. E.]

ERINNA (Ἑριννα). There seem to have been two Greek poetesses of this name. 1. A contemporary and friend of Sappho (about B. C. 612), who died at the age of nineteen, but left behind her poems which were thought worthy to rank with those of Homer. Her poems were of the epic class: the chief of them was entitled Ἥλακστη, the Disaff: it consisted of three hundred lines, of which only four are extant. (Stob. Flor. cxviii. 4; Athen. vii. p. 283, d.; Bergk, Poët. Lyr. Græc. p. 632.) It was written in a dialect which was a mixture of the Doric and Aeolic, and which was spoken at Rhodes, where, or in the adjacent island of Telos, Erinna was born. She is also called a Lesbian and a Mytilenean, on account of her residence in Lesbos with Sappho. (Suidas, s. v.; Eustath. ad Il. ii. 726, p. 326.) There are several epigrams upon Erinna, in which her praise is celebrated, and her untimely death is lamented. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 241, n. 81, p. 218, n. 35, vol. ii. p. 19, n. 47, vol. iii. p. 261, n. 523, 524, vol. ii. p. 460.) The passage last cited, which is from the Épigrasis of Christodorus (vv. 108-110) shews, that her statue was erected in the gymnasium of Zeuxippus at Byzantium. Her statue by Naucydes is mentioned by Tatian. (Orat. ad Græc. 52, p. 113, Worth.) Three epigrams in the Greek Anthology are ascribed to her (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 58; Ja- cobs, vol. i. p. 50), of which the first has the genuine air of antiquity; but the other two, addressed to Baucis, seem to be a later fabrication. She had a place in the Garland of Meleager (v. 12).

2. A Greek poetess, who, if we may believe Eusebius (Chron. Arm., Syncell. p. 260, a., Hieron.) was contemporary with Demosthenes and Philip of Macedon, in O. 107, B. C. 352. Several good scholars, however, reject this statement altogether, and only allow of one Erinna. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 120; Welcker, de Erinna, Corinna, &c. in Creuzer's Meletemata, pt. ii. p. 3; Richter, Sappho und Erinna; Schneidewin, Delect. Poes. Græc. Eleg. &c., p. 323; Idem, in Zimmermann's Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft, 1837, p. 209; Bode, Gesch. d. Hell. Dichtk. vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 448.) [P. S.]

ERINNYES. [EUMENIDÆ.]

ERIO'PIS (Ἐριώπις). There are four mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Il. xiii. 697; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 14; Paus. ii. 3. § 7; Heusch. s. v.) [L. S.]

ERIPHANIS (Ἐριφανίς), a melic poetess, and author of erotic poetry. One particular kind of love-song was called after her; but only one line of her's is preserved in Athenæus (xiv. p. 619), the only ancient author that mentions her. [L. S.]

ERIPHUS (Ἐριφος), an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy. According to Athenæus, he lived at the same time as Antiphanes, or only a little later, and he copied whole verses from Antiphanes. That he belonged to the middle comedy, is sufficiently shewn by the extant titles of his plays, namely, Ἀλολος, Μερίστου, Πελασγῆς. Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 1686. 43) calls him λόγιος ἀνὴρ. (Athen. ii. p. 58, a., iii. p. 84, b. c., iv. pp. 134, c., 137, d., vii. p. 302, e., xv. p. 693, c.; Antiatt. p. 98. 26; Suidas, s. v.; Eudoc. p. 167; Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 420, 421, iii. pp. 556-558; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 441, 442.) [P. S.]

ERIPHY'LE (Ἐριφύλη), a daughter of Talaus and Lysimache, and the wife of Amphiarus, whom she betrayed for the sake of the necklace of Harmonia. (Hom. Od. xi. 326; Apollod. i. 9. § 3; AMPHIARUS, ALCMAON, HARMONIA.) [L. S.]

ERIPHY'LUS, a Greek rhetorician, who is mentioned by Quintilian (x. 6. § 4), but is otherwise unknown. [L. S.]

ERIS (Ἔρις), the goddess who calls forth war and discord. According to the Iliad, she wanders about, at first small and insignificant, but she soon raises her head up to heaven (iv. 441). She is the friend and sister of Ares, and with him she delights in the tumult of war, increasing the moaning of men. (iv. 445, v. 518, xx. 48.) She is insatiable in her desire for bloodshed, and after all the other gods have withdrawn from the battle-field, she still remains rejoicing over the havoc that has been made. (v. 518, xi. 3, &c., 73.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 225, &c.), she was a daughter of Night, and the poet describes her as the mother of a variety of allegorical beings, which are the causes or representatives of man's misfortunes. It was Eris who threw the apple into the assembly of the gods, the cause of so much suffering and war. [PARIS.] Virgil introduces Discordia as a being similar to the Homeric Eris; for Discordia appears in company with Mars, Bellona, and the Furies, and Virgil is evidently imitating Homer (Aen. viii. 702; Serv. ad Aen. i. 31, vi. 280.) [L. S.]

ERIU'NIUS (Ἐριούnius) or ERINNES, the giver of good fortune, occurs as a surname of Hermes, but is also used as a proper name instead of Hermes. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 440, 457, Od. viii. 322; Aristoph. Ran. 1143.) [L. S.]

EROPHILUS, a distinguished engraver of gems, was the son of Dioscorides. He lived, therefore, under the early Roman emperors. He is only known by a beautiful gem, bearing the head of Augustus, on which his name appears, though partially defaced. (Meyer zu Winckelmann, B. xi. c. 2. § 18, Abbildungen, No. 92; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 200, n. 1.) [P. S.]

EROPON, an officer in the confidence of Persena, king of Macedonia, who sent him in B. C. 168 to negotiate an alliance with Eumenes II., king of Pergamum, against the Romans. Livy says that Eropon had been engaged before on secret services of the same nature. (Liv. xlv. 24, 27, 28.) This name should perhaps be substituted for Κρυπῶν in Polyb. xxix. 3. [E. E.]

EROS (Ἔρως), in Latin, AMOR or CUPIDO, the god of love. In the sense in which he is usually conceived, Eros is the creature of the later Greek poets; and in order to understand the ancients properly we must distinguish three Erotes: viz. the Eros of the ancient cosmogonies, the Eros of the philosophers and mysteries, who bears great resemblance to the first, and the Eros whom we meet with in the epigrammatic and erotic poets, whose witty and playful descriptions of the god, however, can scarcely be considered as a part of the ancient religious belief of the Greeks. Homer does not mention Eros, and Hesiod, the earliest author that mentions him, describes him as the cosmogonic Eros. First, says Hesiod (Theog. 120, &c.), there was Chaos, then came Ge, Tartarus, and Eros, the fairest among the gods, who rules over the minds and the council of gods and men. In this account we already perceive a combination of the most ancient with later notions. According to the former, Eros was one of the fundamental causes in the formation of the world, inasmuch as he was the uniting power of love, which brought order and harmony among the conflicting elements of which Chaos consisted. In the same metaphysical sense he is conceived by Aristotle (Metaph. i. 4); and similarly in the Orphic poetry (Orph. Hymn. 5; comp. Aristoph. Av. 695) he is described as the first of the gods, who sprang from the world's egg. In Plato's Symposium (p. 178, b) he is likewise called the oldest of the gods. It is quite in accordance with the notion of the cosmogonic Eros, that he is described as a son of Cronos and Ge, of Eileithyia, or as a god who had no parentage, and came into existence by himself. (Paus. ix. c. 27.) The Eros of later poets, on the other hand, who gave rise to that notion of the god which is most familiar to us, is one of the youngest of all the gods. (Paus. l. c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23.) The parentage of the second Eros is very differently described, for he is called a son of Aphrodite (either Aphrodite Urania or Aphrodite Pandemos), or Polymnia, or a son of Porus and Penia, who was begotten on Aphrodite's birthday. (Plat. l. c.; Sext. Emp. adv. Math. i. 540.) According to other genealogies, again, Eros was a son of Hermes by Artemis or Aphrodite, or of Ares by Aphrodite (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23), or of Zephyrus and Iris (Plut. Amat. 20; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 555), or, lastly, a son of Zeus by his own daughter Aphrodite, so that Zeus was at once his father and grandfather. (Virg. Chr. 134.) Eros in this stage is always conceived and was always represented as a handsome youth, and it is not till about after the time of Alexander the Great that Eros is represented by the epigrammatists and the erotic poets as a wanton boy, of whom a thousand tricks and cruel sports are related, and from whom neither gods nor men were safe. He is generally described as a son of Aphrodite; but as love finds its way into the hearts of men in a manner which no one knows, the poets sometimes describe him as of unknown origin (Theocrit. xiii. 2), or they say that he had indeed a mother, but not a father. (Meleagr. Epigr. 50.) In this stage Eros has nothing to do with uniting the discordant elements of the universe, or the higher sympathy or love which binds human kind together; but he is purely the god of sensual love, who bears sway over the inhabitants of Olympus as well as over men and all living creatures: he tames lions and tigers, breaks the thunderbolts of Zeus, deprives Heracles of his arms, and carries on his sport with the monsters of the sea. (Orph. Hymn. 57; Virg. Ecol. x. 29; Mosch. Idyll. vi. 10; Theocrit. iii. 15.) His arms, consisting of arrows, which he carries in a golden quiver, and of torches, no one can touch with impunity. (Mosch. Idyll. vi.; Theocrit. xxiii. 4; Ov. Trist. v. 1, 22.) His arrows are of different power: some are golden, and kindle love in the heart they wound; others are blunt and heavy with lead, and produce aversion to a lover. (Ov. Met. i. 468; Eurip. Iphig. Aul. 548.) Eros is further represented with golden wings, and as fluttering about like a bird. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 987.) His eyes are sometimes covered, so that he acts blindly. (Theocrit. x. 20.) He is the usual companion of his mother Aphrodite, and poets and artists represent him, moreover, as accompanied by such allegorical beings as Pothos, Himeros, Dionysus, Tyche, Peitho, the Charites or Muses. (Pind. Ol. i. 41; Anacr. xxxiii. 8; Hesiod, Theog. 201; Paus. vi. 24. § 5, vii. 26. § 3, i. 43. § 6.) His statue and that of Hermes usually stood in the Greek gymnasia. (Athen. xiii. p. 551; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1596.)

We must especially notice the connexion of Eros with Anteros, with which persons usually connect the notion of "Love returned." But originally Anteros was a being opposed to Eros, and fighting against him. (Paus. i. 30. § 1, vi. 23. § 4.) This conflict, however, was also conceived as the rivalry existing between two lovers, and Anteros accordingly punished those who did not return the love of others; so that he is the avenging Eros, or a deus ultor. (Paus. i. 30. § 1; Ov. Met. xiii. 750, &c.; Plat. Phaedr. p. 255, d.) The number of Erotes (Amores and Cupidines) is playfully extended ad libitum by later poets, and these Erotes are described either as sons of Aphrodite or of nymphs. Among the places distinguished for their worship of Eros, Thespie in Boeotia stands foremost: there his worship was very ancient, and the old representation of the god was a rude stone (Paus. ix. 27. § 1), to which in later times, however, the most exquisite works of art were added. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 266.) At Thespie a quinquennial festival, the Erotidia or Erotia, were celebrated in honour of the god. (Paus. l. c.; Athen. xiii. p. 561.) Besides Sparta, Samos, and Parion on the Hellespont, he was also worshipped at Athens, where he had an altar at the entrance of the Academy. (Paus. i. 30. § 1.) At Megara his statue, together with those of Himeros and Pothos, stood in the temple of Aphrodite. (Paus. i. 43. § 6, comp. iii. 26. § 3, vi. 24. § 5, vii. 26. § 3.) Among the things sacred to Eros, and which frequently appear with him in works of art, we may mention the rose, wild beasts which are tamed by him, the hare, the cock, and the ram. Eros was a favourite subject with the ancient statuaries, but his representation seems to have been brought to perfection by Praxiteles, who conceived him as a full-grown youth of the most perfect beauty. (Lucian, Am. ii. 17; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4, 5.) In later times artists followed the example of poets, and represented him as a little boy. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderh. ii. p. 216, &c.; Welcker, Zeitschrift für die alte Kunst, p. 475.) Respecting the connexion between Eros and Psyche, see PSYCHE. [L. S.]

EROS (Ἔρως) occurs in three ancient Latin inscriptions as the name of one or more physicians, one of whom is supposed to have been physician to Julia, the daughter of the emperor Augustus. There is extant a short work, written in bad Latin, and entitled "Curandarum Aegritudinum Muliebrum ante et post Partum Liber unicus," which has sometimes been attributed to Eros. The style, however, and the fact that writers are quoted in it who lived long after the time of Augustus, prove that this supposition is not correct. It has also been attributed to a female named Trotaula, under whose name it is generally quoted; but C. G. Gruner, who has examined the subject in a dissertation entitled "Neque Eros, neque Trotaula, sed Salernitanus quidam Medicus, isque Christianus, Auctor Libelli est qui De Morbis Mulierum inscribitur" (Jenae, 1773, 4to.), proves that this also is incorrect. The work is of very little value, and is included in the Aldine collection, entitled "Medici Antiqui omnes qui Latinis Litteris," &c., fol., Venet. 1547, and in the collection of writers "Gynaeciorum," or "on Female Diseases," Basil. 4to, 1566. It was also published in 1778, Lips. 8vo., together with H. Kormmann, "De Virginitate Statu," &c. [W. A. G.]

EROTIANUS (Ἐρωτιανός), or, as he is sometimes called, Herodianus (Ἡρωδιανός), the author of a Greek work still extant, entitled Τὰς κατ' Ἱπποκράτην λέξεων Συνοψήριον, Vocum, quae apud Hippocratem sunt, Collectio. It is uncertain whether he was himself a physician, or merely a grammarian, but he appears to have written (or at least to have intended to write) some other works on Hippocrates besides that which we now possess (pp. 23, 208, ed. Franz). He must have lived (and probably at Rome) in the reign of the emperor Nero, A. D. 54—68, as his work is dedicated to his archiater, Andromachus. It is curious as containing the earliest list of the writings of Hippocrates that exists, in which we find the titles of several treatises now lost, and also miss several that now form part of the Hippocratic collection. The rest of the work consists of a glossary, in which the words are at present arranged in a partially alphabetical manner, though it appears that this mode of arrangement is not that which was adopted by the author himself. It was first published in Greek, 8vo., 1564, Paris, in H. Stephani Dictionarium Medicum; a Latin translation by Barth. Eustachius appeared in 1566, 4to., Venet.; the last and best edition is that by Franz, Lips. 1780, 8vo., Greek and Latin, containing also the glossaries of Galen and Herodotus, a learned and copious commentary, and good indices. It has also been published with some editions of the works of Hippocrates. [W. A. G.]

EROTIUS, vicarius and quaestor, one of the commission of Sixteen, appointed by Theodosius in A. D. 435, to compile the Theodosian Code. He does not appear, however, to have taken any distinguished part in its composition. [DIONORIUS, vol. i. p. 1018.] [J. T. G.]

ERUCIA GENS, plebeian. Only one member of this gens is mentioned in the time of the republic, namely, C. Erucius, the accuser of Sex. Roscius of Ameria, whom Cicero defended in B. C. 80. From Cicero's account he would appear to have been a man of low origin. (Cic. pro Rosc. 13, 16, 18—21, 29, 32.) His name also appears as one of the accusers of L. Varenus, who was likewise defended by Cicero, but in what year is uncertain. [VARENUS.] He was called by Cicero in his speech for Varenus Antoniaster, that is, an imitator of the orator Antonius. (Cic. Fragm. pro Varen. 8, p. 443, ed. Orelli.) The Erius (Ἐρίκιος) who is mentioned by Plutarch (Sull. 16, 18) as one of Sulla's legates in the Mithridatic war, is supposed by Drumann (Gesch. Roms. vol. iii. p. 68) to be a false reading for Hirtius, but we ought perhaps to read Erius.

Under the empire, in the second century after Christ, a family of the Erius of the name of Clarius attained considerable distinction. [CLARIUS.]

ERYCINA (Ἐρυκίνη), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from mount Eryx, in Sicily, where she had a famous temple, which was said to have been built by Eryx, a son of Aphrodite and the Sicilian king Butes. (Diod. iv. 83.) Virgil (Aen. v. 760) makes Aeneas build the temple. Psophia, a daughter of Eryx, was believed to have founded a temple of Aphrodite Erycina, at Psophia, in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 24. § 3.) From Sicily the worship of Aphrodite (Venus) Erycina was introduced at Rome about the beginning of the second Punic war (Liv. xxii. 9, 10, xxiii. 80, &c.), and in B. C. 181 a temple was built to her outside the Porta Collatina. (Liv. xl. 34; Ov. Fast. iv. 871, Rem. Amor. 549; Strab. vi. p. 272; comp. Cic. in Verr. iv. 8; Horat. Carm. i. 2. 33; Ov. Heroid. xv. 57.) [L. S.]

ERYCIUS (Ἐρίκιος), the name of two poets, whose epigrams are in the Greek Anthology. The one is called a Cyzicene, the other a Thessalian; and, from the internal evidence of the epigrams, it is probable that the one lived in the time of Sulla, and about B. C. 84, the other under the emperor Hadrian. Their epigrams are so mixed up, that it is impossible to distinguish accurately between them, and we cannot even determine which of the two poets was the elder, and which the younger. We only know that the greater number of the epigrams are of a pastoral nature, and belong to Erycius of Cyzicus. (Brunck, Ana. vol. ii. p. 295; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 9, vol. xiii. pp. 891, 892; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 474.) [P. S.]

ERYMANTHUS (Ἐρύμανθος). 1. A river-god in Arcadia, who had a temple and a statue at Psophia. (Paus. viii. 24. § 6; Aelian, V. H. ii. 33.) 2. A son of Apollo, was blinded by Aphrodite, because he had seen her in the bath. Apollo, in revenge, metamorphosed himself into a wild boar, and killed Adonis. (Ptolem. Heph. i. 306.)

3. A son of Ariatas and father of Arrhon, or, according to others, the son of Arcas and father of Xanthus. (Paus. viii. 24. § 1.) [L. S.]

ERYMAS (Ἐρύμας), the name of three different Trojans. (Hom. II. xvi. 845, 415; Virg. Aen. ix. 702.) [L. S.]

ERYSICHTHON (Ἐρυσίχθων), that is, the tearer up of the earth. 1. A son of Triopas, who cut down trees in a grove sacred to Demeter, for which he was punished by the goddess with fearful hunger. (Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 34, &c.; Or. Met. viii. 738, &c.) Müller (Dor. ii. 10. § 3) thinks that the traditions concerning Triopas and Erysichthon (from ἀνελκύν, ῥοβίγο) belong to an agricultural religion, which, at the same time, refers to the infernal regions.

2. A son of Cecrops and Agrauros, died without issue in his father's lifetime, on his return from Delos, from whence he brought to Athens the ancient image of Eileithyia. His tomb was shewn at Prasinae. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 2; Paus. i. 18. § 5, 2. § 5, 31. § 2.) [L. S.]

ERYTHRUS (Ἐρυθρός) 1. A son of Leucon, and grandson of Athamas. He was one of the suitors of Hippodameia, and the town of Erythrae, in Boeotia, was said to have derived its name from him. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7; Müller, Orchom. p. 210. 2nd edit.)

2. A son of Rhadamanthus, who led the Erythraeans from Crete to the Ionian Erythrae. (Paus. vii. 3. § 4.) There are two other mythical personages of the name of Erythrus, or Erythrius, from whom the Boeotian Erythrae, and the Erythraean Sea, are said to have received their names respectively. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 267; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐρυθρά; Curtius, viii. 9.) [L. S.]

ERYX (Ἐρυξ), the name of three mythical personages. (Diod. iv. 83; Apollod. ii. 5. § 10; Or. Met. v. 196.) [L. S.]

ERYXIMACHUS (Ἐρυξιμαχος), a Greek physician, who lived in the fourth century B. C., and is introduced in the Convivium of Plato (p. 185) as telling Aristophanes how to cure the hiccup, and in the mean time making a speech himself on love or harmony (Ἔρως), which he illustrated from his own profession. [W. A. G.]

ESAIAS (Ἡεας), sometimes written in Latin ISAIAS. 1. Of CYPRIUS, lived probably in the reign of John VII. (Palaeologus) about A. D. 1430. Nicolaus Comnenus mentions a work of his, described as Oratio de Lipsanemachia, as extant in MS. at Rome; and his Epistle in defence of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, in reply to Nicolaus Sclegias, is given by Leo Allatius in his Græcia Orthodoxa, both in the original Greek and in a Latin version. Two epistles of Michael Glycas, addressed to the much revered (τιμωτάτω) monk Esaias are published in the Deliciae Eruditorum of Giovanni Lami, who is disposed to identify the person addressed with Esaias of Cyprus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 395; Wharton, Appendix to Cave's Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 130, ed. Oxford, 1740-2; Lami, Deliciae Eruditorum, vol. viii. pp. 236-279, Florence, 1739.)

2. Of EGYPT. Palladius in the biographical notices which make up what is usually termed his Lausiac History, mentions two brothers, Paësius (Παίσιος) and Esaias, the sons of a merchant, Ἰσωνόπουλος, by which some understand a Spanish merchant. Upon the death of their father they determined to quit the world; one of them distributed his whole property to the poor, the other expended his in the foundation of a monastic and charitable establishment. If the Orations mentioned below are correctly ascribed to the Esaias of Palladius, the first oration (which in the Latin version begins "Qui mecum manere vultis, audite," &c.) enables us to identify him as the brother that founded the monastery. Rufinus in his Lives of the Fathers, quoted by Tillemont, mentions an anecdote of Esaias and some other persons of monastic character, visiting the confessor Anuph or Anub (who had suffered in the great persecution of Diocletian, but had survived that time) just before his death. If we suppose Esaias to have been comparatively young, this account is not inconsistent with Cave's opinion, that Esaias flourished A. D. 370. Asemanni supposes that he lived about the close of the fourth century. He appears to have lived in Egypt.

There are dispersed through the European libraries a number of works in MS. ascribed to Esaias, who is variously designated "Abbas," "Presbyter," "Eremita," "Anachoreta." They are chiefly in Greek. Some of them have been published, either in the original or in a Latin version. Asemanni enumerates some Arabic and several Syriac works of Esaias, which, judging from their titles, are versions in those tongues of the known works of this writer. It is not ascertained whether Esaias the writer is the Esaias mentioned by Palladius. Cardinal Bellarmin, followed by the editors of the Bibliotheca Patrum, places the writer in the seventh century subsequent to the time of Palladius; but the character of the works supports the opinion that they belong to the Egyptian monk.

(1.) Chapters on the ascetic and peaceful life (Κεφάλαια περὶ ἀσκητικῆς καὶ ᾗσυχας), published in Greek and Latin in the Thesaurus Asceticus of Pierre Posin, pp. 315-325; 4to. Paris, 1684. As some MSS. contain portions of this work in connexion with other passages not contained in it, it is probable that the Chapters are incomplete. One MS. in the King's Library at Paris is described as "Esaias Abbatis Capita Ascetica, in duos libros divisa, quorum unusquisque præcepta centum complectitur."

(2.) Precepta seu Consilia posita tironibus, a Latin version of sixty-eight Short Precepts, published by Lucas Holstenius, in his Codex Regulæ Monasticarum. (vol. i. p. 6. ed. Augsburg, 1759.)

(3.) Orationes. A Latin version of twenty-nine discourses of Esaias was published by Pietro Francesco Zini, with some ascetic writings of Nilus and others, 8vo. Venice, 1574, and have been reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. They are not all orations, but, in one or two instances at least, are collections of apophthegms or sayings. Some MSS. contain more than twenty-nine orations: one in the King's Library at Paris contains thirty, wanting the beginning of the first; and one, mentioned by Harless, is said to contain thirty-one, differently arranged from those in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

(4.) Dubitaciones in Visionem Ezechielis. A MS. in the Royal Library of the Escorial in Spain, is described by Montfaucon (Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum, p. 619) as containing Sermones et Dubitationes in Visionem Ezechielis, by "Esaias Abbas." The Sermones or discourses are probably those mencised above. Of the Dubitationes no further account is given; but the subject, as far as it is indicated by the title, renders it very doubtful if the work belongs to the Egyptian Monk.

The Asctica and Opuscula of Esaias, described in Catalogues, are perhaps portions or extracts of the works noticed above. This is probably the case with the passages given by Cotelierius among the "Sayings of the Fathers." (Palladius, Hist. Lausica, c. 18. ed. Menruius, Leyden, 1616; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vii. p. 426; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 254, ed. Oxford, 1740-3; Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xii. p. 384, &c. ed. Lyon, 1677; Assemani, Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. par. i. p. 46, note; Cotelierius, Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta, vol. i. p. 445, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec., vol. ix. p. 282, vol. xi. p. 395, Bibliotheca Mediae et Infimae Latinitatis, vol. ii. p. 109; Catalogus Aethiopicarum Bibliothecarum Regiae, vol. ii., Paris, 1704.)

3. The PERSIAN. The Acta of the Martyrs, Saints Jonas and Barachisius in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, are a version of a Greek narrative, then, and probably still, extant in the Library of the Republic of Venice, purporting to be drawn up by Esaias the son of Adam, one of the horsemen ("eques") of Sapor, King of Persia, under whom the martyrs suffered. (Acta Sanctorum, Martii, vol. iii. p. 770, &c.) [J. C. M.]

ESQUILINUS, a name of several families at Rome, which they obtained from living on the Esquiline hill. The name also occurs as an agnomen to distinguish a member or a branch of a particular family from others of the same name.

1. An agnomen of P. LICINIUS CALVUS, both father and son. [CALVUS, Noa. 1, 2.]

2. An agnomen of L. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS and Q. MINUCIUS AUGURINUS, though, according to the Fasti, Augurinus would be the agnomen and Esquilinus the cognomen. [AUGURINUS II., Noa. 3, 4.]

3. L. or M. SERGIUS ESQUILINUS, one of the second decemvirate, b. c. 450. (Liv. iii. 35; Dionys. x. 58, xi. 23.)

4. An agnomen of the VIRGINII TRICOSTI. Almost all the members of the Virginia gens had the surname Tricostus, and those who dwelt on the Esquiline had the surname Esquilinus, just as those living on the Caelian hill had the surname CAELIOMONTANUS. Two members of the gens have the surname Esquilinus, namely, OPITER VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS ESQUILINUS, who was consul in b. c. 478, filling the place of C. Servilius Structus Abala, who died in his year of office (Fasti), and his grandson, L. VIRGINIUS TRICOSTUS ESQUILINUS, consular tribune in b. c. 402. The conduct of the siege of Veii was entrusted to the latter and his colleague M'. Sergius Fidenas, but in consequence of their private enmity the campaign was a disastrous one. The Capenates and Faliaci advanced to the relief of Veii. The two Roman generals had each the command of a separate camp: Sergius was attacked by the allies and a sally from the town at the same time, and let himself be overpowered by numbers, because he would not ask his colleague for assistance, and Virginius would not send it because it was not asked. In consequence of their misconduct, they were forced to resign their office before their year had expired. In the following year they were brought to trial and condemned by the people to pay a heavy fine. (Liv. v. 8, 9, 11, 12.)

ETEARCHUS (Ἐτάρχος). 1. An ancient king of the city of Axus in Crete, who, according to the Cyrenaean accounts, was the grandfather of Battus I., king of Cyrene. The story of the way in which he was induced to plan the death of his daughter Phronime, at the instigation of her step-mother, and of the manner in which she was preserved and taken to Cyrene, is told by Herodotus (iv. 154, 155).

2. A king of the Ammonians, mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 32) as the authority for some accounts which he heard from certain Cyrenaean of an expedition into the interior of Africa undertaken by five youths of the Nasamones. [C. P. M.]

ETEMUNDIS, the name prefixed to an epigram of two lines to be found in Burmann, Anthol. Lat. iii. 283, or n. 547, ed. Meyer, but of whom nothing is known. [W. R.]

ETEOCLES (Ἐτεοκλῆς). 1. A son of Andrews and Erippe, or of Cephasus, who was said to have been the first that offered sacrifices to the Charites at Orchomenos, in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 34. § 5, 35. § 1; Theocrit. xvi. 104; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiv. 1; Müller, Orchom. p. 128.)

2. A son of Oedipus and Jocaste. After his father's flight from Thebes, he and his brother Polyneices undertook the government of Thebes by turns. But, in consequence of disputes having arisen between the brothers, Polyneices fled to Adrastus, who then brought about the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. [ADRASTUS.] When many of the heroes had fallen, Eteocles and Polyneices resolved upon deciding the contest by a single combat, but both the brothers fell. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8, 6. §§ 1, 5, &c.; Paus. ix. 5. § 6; comp. Eurip. Phoen. 67; JOCASTE.) [L. S.]

ETEOCLUS (Ἐτεόκλος) a son of Iphias, was, according to some traditions, one of the seven heroes who went with Adrastus against Thebes. He had to make the attack upon the Neïtan gate, where he was opposed by Megareus. (Aeschyl. Sept. a. Theb. 444, &c.; Apollod. iii. 6. § 3.) He is said to have won a prize in the foot-race at the Nemean games, and to have been killed by Leades. (Apollod. iii. 6. §§ 4, 8.) His statue stood at Delphi, among those of the other Argive heroes. (Paus. x. 10. § 2; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1042.) [L. S.]

ETEONICUS (Ἐτεόνικος), a Lacedaemonian, who in b. c. 412 was lieutenant under the admiral Atyochus, and assisted him in his unsuccessful operations against Lesbos. (Thuc. viii. 23.) He was afterwards harried in Thasos, but in 410, together with the Lacedaemonian party, was expelled by the Thasians. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 32.) In 406 we find him serving under Callicratidas, who left him to blockade Conon in Mytilene, while he himself went to meet the Athenian reinforcements. After the battle of Arginusae, by means of a stratagem, Eteoniceus succeeded in drawing off the land forces to Methymna, while he directed the naval forces to make with all speed for Chios, where he found means of rejoining them not long afterwards. In the course of his stay here, he, with considerable energy and promptitude, defeated a plot formed by some of the troops under his command to seize Chios. (Xen. Hell. i. 6. § 26, 36, &c., ii. 1. § 1, &c.) It is probably this Eteoniceus whom we find mentioned in the Anabasis (vii. 1. § 12) apparently serving as an officer under Anaxibius at Byzantium. (b. c. 400.) Eleven years afterwards (389), he is mentioned as being stationed as harmost in Aegina. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § 1.) [C. P. M.]

ETEO'NUS (Ἐτεινός), a descendant of Boeotus, and father of Eleon, from whom the Boeotian town of Eteonos derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 265.) [L. S.]

ETRUSCILLA, HERE'NNIA, wife of the emperor Decius. The name not being mentioned in history, it was a matter of dispute to what princess the coins bearing the legend Herennia Etruscilla Augusta were to be assigned, until a stone was found at Carseoli with the inscription HERENNIAE. CUPRESSENIAE. ETRUSCILLAE. AVG. CONIUGI. D. N. DECI. AVG. MATRI. AVGG. NN. ET. CASTOR. S. P. Q., from which, taken in combination with medals, it appears that her designation in full was Annia Cupressenia Herennia Etruscilla. (Muratori, p. 1036, 4; Maffei, Mus. Veron. p. 102; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 347.) [W. R.]

ETRUSCUS, HERE'NNIUS, son of the emperor Decius, upon whose accession in A. D. 249 he received the appellations of Cæsar and Princeps Juventutis. In 251 he was consul, was admitted to a participation in the title of Augustus, and towards the close of the year was slain along with his father in a bloody battle fought against the Goths in Thracia. [DECIUS.] We gather from coins that his designation at full length was Q. Herennius Etruscus Messius Trajanus Decius, the names Herennius Etruscus being derived from his mother Herennia Etruscilla, while the rest were inherited from his sire. (Aurel. Vict. de Cæs. xxix. Epit. xxix.; Zonar. xii. 20.) [W. R.]

ETRUSCUS (Ἐτροσκός), of MESSÆNE, the author of a single epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 307; Jacobs, vol. iii. p. 20.) Nothing more is known of him. Martial (vi. 83, vii. 39) mentions an Etruscus who was banished by Domitian. (Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 892.) [P. S.]

ETUTA. [GENTIUS.]

ETYMOCLÉS (Ἐτυμωκλῆς) was one of the three Spartan envoys who, happening to be at Athens at the time of the incursion of Sphodrias into Attica (B. C. 378), were arrested by the Athenians on suspicion of having been privy to the attempt. Their assurances, however, to the contrary were believed, and they were allowed to depart. Etymocles is mentioned by Xenophon and Plutarch as a friend of Agesilaus, and we hear of him again as one of the ambassadors sent to negotiate an alliance with Athens in B. C. 369. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. § 22, 23, 32, vi. 5. § 33; Plut. Ages. 25.) [E. E.]

EVADNE (Ἐδάδνη.) 1. A daughter of Poseidon and Pitane. Immediately after her birth, she was carried to the Arcadian king Aegyptus, who brought her up. She afterwards became by Apollo the mother of Jamus. (Pind. Ol. vi. 30; Hygin. Fab. 175.)

2. A daughter of Iphis, or Philax. (Eurip. Suppl. 985; Apollod. iii. 7. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 256. See CAPANEUS.) There are three other mythical personages of the same name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2; Ov. Amor. iii. 6. 41; Diod. iv. 53.) [L. S.]

EVAECHME (Ἐβαχμή), the name of two mythical personages. (Paus. iv. 2. § 1; comp. ALCAÏOUS.) [L. S.]

EVAEMON (Ἐβαίμων), the name of two mythical personages. (Hom. Il. ii. 736; Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.) [L. S.]

EVAE'NETUS (Ἐβαίverος), the name of two commentators on the Phaenomena of Aratus, who are mentioned in the introductory commentary still extant (p. 117, ed. Victor.), but concerning whom nothing is known. [L. S.]

EVAGES (Ἐβάγης), of Hydræa, was, according to Dionysius (ap. Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἱδρεία), an illiterate and quite uneducated shepherd, but yet a good comic poet. Meineke thinks this statement insufficient to give him a place among the Greek comedians. (Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 528.) [P. S.]

EVA'GORAS (Ἐβαγόρας), the name of two mythical personages. (Apollod. i. 9. § 9, iii. 12. § 5; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 156.) [L. S.]

EVA'GORAS (Ἐβαγόρας). 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus. He was sprung from a family which claimed descent from Teucer, the reputed founder of Salamis; and his ancestors appear to have been during a long period the hereditary rulers of that city under the supremacy of Persia. They had, however, been expelled (at what period we are not told) by a Phœnician exile, who obtained the sovereignty for himself, and transmitted it to his descendants: one of these held it at the time of the birth of Evagoras, the date of which there is no means of fixing with any degree of accuracy; but he appears to have been grown up, though still a young man, when one Abdymon, a native of Citium, conspired against the tyrant, put him to death, and established himself in his place. After this the usurper sought to apprehend Evagoras, probably from jealousy of his hereditary claim to the government, but the latter made his escape to Cilicia, and, having there assembled a small band of followers, returned secretly to Salamis, attacked the tyrant in his palace, overpowered his guards, and put him to death. (Isocr. Evag. pp. 191-195; Diod. xiv. 98; Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a.; Paus. ii. 29. § 4.) After this Evagoras established his authority at Salamis without farther opposition. If we may trust his panegyrist, Isocrates, his rule was distinguished for its mildness and equity, and he promoted the prosperity of his subjects in every way, while he particularly sought to extend his relations with Greece, and to restore the influence of Hellenic customs and civilization, which had been in some degree obliterated during the period of barbarian rule. (Isocr. Evag. pp. 197-198.) He at the same time greatly increased the power of his subject city, and strengthened his own resources, specially by the formation of a powerful fleet. Such was his position in B. C. 405, when, after the defeat at Aegospotami, the Athenian general Conon took refuge at Salamis with his few remaining galley. Evagoras had already received, in return for some services to Athens, the rights of an Athenian citizen, and was on terms of personal friendship with Conon (Isocr. Evag. p. 199, e.; Diod. xiii. 106): hence he zealously espoused the Athenian cause. It is said to have been at his intercession that the king of Persia determined to allow Conon the support of the Phœnician fleet, and he commanded in person the squadron with which he joined the fleet of Conon and Pharnabazus at the battle of Cnidus, B. C. 394. (Xen. Hell. ii. 1. § 29; Isocr. Evag. pp. 199, 200; Paus. i. 3. § 2; Ctesias, ap. Phot. p. 44, b.) For this distinguished service a statue of Evagoras was set up by the

Athenians in the Cerameicus, by the side of that of Conon. (Paus. i. 3. § 2; Isocr. Evag. p. 200, c.)

We have very imperfect information concerning the relation in which Evagoras stood to the king of Persia in the early part of his reign; but it seems probable that he was regarded from the first with suspicion: the tyrants whom he had succeeded are particularly spoken of as friendly to Persia (Diod. xiv. 98), and we learn from Ctesias (ap. Phot. p. 44, b.) that his quarrels with one of the other petty states of Cyprus had already called for the interference of the great king before the battle of Cnidus. The chronology of the succeeding events is also very obscure; but the most consistent view of the matter appears to be that derived from Theopompus (ap. Phot. p. 120, a.), that Artaxerxes had previously determined to make war upon Evagoras, and had even commenced his preparations, but was unable to engage with vigour in the enterprise until after the peace of Antalcidas (a. c. 387). (See Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 280; and comp. Isocr. Panegy. p. 70, a.; Xen. Hell. iv. 8. § 24, v. 1. § 10.) Meantime Evagoras had not only extended his dominion over the greater part of Cyprus, but had ravaged the coast of Phoenicia with his fleet, prevailed on the Cilicians to revolt from Persia, and even (if we may believe Isocrates and Diodorus) made himself master of Tyre itself. (Diod. xiv. 98, 110, xv. 2; Isocrat. Evag. p. 201.) At length, however, a great fleet and army were assembled under the command of Tiribazus and Orontes, and Evagoras having ventured to oppose them with very inferior forces was totally defeated; all the rest of Cyprus fell into the hands of the satraps, and Evagoras himself was shut up within the walls of Salamis. But the Persian generals seem to have been unable to follow up their advantage, and notwithstanding this blow the war was allowed to linger for some years. The dissensions between his two adversaries at length proved the safety of Evagoras: Tiribazus was recalled in consequence of the intrigues of Orontes, and the latter hastened to conclude a peace with the Cyprian monarch, by which he was allowed to retain uncontrolled possession of Salamis, with the title of king. (Diod. xv. 2—4, 8, 9; Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a.; Isocr. Evag. p. 201, Panegy. p. 70.) This war, which is said to have lasted ten years in all, was brought to a close in a. c. 385. (Diod. xv. 9; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. pp. 278-281.) Evagoras survived it above ten years. He was assassinated in 374, together with his eldest son Pnytagoras, by an eunuch named Thrasydæus; but the murder was caused by revenge for a private injury, and he seems to have been succeeded without opposition by his son Nicocles. (Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a, b.; Arist. Pol. v. 10; Diod. xv. 47, and Wesseling, ad loc.) Our knowledge of the character and administration of Evagoras is derived mainly from the oration of Isocrates in his praise, addressed to his son Nicocles; but this is written in a style of undistinguishing panegyric, which must lead us to receive its statements with great caution.

2. Apparently a son of the preceding, is mentioned by Diodorus as joined with Phocion in the command of an expedition destined to recover Cyprus for the king of Persia, from whom it had revolted. (a. c. 351.) They succeeded in reducing all the island with the exception of Salamis, which was held by Pnytagoras, probably a brother of this Evagoras. The latter had obtained from the Persian king a promise of his father's government in case he could effect its conquest; but the siege being protracted, Evagoras by some means incurred the displeasure of Artaxerxes, who became reconciled to Pnytagoras, and left him in the possession of Salamis, while he appointed Evagoras to a government in the interior of Asia. Here, however, he again gave dissatisfaction, and was accused of maladministration, in consequence of which he fled to Cyprus, where he was seized and put to death. (Diod. xvi. 42, 46.) The annexed coin belongs to this Evagoras.

3. Of Lacedæmon, remarkable for having gained three victories in the chariot-race at the Olympic games with the same horses, in consequence of which he erected the statue of a quadriga at Olympia, and honoured his horses with a magnificent funeral. (Herod. vi. 103; Aelian, Hist. Anim. xii. 40; Paus. vi. 10. § 8.)

4. An Achaean of Aegium, accused by Critolaus of betraying the counsels of his countrymen to the Romans, b. c. 146. (Polyb. xxxviii. 5.) [E. H. B.]

EVA'GRIUS (Eddypios). 1. Of ANTIOCH, was a native of Antioch, the son of a citizen of that place, named Pompeianus, and a presbyter apparently of the church of Antioch. He travelled into the west of Europe, and was acquainted with Jerome, who describes him as a man "acris ac ferventis ingenii." During the schism in the patriarchate of Antioch, he was chosen by one of the parties (A. D. 388 or 389) successor to their deceased patriarch Paulinus, in opposition to Flavianus, the patriarch of the other party. According to Theodoret, the manner of his election and ordination was altogether contrary to ecclesiastical rule. The historians Socrates and Sozomen state that Evagrius survived his elevation only a short time; but this expression must not be too strictly interpreted, as it appears from Jerome that he was living in A. D. 392. He was perhaps the Evagrius who instructed Chrysostom in monastic discipline, though it is to be observed that Chrysostom was ordained a presbyter by Flavianus, the rival of Evagrius in the see of Antioch. Evagrius had no successor in his see, and ultimately Flavianus succeeded in healing the division.

Evagrius wrote treatises on various subjects (diversarum hypotheson tractatus). Jerome says the author had read them to him, but had not yet published them. They are not extant. Evagrius also translated the life of St. Anthony by Athanasius from Greek into Latin. The very free version printed in the Benedictine edition of Athanasius (vol. i. pars ii. p. 785, &c.) and in the Acta Sanctorum (Januar. vol. ii. p. 107), professes to be that of Evagrius, and is addressed to his son Innocentius, who is perhaps the Innocentius whose death, A. D. 369 or 370, is mentioned by Jerome. (Epist. 41 ad Rusticum.) Tillemont receives it, and Bollandus (Acta Sanct. l. c.) and the Benedictine editors of Athanasius (l. c.) vindicate its genuineness; but Cave affirms that "there is more than one reason for doubting its genuineness;" and Oudin decidedly denies the genuineness both of the Greek text and the version. In the library of Worcester Cathedral is a MS. described as containing the life of St. Antony, written by Evagrius and translated by Jerome: there is probably an error, either in the MS. itself, or in the description of it. (Catal. MSS. Angliæ et Hib. vol. ii. p. 17.)

Tillemont has collected various particulars of the life of Evagrius of Antioch. Trithemius confounds him with Evagrius of Pontus. (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. v. 15; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vii. 15; Theodoretus, Hist. Eccles. v. 23; Hieronymus (Jerome) de Viris Illust. 25; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xii. p. 13, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 283, ed. Ox. 1740-43; Oudin, de Scriptor. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. i. col. 882; Trithemius, de Scriptor. Eccles. c. 85; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 434, vol. x. p. 137.)

2. The ASCETIC, instructed Chrysostom in monastic discipline. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 455.) He is perhaps the same as Evagrius of Antioch. [No. 1.]

3. Of EPIPHANIA, known also as EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS and EX-PRAEFECTUS. He was a native of Epiphaneia on the Orontes, in the province of Syria Secunda, as we gather from the title of his Ecclesiastical History, where he is called Ἐπιφανεύς. (Comp. also his Hist. Eccles. iii. 34.) Photius says (Biblioth. Cod. 29), according to the present text, that he was of a celebrated city (πόλις δὲ ἐπιφανοῦς) of Coele-Syria; but the text is probably corrupt. Nicephorus Callisti (Hist. Eccles. i. l, xvi. 31) twice cites him as ὁ ἐπιφανής, "the illustrious;" but this is probably an error, either in the transcription of Nicephorus or in that of his authorities. The birth of Evagrius is fixed by data furnished in his own writings in or about A. D. 536. (Evagr. Hist. Eccles. iv. 29, vi. 24.) He was sent to school before or when he was four years old, for he was a schoolboy when he was taken by his parents to the neighbouring city of Apameia to see the exhibition of "the life-giving wood of the Cross," during the alarm caused by the capture of Antioch by Chosroes or Khsrau I., king of Persia, A. D. 540. Two years afterwards (A. D. 542), he was near dying from a pestilential disorder which then first visited the Byzantine empire, and which continued at intervals for above half a century, if not more, to cause a fearful mortality. Evagrius gives a melancholy catalogue of his own subsequent losses through it. It took off, at different times, his first wife, several of his children (especially a married daughter, who, with her child, died when the pestilence visited Antioch for the fourth time, A. D. 591 or 592, two years before Evagrius wrote his history), and many of his kindred and domestics. Evagrius was a "scholasticus" (advocate or pleader), and is often designated from his profession. It is probable that he practised at Antioch, which, as the capital of the province of Syria, would offer an important field for his forensic exertions, and with which city his writings shew that he was familiar. (Comp. Hist. Eccles. i. 18, iii. 28.) He appears to have been the legal adviser of Gregory, patriarch of Antioch; and some of his memorials, drawn up in the name of the patriarch, obtained the notice and approval of the emperor Tiberius, who gave Evagrius, not as some have understood, the quaestorship, but the rank of a quaestorian or ex-quaestor. (Evagr. Hist. Eccles. vi. 24, where see the note of Valesius.) On the birth of Theodosius, son of the emperor Maurice (A. D. 584 or 585), Evagrius composed a piece, apparently a congratulatory address, which obtained a farther manifestation of imperial favour in the rank of ex-prefect (ἐξ ἐπαρχῶν), which designation he bears in the title of his own work, and in Nicephorus. (Hist. Eccles. i. l.) He accompanied the Patriarch Gregory to a synod at Constantinople (A. D. 589), to the judgment of which the patriarch had appealed when accused of incest and adultery. On his return to Antioch, after the acquittal of Gregory, Evagrius (in October or November of the same year) married a second wife, a young maiden. His reputation and influence are evidenced by the fact that his marriage was celebrated by a general festival at the public expense; but the rejoicing was interrupted by a dreadful earthquake, in which, as some computed, 60,000 of the inhabitants perished. This is the last incident in the life of Evagrius of which anything is known, except the death of his daughter, already noticed, and the completion of his history, in A. D. 593 or 594.

Evagrius wrote (1) An Ecclesiastical History, which extends, besides some preliminary matter, from the third general council, that of Ephesus, A. D. 431, to the twelfth year of the reign of the Emperor Maurice, A. D. 593-4. He modestly professes that he was not properly qualified for such a work (μη δεύς ἐν τῷ τὰ ταῦτα), but says he was induced to undertake it, as no one had yet attempted to continue the history of the Church regularly (κατ' εἰρμόν) from the time at which the histories of Sozomen and Theodoret close. He has the reputation of being tolerably accurate. His credulity and love of the marvellous are characteristic of the period rather than of the individual. Photius describes his style as not unpleasant, though occasionally redundant; and (as we understand the passage) praises him as being more exact than the other ecclesiastical historians in the statement of opinions: ἐν δὲ τῇ τῶν δογματικῶν ὁρθότητι κριθεὶς τῶν ἄλλων μᾶλλον ἰστορικῶν. Some however interpret the passage as a commendation of the historian's orthodoxy. Nicephorus Callisti (Hist. Eccles. i. l) notices, that Evagrius dwells much on secular affairs, and enumerates the writers from whom he derived his materials, namely Eustathius the Syrian, Zosimus, Priscus and Joannes, Procopius of Caesarea, Agathias, "and other writers of no mean character." His history has been repeatedly published. The edition of Valesius (Henri de Valois) which comprehends the other early Greek Ecclesiastical Historians, has a valuable biographical preface, a Latin translation, and useful notes. It was reprinted with some additional "variorum" notes by Reading, 3 vols. fol. Camb. 1720. (2) A volume of Memorials, Letters, Decrees, Orations, and Disputations, including the Memorials and the address which procured for Evagrius his rank of Quaestorian and Ex-prefect. This volume is mentioned in the Ecclesiastical History, but appears to be now lost. Some pieces of little moment have been ascribed to Evagrius, but most or all of them incorrectly. (Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. iv. 26, vi. 7, 8, 23, 24; Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 29; Nicephorus Callisti, Hist. Eccles. i. l, xvi. 31; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 482.

4. OF PONTUS, an eminent ascetic and ecclesiastical writer. The place of his birth was probably Iborn, a small town in Pontus, on the shore of the Euxine near the mouth of the Halys; but the expressions of Nicephorus Callisti would rather imply that he was of the race of the Iberians, who inhabited the modern Georgia, on the southern side of the Caucasus. Palladius, his disciple, says he was of Pontus, of the city (or rather a city) of the Iberians (Ἰβήρας Ἱβήρων, or as one MS., according to Tillmont, has it, Ἰβήρων), which is ambiguous. Jerome calls him "Hyperborita," an expression which Martianay, the Benedictine editor of Jerome's works, alters to "Iberita," and which has given occasion to other conjectural emendations. (Cotelierius, Eccles. Græc. Monumenta, vol. iii. p. 543.) His father was a presbyter, or perhaps a chorepiscopus. (Heraclides, apud Tillmont.) He was placed in early life under the instruction of Gregory Nazianzen. There is extant a letter of Gregory to an Evagrius, to whom he expresses his pleasure at the growing reputation of one whom he terms "our son," and of whom he had been the instructor both in literature and religion. If, as is conjectured, this letter refers to our Evagrius, his father and he were of the same name. Gregory also in his will leaves a legacy, with strong expressions of regard, to Evagrius the deacon; but it is not certain that this is our Evagrius. Evagrius was appointed reader by the great Basil, and was ordained deacon either by Gregory Nyssen or Gregory Nazianzen. According to Socrates, he was ordained at Constantinople by Gregory Nazianzen; and Sozomen says, that when Gregory occupied the see of Constantinople, he made Evagrius his archdeacon. If these statements are received, the removal of Evagrius to Constantinople must be placed during or before the short time (A. D. 379 to 381) of Gregory's episcopate at Constantinople. But according to Palladius (whose personal connexion with Evagrius would make his testimony preferable, if the text of his Lausiac History was in a more satisfactory state), Evagrius was ordained deacon by Gregory Nyssen, and taken by him to the first council of Constantinople (the second general council), and left by him in that city, under the patronage of Nectarius, who succeeded Gregory Nazianzen. The age and intellectual character of Evagrius disposed him to polemical discussion; and "he obtained high reputation in controversy," says Palladius, "in the great city, exulting with the ardour of youth in opposing every form of heresy." His popularity was probably increased by the beauty of his person, which he set off by great attention to his dress. The handsome deacon won and returned the affection of a married lady of rank; but Evagrius, though vain, was not profligate, and struggled hard against the sinful passion. It is doubtful, however, if he would have broken away from the snare, but for an extraordinary dream; in which he dreamed that he took a solemn oath to leave Constantinople. Deeming himself bound by his oath, he at once left the city; and by this step, according to Sozomen, preserved not only his virtue, but his life, which was in imminent danger from the jealousy of the lady's husband. His first journey, after leaving Constantinople, was at Jerusalem. Here, recovering from the alarm into which his dream had thrown him, he gave way again to vanity and the love of dress; but a long and severe illness, and the exhortation of Melania Romana, a lady who had devoted herself to a religious life, and had become very eminent, induced him to renounce the world, and give himself up to an ascetic life. He received the monastic garb from the hands of Melania, and departed for Egypt, the cradle of monasticism, where he spent the remainder of his life. Some copies of Palladius are thought to speak of a visit made by him to Constantinople, in A. D. 394; but the passage is obscure, and Tillmont and the Greek text of Palladius, in the Bibliotheca Patrum, refer the incident to Ammonius. Socrates states that he accompanied Gregory Nazianzen into Egypt; but there is no reason to think that Gregory visited Egypt at that time. Evagrius's removal into Egypt was probably late in A. D. 382, or in 383. The remainder of his life was spent on the hills of Nitria, in one of the hermitages or monasteries of Scetis or Scitis, or in the desert "of the Cella," to which, after a time, he withdrew. He was acquainted with several of the more eminent solitaries of the country, the two Macarii, Ammonius, and others, whose reputation for austerity of life, sanctity and miracles (especially healing the sick and casting out daemons) he emulated. He learned here, says Socrates, to be a philosopher in action, as he had before learned to be one in words. He had many disciples in the monastic life, of whom Palladius was one. His approval of the answer which one of the solitaries gave to the person who informed him of the death of his father: "Cease to blaspheme; for my Father (meaning God) is immortal," shews that Jerome's sarcastic remark, that he recommended an apathy which would shew that a man was "either a stone or God," was not undeserved. Theophilus, patriarch of Alexandria, would have ordained him a bishop; but he fled from him to avoid an elevation which he did not covet. Palladius has recorded many singular instances of his temptations and austerities; and, besides a separate memoir of him, has mentioned him in his notices of several other leading monks. Evagrius died apparently about A. D. 399, at the age of fifty-four.

There is considerable difficulty in ascertaining what were the writings of Evagrius. Some are known to us only from the notice of them in ancient writers, others are extant only in a Latin version, and of others we have only disjointed fragments. As nearly as we can ascertain, he is the author of the following works:—1. Μοναχὸς (perhaps we should read Μοναχικός) ἢ περὶ Πρακτικῆς. Fragments of this work, but apparently much interpolated, are given in the Monumenta Eccles. Græc. of Cotelierius, vol. iii. pp. 68—102, and in the edition of the Dialogus Vite S. Joannis Chrysostomi, erroneously ascribed to Palladius, published by Emmer. Bigotius (4to., Paris, 1680) pp. 349—355. Possibly the whole work is extant in these fragments (which are all given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Gallandius, vol. vii.); although a quotation given by Socrates (Hist. Eccles. iii. 7) as from this work (but which Cotelierius considers was probably taken from the next-mentioned work) is not included in it. An introductory address to Anatolius, given by Cotelierius, was evidently designed as a preface both to this work and the next. A Latin translation of the Monachus was revised by Gennadius, who lived toward the close of the fifth century. 2. Ἐννενήκοντα ἢ ἑκατὸν τὸν κατακλιθεῖς (or περὶ τοῦ καταξυθέντος) γνώσεις, in fifty chapters, and Ἐξακσία Προγνωστικὰ Προβλήματα. These two pieces, which are by ancient and modern writers noticed as distinct works, are by the writer himself, in the address to Anatolius just mentioned, regarded as one work, in six hundred and fifty chapters. Perhaps the complete work constituted the Ἱερά, one of the three works of Evagrius mentioned by Palladius. The fifty chapters of the Γνωστικός were first translated into Latin by Gennadius. It is possible that the "paucas sententias valde obscuras," also translated by Gennadius, were a fragment of the Προβλήματα: Fabricius thinks that the treatise entitled Capita Gnostica published in Greek and Latin by Suarezius, in his edition of the works of St. Nilus, is the Γνωστικός of Evagrius. 3. Ἀντιρρητικός (or Ἀντιρρητικός) ἀπὸ τῶν θείων γραφῶν, πρὸς τοὺς περὶ αὐτὰς δαίμονας. This work was translated by Gennadius. It was divided into eight sections corresponding to the eight evil thoughts. Fabricius and Gallandius consider that the fragment given by Bigotius (as already noticed) is a portion or compendium of this work, the scriptural passages being omitted. But although that fragment, a Latin version of which, with some additional sentences not found in the Greek, appears in the Biblioth. Patrum (vol. v. p. 902, ed. Paris, 1610, vol. iv. p. 925, ed. Cologn. 1618, vol. v. p. 698, ed. Paris, 1654, and vol. xxvii. p. 97, ed. Lyon, 1677) treats of the eight evil thoughts, it belongs, we think, to the Μοραχός rather than the Ἀντιρρητικός. 4. Στίχῃρα δύο, two collections of sentences, possibly in verse, one addressed to Coenobites or monks, the other to a virgin, or to women devoted to a life of virginity. A Latin version of these appears in the Appendix to the Codes Regularum of Holstenius, 4to., Rome, 1661, and reprinted in vol. i. pp. 465—468 of the Augsburg edition of 1759, and in the Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xxvii. pp. 469, 470, ed. Lyon, 1677, and vol. vii. of the edition of Gallandius. Jerome, who mentions the two parts of these Στίχῃρα, appears to refer to a third part addressed "to her whose name of blackness attests the darkness of her peridy," i. e. to Melania Romana; but this work, if Jerome is correct in his mention of it, is now lost. Gennadius mentions the two parts, not the third: and it is possible that, as Cave supposes, these, not the Γνωστικός, may constitute the Ἱερά of Palladius. 5. Τῶν κατὰ Μοραχῶν πραγμάτων τὰ αἴτια, extant in Cotelierus, Eccles. Graec. Mon. vol. iii., and Gallandius, Bibl. Patrum, vol. vii., are noticed in the Vitae Patrum of Rosweid, and are perhaps referred to by Jerome, who says that Evagrius wrote a book and sentences Περὶ Ἀσάβειας; in which words he may describe the Μοραχός and this work Τῶν κατὰ Μοραχῶν, both which are contained in one MS. used by Cotelierus. 6. A fragment Εἰς τὸ ΠΙΠΙ (ΠΙΠΙ), or the tetragrammaton and other names of God used in the Hebrew Scriptures, published by Cotelierus and Gallandius (ll. cc.) 7. Κεφάλαια λγ' κατ' ἀκολουθίαν. 8. Πνευματικὰ γῶμαι κατὰ ἀλφάβητον. 9. Ἐτερεαὶ γῶμαι. These three pieces are published by Gallandius as the works of Evagrius, whose claim to the authorship of them he vindicates. They have been commonly confounded with the works of St. Nilus. 10. 11. The life of the monk Pachrom or Pachromius; and A Sermon on the Trinity, both published by Suarezius among the works of St. Nilus, but assigned by him, on the authority of his MS., to Evagrius. Gallandius positively ascribes the sermon to Basil of Caesarea. 12. Ἱστορήματα εἰς Παροιμίας τοῦ Σολομώντος, mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Εὐάγγριος). Some understand Suidas to mean not "Notes on the Proverbs," but a "work on the model of the Proverbs of Solomon," and suppose that the Στίχῃρα are referred to. Fabricius, however, is inclined to regard it as a commentary. 13. Περὶ Λογιῶν, and 14. Ἀποφθέγματα περὶ τῶν μεγάλων γερόντων, both mentioned by Cotelierus (Eccles. Graec. Mon. vol. iii. pp. 547, 552) as extant in MS. 15. Trithemius ascribes to Evagrius "a work on the life of the Holy Fathers;" but he either refers to one of his works on "the monastic life," or has been misled by passages in Gennadius and Jerome. It is doubtful, however, whether these and several others of his writings extant in MS. and variously entitled, are distinct works, or simply compilations or extracts from some of the above. The genuineness of several of the above works must be regarded as doubtful. There are many citations from Evagrius in different writers, in the Scholia to the works of others, and in the Catenae on different books of Scripture. Jerome attests that his works were generally read in the East in their original Greek, and in the West in a Latin version made "by his disciple Rufinus."

Jerome appears to have been the first to raise the cry of heresy against Evagrius. The editors of the Bibliotheca Patrum (except Gallandius) prefix to the portions of his works which they publish a prefatory caveat. He is charged with perpetuating the errors of Origen, and anticipating those of Pelagius. Tillemont vindicates him from these charges. Some of his opinions, as coincident with those of Origen, were condemned, according to Nicephorus Callisti, at the fifth general (second Constantinopolitan) council, A. D. 553. (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. iv. 23; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. vi. 30; Palladius, Hist. Lausiac. c. 86, in the Bibl. Patrum, vol. xiii., ed. Paris, 1654; Hieronymus, ad Ctesiphontem adv. Pelagianos, Opera, vol. iv. p. 476, ed. Martianay, Paris, 1693; Greg. Nazianz. Opera, pp. 870-71, ed. Paris, 1630; Gennadius, de Viris Illustr. c. 11; Suidas, s. v. Εὐάγγριος and Μανδύριος; Nicephorus Callisti, Hist. Eccles. xi. 37, 42, 43; Trithemius, de Scriptor. Eccles. c. 85; Cotelierus, Eccles. Graec. Monum. vol. iii. p. 68, &c., and notes; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. x. p. 368, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 434, vol. viii. pp. 661, 679, 695, vol. ix. p. 284, &c., vol. x. p. 10; Gallandius, Biblioth. Patrum, vol. vii.; Oudin. Comment. de Scriptor. Eccles. vol. i. p. 883, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 275, ed. Oxon. 1740-43.)

5. An Evagrius, expressly distinguished by Gennadius from Evagrius of Pontus, wrote a work celebrated in its day, called Altercatio inter Theophilum Christianum et Simeonem Judaeum. It is published by Gallandius. (Gennadius, de Viris Illustribus, c. 50; Gallandius, Biblioth. Patrum, vol. ix. Proleg. p. xvii. and p. 250, &c.)

6. An Evagrius, supposed by some to be Evagrius of Pontus, but not so if we may judge from the subject, wrote a treatise described as Variarum Considerationum sive de Sermonis Discrimine Capita quinquaginta quatuor, extant in the MS. in the library of the Escorial. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 338, 367.) [J. C. M.]

EVALCES (Εὐάλκης), is referred to by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 578) as the author of a work on

Ephesus (Ἐφεσῖαν). There are a few other persons of the same name, concerning whom nothing of interest is known. (Xen. Hell. iv. 1. § 40; Anthol. Græc. vi. 262.) [L. S.]

EVANDER (Ἐβανδρος). 1. A son of Hermes by an Arcadian nymph, a daughter of Ladon, who is called Themis or Nicostrata, and in Roman traditions Carmenta or Tiburtia. (Paus. viii. 43. § 2; Plut. Quæst. Rom. 53;) Dionys. A. R. i. 31; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 336.) Evander is also called a son of Echemus and Timandra. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 130.) About sixty years previous to the Trojan war, Evander is said to have led a Pelasgian colony from Pallantium in Arcadia into Italy. The cause of this emigration was, according to Dionysius, a civil feud among the people, in which the party of Evander was defeated, and therefore left their country of their own accord. Servius, on the other hand, relates that Evander had killed his father at the instigation of his mother, and that he was obliged to quit Arcadia on that account. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 51; comp. Ov. Fast. i. 480.) He landed in Italy on the banks of the Tiber, at the foot of the Palatine Hill, and was hospitably received by king Turnus. According to Servius (ad Aen. viii. 562), however, Evander took possession of the country by force of arms, and slew Herilus, king of Praeneste, who had attempted to expel him. He built a town Pallantium, which was subsequently incorporated with Rome, and from which the names of Palatium and Palatinus were believed to have arisen. (Varro, de Ling. Lat. v. 53.) Evander is said to have taught his neighbours milder laws and the arts of peace and social life, and especially the art of writing, with which he himself had been made acquainted by Heracles (Plut. Quæst. Rom. 56), and music; he also introduced among them the worship of the Lycæan Pan, of Demeter, Poseidon, Heracles, and Nike. (Liv. i. 5; Dionys. i. 31, &c.; Ov. Fast. i. 471, v. 91; Paus. L. c.) Virgil (Aen. viii. 51) represents Evander as still alive at the time when Aeneas arrived in Italy, and as forming an alliance with him against the Latins. (Comp. Serv. ad Aen. viii. 157.) Evander had a son Pallas, and two daughters, Rome and Dyna. (Virg. Aen. viii. 574; Serv. ad Aen. i. 277; Dionys. i. 32.) He was worshipped at Pallantium in Arcadia, as a hero, and that town was subsequently honoured by the emperor Antoninus with several privileges. Evander's statue at Pallantium stood by the side of that of his son Pallas. At Rome he had an altar at the foot of the Aventine. (Paus. viii. 44. § 5; Dionys. L. c.)

2. A son of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5; Diet. Cræc. iii. 14.)

3. A son of the Lycian king Sarpedon, who took part in the Trojan war. (Diod. v. 79.) [L. S.]

EVANDER (Ἐβανδρος), a Phocian, was the pupil and successor of Lacydes as the head of the Academic School at Athens, about B. C. 215. Evander himself was succeeded by his pupil Hegesinus. Concerning the opinions and writings of this philosopher nothing is known. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 60; Cic. Acad. ii. 6.) Several Pythagoreans of the time of Evander, who were natives of Croton, Metapontum, and Leontini, are mentioned by Lamblichus (Vit. Pyth. 36), and a Cretan Evander occurs in Plutarch. (Lysand. 23.) [L. S.]

EVANDER, AVIANIUS, or, as we read in some MSS., AVIANUS EVANDER, lived at Rome in B. C. 50, in a part of the house of Memmius, and was on friendly terms with Cicero, from whose letters we learn that he was a sculptor. He seems to have been a freedman of M. Aemilius Avianus. (Ad Fam. vii. 23, xiii. 2.) [L. S.]

EVANDER, AULANIUS, a sculptor and silver chaser, born at Athens, whence he was taken by M. Antonius to Alexandria. At the overthrow of Antony he fell into the power of Octavian, and was carried among the captives to Rome, where he executed many admirable works. Pliny mentions a statue of Diana at Rome by Timotheus, the head of which was restored by Evander. (Plin. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10; Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 303, 304.) Some writers suppose that Horace refers to his works (Sat. i. 3. 90), but the passage seems to be rather a satirical allusion to vases prized for their antiquity—as old as king Evander. [P. S.]

EVA'NEMUS (Ἐβανέμος), the giver of favourable wind, was a surname of Zeus, under which the god had a sanctuary at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 13. § 5; comp. Theocrit. xxviii. 5.) [L. S.]

EVA'NGELUS (Ἐβανγγελλος), the bearer of good news. Under this name the shepherd Pico-darus had a sanctuary at Ephesus, where he enjoyed heroic honours, because he had found a quarry of beautiful marble, of which the Ephesians built a temple. (Vitruv. x. 7.) [L. S.]

EVANO'RIDAS (Ἐβανορίδας) an Elean, was one of the prisoners taken by Lycus of Phærae, the lieutenant-general of the Achæans, in B. C. 217, when he defeated Euripides the Aetolian, who had been sent, at the request of the Eleans, to supersede the former commander Pyrrhæas. (Polyb. v. 94.) Pausanias (vi. 8) mentions Evamoridas as having won the boys' prize for wrestling at the Olympic and Nemean games, and as having drawn up a list of the Olympic victors, when he afterwards held the office of Ἐλληνοδόκτης. (See Diet. of Ant. pp. 663, 664.) [E. E.]

EVANTHES (Ἐβανθής). 1. Of Cyzicus, is quoted by Hieronymus (adv. Jovin. ii. 14) as an authority for the opinion, that at the time of Pygmalion people were not yet in the habit of eating meat. Whether he is the same as the Evanthes of Cyzicus who, according to Pausanias (vi. 4. § 10) gained a prize at the Olympic games, is unknown.

2. Of Miletus, is mentioned as an author by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 29), and seems to have been an historian, but is otherwise unknown.

3. Of Samos, a Greek historian, who is mentioned only by Plutarch. (Sol. 11.) There are several passages in which authors of the name of Evanthes are referred to; but, their native countries not being stated, it is uncertain whether those passages refer to any of the three Evanthes here specified, or to other persons of the same name. Thus Pliny (H. N. viii. 22) quotes one Evanthes whom he calls inter auctores Græciæ non spreus, and from whose work he gives a statement respecting some religious rite observed in Arcadia. One might therefore be inclined to think him the same as the Evanthes who is quoted by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1063, 1065) as the author of μυθικά. Athenæus (vii. p. 296) speaks of an epic poet Evanthes, of whose productions he mentions a hymn to Glaucus. [L. S.]

and with great affection, by Achilles Tatius (iii. 6—8). The subjects of them were, the release of Andromeda by Perseus, and the release of Prometheus by Heracles. (Comp. Lucian, de Domo, 22; Philostr. Imag. i. 29.) Both subjects are represented on existing works of art in a manner similar to that of the pictures of Evanthes. (Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 396, n. 2, § 414, n. 3; Pitt. Exc. iv. 7, 61; Mus. Borb. v. 32, vi. 50, ix. 39; Gell, Pomp. pl. 42.) [P. S.]

EVANTHIUS, a rhetorician and grammarian, highly eulogized in the chronicle of St. Jerome, died about A. D. 359, is numbered among the ancient commentators on Terence, and is believed by Lindenbrogius to be the author of the Brevi dissertatio de Tragoedia et Comedia, commonly prefixed to the larger editions of the dramatist. He has sometimes been confounded with Euphrasius, who belongs to a much later period. (Schofen, De Terentio et Donato ejus interprete, 8vo., Bonn. 1821, p. 37; Ruhnus, De Metris Terent. p. 2705, ed. Putsch.) [W. R.]

EVARCHUS (Εὐαρχος), tyrant of the Acarnanian town of Astacus in the first year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 431, was ejected by the Athenians in the summer and reinstated in the winter by the Corinthians. (Thuc. i. 80, 83.) Nothing is mentioned further either of him or of Astacus, but it is probable that the Athenian interest was soon restored. (Comp. i. 102.) [A. H. C.]

EVATHLUS (Εὐαθλος). 1. An Athenian sycophant and sorry orator, mentioned by Aristophanes. (Acharn. 710, Vesp. 590, and Schol.) He was likewise attacked by Plato and Cratinus.

2. A wealthy young Athenian, who placed himself under the tuition of Protagoras, for the purpose of learning the art of oratory, promising him a large sum for his instructions. (According to Quintilian, iii. 1. § 10, he paid him 10,000 drachmæ.) An amusing story is told by A. Gellius (v. 10; comp. Diog. Laërt. ix. 56) of the way in which he evaded paying half the money he had promised. [C. P. M.]

EVAX, said to have been a king of Arabia, who is mentioned in some editions of Pliny (H. N. xiv. 4) as having written a work "De Simplicium Effectibus," addressed to Nero, that is, the emperor Tiberius, A. D. 14—37. This paragraph, however, is wanting in the best MSS., and has accordingly been omitted in most modern editions of Pliny. (See Salmas. Prolegom. ad Homon. Hyles latr. p. 15; Harduin's Notes to Pliny, l. c.) He is said by Marbodius (or Marbodæus), in the prologue to his poem on Precious Stones, to have written a work on this subject addressed to Tiberius, from which his own is partly taken. A Latin prose work, professing to belong to Evax, entitled "De Nominibus et Virtutibus Lapidum qui in Artem Medicinæ recipiuntur," is to be found in a MS. in the Bodleian library at Oxford (Hatton, 100), and probably in other European libraries. The work of Marbodius has been published and quoted under the name of Evax. (See Choulant, Handbuch der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, 2nd ed. art. Marbodius.) [W. A. G.]

EUBIUS (Εὐβιος). 1. A Stoic philosopher of Ascalon, who is mentioned only by Stephanus of Byzantium. (s. v. Ἀσκάλων.)

2. An author of obscene erotic stories (impuras conditor historiarum, Ov. Trist. ii. 416.) [L. S.]

EUBOEIA (Εὐβοία), a daughter of Asopus, from whom the island of Euboea was believed to have derived its name. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 278.) There are three other mythical personages of the same name. (Paus. ii. 17. § 2; Apollod. ii. 7. § 8; Athen. vii. p. 296.) [L. S.]

EUBOEUS (Εὐβόιος) of Paros, a very celebrated writer of parodies, who lived about the time of Philip of Macedonia. In his poems, which seem to have been written in the style of Homer, he ridiculed chiefly the Athenians. Euboeus and Boeotus are said to have excelled all other parodists. In the time of Athenaeus a collection of his Parodies in four books was still extant, but all of them are lost with the exception of a few short fragments. (Athen. xv. pp. 698, 699; comp. Weland, Dissert. de Parodiis Homeric. Scriptoris, p. 41. &c.) [L. S.]

EUBOTAS (Εὐβότας), a Cyrenaean, who gained a victory in the foot-race in Ol. xciii. (B. C. 408), and in the chariot-race in Ol. civ. (B. C. 364). There is considerable doubt as to the name. Diodorus calls him Εὐβόρος, Xenophon Εὐβόρας; nor is it quite clear whether Pausanias, where he mentions him, speaks of two victories gained at different Olympiads, or of a double victory gained on the second occasion. (Paus. vi. 8. § 3, 4. § 2; Diod. xiii. 68; Xen. Hellen. i. 2. § 1.) [C. P. M.]

EUBULÉUS (Εὐβούλες). 1. According to an Argive tradition, a son of Trochilus by an Eleusinian woman, and brother of Triptolemus; whereas, according to the Orphici, Eubuleus and Triptolemus were sons of Dysaules. (Paus. i. 14. § 2.)

2. One of the Tritopatores at Athens. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 21.)

Eubuleus occurs also as a surname of several divinities, and describes them as gods of good counsel, such as Hades and Dionysus. (Schol. ad Nicand. Alex. 14; Orph. Hymn. 71. 3; Macrobi. Sat. i. 18; Plut. Sympos. vii. 9.) [L. S.]

EUBULÉUS, a sculptor, whose name is inscribed on a headless Hermes. The inscription ΕΤΒΟΤΑΕΤΕ ΠΡΑΞΗΤΕΑΟΤΕ (sic in Winckelmann) makes him a son of Praxiteles; and, according to Meyer, there is no doubt that the great sculptor of that name is meant. The statue still exists, but in private hands. (Winckelmann, Geschichte d. Kunst, ix. 3. § 20; Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. vi. tab. 22, p. 142.) [P. S.]

EUBULIDES (Εὐβουλίδης). 1. An Athenian, who, having lost a cause, in which he was prosecutor, through the evidence given by a man named Euxitheus, revenged himself on the latter by getting a verdict passed in a very irregular manner by the members of his deme, that he was not an Athenian citizen. Euxitheus appealed to the dicasts of the Helisiae (see Dict. of Ant. & v. Appellatio, Greek), and succeeded in establishing his citizenship. A speech composed in his defence has come down to us among those of Demosthenes, but is, by some critics, perhaps without sufficient reason, attributed to Lyaias. (Dem. c. Eubulid. c. 5.)

2. An Athenian, son of Soitheus and Phylomache, but adopted by his maternal grandfather, Eubulidea. On his behalf a suit was commenced against a relative of the name of Macartatus, for the recovery of some property. He being still a boy, his father, Soithenus, appeared for him. Demosthenes wrote in his defence the speech πρὸς Μαρτυράσας.

The name Eubulides was borne by several others of this family, the genealogy of which it is rather difficult to make out; but it appears that Eubulides, the grandfather and adoptive father of the boy of the same name, was himself the grandson of another Eubulides, son of Buselus. (Dem. c. Macart. cc. 1-8.)

3. 4. Two individuals of the name of Eubulidas are mentioned as among the victims of the rapacity of Verres. One surnamed Grosphus, a native of Centuripee, the other a native of Herbita. (Cic. c. Verr. iii. 23, v. 42, 49.) [C. P. M.]

EUBULIDES (Εὐβουλίδης), of Miletus, a philosopher who belonged to the Megaric school. It is not stated whether he was the immediate or a later successor of Euclides (Diog. Laërt. ii. 108); nor is it said whether he was an elder or younger contemporary of Aristotle, against whom he wrote with great bitterness. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 109; Athen. vii. p. 354; Aristot. ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. xv. 2, p. 792.) The statement that Demosthenes availed himself of his dialectic instruction (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 845; Apul. Orat. de Mag. p. 18, ed. Bip.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 265, p. 493, ed. Bekk.) is alluded to also in a fragment of an anonymous comic poet. (ap. Diog. Laërt. ii. 108.) There is no mention of his having written any works, but he is said to have invented the forms of several of the most celebrated false and captious syllogisms (Diog. Laërt. l. c.), some of which, however, such as the διαλαύσις and the κερατίνης, were ascribed by others to the later Diodorus Cronus (Diog. Laërt. i. 111), and several of them are alluded to by Aristotle and even by Plato. Thus the εγκεκαλυμμένος, δωλεσθέντων or Ἡλέκτρα, which are different names for one and the same form of syllogism, as well as the ψευδόμενος and κερατίνης, occur in Aristotle (El. Soph. 24, 25, 22), and partially also in Plato (Euthyd. p. 276, comp. Theætet. pp. 165, 173.) We cannot indeed ascertain what motives Eubulides and other Megarics had in forming such syllogisms, nor in what form they were dressed up, on account of the scantiness of our information upon this portion of the history of Greek philosophy; but we may suppose, with the highest degree of probability, that they were directed especially against the sensualistic and hypothetical proceedings of the Stoics, and partly also against the definitions of Aristotle and the Platonists, and that they were intended to establish the Megaric doctrine of the simplicity of existence, which could be arrived at only by direct thought. (H. Ritter, Ueber die Megar. Schule, in Niebuhr und Brandis' Rhein. Mus. ii. p. 295, &c.; Brandis, Gesch. der Griech. Rhet. Philos. i. p. 122, &c.) Apollonius Cronus, the teacher of Diodorus Cronus, and the historian Euphranor, are mentioned as pupils of Eubulides. [Ch. A. B.]

EUBULIDES (Εὐβουλίδης), a statuary, who made a great votive offering, consisting of a group of thirteen statues, namely, Athena, Paconia, Zeus, Mnemosyne, the Muses, and Apollo, which he dedicated at Athens, in the temple of Dionysus, in the Comæciæ. (Paus. i. 2. § 4.) Pliny mentions his statue of one counting on his fingers (xxiv. 8, a. 13, § 29, according to Harduin's emendation). Eubulides had a son, EUCHEIR.

In the year 1837 the great group of Eubulides in the Cerameicus was discovered. Near it was a fragment of an inscription . . . ΧΕΙΡΟΣ ΚΡΟΠΙΔΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΗΣΕΝ. Another inscription was found near the Erechtheum, . . . ΧΕΙΡ ΚΑΙ ΕΥΒΟΥΛΙΔΗΣ ΚΡΟΠΙΔΑΙ ΕΠΟΙΗΣΑΝ. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. i. p. 504, No. 666, comp. Add. p. 916.) From a comparison of these inscriptions with each other and with Pausanias (viii. 14. § 4), it may be inferred that the first inscription should be thus completed: — ΕΥΒΟΥΛΙΔΗΣ ΕΥΧΕΙΡΟΣ ΚΡΟΠΙΔΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΗΣΕΝ, and that there was a family of artists of the Croepeian demes, of which three generations are known, namely, Eubulides, Eucheir, Eubulides. The architectural character of the monument and the forms of the letters, alike shew that these inscriptions must be referred to the time of the Roman dominion in Greece. (Ross, in the Kunstblatt, 1837, No. 93, &c.) Thiersch comes to a like conclusion on other grounds. (Epochen, p. 127.) [P. S.]

EUBULUS (Εὐβούλος), a son of Carmanor and father of Carme. (Paus. ii. 30. § 3.) This name likewise occurs as a surname of several divinities who were regarded as the authors of good counsel, or as well-disposed; though when applied to Hades, it is, like Eubuleus, a mere euphemism. (Orph. Hymn. 17. 12, 29. 6. 55. 8.) [L. S.]

EUBULUS, AURELIUS of Emesa, chief auditor of the exchequer (τοῦ καθάρου λόγου ἐπιτετραμμένος) under Elagabalus, rendered himself so odious by his rapacity and extortion, that upon the death of his patron the tyrant, he was torn to pieces by the soldiers and people, who had long clamorously demanded his destruction. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 21.) [W. R.]

EUBULUS, one of the commission of Nine appointed by Theodosius in A. D. 429 to compile a code upon a plan which was afterwards abandoned. He had before that date filled the office of magister scriniorum. In A. D. 435, he was named on the commission of Sixteen, which compiled the existing Theodosian code upon an altered plan. He then figures as comes and quaestor, with the titles illustris and magnificus. The emperor, however, in mentioning those who distinguished themselves in the composition of his code, does not signalize Eubulus. [Diodorus, vol. i. p. 1018.] [J. T. G.]

EUBULUS (Εὐβούλος), an Athenian, the son of Euphranor, of the Cettian demus, was a very distinguished comic poet of the middle comedy, flourished, according to Suidas (s. v.), in the 101st Olympiad, A. C. 373. If this date be correct (and it is confirmed by the statement that Philip, the son of Aristophanes, was one of his rivals), Eubulus must have exhibited comedies for a long series of years; for he ridiculed Callimedon, the contemporary of Demosthenes. (Athen. viii. p. 340, d.) It is clear, therefore, that Suidas is wrong in placing Eubulus on the confines of the Old and the Middle Comedy. He is expressly assigned by the author of the Etymologicum Magnum (p. 451. 30) and by Ammonius (s. v. ἔρδον) to the Middle Comedy, the duration of which begins very little before him, and extends to a period very little, if at all, after him.

His plays were chiefly on mythological subjects. Several of them contained parodies of passages from the tragic poets, and especially from Euripides. There are a few instances of his attacking eminent individuals by name, as Philocrates, Cydias, Callimedon, Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse, and Callistratus. He sometimes ridicules classes of persons, as the Thebans in his Ἀντίωπη.

His language is simple, elegant, and generally pure, containing few words which are not found in writers of the best period. Like Antiphanes, he was extensively pillaged by later poets, as, for example, by Alexis, Ophellion, and Ephippus.

Suidas gives the number of the plays of Eubulus at 104, of which there are extant more than 50 titles, namely, Ἀγκυλίων, Ἀγχίσις, Ἀμάλθεια, Ἀνασωζόμενοι, Ἀντίωπη, Ἀστυτοί, Ἀλγή, Βελλεροφόντης, Γανυμήδης, Γλαῦκος, Δαίδαλος, Δαμαλίας is a corrupt title (Suid. s. v. Ἀσκολιδεύειν), for which Meineke would read Δαμασίας, Δευκαλίων, Διονύσιος, in which he appears to have been ridiculed the confusion which prevailed in all the arrangements of the palace of Dionysius (Schol. ad Aristoph. Theam. 136), Διδύμους, or, according to the fuller title (Athen. xi. p. 460, e.), Σεμέλη ἢ Διδύμους, Δόλων, Εἰρήνη, Εὐρόπη, Ἥχολ, Ἰέλιον, Ἴων, Καλαθοφόρος, Καμπυλίω (doubtful), Κατακολλόμενος (doubtful), Κερκῆες, Κλεφδρα, Κορυδαλός, Κυβευταί, Λάκωνες ἢ Λήδα, Μήδεια, Μυλωθρίς, Μυσοί, Νάννιον, Ναυσικία, Νεοτρίς, Ξούθος, Ὀδυσσεύς, ἢ Πανόπται, Οἰδίπους, Οἰνόμενος ἢ Πέλοψ, Ὀλβία, Ὀρβάνης, Πάμφιλος, Παννυχίς, Παρμενίσκος, Παλγών, Πορροδοσκός, Προκρίς, Προσούσια ἢ Κύκνος, Σεφρονοτάλιδες, Σφρυγγοκαρίων, Τιθάει, Τιτάνας, Φοίνιξ, Χάρτες, Χρυσίλλα, Ψάδτρια. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 355—367, vol. iii. pp. 205—272; Clinton, Fast. Hell. sub ann. v. c. 375; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 442—444.) [P. S.]

EUCADMUS (Εὐκαδμος), an Athenian sculptor, the teacher of ΑΝΔΡΟΣΘΕΝΗΣ. (Paus. x. 19. § 3.) [P. S.]

EUCAMPIDAS (Εὐκαμπίδας), less properly EUCALPIDAS (Εὐκαλπίδας), an Arcadian of Maenalus, is mentioned by Demosthenes as one of those who, for the sake of private gain, became the instruments of Philip of Macedon in sapping the independence of their country. Polybius censures Demosthenes for his injustice in bringing so sweeping a charge against a number of distinguished men, and defends the Arcadians and Messenians in particular for their connexion with Philip. At the worst, he says, they are chargeable only with an error of judgment, in not seeing what was best for their country; and he thinks that, even in this point, they were justified by the result,—as if the result might not have been different, had they taken a different course. (Dem. de Cor. pp. 245, 324; Polyb. xvii. 14.) [CINEAS.] Eucampidas is mentioned by Pausanias (viii. 27) as one of those who led the Maenalian settlers to Megalopolis, to form part of the population of the new city, v. c. 371. [E. E.]

EUCHEIR (Εὐχεῖρ), is one of those names of Grecian artists, which are first used in the mythological period, on account of their significance, but which were afterwards given to real persons. [CHERISOPHUS.] 1. Eucheir, a relation of Daealus, and the inventor of painting in Greece, according to Aristotle, is no doubt only a mythical personage. (Plin. vii. 56.)

2. Eucheir, of Corinth, who, with Eugrammus, followed Demaratus into Italy (a. c. 664), and introduced the plastic art into Italy, should probably be considered also a mythical personage, designating the period of Etruscan art to which the earliest painted vases belong. (Plin. xxxv. 12. s.

43, comp. xxv. 5; Thiersch, Epoche, pp. 165, 166; Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 75.) At all events, there appear to have been families of artists, both at Corinth and at Athens, in which the name was hereditary. The following are known.

3. Eucheirus (Εὐχεῖρος, for so Pausanias gives the name) of Corinth, a statuary, was the pupil of Syadras and Chartas, of Sparta, and the teacher of Clearchus of Rhegium. (Paus. vi. 4. § 2.) He must therefore have flourished about the 65th or 66th Olympiad, v. c. 520 or 516. [CHARTAS, PYTHAGORAS OF RHEGIUM.] This is probably the Euchir whom Pliny mentions among those who made statues of athletes, &c. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 34.)

4. Eucheir, the son of Eubulides, of Athens, a sculptor, made the marble statue of Hermes, in his temple at Pheneus in Arcadia. (Paus. viii. 14. § 7.) Something more is known of him through inscriptions discovered at Athens, in reference to which see EUBULIDES. [P. S.]

EUCHEIRUS, statuary. [EUCHEIR, No. 3.]

EUCHE'NOR (Εὐχένωρ), a son of Coeranus and grandson of Polydus of Megara. He took part in the Trojan war, and was killed. (Paus. i. 43. § 5.) In Homer (Il. xii. 663) he is called a son of the seer Polydus of Corinth. There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1839.) [L. S.]

EUCHERIA, the authoress of sixteen elegiac couplets, in which she gives vent to the indignation excited by the proposals of an unworthy suitor—stringing together a long series of the most absurd and unnatural combinations, all of which are to be considered as fitting and appropriate in comparison with such an union. The idea of the piece was evidently suggested by the Virgilian lines

Mopso Nisa datur; quid non speremus amantes?

Jungentur jam grypes equis; aevoque sequenti Cum canibus timidi venient ad pocula damae, while in tone and spirit it bears some resemblance to the Ibis ascribed to Ovid, and to the Dirae of Valerius Cato. The presumptuous wooer is called a rusticus servus, by which we must clearly understand, not a slave in the Roman acceptation of the term, but one of those villani or serfs who, according to the ancient practice in Germany and Gaul, were considered as part of the live stock indissolubly bound to the soil which they cultivated. From this circumstance, from the introduction here and there of a barbarous word, from the fact that most of the original MSS. of these verses were found in France, and that the name of Eucherius was common in that country in the fifth and sixth centuries, we may form a guess as to the period when this poetess flourished, and as to the land of her nativity; but we possess no evidence which can entitle us to speak with any degree of confidence. (Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. lxxv. and p. 97, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 827, vol. v. pt. iii. p. 1458; Burmann, Anthol. Lat. v. 133, or n. 385, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

EUCHERIUS, bishop of Lyons, was born, during the latter half of the fourth century, of an illustrious family. His father Valerianus is by many believed to be the Valerianus who about this period held the office of Praefectus Galliae, and was a near relation of the emperor Avitus. Eucherius married Gallia, a lady not inferior to himself in station, by whom he had two sons, Salonius and Veranius, and two daughters, Consortia and Tullia. About the year A. D. 410, while still in the vigour of his age, he determined to retire from the world, and accordingly betook himself, with his wife and family, first to Lerina (Lerinum), and from thence to the neighbouring island of Lero or St. Margaret, where he lived the life of a hermit, devoting himself to the education of his children, to literature, and to the exercises of religion. During his retirement in this secluded spot, he acquired so high a reputation for learning and sanctity, that he was chosen bishop of Lyons about A. D. 434, a dignity enjoyed by him until his death, which is believed to have happened in 450, under the emperors Valentinianus III. and Marcianus. Venerius was appointed his successor in the episcopal chair, while Salonius became the head of the church at Geneva.

The following works bear the name of this prelate: 1. De laude Eremi, written about the year A. D. 428, in the form of an epistle to Hilarius of Arles. It would appear that Eucherius, in his passion for a solitary life, had at one time formed the project of visiting Egypt, that he might profit by the bright example of the anchorites who thronged the deserts near the Nile. He requested information from Cassianus [CASSIANUS], who replied by addressing to him some of those collationes in which are painted in such lively colours the habits and rules pursued by the monks and eremites of the Thebaid. The enthusiasm excited by these details called forth the letter bearing the above title.

2. Epistola perænetica ad Valerianum cognatum de contentis mundi et secularis philosophiæ, composed about A. D. 432, in which the author endeavours to detach his wealthy and magnificent kinsman from the pomps and vanities of the world. An edition with scholia was published by Erasmus at Basle in 1520.

3. Liber formularum spiritualis intelligentiæ ad Verianum filium, or, as the title sometimes appears, De forma spiritalis intellectus, divided into eleven chapters, containing an exposition of many phrases and texts in Scripture upon allegorical, typical, and mystical principles.

4. Instructionum Libri II. ad Salonium filium. The first book treats "De Questionibus difficultioribus Veteris et Novi Testamenti," the second contains "Explicationes nominum Hebraicorum."

5. Homiliæ. Those, namely, published by Livinius at the end of the "Sermones Catechetici Theodori Studitæ," Antwerp, 8vo. 1602.

The authenticity of the following is very doubtful.

6. Historia Passionis S. Mauricii et Sociorum Meritum Legionis Felicis Thebaeae Agoumenisium.

7. Echortatio ad Monachos, the first of three printed by Holstenius in his "Codex Regularum," Romæ. 1661, p. 89.

8. Epitome Operum Cassiani.

The following are certainly spurious: 1. Commentarius in Genesis. 2. Commentarium in libro Regum Libri IV. 3. Epistola ad Faustinum. 4. Epistola ad Philonem. 5. Regula duplex ad Monachos. 6. Homiliarum Collectio, ascribed in some of the larger collections of the Fathers to Eusebius of Emesa, in others to Gallicanus. Eucherius is, however, known to have composed many homilies; but, with the exception of those mentioned above (5), they are believed to have perished.

No complete collection of the works of Eucherius has ever been published. The various editions of the separate tracts are carefully enumerated by Schönmann, and the greater number of them will be found in the "Chronologia S. insulæ Lerinensis," by Vincentius Barralis, Lugdun. 4to. 1613; in "D. Eucherii Lug. Episc. doctias. Lucubrationes cura Joannis Alexandri Brassicani," Basil. fol. 1531; in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Colon. fol. 1618, vol. v. p. 1; and in the Bibl. Pat. Max. Lugdun. fol. 1677, vol. vi. p. 822. (Gennad. de Viris. Ill. c. 63; Schoenemann, Bibl. Patrum. Lat. ii. § 36.)

This Eucherius must not be confounded with another Gaulish prelate of the same name who flourished during the early part of the sixth century, and was a member of ecclesiastical councils held in Gaul during the years A. D. 524, 527, 529. The latter, although a bishop, was certainly not bishop of Lyons. See Jos. Antelmius, Assertio pro unico S. Eucherio Lugdunensi episcopo, Paris, 4to. 1726.

There is yet another Eucherius who was bishop of Orleans in the eighth century. [W. R.]

EUCLEIA (Εὐκλεία), a divinity who was worshipped at Athens, and to whom a sanctuary was dedicated there out of the spoils which the Athenians had taken in the battle of Marathon. (Paus. i. 14. § 4.) The goddess was only a personification of the glory which the Athenians had reaped in the day of that memorable battle. (Comp. Böckh, Corp. Inscript. n. 258.) Eucleia was also used at Athens as a surname of Artemis, and her sanctuary was of an earlier date, for Euechidas died in it. (Plut. Arist. 20; EUCRIDAS.) Plutarch remarks, that many took Eucleia for Artemis, and thus made her the same as Artemis Eucleia, but that others described her as a daughter of Hercules and Myrto, a daughter of Menoetius; and he adds that this Eucleia died as a maiden, and was worshipped in Boeotia and Locris, where she had an altar and a statue in every market-place, on which persons on the point of marrying used to offer sacrifices to her. Whether and what connexion there existed between the Attic and Boeotian Eucleia is unknown, though it is probable that the Attic divinity was, as is remarked above, a mere personification, and consequently quite independent of Eucleia, the daughter of Hercules. Artemis Eucleia had also a temple at Thebes. (Paus. ix. 17. § 1.) [L. S.]

EUCLEIDES (Εὐκλείδης) of ALEXANDRIA. The length of this article will not be blamed by any one who considers that, the sacred writers excepted, no Greek has been so much read or so variously translated as Euclid. To this it may be added, that there is hardly any book in our language in which the young scholar or the young mathematician can find all the information about this name which its celebrity would make him desire to have.

Euclid has almost given his own name to the science of geometry, in every country in which his writings are studied; and yet all we know of his private history amounts to very little. He lived, according to Proclus (Comm. in Eucl. ii. 4), in the time of the first Ptolemy, A. C. 323—283. The forty years of Ptolemy's reign are probably those of Euclid's age, not of his youth; for had he been trained in the school of Alexandria formed by Ptolemy, who invited thither men of note, Proclus would probably have given us the name of his teacher: but tradition rather makes Euclid the founder of the Alexandrian mathematical school than its pupil. This point is very material to the formation of a just opinion of Euclid's writings; he was, we see, a younger contemporary of Aristotle (s. c. 384—322) if we suppose him to have been of mature age when Ptolemy began to patronise literature: and on this supposition it is not likely that Aristotle's writings, and his logic in particular, should have been read by Euclid in his youth, if at all. To us it seems almost certain, from the structure of Euclid's writings, that he had not read Aristotle: on this supposition, we pass over, as perfectly natural, things which, on the contrary one, would have seemed to shew great want of judgment.

Euclid, says Proclus, was younger than Plato, and older than Eratosthenes and Archimedes, the latter of whom mentions him. He was of the Platonic sect, and well read in its doctrines. He collected the Elements, put into order much of what Eudoxus had done, completed many things of Theaetetus, and was the first who reduced to unobjectionable demonstration the imperfect attempts of his predecessors. It was his answer to Ptolemy, who asked if geometry could not be made easier, that there was no royal road (μη εἶναι βασιλικὴν ὁδὸν πρὸς γεωμετρίαν).* This piece of wit has had many imitators; "Quel diable" said a French nobleman to Rohault, his teacher of geometry, "pourrait entendre cela?" to which the answer was "Ce serait un diable qui aurait de la patience." A story similar to that of Euclid is related by Seneca (Ep. 91, cited by August) of Alexander.

Pappus (lib. vii. in præf.) states that Euclid was distinguished by the fairness and kindness of his disposition, particularly towards those who could do anything to advance the mathematical sciences: but as he is here evidently making a contrast to Apollonius, of whom he more than insinuates a directly contrary character, and as he lived more than four centuries after both, it is difficult to give credence to his means of knowing so much about either. At the same time we are to remember that he had access to many records which are now lost. On the same principle, perhaps, the account of Nasir-eddin and other Easterns is not to be entirely rejected, who state that Euclid was sprung of Greek parents, settled at Tyre; that he lived, at one time, at Damascus; that his father's name was Naucratus, and grandfather's Zenarchus. (August, who cites Gartz, De Interpr. Eucl. Arab.) It is against this account that Eutocius of Ascalon never hints at it.

At one time Euclid was universally confounded with Euclid of Megara, who lived near a century before him, and heard Socrates. Valerius Maximus has a story (viii. 12) that those who came to Plato about the construction of the celebrated Delian altar were referred by him to Euclid the geometer. This story, which must needs be false, since Euclid of Megara, the contemporary of Plato, was not a geometer, is probably the origin of the confusion.

* This celebrated anecdote breaks off in the middle of the sentence in the Beale edition of Proclus. Barocius, who had better manuscripts, supplies the Latin of it; and Sir Henry Savile, who had manuscripts of all kinds in his own library, quotes it as above, with only ἔτι for πρὸς. August, in his edition of Euclid, has given this chapter of Proclus in Greek, but without saying from whence he has taken it.

Harless thinks that Eudoxus should be read for Euclid in the passage of Valerius.

In the frontispiece to Whiston's translation of Tacquet's Euclid there is a bust, which is said to be taken from a brass coin in the possession of Christina of Sweden; but no such coin appears in the published collection of those in the cabinet of the queen of Sweden. Sidonius Apollinarius says (Epist. xi. 9) that it was the custom to paint Euclid with the fingers extended (aratis), as if in the act of measurement.

The history of geometry before the time of Euclid is given by Proclus, in a manner which shews that he is merely making a summary of well known or at least generally received facts. He begins with the absurd stories so often repeated, that the Aegyptians were obliged to invent geometry in order to recover the landmarks which the Nile destroyed year by year, and that the Phoenicians were equally obliged to invent arithmetic for the wants of their commerce. Thales, he goes on to say, brought this knowledge into Greece, and added many things, attempting some in a general manner (καθολικώτερον) and some in a perceptive or sensible manner (αἰσθητικώτερον). Proclus clearly refers to physical discovery in geometry, by measurement of instances. Next is mentioned Ameristius, the brother of Stesichorus the poet. Then Pythagoras changed it into the form of a liberal science (καθεύειας ἐλευθέρου), took higher views of the subject, and investigated his theorems immaterially and intellectually (ἀδύναμι καὶ νοεῶν): he also wrote on incommensurable quantities (ἀδύγων), and on the mundane figures (the five regular solids).

Barocius, whose Latin edition of Proclus has been generally followed, singularly enough translates ἀλογα by quæ non explicari possunt, and Taylor follows him with "such things as cannot be explained." It is strange that two really learned editors of Euclid's commentator should have been ignorant of one of Euclid's technical terms. Then come Anaxagoras of Clazomenæ, and a little after him Oenopides of Chios; then Hippocrates of Chios, who squared the lunule, and then Theodorus of Cyrene. Hippocrates is the first writer of elements who is recorded. Plato then did much for geometry by the mathematical character of his writings; then Leodamos of Thasus, Archytas of Tarentum, and Theaetetus of Athens, gave a more scientific basis (ἐπιστημονικώτερον σῶστατον) to various theorems; Neocleides and his disciple Leon came after the preceding, the latter of whom increased both the extent and utility of the science, in particular by finding a test (διαρίσμων) of whether the thing proposed be possible* or impossible. Eudoxus of Cnidus, a little younger than Leon, and the companion of those about Plato [Eudoxus], increased the number of general theorems, added three proportions to the three already existing, and in the things which concern the section (of the cone, no doubt) which was started by Plato himself, much increased their number, and employed analyses upon them. Amyclas Heracleotes, the companion of Plato, Menæchmus, the disciple of Eudoxus and of Plato, and his brother Deinostratus, made geometry more perfect. Theudius of Magnesia generalized many particular propositions. Cysicius of Athens was his contemporary; they took different sides on many common inquiries. Hermotimus of Colophon added to what had been done by Eudoxus and Theaetetus, discovered elementary propositions, and wrote something on loci. Philip (of Mercurius, others read Medusius, Barocius reads Mendaceus), the follower of Plato, made many mathematical inquiries connected with his master's philosophy. Those who write on the history of geometry bring the completion of this science thus far. Here Proclus expressly refers to written history, and in another place he particularly mentions the history of Eudemus the Peripatetic.

This history of Proclus has been much kept in the background, we should almost say discredited, by editors, who seem to wish it should be thought that a finished and unassailable system sprung at once from the brain of Euclid; an armed Minerva from the head of a Jupiter. But Proclus, as much a worshipper as any of them, must have had the same bias, and is therefore particularly worthy of confidence when he cites written history as to what was not done by Euclid. Make the most we can of his preliminaries, still the thirteen books of the Elements must have been a tremendous advance, probably even greater than that contained in the Principia of Newton. But still, to bring the state of our opinion of this progress down to something short of painful wonder, we are told that demonstration had been given, that something had been written on proportion, something on incommensurables, something on loci, something on solids; that analysis had been applied, that the conic sections had been thought of, that the Elements had been distinguished from the rest and written on. From what Hippocrates had done, we know that the important property of the right-angled triangle was known; we rely much more on the lunules than on the story about Pythagoras. The dispute about the famous Delian problem had arisen, and some conventional limit to the instruments of geometry must have been adopted; for on keeping within them, the difficulty of this problem depends.

It will be convenient to speak separately of the Elements of Euclid, as to their contents; and afterwards to mention them bibliographically, among the other writings. The book which passes under this name, as given by Robert Simson, unexceptionable as Elements of Geometry, is not calculated to give the scholar a proper idea of the elements of Euclid; but it is admirably adapted to confuse, in the mind of the young student, all those notions of sound criticism which his other instructors are endeavouring to instil. The idea that Euclid must be perfect had got possession of the geometrical world; accordingly each editor, when he made what he took to be an alteration for the better, assumed that he was restoring, not amending, the original. If the books of Livy were to be re-written upon the basis of Niebuhr, and the result declared to be the real text, then Livy would no more than share the fate of Euclid; the only difference being, that the former would undergo a larger quantity of alteration than editors have seen fit to inflict upon the latter. This is no caricature; e.g., Euclid, says Robert Simson, gave, without doubt, a definition of compound ratio at the beginning of the fifth book, and accordingly he there inserts, not merely a definition, but he assures us, the very one which Euclid gave. Not a single manuscript supports him: how, then, did he know? He saw that there ought to have been such a definition, and he concluded that, therefore, there had been one. Now we by no means uphold Euclid as an all-sufficient guide to geometry, though we feel that it is to himself that we owe the power of amending his writings; and we hope we may protest against the assumption that he could not have erred, whether by omission or commission.

First. There is a total absence of distinction between the various ways in which we know the meaning of terms: certainty, and nothing more, is the thing sought. The definition of straightness, an idea which it is impossible to put into simpler words, and which is therefore described by a more difficult circumlocution, comes under the same heading as the explanation of the word "parallel." Hence disputes about the correctness or incorrectness of many of the definitions.

Secondly. There is no distinction between propositions which require demonstration, and those which a logician would see to be nothing but different modes of stating a preceding proposition. When Euclid has proved that everything which is not A is not B, he does not hold himself entitled to infer that every B is A, though the two propositions are identically the same. Thus, having shewn that every point of a circle which is not the centre is not one from which three equal straight lines can be drawn, he cannot infer that any point from which three equal straight lines are drawn is the centre, but has need of a new demonstration. Thus, long before he wants to use book i. prop. 6, he has proved it again, and independently.

Thirdly. He has not the smallest notion of admitting any generalized use of a word, or of parting with any ordinary notion attached to it. Setting out with the conception of an angle rather as the sharp corner made by the meeting of two lines than as the magnitude which he afterwards shews how to measure, he never gets rid of that corner, never admits two right angles to make one angle, and still less is able to arrive at the idea of an angle greater than two right angles. And when, in the last proposition of the sixth book, his definition of proportion absolutely requires that he should reason on angles of even more than four right angles, he takes no notice of this necessity, and no one can tell whether it was an oversight, whether Euclid thought the extension one which the student could make for himself, or whether (which has sometimes struck us as not unlikely) the elements were his last work, and he did not live to revise them.

In one solitary case, Euclid seems to have made an omission implying that he recognized that natural extension of language by which unity is considered as a number, and Simson has thought it necessary to supply the omission (see his book v. prop. A), and has shewn himself more Euclid than Euclid upon the point of all others in which Euclid's philosophy is defective.

Fourthly. There is none of that attention to the forms of accuracy with which translators have endeavoured to invest the Elements, thereby giving them that appearance which has made many teachers think it meritorious to insist upon their pupils remembering the very words of Simson. Theorems are found among the definitions: assump- tions are made which are not formally set down among the postulates. Things which really ought to have been proved are sometimes passed over, and whether this is by mistake, or by intention of supposing them self-evident, cannot now be known : for Euclid never refers to previous propositions by name or number, but only by simple re-assertion without reference ; except that occasionally, and chiefly when a negative proposition is referred to, such words as "it has been demonstrated" are employed, without further specification.

Fifthly. Euclid never condescends to hint at the reason why he finds himself obliged to adopt any particular course. Be the difficulty ever so great, he removes it without mention of its existence. Accordingly, in many places, the unassisted student can only see that much trouble is taken, without being able to guess why.

What, then, it may be asked, is the peculiar merit of the Elements which has caused them to retain their ground to this day? The answer is, that the preceding objections refer to matters which can be easily mended, without any alteration of the main parts of the work, and that no one has ever given so easy and natural a chain of geometrical consequences. There is a never erring truth in the results ; and, though there may be here and there a self-evident assumption used in demonstration, but not formally noted, there is never any the smallest departure from the limitations of construction which geometers had, from the time of Plato, imposed upon themselves. The strong inclination of editors, already mentioned, to consider Euclid as perfect, and all negligences as the work of unskilful commentators or interpolators, is in itself a proof of the approximate truth of the character they give the work ; to which it may be added that editors in general prefer Euclid as he stands to the alterations of other editors.

The Elements consist of thirteen books written by Euclid, and two of which it is supposed that Hypsicles is the author. The first four and the sixth are on plane geometry ; the fifth is on the theory of proportion, and applies to magnitude in general ; the seventh, eighth, and ninth, are on arithmetic ; the tenth is on the arithmetical characteristics of the divisions of a straight line ; the eleventh and twelfth are on the elements of solid geometry ; the thirteenth (and also the fourteenth and fifteenth) are on the regular solids, which were so much studied among the Platonists as to bear the name of Platonic, and which, according to Proclus, were the objects on which the Elements were really meant to be written.

At the commencement of the first book, under the name of definitions (ὅροι), are contained the assumption of such notions as the point, line, &c., and a number of verbal explanations. Then follow, under the name of postulates or demands (αἰτήματα), all that it is thought necessary to state as assumed in geometry. There are six postulates, three of which restrict the amount of construction granted to the joining two points by a straight line, the indefinite lengthening of a terminated straight line, and the drawing of a circle with a given centre, and a given distance measured from that centre as a radius ; the other three assume the equality of all right angles, the much disputed property of two lines, which meet a third at angles less than two right angles (we mean, of course, much disputed as to its propriety as an assumption, not as to its truth), and that two straight lines cannot inclose a space. Lastly, under the name of common notions (κοινὰί νομοί) are given, either as common to all men or to all sciences, such assertions as that—things equal to the same are equal to one another—the whole is greater than its part—&c. Modern editors have put the last three postulates at the end of the common notions, and applied the term axiom (which was not used till after Euclid) to them all. The intention of Euclid seems to have been, to distinguish between that which his reader must grant, or seek another system, whatever may be his opinion as to the propriety of the assumption, and that which there is no question every one will grant. The modern editor merely distinguishes the assumed problem (or construction) from the assumed theorem. Now there is no such distinction in Euclid as that of problem and theorem ; the common term πρότασις, translated proposition, includes both, and is the only one used. An immense preponderance of manuscripts, the testimony of Proclus, the Arabic translations, the summary of Boethius, place the assumptions about right angles and parallels (and most of them, that about two straight lines) among the postulates ; and this seems most reasonable, for it is certain that the first two assumptions can have no claim to rank among common notions or to be placed in the same list with "the whole is greater than its part."

Without describing minutely the contents of the first book of the Elements, we may observe that there is an arrangement of the propositions, which will enable any teacher to divide it into sections. Thus prop. 1—3 extend the power of construction to the drawing of a circle with any centre and any radius ; 4—8 are the basis of the theory of equal triangles ; 9—12 increase the power of construction ; 13—15 are solely on relations of angles ; 16—21 examine the relations of parts of one triangle ; 22—23 are additional constructions ; 23—26 augment the doctrine of equal triangles ; 27—31 contain the theory of parallels ; * 32 stands alone, and gives the relation between the angles of a triangle ; 33—34 give the first properties of a parallelogram ; 35—41 consider parallelograms and triangles of equal areas, but different forms ; 42—46 apply what precedes to augmenting power of construction ; 47—48 give the celebrated property of a right angled triangle and its converse. The other books are all capable of a similar species of subdivision.

The second book shews those properties of the rectangles contained by the parts of divided straight lines, which are so closely connected with the common arithmetical operations of multiplication and division, that a student or a teacher who is not fully alive to the existence and difficulty of incommensurables is apt to think that common arithmetic would be as rigorous as geometry. Euclid knew better.

The third book is devoted to the consideration of the properties of the circle, and is much cramped in several places by the imperfect idea already alluded to, which Euclid took of an angle. There are some places in which he clearly drew upon experimental knowledge of the form of a circle, and made tacit assumptions of a kind which are rarely met with in his writings.

The fourth book treats of regular figures. Euclid's original postulates of construction give him, by this time, the power of drawing them of 3, 4, 5, and 15 sides, or of double, quadruple, &c., any of these numbers, as 6, 12, 24, &c., 8, 16, &c. &c.

The fifth book is on the theory of proportion. It refers to all kinds of magnitude, and is wholly independent of those which precede. The existence of incommensurable quantities obliges him to introduce a definition of proportion which seems at first not only difficult, but uncouth and inelegant; those who have examined other definitions know that all which are not defective are but various readings of that of Euclid. The reasons for this difficult definition are not alluded to, according to his custom; few students therefore understand the fifth book at first, and many teachers decidedly object to make it a part of the course. A distinction should be drawn between Euclid's definition and his manner of applying it. Every one who understands it must see that it is an application of arithmetic, and that the defective and unwieldy forms of arithmetical expression which never were banished from Greek science, need not be the necessary accompaniments of the modern use of the fifth book. For ourselves, we are satisfied that the only rigorous road to proportion is either through the fifth book, or else through something much more difficult than the fifth book need be.

The sixth book applies the theory of proportion, and adds to the first four books the propositions which, for want of it, they could not contain. It discusses the theory of figures of the same form, technically called similar. To give an idea of the advance which it makes, we may state that the first book has for its highest point of constructive power the formation of a rectangle upon a given base, equal to a given rectilinear figure; that the second book enables us to turn this rectangle into a square; but the sixth book empowers us to make a figure of any given rectilinear shape equal to a rectilinear figure of given size, or briefly, to construct a figure of the form of one given figure, and of the size of another. It also supplies the geometrical form of the solution of a quadratic equation.

The seventh, eighth, and ninth books cannot have their subjects usefully separated. They treat of arithmetic, that is, of the fundamental properties of numbers, on which the rules of arithmetic must be founded. But Euclid goes further than is necessary merely to construct a system of computation, about which the Greeks had little anxiety. He is able to succeed in shewing that numbers which are prime to one another are the least in their ratio, to prove that the number of primes is infinite, and to point out the rule for constructing what are called perfect numbers. When the modern systems began to prevail, these books of Euclid were abandoned to the antiquary: our elementary books of arithmetic, which till lately were all, and now are mostly, systems of mechanical rules, tell us what would have become of geometry if the earlier books had shared the same fate.

The tenth book is the development of all the power of the preceding ones, geometrical and arithmetical. It is one of the most curious of the Greek speculations: the reader will find a synoptical account of it in the Penny Cyclopaedia article, "Irrational Quantities." Euclid has evidently in his mind the intention of classifying incommensurable quantities: perhaps the circumference of the circle, which we know had been an object of inquiry, was suspected of being incommensurable with its diameter; and hopes were perhaps entertained that a searching attempt to arrange the incommensurables which ordinary geometry presents might enable the geometer to say finally to which of them, if any, the circle belongs. However this may be, Euclid investigates, by isolated methods, and in a manner which, unless he had a concealed algebra, is more astonishing to us than anything in the Elements, every possible variety of lines which can be represented by  $\sqrt{(\sqrt{a} \pm \sqrt{b})}$ ,  $a$  and  $b$  representing two commensurable lines. He divides lines which can be represented by this formula into 23 species, and he succeeds in detecting every possible species. He shews that every individual of every species is incommensurable with all the individuals of every other species; and also that no line of any species can belong to that species in two different ways, or for two different sets of values of  $a$  and  $b$ . He shews how to form other classes of incommensurables, in number how many soever, no one of which can contain an individual line which is commensurable with an individual of any other class; and he demonstrates the incommensurability of a square and its diagonal. This book has a completeness which none of the others (not even the fifth) can boast of: and we could almost suspect that Euclid, having arranged his materials in his own mind, and having completely elaborated the tenth book, wrote the preceding books after it, and did not live to revise them thoroughly.

The eleventh and twelfth books contain the elements of solid geometry, as to prisms, pyramids, &c. The duplicate ratio of the diameters is shewn to be that of two circles, the triplicate ratio that of two spheres. Instances occur of the method of exhaustions, as it has been called, which in the hands of Archimedes became an instrument of discovery, producing results which are now usually referred to the differential calculus: while in those of Euclid it was only the mode of proving propositions which must have been seen and believed before they were proved. The method of these books is clear and elegant, with some striking imperfections, which have caused many to abandon them, even among those who allow no substitute for the first six books. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth books are on the five regular solids: and even had they all been written by Euclid (the last two are attributed to Hypsicles), they would but ill bear out the assertion of Proclus, that the regular solids were the objects with a view to which the Elements were written: unless indeed we are to suppose that Euclid died before he could complete his intended structure. Proclus was an enthusiastic Platonist: Euclid was of that school; and the former accordingly attributes to the latter a particular regard for what were sometimes called the Platonic bodies. But we think that the author himself of the Elements could hardly have considered them as a mere introduction to a favourite speculation: if he were so blind, we have every reason to suppose that his own contemporaries could have set him right. From various indications, it can be collected that the fame of the Elements was almost coeval with their publication; and by the time of Marinus we learn from that writer that Euclid was called νόμιος στοιχείων.

The Data of Euclid should be mentioned in connection with the Elements. This is a book containing a hundred propositions of a peculiar and limited intent. Some writers have professed to see in it a key to the geometrical analysis of the ancients, in which they have greatly the advantage of us. When there is a problem to solve, it is undoubtedly advantageous to have a rapid perception of the steps which will reach the result, if they can be successively made. Given A, B, and C, to find D: one person may be completely at a loss how to proceed; another may see almost intuitively that when A, B, and C are given, E can be found; from which it may be that the first person, had he perceived it, would have immediately found D. The formation of data consequential, as our ancestors would perhaps have called them, things not absolutely given, but the gift of which is implied in, and necessarily follows from, that which is given, is the object of the hundred propositions above mentioned. Thus, when a straight line of given length is intercepted between two given parallels, one of these propositions shows that the angle it makes with the parallels is given in magnitude. There is not much more in this book of Data than an intelligent student picks up from the Elements themselves; on which account we cannot consider it as a great step in geometrical analysis. The operations of thought which it requires are indispensable, but they are contained elsewhere. At the same time we cannot deny that the Data might have fixed in the mind of a Greek, with greater strength than the Elements themselves, notions upon consequential data which the moderns acquire from the application of arithmetic and algebra: perhaps it was the perception of this which dictated the opinion about the value of the book of Data in analysis.

While on this subject, it may be useful to remind the reader how difficult it is to judge of the character of Euclid's writings, as far as his own merits are concerned, ignorant as we are of the precise purpose with which any one was written. For instance: was he merely shewing his contemporaries that a connected system of demonstration might be made without taking more than a certain number of postulates out of a collection, the necessity of each of which had been advocated by some and denied by others? We then understand why he placed his six postulates in the prominent position which they occupy, and we can find no fault with his tacit admission of many others, the necessity of which had perhaps never been questioned. But if we are to consider him as meaning to be what his commentators have taken him to be, a model of the most scrupulous formal rigour, we can then deny that he has altogether succeeded, though we may admit that he has made the nearest approach.

The literary history of the writings of Euclid would contain that of the rise and progress of geometry in every Christian and Mohammedan nation: our notice, therefore, must be but slight, and various points of it will be confirmed by the bibliographical account which will follow.

In Greece, including Asia Minor, Alexandria, and the Italian colonies, the Elements soon became the universal study of geometers. Commentators were not wanting; Proclus mentions Heron and Pappus, and Aeneas of Hierapolis, who made an epitome of the whole. Theon the younger (of Alexandria) lived a little before Proclus (who died about A. D. 485). The latter has made his feeble commentary on the first book valuable by its historical information, and was something of a luminary in ages more dark than his own. But Theon was a light of another sort, and his name has played a conspicuous and singular part in the history of Euclid's writings. He gave a new edition of Euclid, with some slight additions and alterations: he tells us so himself, and uses the word ἐκδοσις, as applied to his own edition, in his commentary on Ptolemy. He also informs us that the part which relates to the sectors in the last proposition of the sixth book is his own addition: and it is found in all the manuscripts following the ὅρεσι δέει δέξασθαι with which Euclid always ends. Alexander Aphrodisiensis (Comment. in priora Analyt. Aristot.) mentions as the fourth of the tenth book that which is the fifth in all manuscripts. Again, in several manuscripts the whole work is headed as ἐκ τῶν ὁρίων συνωρισμένων. We shall presently see to what this led: but now we must remark that Proclus does not mention Theon at all; from which, since both were Platonists residing at Alexandria, and Proclus had probably seen Theon in his younger days, we must either infer some quarrel between the two, or, which is perhaps more likely, presume that Theon's alterations were very slight.

The two books of Geometry left by BOETHIUS contain nothing but enunciations and diagrams from the first four books of Euclid. The assertion of Boethius that Euclid only arranged, and that the discovery and demonstration were the work of others, probably contributed to the notions about Theon presently described. Until the restoration of the Elements by translation from the Arabic, this work of Boethius was the only European treatise on geometry, as far as is known.

The Arabic translations of Euclid began to be made under the caliphs Haroun al Raschid and Al Mamun; by their time, the very name of Euclid had almost disappeared from the West. But nearly one hundred and fifty years followed the capture of Egypt by the Mohammedans before the latter began to profit by the knowledge of the Greeks. After this time, the works of the geometers were sedulously translated, and a great impulse was given by them. Commentaries, and even original writings, followed; but so few of these are known among us, that it is only from the Saracen writings on astronomy (a science which always carries its own history along with it) that we can form a good idea of the very striking progress which the Mohammedans made under their Greek teachers. Some writers speak lightly of this progress, the results of which they are too apt to compare with those of our own time: they ought rather to place the Saracens by the side of their own Gothic ancestors, and, making some allowance for the more advantageous circumstances under which the first started, they should view the second systematically dispersing the remains of Greek civilization, while the first were concentrating the geometry of Alexandria, the arithmetic and algebra of India, and the astronomy of both, to form a nucleus for the present state of science.

The Elements of Euclid were restored to Europe by translation from the Arabic. In connection with this restoration four Eastern editors may be mentioned. Honein ben Ishak (died A. D. 873) published an edition which was afterwards corrected by Thabet ben Corrah, a well-known astronomer. After him, according to D'Herbelot, Othman of Damascus (of uncertain date, but before the thirteenth century) saw at Rome a Greek manuscript containing many more propositions than he had been accustomed to find: he had been used to 190 diagrams, and the manuscript contained 40 more. If these numbers be correct, Honein could only have had the first six books; and the new translation which Othman immediately made must have been afterwards augmented. A little after A. D. 1260, the astronomer Nasireddin gave another edition, which is now accessible, having been printed in Arabic at Rome in 1594. It is tolerably complete, but yet it is not the edition from which the earliest European translation was made, as Peyrard found by comparing the same proposition in the two.

The first European who found Euclid in Arabic, and translated the Elements into Latin, was Adelard or Adelard, of Bath, who was certainly alive in 1130. (See "Adelard," in the Biogr. Dict. of the Soc. D. U. K.) This writer probably obtained his original in Spain: and his translation is the one which became current in Europe, and is the first which was printed, though under the name of Campanus. Till very lately, Campanus was supposed to have been the translator. Tiraboschi takes it to have been Adelard, as a matter of course; Libri pronounces the same opinion after inquiry; and Scheibel states that in his copy of Campanus the authorship of Adelard was asserted in a handwriting as old as the work itself. (A. D. 1482.) Some of the manuscripts which bear the name of Adelard have that of Campanus attached to the commentary. There are several of these manuscripts in existence; and a comparison of any one of them with the printed book which was attributed to Campanus would settle the question.

The seed thus brought by Adelard into Europe was sown with good effect. In the next century Roger Bacon quotes Euclid, and when he cites Boethius, it is not for his geometry. Up to the time of printing, there was at least as much dispersion of the Elements as of any other book: after this period, Euclid was, as we shall see, an early and frequent product of the press. Where science flourished, Euclid was found; and wherever he was found, science flourished more or less according as more or less attention was paid to his Elements. As to writing another work on geometry, the middle ages would as soon have thought of composing another New Testament: not only did Euclid preserve his right to the title of κύριος στοιχείων down to the end of the seventeenth century, and that in so absolute a manner, that then, as sometimes now, the young beginner imagined the name of the man to be a synonyme for the science; but his order of demonstration was thought to be necessary, and founded in the nature of our minds. Tartaglia, whose bias we might suppose would have been shaken by his knowledge of Indian arithmetic and algebra, calls Euclid solo introduttore delle scientie mathematiche: and algebra was not at that time considered as entitled to the name of a science by those who had been formed on the Greek model; "arte maggiore" was its designation. The story about Pascal's discovery of geometry in his boyhood (A. D. 1635) contains the statement that he had got "as far as the 32nd proposition of the first book" before he was detected, the exaggerators (for much exaggerated this very circumstance shews the truth must have been) not having the slightest idea that a new invented system could proceed in any other order than that of Euclid.

The vernacular translations of the Elements date from the middle of the sixteenth century, from which time the history of mathematical science divides itself into that of the several countries where it flourished. By slow steps, the continent of Europe has almost entirely abandoned the ancient Elements, and substituted systems of geometry more in accordance with the tastes which algebra has introduced: but in England, down to the present time, Euclid has held his ground. There is not in our country any system of geometry twenty years old, which has pretensions to anything like currency, but it is either Euclid, or something so fashioned upon Euclid that the resemblance is as close as that of some of his professed editors. We cannot here go into the reasons of our opinion; but we have no doubt that the love of accuracy in mathematical reasoning has declined wherever Euclid has been abandoned. We are not so much of the old opinion as to say that this must necessarily have happened; but, feeling quite sure that all the alterations have had their origin in the desire for more facility than could be obtained by rigorous deduction from postulates both true and evident, we see what has happened, and why, without being at all inclined to dispute that a disposition to depart from the letter, carrying off the spirit, would have been attended with very different results. Of the two best foreign books of geometry which we know, and which are not Euclidean, one demands a right to "imagine" a thing which the writer himself knew perfectly well was not true; and the other is content to shew that the theorems are so nearly true that their error, if any, is imperceptible to the senses. It must be admitted that both these absurdities are committed to avoid the fifth book, and that English teachers have, of late years, been much inclined to do something of the same sort, less openly. But here, at least, writers have left it to teachers to shirk* truth, if they like, without being wilful accomplices before the fact. In an English translation of one of the preceding works, the means of correcting the error were given: and the original work of most note, not Euclidean, which has appeared of late years, does not attempt to get over the difficulty by any false assumption.

At the time of the invention of printing, two errors were current with respect to Euclid personally. The first was that he was Euclid of Megara, a totally different person. This confusion has been said to take its rise from a passage in Plutarch, but we cannot find the reference. Boethius perpetuated it. The second was that Theon was the demonstrator of all the propositions, and that Euclid only left the definitions, postulates, &c., with the enunciations in their present order. So completely was this notion received, that editions of Euclid, so called, contained only enunciations; all that contained demonstrations were said to be Euclid with the commentary of Theon, Campanus, Zambertus, or some other. Also, when the enunciations were given in Greek and Latin, and the demonstrations in Latin only, this was said to constitute an edition of Euclid in the original Greek, which has occasioned a host of bibliographical errors. We have already seen that Theon did edit Euclid, and that manuscripts have described this editorship in a manner calculated to lead to the mistake: but Proclus, who not only describes Euclid as τὰ μαλακώτερον δευκνόμενα τοῖς ἑμπροσθεν εἰς ἀνελγέτους ἀποδείξεις ἀναγὰγον, and comments on the very demonstrations which we now have, as on those of Euclid, is an unanswerable witness; the order of the propositions themselves, connected as it is with the mode of demonstration, is another; and finally, Theon himself, in stating, as before noted, that a particular part of a certain demonstration is his own, states as distinctly that the rest is not. Sir Henry Savile (the founder of the Savilian chairs at Oxford), in the lectures* on Euclid with which he opened his own chair of geometry before he resigned it to Briggs (who is said to have taken up the course where his founder left off, at book i. prop. 9), notes that much discussion had taken place on the subject, and gives three opinions. The first, that of quidam stulti et porridiculi, above discussed: the second, that of Peter Ramus, who held the whole to be absolutely due to Theon, propositions as well as demonstrations, false, quis negat? the third, that of Buteo of Dauphiny, a geometer of merit, who attributes the whole to Euclid, quae opinio aut vera est, aut veritatis certe proxima. It is not useless to remind the classical student of these things: the middle ages may be called the "ages of faith" in their views of criticism. Whatever was written was received without examination; and the endorsement of an obscure scholiast, which was perhaps the mere whim of a transcriber, was allowed to rank with the clearest assertions of the commentators and scholars who had before them more works, now lost, written by the contemporaries of the author in question, than there were letters in the stupid sentence which was allowed to overbalance their testimony. From such practices we are now, it may well be hoped, finally delivered: but the time is not yet come when refutation of "the scholiast" may be safely abandoned.

* We must not be understood as objecting to the teacher's right to make his pupil assume anything he likes, provided only that the latter knows what he is about. Our contemptuous expression (for such we mean it to be) is directed against those who substitute assumption for demonstration, or the particular for the general, and leave the student in ignorance of what has been done.

All the works that have been attributed to Euclid are as follows:

1. Χροική, the Elements, in 13 books, with a 14th and 15th added by HYPsicLES.

2. Δεδομένα, the Data, which has a preface by MARINUS of Naples.

3. Εἰσαγωγή Ἀρμονική, a Treatise on Music; and 4. Κατατομή Κανόνος, the Division of the Scale: one of these works, most likely the former, must be rejected. Proclus says that Euclid wrote κατὰ μουσικὴν στοιχειώσεως.

5. Φαινόμενα, the Appearances (of the heavens). Pappus mentions them.

6. Ὀπτικά, on Optics; and 7. Κατοπτρικά, on Catoptrics. Proclus mentions both.

* Prælectiones in decem in principium elementorum Euclidis; Oxoniæ habitæ M.D.C.XX. Oxoniae, 1621.

The preceding works are in existence; the following are either lost, or do not remain in the original Greek.

8. Περὶ Διαμερέσεων βιβλίον, On Divisions. Proclus (l.c.) There is a translation from the Arabic, with the name of Mohammed of Bagdad attached, which has been suspected of being a translation of the book of Euclid: of this we shall see more.

9. Κωνικῶν βιβλία δ', Four books on Conic Sections. Pappus (lib. vii. præf.) affirms that Euclid wrote four books on conics, which Apollonius enlarged, adding four others. Archimedes refers to the elements of conic sections in a manner which shews that he could not be mentioning the new work of his contemporary Apollonius (which it is most likely he never saw). Euclid may possibly have written on conic sections; but it is impossible that the first four books of APOLLONIUS (see his life) can have been those of Euclid.

10. Πορισμάτων βιβλία γ', Three books of Porisms. These are mentioned by Proclus and by Pappus (l.c.), the latter of whom gives a description which is so corrupt as to be unintelligible.

11. Τόπων Ἐπικίδων βιβλία β', Two books on Plane Loci. Pappus mentions these, but not Eutocius, as Fabricius affirms. (Comment. in Apoll. lib. i. lemm.)

12. Τόπων πρὸς Ἐπιφάνειαν βιβλία β', mentioned by Pappus. What these τόποι πρὸς Ἐπιφάνειαν, or Loci ad Superficiem, were, neither Pappus nor Eutocius inform us; the latter says they derive their name from their own ἰδέσθαι, which there is no reason to doubt. We suspect that the books and the meaning of the title were as much lost in the time of Eutocius as the now.

13. Περὶ Ψευδариων, On Fallacies. On this work Proclus says, "He gave methods of clear judgment (διορατικῆς φρονήσεως) the possession of which enables us to exercise those who are beginning geometry in the detection of false reasonings, and to keep them free from delusion. And the book which gives us this preparation is called Ψευδариων, in which he enumerates the species of fallacies, and exercises the mental faculty on each species by all manner of theorems. He places truth side by side with falsehood, and connects the confutation of falsehood with experience." It thus appears that Euclid did not intend his Elements to be studied without any preparation, but that he had himself prepared a treatise on fallacious reasoning, to precede, or at least to accompany, the Elements. The loss of this book is much to be regretted, particularly on account of the explanations of the course adopted in the Elements which it cannot but have contained.

We now proceed to some bibliographical account of the writings of Euclid. In every case in which we do not mention the source of information, it is to be presumed that we take it from the edition itself.

The first, or editio princeps, of the Elements is that printed by Erhard Ratdolt at Venice in 1482, black letter, folio. It is the Latin of the fifteen books of the Elements, from Adelard, with the commentary of Campanus following the demonstrations. It has no title, but, after a short introduction by the printer, opens thus: "Preclarissimus liber elementorum Euclidis periphrasice aperi: in artem geometrie incipit quā foelicissime: Punctus est ejus pē nū est." &c. Ratdolt states in the introduction that the difficulty of printing diagrams had prevented books of geometry from going through the press, but that he had so completely overcome it, by great pains, that "qua facilitate litterarum elementa imprimuntur, ea etiam geometricæ figure confecerunt." These diagrams are printed on the margin, and though at first sight they seem to be woodcuts, yet a closer inspection makes it probable that they are produced from metal lines. The number of propositions in Euclid (15 books) is 485, of which 18 are wanting here, and 30 appear which are not in Euclid; so that there are 497 propositions. The preface to the 14th book, by which it is made almost certain that Euclid did not write it (for Euclid's books have no prefaces) is omitted. Its Arabic origin is visible in the words helnuuayn and helnuaripke, which are used for a rhombus and a trapezium. This edition is not very scarce in England; we have seen at least four copies for sale in the last ten years.

The second edition bears "Vincentiæ 1491," Roman letter, folio, and was printed "per magistrum Leonardum de Basilea et Gulielmum de Papis socios." It is entirely a reprint, with the introduction omitted (unless indeed it be torn out in the only copy we ever saw), and is but a poor specimen, both as to letter-press and diagrams, when compared with the first edition, than which it is very much scarcer. Both these editions call Euclid Megarensis.

The third edition (also Latin, Roman letter, folio,) containing the Elements, the Phaenomena, the two Optics (under the names of Specularia and Perspectiva), and the Data with the preface of Marius, being the editio princeps of all but the Elements, has the title Euclidis Megarensis philosophi Platonici, mathematicarum disciplinarum junioris: habent in hoc volumine quicunque ad mathematicis substantiâ aspirant: elementorum libros, &c. &c. Zamberto Veneto Interprete. At the end is Impressum Venetiæ, &c. in ædibus Joannis Tacuini, &c., M. D.VIII. Klendi Novëbris—that is, 1508, often read 1508 by an obvious mistake. Zambertus has given a long preface and a life of Euclid: he professes to have translated from a Greek text, and this a very little inspection will shew he must have done; but he does not give any information upon his manuscripts. He states that the propositions have the exposition of Theon or Hypsicles, by which he probably means that Theon or Hypsicles gave the demonstrations. The preceding editors, whatever their opinions may have been, do not expressly state Theon or any other to have been the author of the demonstrations: but by 1508 the Greek manuscripts which bear the name of Theon had probably come to light. For Zambertus Fabricius cites Goetz mem. bibl. Dresd. ii. p. 213: his edition is beautifully printed, and is rare. He exposes the translations from the Arabic with unceasing severity. Fabricius mentions (from Scheibel) two small works, the four books of the Elements by Ambr. Jocher, 1506, and something called "Geometria Euclidis," which accompanies an edition of Sacrobosco, Paris, H. Stephens, 1507. Of these we know nothing.

The fourth edition (Latin, black letter, folio, 1509), containing the Elements only, is the work of the celebrated Lucas Pacioli (de Burgo Sancti Sepalchri), better known as Lucas di Borgo, the first who printed a work on algebra. The title is Euclidis Megarensis philosophi acutissimi mathematicorumque omnium viæ controversia principis opera, &c. At the end, Venetis impressum per... Paganinum de Paganinis... anno... MDVIII... Pacioli adopts the Latin of Adelard, and occasionally quotes the comment of Campanus, introducing his own additional comments with the head "Castigator." He opens the fifth book with the account of a lecture which he gave on that book in a church at Venice, August 11, 1508, giving the names of those present, and some subsequent laudatory correspondence. This edition is less loaded with comment than either of those which precede. It is extremely scarce, and is beautifully printed: the letter is a curious intermediate step between the old thick black letter and that of the Roman type, and makes the derivation of the latter from the former very clear.

The fifth edition (Elements, Latin, Roman letter, folio), edited by Jacobus Faber, and printed by Henry Stephens at Paris in 1516, has the title Contenta followed by heads of the contents. There are the fifteen books of Euclid, by which are meant the Enunciations (see the preceding remarks on this subject); the Comment of Campanus, meaning the demonstrations in Adelard's Latin; the Comment of Theon as given by Zambertus, meaning the demonstration in the Latin of Zambertus; and the Comment of Hypsicles as given by Zambertus upon the last two books, meaning the demonstrations of those two books. This edition is fairly printed, and is moderately scarce. From it we date the time when a list of enunciations merely was universally called the complete work of Euclid.

With these editions the ancient series, as we may call it, terminates, meaning the complete Latin editions which preceded the publication of the Greek text. Thus we see five folio editions of the Elements produced in thirty-four years.

The first Greek text was published by Simon Gryne, or Gryneus, Basle, 1533, folio: * containing, ἐκ τῶν Θεωνος συνοψιῶν (the title-page has this statement), the fifteen books of the Elements, and the commentary of Proclus added at the end, so far as it remains; all Greek, without Latin. On Gryneus and his reverend care of manuscripts, see Anthony Wood. (Athen. Oxon. in verb.) The Oxford editor is studiously silent about this Basle edition, which, though not obtained from many manuscripts, is even now of some value, and was for a century and three-quarters the only printed Greek text of all the books.

With regard to Greek texts, the student must be on his guard against bibliographers. For instance, Harless† gives, from good catalogues, Ed-* Fabricius sets down an edition of 1530, by the same editor: this is a misprint.

† "Sure I am, that while he continued there (i.e. at Oxford), he visited and studied in most of the libraries, searched after rare books of the Greek tongue, particularly after some of the books of commentaries of Proclus Diadoch. Lycius, and having found several, and the owners to be careless of them, he took some away, and conveyed them with him beyond the seas, as in an epistle by him written to John the son of Thoa More, he confesseth." Wood.

‡ Schweiger, in his Handbuch (Leipsig, 1830), gives this same edition as a Greek one, and makes the same mistake with regard to those of Ibayyudius, Scheubel, &c. We have no doubt that the αριθμὸν στοιχείων βιβλία α', Rome, 1545, 8vo., printed by Antonius Bladus Asulanus, containing enunciations only, without demonstrations or diagrams, edited by Angelus Cusanus, and dedicated to Antonius Altovitus. We happen to possess a little volume agreeing in every particular with this description, except only that it is in Italian, being "I quindici libri degli elementi di Euclide, di Greco tradotti in lingua Toscana." Here is another instance in which the editor believed he had given the whole of Euclid in giving the enunciations. From this edition another Greek text, Florence, 1545, was invented by another mistake. All the Greek and Latin editions which Fabricius, Murhard, &c., attribute to Dasypodius (Conrad Rauchfuss), only give the enunciations in Greek. The same may be said of Scheubel's edition of the first six books (Baale, folio, 1550), which nevertheless professes in the title-page to give Euclid, Gr. Lat. There is an anonymous complete Greek and Latin text, London, printed by William Jones, 1620, which has thirteen books in the title-page, but contains only six in all copies that we have seen: it is attributed to the celebrated mathematician Briggs.

The Oxford edition, folio, 1703, published by David Gregory, with the title Εὐκλείδων τὰ στοιχεύματα, took its rise in the collection of manuscripts bequeathed by Sir Henry Savile to the University, and was a part of Dr. Edward Bernard's plan (see his life in the Penny Cyclopædia) for a large republication of the Greek geometrists. His intention was, that the first four volumes should contain Euclid, Apollonius, Archimedes, Pappus, and Heron; and, by an undesigned coincidence, the University has actually published the first three volumes in the order intended: we hope Pappus and Heron will be edited in time. In this Oxford text a large additional supply of manuscripts was consulted, but various readings are not given. It contains all the reputed works of Euclid, the Latin work of Mohammed of Bagdad, above mentioned as attributed by some to Euclid, and a Latin fragment De Levi et Ponderoso, which is wholly unworthy of notice, but which some had given to Euclid. The Latin of this edition is mostly from Commandine, with the help of Henry Savile's papers, which seem to have nearly amounted to a complete version. As an edition of the whole of Euclid's works, this stands alone, there being no other in Greek. Peyrard, who examined it with every desire to find errors of the press, produced only at the rate of ten for each book of the Elements.

The Paris edition was produced under singular circumstances. It is Greek, Latin, and French, in 8 vols. 4to. Paris, 1814-16-18, and it contains fifteen books of the Elements and the Data; for, though professing to give a complete edition of Euclid, Peyrard would not admit anything else to be genuine. F. Peyrard had published a translation of some books of Euclid in 1804, and a complete translation of Archimedes. It was his intention to publish the texts of Euclid, Apollonius, and Archimedes; and beginning to examine the manuscripts of Euclid in the Royal Library at Paris, 23 in number, he found one, marked No. 190, which had the appearance of being written in the ninth century, and which seemed more complete and trustworthy than any single known manuscript. This document was part of the plunder sent from Rome to Paris by Napoleon, and had belonged to the Vatican Library. When restitution was enforced by the allied armies in 1815, a special permission was given to Peyrard to retain this manuscript till he had finished the edition on which he was then engaged, and of which one volume had already appeared. Peyrard was a worshipper of this manuscript, No. 190, and had a contempt for all previous editions of Euclid. He gives at the end of each volume a comparison of the Paris edition with the Oxford, specifying what has been derived from the Vatican manuscript, and making a selection from the various readings of the other 22 manuscripts which were before him. This edition is therefore very valuable; but it is very incorrectly printed: and the editor's strictures upon his predecessors seem to us to require the support of better scholarship than he could bring to bear upon the subject. (See the Dublin Review, No. 22, Nov. 1841, p. 341, &c.)

The Berlin edition, Greek only, one volume in two parts, octavo, Berlin, 1826, is the work of E. F. August, and contains the thirteen books of the Elements, with various readings from Peyrard, and from three additional manuscripts at Munich (making altogether about 35 manuscripts consulted by the four editors). To the scholar who wants one edition of the Elements, we should decidedly recommend this, as bringing together all that has been done for the text of Euclid's greatest work.

We mention here, out of its place, The Elements of Euclid with dissertations, by James Williamson, B.D. 2 vols. 4to., Oxford, 1781, and London, 1789. This is an English translation of thirteen books, made in the closest manner from the Oxford edition, being Euclid word for word, with the additional words required by the English idiom given in Italics. This edition is valuable, and not very scarce: the dissertations may be read with profit by a modern algebraist, if it be true that equal and opposite errors destroy one another.

Camerer and Hauber published the first six books in Greek and Latin, with good notes, Berlin, 8vo, 1824.

We believe we have mentioned all the Greek texts of the Elements; the liberal supply with which the bibliographers have furnished the world, and which Fabricius and others have perpetuated, is, as we have no doubt, a series of mistakes arising for the most part out of the belief about Euclid the enunciator and Theon the demonstrator, which we have described. Of Latin editions, which must have a slight notice, we have the six books by Orontius Finosus, Paris, 1536, folio (Fabr., Murhard); the same by Joschim Camerarius, Leipsic, 1543, 8vo (Fabr., Murhard); the fifteen books by Steph. Gracilis, Paris, 1557, 4to, (Fabr., who calls it Gr. Lat., Murhard); the fifteen books of Franc. de Foix de Candale (Flussas Candalle), who adds a sixteenth, Paris, 1566, folio, and promises a seventeenth and eighteenth, which he gave in a subsequent edition, Paris, 1578, folio (Fabr., Murhard); Frederic classical bibliographers are trustworthy as to writers with whom a scholar is more conversant than with Euclid. It is much that a Fabricius should enter upon Euclid or Archimedes at all, and he may well be excused for simply copying from bibliographical lists. But the mathematical bibliographers, Heibronner, Murhard, &c., are inexcusable for copying from, and perpetuating, the almost unavoidable mistakes of Fabricius.

Commandine's first edition of the fifteen books, with commentaries, Pisauri, 1572, fol. (Fabr., Murhard); the fifteen books of Christopher Clavius, with commentary, and Candalla's sixteenth book annexed, Rome, 1574, fol. (Fabr., Murhard); thirteen books, by Ambrosius Rhodius, Witteberg, 1609, 8vo. (Fabr., Murh.); thirteen books by the Jesuit Claude Richard, Antwerp, 1646, folio (Murh.); twelve books by Horaley, Oxford, 1802. We have not thought it necessary to swell this article with the various reprints of these and the old Latin editions, nor with editions which, though called Elements of Euclid, have the demonstrations given in the editor's own manner, as those of Maurolycus, Barrow, Cotes, &c., &c., nor with the editions contained in ancient courses of mathematics, such as those of Herigonius, Dechales, Schott, &c., &c., which generally gave a tolerably complete edition of the Elements. Commandine and Clavius are the progenitors of a large school of editors, among whom Robert Simson stands conspicuous.

We now proceed to English translations. We find in Tanner (Bibl. Brit. Hib. p. 149) the following short statement: "Candish, Richardus, patria Suffolciensis, in linguam patriam transtulit Euclidis geometriam, lib. xv. Claruit* A.D. MDLVI. Bal. par. post. p. 111." Richard Candish is mentioned elsewhere as a translator, but we are confident that his translation was never published. Before 1570, all that had been published in English was Robert Recorde's Pathway to Knowledge, 1551, containing enunciations only of the first four books, not in Euclid's order. Recorde considers demonstration to be the work of Theon. In 1570 appeared Henry Billingsley's translation of the fifteen books, with Candalla's sixteenth, London, folio. This book has a long preface by John Dee, the magician, whose picture is at the beginning: so that it has often been taken for Dee's translation; but he himself, in a list of his own works, ascribes it to Billingsley. The latter was a rich citizen, and was mayor (with knighthood) in 1591. We always had doubts whether he was the real translator, imagining that Dee had done the drudgery at least. On looking into Anthony Wood's account of Billingsley (Atq. Oron. in verb.) we find it stated (and also how the information was obtained) that he studied three years at Oxford before he was apprenticed to a haberdasher, and there made acquaintance with an "eminent mathematician" called Whythead, an Augustine friar. When the friar was "put to his shifts" by the dissolution of the monasteries, Billingsley received and maintained him, and learnt mathematics from him. "When Whythead died, he gave his scholar all his mathematical observations that he had made and collected, together with his notes on Euclid's Elements." This was the foundation of the translation, on which we have only to say that it was certainly made from the Greek, and not from any of the Arabic-Latin versions, and is, for the time, a very good one. It was reprinted, London, folio, 1661. Billingsley died in 1606, at a great age.

Edmund Scarburgh (Oxford, folio, 1705) translated six books, with copious annotations. We omit detailed mention of Whiston's translation of Tacquet, of Keill, Cunn, Stone, and other editors, whose editions have not much to do with the progress of opinion about the Elements.

Dr. Robert Simson published the first six, and eleventh and twelfth books, in two separate quarto editions. (Latin, Glasgow, 1756. English, London, 1756.) The translation of the Data was added to the first octavo edition (called 2nd edition), Glasgow, 1762: other matters unconnected with Euclid have been added to the numerous succeeding editions. With the exception of the editorial fancy about the perfect restoration of Euclid, there is little to object to in this celebrated edition. It might indeed have been expected that some notice would have been taken of various points on which Euclid has evidently fallen short of that formality of rigour which is tacitly claimed for him. We prefer this edition very much to many which have been fashioned upon it, particularly to those which have introduced algebraical symbols into the demonstrations in such a manner as to confuse geometrical demonstration with algebraical operation. Simson was first translated into German by J. A. Matthiæ, Magdeburgh, 1799, 8vo.

Professor John Playfair's Elements of Geometry contains the first six books of Euclid; but the solid geometry is supplied from other sources. The first edition is of Edinburgh, 1795, octavo. This is a valuable edition, and the treatment of the fifth book, in particular, is much simplified by the abandonment of Euclid's notation, though his definition and method are retained.

Euclid's Elements of Plane Geometry, by John Walker, London, 1827, is a collection containing very excellent materials and valuable thoughts, but it is hardly an edition of Euclid.

We ought perhaps to mention W. Halifax, whose English Euclid Schweiger puts down as printed eight times in London, between 1685 and 1752. But we never met with it, and cannot find it in any sale* catalogue, nor in any English enumeration of editors. The Diagrams of Euclid's Elements by the Rev. W. Taylor, York, 1828, 8vo. size (part i. containing the first book; we do not know of any more), is a collection of lettered diagrams stamped in relief, for the use of the blind.

The earliest German print of Euclid is an edition by Scheubel or Scheybl, who published the seventh, eighth, and ninth books, Augsburg, 1555, 4to. (Fabr. from his own copy); the first six books by W. Holtzmann, better known as Xylander, were published at Basle, 1562, folio (Fabr., Murhard, Kästner). In French we have Errard, nine books, Paris, 1598, 8vo. (Fabr.); fifteen books by Henrion, Paris, 1615 ((Fabr.), 1623 (Murh.), about 1627 (necessary inference from the preface of the fifth edition, of 1649, in our possession). It is a close translation, with a comment. In Dutch, six books by J. Petrus Dou, Leyden, 1606 (Fabr.), 1608 (Murh.). Dou was translated into German, Amsterdam, 1634, 8vo. Also an anonymous translation of Clavius, 1663 (Murh.). In Italian, Tartaglia's edition, Venice, 1543 and 1565. (Murh., Fabr.) In Spanish, by Joseph Saragoza, Valencia 1673, 4to. (Murh.) In Swedish, the first six books, by Martin Strömer, Upsal, 1753. (Murh.)

The remaining writings of Euclid are of small interest compared with the Elements, and a shorter account of them will be sufficient.

* Hence Schweiger has it that R. Candish published a translation of Euclid in 1556.

* These are the catalogues in which the appearance of a book is proof of its existence.

The first Greek edition of the Data is Εὐκλείδου δεδομένα, &c., by Claudius Hardy, Paris, 1625, 4to., Gr. Lat., with the preface of Marinus prefixed. Murhard speaks of a second edition, Paris, 1695, 4to. Dasypodius had previously published them in Latin, Strasburg, 1570. (Fabr.) We have already spoken of Zamberti's Latin, and of the Greek of Gregory and Peyrard. There is also Euclidis Datorum Liber by Horaley, Oxford, 1803, 8vo.

The Phænomena is an astronomical work, containing 25 geometrical propositions on the doctrine of the sphere. Pappus (lib. vi. præf.) refers to the second proposition of this work of Euclid, and the second proposition of the book which has come down to us contains the matter of the reference. We have referred to the Latin of Zamberti and the Greek of Gregory. Dasypodius gave an edition (Gr. Lat., so said; but we suppose with only the enunciations Greek), Strasburg, 1571, 4to. (P) (Weidler), and another appeared (Lat.) by Joseph Auria, with the comment of Maurolycus, Rome, 1591, 4to. (Lalande and Weidler.) The book is also in Mersenne's Synopsis, Paris, 1644, 4to. (Weidler.) Lalande names it (Bibl. Astron. p. 188) as part of a very ill-described astronomical collection, in 3 vols. Paris, 1626, 16mo.

Of the two works on music, the Harmonics and the Division of the Canon (or scale), it is unlikely that Euclid should have been the author of both. The former is a very dry description of the interminable musical nomenclature of the Greeks, and of their modes. It is called Aristoxenean [ARISTOXENUS]: it does not contain any discussion of the proper ultimate authority in musical matters, though it does, in its wearisome enumeration, adopt some of those intervals which Aristoxenus retained, and the Pythagoreans rejected. The style and matter of this treatise, we strongly suspect, belong to a later period than that of Euclid. The second treatise is an arithmetical description and demonstration of the mode of dividing the scale. Gregory is inclined to think this treatise cannot be Euclid's, and one of his reasons is that Ptolemy does not mention it; another, that the theory followed in it is such as is rarely, if ever, mentioned before the time of Ptolemy. If Euclid did write either of these treatises, we are satisfied it must have been the second. Both are contained in Gregory (Gr. Lat.) as already noted; in the collection of Greek musical authors by Meibomius (Gr. Lat.), Amsterdam, 1652, 4to.; and in a separate edition (also Gr. Lat.) by J. Pena, Paris, 1537, 4to. (Fabr.), 1557 (Schweiger). Possevinus has also a corrected Latin edition of the first in his Bibl. Sel. Colon. 1657. Forcadel translated one treatise into French, Paris, 1666, 8vo. (Schweiger.)

The book on Optics treats, in 61 propositions, on the simplest geometrical characteristics of vision and perspective: the Catoptrics have 31 propositions on the law of reflexion as exemplified in plane and spherical mirrors. We have referred to the Gr. Lat. of Gregory and the Latin of Zamberti; there is also the edition of J. Pena (Gr. Lat.), Paris, 1557, 4to. (Fabr.); that of Dasypodius (Latin only, we suppose, with Greek enunciations), Strasburg, 1557, 4to. (Fabr.); a reprint of the Latin of Pena, Leyden, 1599, 4to. (Fabr.); and some other reprint, Leipzig, 1607. (Fabr.) There is a French translation by Rol. Frenart Mans, 1663, 4to.; and an Italian one by Egnatic Danti, Florence, 1573, 4to. (Schweiger.)

EUCLEIDES (Εὐκλείδης), historical. 1. One of the leaders of the body of colonists from Zancle who founded Himera. (Thucyd. vi. 5.)

2. One of the sons of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela. It was in suppressing a revolt of the Gelocans against Euclides and his brother, which broke out on the death of Hippocrates, that Gelon managed to get the sovereignty into his own hands, B.C. 491. (Herod. vii. 155.)

3. One of the Thirty Tyrants at Athens. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2.)

4. The archon eponymus for the year B.C. 403. His archonship is memorable for the restoration, with some modifications, of the old laws of Solon and Draco. These were inscribed on the stoa poecile in the so-called Ionian alphabet, which was then first brought into use at Athens for public documents. (Andoc. de Myst. p. 11; Plut. Arist. l.) Athenæus (i. p. 3, a.) mentions an Athenian of this name who was famous as a collector of books. Whether he was the same person as the archon, or not, does not appear.

5. The brother of Cleomenes III. king of Sparta. He commanded a division of the forces of the latter at the battle of Sellasia, B.C. 223, and by his unskilful tactics in a great degree brought about the defeat of the Lacedæmonians. He fell with the whole of the wing which he commanded. (Polyb. ii. 65, 67, 68; Plut. Philop. p. 358, Arist. p. 1046, Cleom. pp. 809, 818.) [C. P. M.]

EUCLEIDES (Εὐκλείδης), a native of MEGARA, or, according to some less probable accounts, of Gela. He was one of the chief of the disciples of Socrates, but before becoming such, he had studied the doctrines, and especially the dialectics, of the Eleatics. Socrates on one occasion reproved him for his fondness for subtle and captious disputes. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 30.) On the death of Socrates (B.C. 399), Euclides, with most of the other pupils of that philosopher, took refuge in Megara, and there established a school which distinguished itself chiefly by the cultivation of dialectics. The doctrines of the Eleatics formed the basis of his philosophical system. With these he blended the ethical and dialectical principles of Socrates. The Eleistic dogma, that there is one universal, unchangeable existence, he viewed in a moral aspect, calling this one existence the Good, but giving it also other names (as Reason, Intelligence, &c.), perhaps for the purpose of explaining how the real, though one, appeared to be many. He rejected demonstration, attacking not so much the premises assumed as the conclusions drawn, and also reasoning from analogy. He is said to have been a man of a somewhat indolent and procrastinating disposition. He was the author of six dialogues, none of which, however, have come down to us. He has frequently been erroneously confounded with the mathematician of the same name. The school which he founded was called sometimes the Megaric, sometimes the Dialectic or Eristic. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 106—108; Cic. Acad. ii. 42; Plut. de Fratr. Aqu. 18.) [C. P. M.]

EUCLEIDES (Εὐκλείδης). 1. A Greek physician, to whom is addressed one of the Letters attributed to Theano (Socrat. et Pythag. Epist. p. 61, ed. Orell.), and who therefore may be supposed to have lived in the fifth century B. C.

2. The author of an antidote against venomous animals, &c., the composition of which is preserved by Galen, de Antid. ii. 10, vol. xiv. p. 162. Eucleides must have lived in or before the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

EUCLEIDES. 1. Of Athens, a sculptor, made the statues of Pentelic marble, in the temples of Demeter, Aphrodite, and Dionysus, and Eleithuia at Bera in Achaia. (Paus. vii. 25. § 5.) This town, as seen by Pausanias, had been rebuilt after its destruction by an earthquake, in A. C. 373. (Paus. l. c., comp. § 2.) The artist probably flourished, therefore, soon after this date.

2. A medallist, whose name is seen on the coins of Syracuse. (R. Rochette, Lettre à M. le Duc de Ligne, 1831.) [P. S.]

EUCLES (Εὐκλῆς). 1. Of Rhodes, a son of Calhianax and Callipateira, the daughter of Diagoras, belonged to the family of the Eratidae or Diagoridae. He gained a victory in boxing at Olympia, though it is uncertain in what year; and there was a statue of him at Olympia, the work of Naucydeas. (Paus. vi. 6. § 1, 7. § 1.) The Scholiast on Pindar (Ol. vii. 16) calls him Euclon, and describes him as a nephew of Callipateira. (Böckh, Explicat. ad Pind. Ol. vii. p. 166, &c.; DIAGORAS, ERATIDEAS.)

2. A son of Hippon of Syracuse, was one of the three new commanders who were appointed in A. C. 414. Subsequently he was one of the commanders of the fleet which the Syracusans sent to Miletus to assist Tissaphernes against the Athenians. (Thuc. vi. 103; Xen. Hell. i. 2. § 8.) A third person of this name is Euclea, who was archon at Athens in A. C. 427. (Thuc. iv. 104.) [L. S.]

EUCLOUS (Εὐκλούς), an ancient Cyprian smithy, who, according to Pausanias (x. 12. § 6, 14. § 3, 24. § 3), lived before the time of Homer, who, as he predicted, was to spring from Cyprus. Pausanias quotes some lines professing to be the bard's prophecy of this event. The poem called the Cyprian Poem has been erroneously supposed to have been of his composition. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 35.) [C. P. M.]

EUCRATES (Εὐκράτης), the demagogue, according to the Scholiast, alluded to by Aristophanes (Equi. 130), where he speaks of a flax-seller who ruled next but one before Cleon. (Comp. Equi. 254.) He might possibly be the same as the father of Diodotus (Thuc. iii. 41), who spoke against Cleon in the Mytilenæan debate, A. C. 427, but it is not very probable. The Eucrates mentioned in the Lysistrata (103) of Aristophanes as a general in Thrace is a different person, and probably the same as the brother of Nicias spoken of below. [A. H. C.]

EUCRATES (Εὐκράτης). 1. An Athenian, a brother of the noted general Nicias. The few notices we have of him are to be found in the speeches of Andocides and Lysias, and these do not tally with each other. According to Lysias, he was made general by the Athenians, apparently after the last naval defeat of Nicias in the harbour of Syracuse (unless indeed by the last sea fight Lysias means the battle of Aegospotami), and shewed his attachment to the principles of liberty by refusing to become one of the Thirty Tyrants, and was put to death by them. According to Andocides, Eucrates was one of the victims of the popular ferment about the mutilation of the Hermes busts, having been put to death on the information of Diocleides. We have a speech of Lysias, composed in defence of the son of Eucrates on the occasion of a trial as to whether his hereditary property should be confiscated or not. (Lys. de Bonis Niciæ frat. c. 2; Andoc. de Myst. c. 11.)

2. A writer mentioned by Hesychius (s. v. ἑλατρον) as the author of a work entitled Ῥοδιάκᾶ. Athenæus (iii. p. 111, c.) also mentions a writer of this name. [C. P. M.]

EUCRATIDES (Εὐκρατίδης), king of Bactria, was contemporary with Mithridates I. (Araxes VI.), king of Parthia, and appears to have been one of the most powerful of the Bactrian kings, and to have greatly extended his dominions; but all the events of his reign are involved in the greatest obscurity and confusion. It seems probable that he established his power in Bactria proper, while Demetrius, the son of Euthydemus, still reigned in the Indian provinces south of the Paropamisus [DEMETRIUS]; and, in the course of the wars that he carried on against that prince, he was at one time besieged by him with very superior forces for a space of near five months, and with difficulty escaped. (Justin, xii. 6.) At a subsequent period, and probably after the death of Demetrius, he made great conquests in northern India, so that he was said to have been lord of a thousand cities. (Strab. xv. p. 686.) Yet in the later years of his reign he appears to have suffered heavy losses in his wars against Mithridates, king of Parthia, who wrested from him several of his provinces (Strab. xi. pp. 515, 517), though it seems impossible to admit the statement of Justin (xii. 6), that the Parthian king conquered all the dominions of Eucratides, even as far as India. It appears certain at least, from the same author, that Eucratides retained possession of his Indian dominions up to the time of his death, and that it was on his return from thence to Bactria that he was assassinated by his son, whom he had associated with himself in the sovereignty. (Justin, xli. 6.) The statements of ancient authors concerning the power and greatness of Eucratides are confirmed by the number of his coins that have been found on both sides of the Paropamisus: on these he bears the title of "the Great." (Wilson's Ariana, p. 235—237.) The date suggested for the commencement of his reign by Bayer, and adopted by Wilson, is 181 B. C.; but authorities differ widely as to its termination, which is placed by Lassen in 160 B. C., while it is extended by Bayer and Wilson to 147 B. C. (See Wilson's Ariana, p. 234—238, where all the points relating to Eucratides are discussed and the authorities referred to.)

Bayes (Hist. Regn. Graec. Bactriani, p. 95, &c.) has inferred the existence of a second Eucratides, the son of the preceding, to whom he ascribes the murder of his father, and this view has been adopted by M. Raoul Rochette (Journal des Sav. 1835); but it does not seem to be established on any sufficient grounds. Wilson and Mionnet conceive Helicetes to have been the successor of Eucratides. (Wilson's Asiana, p. 237; Mionnet, Suppl. t. 8, p. 470.) [HELICETES.] [E. H. B.]

EUCTEMON (Εὐκτῆμων), the astronomer. [METON.]

EUCTEMON (Εὐκτῆμων), a Greek rhetorician who lived in the early part of the Roman empire. He is mentioned only by Seneca, who has preserved a few fragments of his works. (Controv. iii. 19, 20, iv. 25, v. 30, 34.) [L. S.]

EUDAEMON (Εὐδαίμων). 1. The name of two victors in the Olympian games. One of them was an Egyptian, and won the prize in boxing, but the year is not known. (Philost. Her. ii. 6.) The other was a native of Alexandria, and gained a victory in the foot-race in OL 237, or A. D. 169. (African. ap. Euseb. Chron. p. 44, 2d. edit. Scalig.)

2. A Greek grammarian, and contemporary of Iulianus. He was a native of Pelusium in Egypt, and wrote a work on orthography, which is lost, but is often referred to by Suidas, in the Etymologicum, and by Stephanus of Byzantium. (s. v. Διάκ, Δασκάλιον, Δοκίμιον, Καπετάλιον, and Ὀρσσία; Eudoc. p. 168.) [L. S.]

EUDAMIDAS (Εὐδαμίδας). 1. A Spartan of some note, who, when the Chalcidians sent to implore aid against Olynthus in B. C. 383, was sent at the head of 2000 men. Before his departure he prevailed on the ephors to commit the next division which should be sent to the command of his brother Phoebidas. The latter, on his march, seized the Cadmea of Thebes; and in consequence of the delay of the main body of the troops thus occasioned, Eudamidas could effect but little. He, however, garrisoned several of the Chalcidian towns; and, making Potidaea his headquarters, carried on the war without any decisive result. According to Diodorus, he was worsted in several engagements; and it would appear from Demosthenes (de Falsa Legat. p. 425), who speaks of three commanders having in this war fallen on the side of the Chalcidians and Laedaemonians, that in one of these encounters Eudamidas was killed. (Xen. Hell. v. 2, § 24; Diod. xv. 20, 21.)

2. Two kings of Sparta bore this name. Eudamidas I. was the younger son of Archidamus III. and succeeded his brother Agis III. in B. C. 530. The exact length of his reign is uncertain, but it was probably about 30 years. Plutarch (Apophth. p. 220, 221) records some sayings of Eudamidas, which bespeak his peaceful character and policy, which is also attested by Pausanias (iii. 10, § 5).

Eudamidas II. was the son of Archidamus IV. (whom he succeeded) and grandson of Eudamidas I. (Plut. Agis, 3.) He was the father of Agis IV. and Archidamus V. [C. P. M.]

EUDAMUS (Εὐδάμος), is mentioned by Aristophanes (Pist. 884) as a contemporary, and lived therefore in the fifth century B. C. The Scholiast informs us that he was by trade either a druggist or a goldsmith, and that he sold rings as antidotes against poisons. [W. A. G.]

EUDEMUS (Εὐδήμος). 1. One of Alexander's generals, who was appointed by him to the command of the troops left in India. (Arrian, Anab. vi. 27, § 5.) After Alexander's death he made himself master of the territories of the Indian king Porus, and treacherously put that monarch to death. He by this means became very powerful, and in 317 B. C. brought to the support of Eumenes in the war against Antigonus a force of 3500 men and 125 elephants. (Diod. xix. 14.) With these he rendered him active service in the first battle in Gabiene, but seems nevertheless to have been jealous of him, and joined in the conspiracy of Antigonus and Tentamos against him, though he was afterwards induced to divulge their plans. After the surrender of Eumenes, Eudemus was put to death by order of Antigonus, to whom he had always shewn a marked hostility. (Diod. xix. 15, 27, 44; Plut. Eum. c. 16.)

2. Son of Craterus and brother of Pithon, was appointed by his brother satrap of Parthia in the stead of Philip, whom he displaced. (Diod. xix. 14.) [E. H. B.]

EUDEMUS (Εὐδήμος). 1. An historical writer, a native of either Naxos or Paros, who lived before the time of the Peloponnesian war. (Dionys. Jud. de Thuc. c. 5; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 2, 26, p. 267; Vossius, de Hist. Gr. p. 440, ed. Westermann.)

2. A writer, apparently on natural history, who is frequently quoted by Aelian, in his History of Animals (iii. 21, iv. 8, 43, 45, 56, v. 7).

3. A writer on the history of astronomy and geometry, mentioned by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 130), Diogenes Laërtius (i. 23), and Proclus (in Euclid. i. 4).

4. A rhetorician, who lived probably in the fourth century after Christ. He was the author of a lexicon, περὶ λέξεων ἑτηρικῶν, manuscripts of which are still extant at Paris, Vienna, and other places. His work appears to have been diligently used by Suidas, and is mentioned with praise by Eudocia. (Suidas, s. v. Εὐδήμος; Eudocia, p. 165; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 245, 632.) [C. P. M.]

EUDEMUS (Εὐδήμος). 1. Of Cyprus, to whom Aristotle dedicated the dialogue Εὐδήμος ἢ περὶ ψυχῆς, which is lost, and known to us only by some fragments preserved in Plutarch (Consolat. ad Apollon. p. 115, b.), and a few other writers. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 393, 599; Ionsius, De Script. Historias Philosoph. i. 15, 3; Wyttienbach, ad Plat. l. c. p. 765; and the commentators on Cic. de Divin. i. 25.)

2. Of Rhodes, a contemporary and disciple of Aristotle. We have no particulars of his life; but that he was one of the most important of Aristotle's numerous disciples may be inferred from the anecdote of Gellius (xiii. 5, where Eudemus must be read instead of Menodemo), according to which Eudemus and Theophrastus were the only disciples whom the Peripatetic school esteemed worthy to fill the place of Aristotle after his death. Simplicius makes mention of a biography of Eudemus, supposed to be the work of one Damos or Damasius. (Simplic. ad Aristot. Phys. vi. 216.) Eudemus was one of those immediate disciples of Aristotle who closely followed their master, and the principal object of whose works was to correct, amplify, and complete his writings and philosophy. It was owing to this circumstance, as we learn from the ancient critics, that Aristotle's writings were so often confounded with those of other authors.

Thus, for instance, Eudemus and his contemporaries and fellow-disciples, Theophrastus and Phanasias, wrote works with the same titles and on the same subjects as those of Aristotle. The works of Eudemus of this kind were—1. On the Categories. 2. Περὶ Ἐμπειρίας. 3. Ἀναλυτικά. 4. Φυσικά, a work of which Simplicius in his commentary has preserved some fragments, in which Eudemus often contradicts his master. In this treatise, or in some other, he seems to have also treated on the nature of the human body. (Appul. Apolog. p. 463.) But all these works are lost, and likewise another of still more importance, in which he treated of the history of geometry and astronomy (ἡ περὶ τῶν Ἀστρολογουμένων Ἱστορία, Diog. Laërt. i. 23; or Ἀστρολογικὴ Ἱστορία, Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 432.)

Eudemus, however, is of most importance to us as an editor of and commentator upon the Aristotelian writings. How closely he followed Aristotle in his work on Physics, is shown by the circumstance of later commentators referring to Eudemus in matters of verbal criticism. (Stahr, Aristotelis, ii. p. 82.) Indeed Eudemus followed the Aristotelian system so closely, that modern scholars, as Brandis for instance, do not hesitate to ascribe to Eudemus some writings which are generally attributed to Aristotle. (Brandis, in Rhein. Museum, i. 4. pp. 283, 284.) Aristotle died in his 63rd year, without having published even half of his writings; and the business of arranging and publishing his literary relics devolved upon his nearest friends and disciples. Simplicius has preserved a passage of the work of Andronicus of Rhodes on Aristotle and his writings, which contains a fragment of a letter of Eudemus, which he wrote to Theophrastus, asking for an accurate copy of a manuscript of the fifth book of the Aristotelian Physics. (Simplic. ad Arist. Phys. fol. 216, a., lin. 7.) In the same manner the Aristotelian Metaphysics in their present form seem to have been composed by Eudemus or his successors; for we learn from Asclepius of Tralles [ASCLEPIUS], who has preserved many valuable notices from the works of the more ancient commentators, that Aristotle committed his manuscript of the Metaphysics to Eudemus, by which the publication of the work was delayed; that on the death of Aristotle some parts of the manuscript were missing, and that these had to be completed from the other writings of Aristotle by the survivors of Aristotle (οἱ μεταγενέστεροι). (Asclepius, Proem. in Aristot. Metaph. libr. A. p. 519, in Brandis, Schol. p. 589.) That we are indebted to Eudemus and his followers for the preservation of this inestimable work may also be inferred from the fact, that Joannes Philoponus states that Pasicles (or Pasicles) of Rhodus, brother of Eudemus and likewise a disciple of Aristotle, was, according to the opinion of some ancient critics, the author of the second book of the Metaphysics (the book δ). (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 256; Syrian. ad Aristot. Metaph. B. p. 17; Alexand. Aphrodis. pp. 55, 82, ad Sophist. Elench. ii. p. 69, ed. Venet. 1529.)

For the Ethics of Aristotle we are also probably indebted more or less to Eudemus. We have, under the name of Ethics, three works ascribed to Aristotle of very unequal value and quality. [ARISTOTELIS, pp. 330, 331.] One of these bears even the name of Eudemus (Ἡθικά Εὐδήμεια), and was in all probability a recension of Aristotle's lectures edited by Eudemus. What share, however, Eudemus had in the composition of the chief work (the Ἡθικά Νικομάχεια) remains uncertain after the latest investigation of the subject. (Pansch, de Moralibus magnis subditicio Aristotelis libro, 1841.) [A. S.]

EUDĒMUS (Εὐδήμος), the name of several Greek physicians, whom it is difficult to distinguish with certainty. [EUDAMUS.]

1. A druggist, who apparently lived in the fourth or third century B. C. He is said by Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. ix. 17. 2), to have been eminent in his trade, and to have professed to be able to take hellebore without being purged.

2. A celebrated anatomist, who lived probably about the third century B. C., as Galen calls him a contemporary of Herophilus and Erasistratus. (Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." vi. 1, vol. xviii. pt. 1. p. 7.) He appears to have given particular attention to the anatomy and physiology of the nervous system. (Galen, de Locis. Affect. iii. 14, vol. viii. p. 212.) He considered the metacarpus and metatarsus each to consist of five bones (Galen, de Usu Part. iii. 8, vol. iii. p. 203), on which point Galen differed from him, but modern anatomists agree with him. He, however, fell into the error of supposing the acromion to be a distinct and separate bone. (Rufus Ephes. de Appell. Part. Corp. Hum. p. 29.)

3. A physician at Rome, who was the paramour of Livia (or Livilla), the wife of Drusus Caesar, the son of the emperor Tiberius, and who joined her and Sejanus in their plot for poisoning her husband, A. D. 23. (Plin. H. N. xxix. 8; Tac. Ann. iv. 3.) He was afterwards put to the torture. (Tac. ibid. c. 11.) He is supposed to be the same person who is said by Caelius Aurelianus (de Morb. Acut. ii. 38, p. 171) to have been one of the followers of Themison, and whose medical observations on hydrophobia and some other diseases are quoted by him. He appears to be the same physician who is mentioned by Galen (de Meth. Med. i. 7. vol. x. p. 53) among several others as belonging to the sect of the Methodists.

4. A contemporary and personal acquaintance of Galen, in the latter part of the second century after Christ. (Galen, de Meth. Med. vi. 6. vol. x. p. 454.)

5. The name is also found in Galen, de Compos. Medic. sec. Locos, ix. 5, vol. xiii. p. 291, de Antid. ii. 14, vol. xiv. p. 185; Athen. ix. pp. 369, 371; Cramer's Anecd. Græca Paris. vol. iii., and in other places. [W. A. G.]

EUDĒCĪUS (Εὐδίκος), a Thessalian of Larissæ, probably one of the family of the Aleuadae. Like most of his house, he was a devoted adherent of Philip of Macedon, and in B. C. 344 aided him in effecting the division of Thessaly into four tetrarchies, at the head of one of which he was himself placed. Demosthenes stigmatizes him as a traitor to his country. The division above named had the effect of reducing Thessaly entirely under the control of Philip. (Dem. de Coron. p. 241; Harpocrat. s. v. Εὐδίκος; Buttmann, Mythologus, vol. ii. p. 288, &c.; Böckh, Explic. ad Pind. Pyth. x. p. 333.) [C. P. M.]

EUDĒCĪUS, magister scriniorum, one of the first commission of Nine, appointed by Theodosius in A. D. 429 to compile a code upon a plan which was afterwards abandoned for another. [PRODO- RUS, vol. i. p. 1018.] [J. T. G.]

EUDOCIA (Εὐδοκία), the name of several Byzantine princesses.

1. AUGUSTA, wife of the emperor Theodosius II. She was the daughter of the sophist Leontius, or Leon, or, as he is called in the Paschal Chronicle, Heracleitus of Athens, where she was born. The year of her birth is doubtful. Nicephorus Callisti, who has given the fullest account of her, states (xiv. 50) that she died in the fourth year of the emperor Leo, which corresponds to A. D. 460-61, aged sixty-seven; and that she was in her twentieth year when she married Theodosius. According to this statement, she must have been born A. D. 393-4, and married A. D. 413-14. But the age of Theodosius (born A. D. 401) leads us to prefer, for the marriage, the date given by the Paschal or Alexandrian Chronicle and by Marcellinus (Chron.), viz. the consulship of Eustathius and Agricola, A. D. 421. We must then give up the calculation of Nicephorus as to the time of her death, or as to her age at that time or at her marriage. Possibly she came to Constantinople in her twentieth year, in 413-14, but was not married till 421. She was called originally Athenais, and having excellent natural abilities, was educated by her father and by the grammarians Hyperechius and Orion in every branch of science and learning then cultivated. She was familiar with Greek and Latin literature, rhetoric, astronomy, geometry, and the science of arithmetic. She was also eminent for her beauty; and in consideration of these advantages, natural and acquired, her father at his death left her no share in his property, all of which he bequeathed to her two brothers Valerius and Aetius, called Genesius by Zonaras, or Gesius in the Paschal Chronicle, saying that her good fortune and the fruits of her education would be a sufficient inheritance.

From dissatisfaction either at this arrangement, or at some wrong she had suffered, Athenais went to Constantinople to appeal against her brothers; and Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius, who managed alike him and his empire, fixed on her as a suitable wife for him. Athenais was a heathen; but her heathenism yielded to the arguments or persuasions of Pulcheria and of Atticus, patriarch of Constantinople, by whom she was baptized, receiving at her baptism the name of Eudocia, and being adopted in that ordinance by Pulcheria as a daughter—an expression apparently indicating that she had that princess for a sponsor. The date of her marriage (A. D. 421), given by Marcellinus and the Paschal Chronicle, is probably correct, though Theophanes places it one if not two years earlier.

Most historians mention only one child of this union, Eudoxia, who, according to Marcellinus, was born in the thirteenth consulship of Honorius, and the tenth of Theodosius, i. e. A. D. 422, and betrothed, in the consulship of Victor and Castinus, A. D. 424, to her cousin Valentinian, afterwards emperor of the West as Valentinian III. Tillemont thinks there are notices which seem to shew that there was a son, Arcadius, but he must have died young. Marcellinus mentions another daughter of the emperor Theodosius, and therefore (if legitimate) of Eudocia also, Flacilla; but Tillemont suspects that Marcellinus speaks of a sister of Theodosius so named. Flacilla died in the consulship of Antiochus and Bassus, A. D. 431. The marriage of Valentinian with Eudoxia was celebrated, not, as at first appointed, at Thessalonica, but at Constantinople (comp. Socrates, Hist. Eccles. vii. 44; Niceph. Call. Hist. xiv. 23; Marcellin. Chron. Actio II et Sigisvoldo Coss.), in the year 436 or 437, most likely the latter. In 438, Eudocia set out for Jerusalem, in discharge of a vow which she had made to visit "the holy places" on occasion of her daughter's marriage; and returned the year following to Constantinople, bringing with her the reputed relics of Stephen the proto-martyr. It was probably in this journey that she visited Antioch, addressed the people of that city, and was honoured by them with a statue of brass, as related by Evagrius. At her persuasion Theodosius enlarged the boundaries and the walls of Antioch, and conferred other marks of favour on that city. She had received the title of Augusta A. D. 423.

Hitherto it is probable that Eudocia had interfered but little with the influence exercised by Pulcheria in public affairs. Nicephorus says, she lived twenty-nine years in the palace, "submitting to (ὕψ) Pulcheria as mother and Augusta." As Nicephorus places Eudocia's marriage in 413-14, he makes 442-43 the period of the termination of Pulcheria's administration. He states, that Eudocia's administration lasted for seven years, which brings us to 449-50 as the date of her last journey to Jerusalem, a date which, from other circumstances, appears to be correct.

During the seven years of her administration, in A. D. 444, according to the Paschal Chronicle, but later according to Theophanes, occurred the incident which was the first step to her downfall. An apple of remarkable size and beauty had been brought to Constantinople, which the emperor purchased and presented to his wife. She sent it to Paulinus, the magister officiorum, who was then confined by a fit of the gout; and Paulinus, deeming it a suitable offering, sent it to the emperor. Theodosius recognized it as the one which he had given to Eudocia; and, without mentioning the reason to her, enquired what she had done with it. She, apprehensive of his displeasure at having parted with his gift, replied that she had eaten it, and confirmed her assertion by an oath. This falsehood increased the emperor's suspicions that Eudocia regarded Paulinus with undue affection; and he banished him to Cappadocia, where he was either then or afterwards put to death. Marcellinus places his death in the fifth consulship of Valentinian A. D. 440; but we prefer the statement of Nicephorus, that his banishment was after 442-3, and are disposed to place his death in A. D. 449-50. Eudocia, however, soothed for a time the jealousy of her husband, but it was not eradicated, as subsequent events shewed. Gibbon rejects the whole story of the apple "as fit only for the Arabian Nights;" but his scepticism appears unreasonable.

The quarrels of the ecclesiastics were the immediate occasion of her downfall. Chrysaphius, the eunuch and head chamberlain, a supporter of the monk Eutyches, wished to procure the deposition of Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, who had just been elected, A. D. 447. Chrysaphius, finding that Flavian was supported by Pulcheria, who, though no longer directing the government, retained considerable influence, applied to Eudocia, whom he reminded of the grievances she had sustained "on Pulcheria's account." Eudocia, after a long continued effort, at last succeeded in alienating her husband from his sister. Pulcheria was forbidden the court, and retired from Constantinople; and in the second or pseudo-council of Ephesus (A. D. 449), known as "the council of robbers" (ἡ ληστική), Flavian was deposed, and so roughly treated by the assembled prelates, that he died of their violence a few days after. But Theodosius was soon led to take up the cause of the murdered patriarch. He banished Chrysaphius, and stripped him of all his possessions; and shewed his anger with Eudocia by reviving the quarrel about the apple; so that she begged and obtained permission to retire to Jerusalem. Pulcheria was recalled, and resumed the now vacant management of affairs, which she retained during the short remainder of the reign of Theodosius and that of her husband Marcian, who succeeded him.

Eudocia might possibly have been reconciled to her husband, but for an event recorded by Marcellinus, which rendered the breach irreparable. Saturninus, who held the office of comes domesticorum, being sent for the purpose by Theodosius, on what account is not stated, but probably through jealousy, slew two ecclesiastics, Severus, a priest, and Johannes or John, a deacon, who were in the service of Eudocia at Jerusalem. She, enraged, put Saturninus to death, and was in return stripped of the state and retinue of empress, which she had been hitherto allowed to retain. Marcellinus places these and events in the eighteenth consulship of Theodosius, A. D. 444; but this date is altogether inconsistent with the facts mentioned by Nicephorus. Theophanes placed them in A. M. 5942, Alex. era (A. D. 450), which is probably correct; if so, it must have been before the death of Theodosius, which took place in that year.

Eudocia spent the rest of her life in the Holy Land, devoting herself to works of piety and charity. She repaired the walls of Jerusalem, converted much with ecclesiastics, built monasteries and hospitals, and a church in honour of the proto-martyr Stephen on the spot where he was said to have been stoned; enriched existing churches with valuable offerings, and bestowed great sums in charity on the priests and the poor. But she was, for some years, obnoxious to the imputation of heresy. The opinion of Eutyches on the union of the two natures in Christ, which she held, and which had triumphed in the "council of robbers," at Ephesus (A. D. 449), was condemned in another council held at Chalcedon (A. D. 451), soon after the death of Theodosius. The decrees of this latter council Eudocia for some years rejected. When, however, she heard of the captivity of her daughter Eudoxia [EUDOXIA], whom, with her two daughters, Genserich, king of the Vandals, had carried into Africa (A. D. 455), she sought to be reconciled to Pulcheria, that she might interest her and her husband, the emperor Marcian, in behalf of the captives. By the intervention of Olybrius, to whom one of the captive princesses was betrothed, and of Valerius, the reconciliation was effected; and Pulcheria anxiously sought to restore Eudocia to the communion of the church. She engaged her brothers and daughters (according to Nicephorus) to write to her for this purpose: from which it may be gathered that the brothers of Eudocia had become Christians, and were still living. According to the Paschal Chronicle, they had been advanced to high offices, Aëtius or Gessius in the provinces, and Valerius at court. Possibly the Valerius who had been one of the mediators between the princesses, was one of them. Who "the daughters," of Eudocia were, is not clear. We read only of two, Eudoxia, now in captivity, and Flacilla, long since dead. If the letters were from the captive princesses, we must understand daughters in the more extended sense of female descendants. These letters and the conversations which Eudocia held with Symeon the Stylite, and Euthymius, an eminent monk of Jerusalem, determined her to renounce Eutychianism; and her conversion led many others to follow her example; but it is honourable to her that she continued her gratuities to those who retained as well as to those who renounced these opinions. She died at Jerusalem in the fourth year of the reign of Leo I. A. D. 460-61, and was buried in the church of St. Stephen, which she herself had built. Theophanes places her death in A. M. 5947 Alex. era (A. D. 455), but this is too early. Her age has been already noticed. She solemnly declared at her death that she was free from any guilty connexion with Paulinus.

Eudocia was an author. She wrote—1. A poem on the victory obtained by the troops of her husband Theodosius over the Persians, A. D. 421 or 422. This was in heroic verse, and is mentioned by Socrates. (Hist. Eccles. vii. 21.) 2. A paraphrase of the Octateuch, also in heroic verse. Photius describes it as consisting of eight books, according to the division of that part of Scripture which it embraced; and says it was well and perspicuously written, and conformable to the laws of the poetic art; but that the writer had not allowed herself the poetic licences of digression and of mingling fiction with truth, having kept very close to the sense of the sacred books. 3. A paraphrase of the Prophecies of Daniel and Zechariah, in the same measure. 4. A poem, in the same measure and in three books, on the history and martyrdom of Cyprrian and Justina, who suffered in the persecution under Diocletian. Photius gives a pretty full account of this poem. 5. Zonaras and Joannes Tzetzes ascribe to Eudocia Homero-Centones; and a poem under that title, composed of verses and parts of verses from Homer, and having for its subject the history of the fall and of the redemption of man by Jesus Christ, has been repeatedly published, both in the original and in a Latin version. In one edition, it is said to be by Eudocia Augusta, or Patricius Pelagius. The genuineness of this work is, however, very disputable, and even the fact of Eudocia having ever written anything of the kind, is not quite clear.

2. Daughter of Valentinian III. and of Eudoxia, daughter of Theodosius II., and consequently grand-daughter of the subject of the preceding article. She was carried captive to Carthage by Genesic, king of the Vandals, when he sacked Rome (A. D. 455), together with her mother and her younger sister Placidia. Genesic married Eudocia (A. D. 456), not to one of his younger sons, Gento, as Idatius says, but to his eldest son Hunneric (who succeeded his father, A. D. 477, as king of the Vandals); and sent Eudocia and Placidia to Constantinople. After living sixteen years with Hunneric, and bearing him a son, Hulderic, who also afterwards became king of the Vandals, Eudocia, on the ground of dislike to the Arianism of her husband, secretly left him, and went to Jerusalem, where she soon after died (A. D. 472), having bequeathed all she had to the Church of the Resurrection, and was buried in the sepulchre of her grandmother, the empress Eudocia. (Evargrina, Hist. Eccles. ii. 7; Marcellinus, Chronicon; Idatius, Chronicon; Nicephorus Callisti, Hist. Eccles. xv. 11; Procopius, de Bello Vandalico, i. 5; Theophanes, Chronographia, A. M. 5947 and 5964, Alex. era; Zonaras, Annales, vol. iii. p. 40, ed. Basil, 1557; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. vi.)

3. EUDOCIA FABIA, wife of the emperor Heraclius. She was the daughter of a certain African noble, and was at Constantinople (A. D. 610) when Heraclius, to whom she was betrothed, having assumed the purple in Africa, sailed to Constantinople to dethrone the tyrant Phocas. Phocas shut her up in a monastery with the mother of Heraclius; but his fall led to their release. She was married on the day of Heraclius's coronation, and crowned with him, and, according to Zonaras, received from him the name of Fabia; but Cedrenus makes Fabia her original name, which is more likely. She had by Heraclius, according to Zonaras, three children, a daughter Epiphania, and two sons, the elder named Heraclius and the younger Constantine. She died soon after the birth of the youngest child. Cedrenus assigns to them only a daughter and one son, who was, according to him, called both Heraclius and Constantine. He places the death of Eudocia in the second year of Heraclius, A. D. 612. (Zonaras, Annales, vol. iii. pp. 66, 67, ed. Basil, 1557; Cedrenus, Compendium, pp. 713—14, ed. Bonn, 1838-9.)

4. EUDOCIA, daughter of Incer or Inger, and concubine of the emperor Michael III., by whom she was given in marriage (about A. D. 866) to Basil the Macedonian, afterwards emperor. She bore Basil a son, afterwards the emperor Leo the Philosopher, so soon after their marriage, that it was said that Michael was the child's father, and that she was pregnant at the time of her marriage. Cedrenus speaks of the marriage of Basil with Eudocia, whose noble birth and beauty he celebrates; but, far from making her the concubine of Michael, speaks of her as excelling in modesty. (Zonaras, Annales, vol. iii. p. 132, ed. Basil, 1577; Cedrenus, Compendium, vol. ii. p. 198, ed. Bonn, 1838-9.)

5. EUDOCIA, third wife of the emperor Constantine V. (Copronymus). She was crowned and received the title of Augusta from her husband in the twenty-eighth year of his reign, A. D. 768. (Cedreni Compendium, vol. ii. p. 16, ed. Bonn.)

6. EUDOCIA, third wife of Leo the Philosopher, son of Basil the Macedonian and of Eudocia. (No. 3.) She died in childbirth soon after, and the child died also. She was the daughter, or of the race of Opiscius. Of the date of her marriage and death we have no account. It was probably near the beginning of the tenth century; at any rate before A. D. 904. (Zonaras, Annales, vol. iii. p. 143, ed. Basil, 1567; Cedrenus, Compendium, p. 492, ed. Basil, 1566.)

7. Eldest daughter of the Byzantine emperor Constantine IX., became a nun in consequence of some disease by which she was disfigured. She appears to have survived her father, who died A. D. 1028. (Zonaras, Annales, vol. iii. p. 182, ed. Basil, A. D. 1557.)

8. EUDOCIA AUGUSTA OF MACREMBOLIS, wife of the emperors Constantine XI. (Ducas) and Romanus IV. (Diogenes). She was married to Constantine while he was yet in a private station, and bore him two sons, Michael and Andronicus, before his accession in A. D. 1059, and one son, Constantine, born afterwards; they had also two daughters, Theodora and Zoe. On the accession of Constantine she received the title of Augusta; and on his death, A. D. 1067, he bequeathed the empire to her and to their three sons, Michael VII. (Parapinaces), Andronicus I., and Constantine XII. (Porphirogenitus). He bound Eudocia by an oath not to marry again. Eudocia had in fact the management of the government, the children being all young. Perceiving that the protection of the eastern frontier, which was threatened with invasion, required a stronger hand, she married Romanus IV. (Diogenes). Romanus, who was eminent for his fine figure, strength, and warlike qualities, had, on the death of Constantine XI., prepared to seize the throne, but was prevented by Eudocia, who threw him into prison, and exiled him; but, either for reasons of state, or from affection, soon recalled him, and raised him to the command of the army. Her oath not to marry had been given in writing, and committed to the custody of the patriarch of Constantinople; but by a trick she recovered it, and, within eight months after her husband's death (A. D. 1068), married Romanus, and raised him to be colleague in the empire with herself and her sons. She had hoped to govern him, but was disappointed, and his assertion of his own will led to quarrels between them. During the captivity of Romanus, Joannes or John Ducas, brother of the late Constantine, who had been invested with the dignity of Caesar, declared Michael Parapinaces sole emperor, and banished Eudocia to a convent which she had herself built on the shore of the Propontia. On the death of Diogenes, who on his release had fallen into the hands of Andronicus, the eldest son of Joannes Ducas, and died from the cruel usage he received, A. D. 1071 [ROMANUS IV. (DIOGENES)], Eudocia buried her unhappy husband with great splendour. She appears to have long survived this event. (Zonaras, Annales, vol. iii. pp. 218—226, ed. Basil, 1557; Michael Glycas, Annales, pars iv. p. 606, &c., ed. Bonn.)

Eudocia compiled a dictionary of history and mythology, which she called Ἱστορίαι, i. e. Collection or bed of Violets. It was printed for the first time by Villosion, in his Anecdota Græca, 2 vols. 4to. Venice, 1781. It is prefaced by an address to her husband Romanus Diogenes, in which she describes the work as "a collection of genealogies of gods, heroes, and heroines, of their metamorphoses, and of the fables and stories respecting them found in the ancients; containing also notices of various philosophers." The sources from which the work was compiled are in a great degree the same as those used in the Lexicon of Suidas. The sources are examined and described by Meineke in his Observationes in Eudociæ Violetum, in the fifth and sixth volumes of the Bibliothek der alten Literatur und Kunst, Göttingen, 1789.

9. Daughter of Andronicus Comnenus, second son of the Byzantine emperor Calo-Joanna. She was married, but to whom is unknown; and after her husband's death lived in concubinage with Andronicus, her cousin, afterwards emperor as Andronicus I. Her second husband was Michael Gabras, to whom she was married. We can give no exact dates of the few incidents known of her life. She lived in the middle of the twelfth century. (Michael Glycas, Manuel Comnenus, Lib. iii. pp. 135, 136, Lib. iv. p. 173, ed. Bonn.)

[J. C. M.]

EUDO'RA (Εὐδοῖρα), a daughter of Nereus and Doria. (Hes. Theog. 244; Apollod. i. 2 § 7.) There are two more mythical personages of this name. (Hes. Theog. 360; Hygin. Fab. 192.) [L. S.]

EUDOR'US (Εὐδωρος), a son of Hermes and Polymele, was brought up by his grandfather Phylas. He was one of the five leaders of the Myrmidones under Achilles, who sent him out to accompany Patroclus, and to prevent the latter from venturing too far; but Eudorus was slain by Pyraechmus. (Hom. Il. xvi. 179, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1697.)

EUDOR'US (Εὐδωρος) is mentioned by Alexander Aphrodisiensis (ad Arist. Metaph. p. 26, ed. Paris 1536, fol.) as a commentator on Aristotle's Metaphysics, in which he is said to have altered several passages. Simplicius likewise speaks of a Peripatetic philosopher of this name, and relates that he had written on the Aristotelian Categories. We do not know, however, if this be the same person. Eudorus, whom Alexander Aphrodisiensis mentions, was a native of Alexandria, and had, like Ariston of Alexandria, written a work on the Nile. (Strab. xvii. p. 790; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 845, vol. iii. pp. 172, 492.)

[A. S.]

EUDOR'US, a scene-painter and statuary in bronze, of second-rate merit. (Plin. xxv. 11. a 40 § 34.)

EUDOXIA (Εὐδοξία), the name of several princesses chiefly of the Eastern or Byzantine empire.

1. The daughter of the Frank Bauto, married to the emperor Arcadius, A. D. 395, by whom she had four daughters, Flaccia or Flaccilla or Falchilla, Palcheria, Arcadia, and Marina, and one son, Theodosius II. or the younger. She was a woman of high spirit, and exercised great influence over her husband: to her persuasion his giving up of the eunuch Eutropius into the power of his enemies may be ascribed. She was involved in a fierce contest with Chrysostom, who fearlessly inveighed against the avarice and luxury of the court, and scrupled not to attack the empress herself. The particulars of the struggle are given elsewhere. [CHRYSOSTOMUS, JOANNES.] She died of a miscarriage in the sixth consulship of Honorius, A. D. 404, or, according to Theophanes, A. D. 406. The date of her death is carefully discussed by Tillemont. (Histoire des Empereurs, vol. v. p. 785.) Cedrenus narrates some curious particulars of her death, but their credibility is very doubtful. (Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. apud Phot.; Marcellinus, Chronicon; Socrates, Hist.

Eccles. vi. 18; Cassiodor. Hist. Tripart. x. 20; Theophanes, Chronographia ad A. M. 5892, 97, 98, Alex. era; Cedrenus, Compend. vol. i. p. 585, ed. Bonn.)

2. Daughter of Theodosius II. and of Eudocia, born A. D. 422, and betrothed soon after to Valentinian, son of the emperor Honorius, who afterwards was emperor of the West as Valentinian III. and to whom she was married at Constantinople in A. D. 436 or 437. On the assassination of her husband by Maximus (A. D. 455), who usurped the throne, she was compelled to marry the usurper; but, resenting both the death of her husband and the violence offered to herself, she instigated Genseric, king of the Vandals, who had conquered Africa, to attack Rome. Genseric took the city. Maximus was slain in the flight, and Eudocia and her daughters, Eudocia and Placidia, were carried by the Vandal king to Carthage. After being detained in captivity some years, she was sent with her daughter Placidia and an honourable attendance to Constantinople. [See EUDOCIA, No. 1, and the authorities subjoined there.]

The coins of the empresses Eudocia and Eudoxia are, from the two names being put one for the other, difficult to be assigned to their respective persons. (See Eckhel, Doctrina Num. Veterum, vol. viii. p. 170.)

EUDOXIUS, commonly cited with the addition Heros, was a Graeco-Roman jurist, who flourished shortly before Justinian. Panciroli (de Claris Interpp. Juris, p. 63) places him too early in supposing that he was the Pr. Pr. to whom were addressed the constitution of Theodosius and Valentinian of A. D. 427 (Cod. 1. tit. 8. a. 1), and the constitution of Arcadius and Honorius. (Cod. 2. tit. 77. a. 2.) He is mentioned in Const. Tanta, § 9, as the grandfather of Anatolius, professor of law at Berytus, who was one of the compilers of the Digest. The appellation Heros is not a proper name, but a title of excellency, and is placed sometimes before, and sometimes after, the name. Thus, in Basil. vi. p. 227, we have δ "Heros Εὐδοξίος, and, in Basil. iii. p. 60, Εὐδοξίος δ "Heros. We find the same title applied to Patricius, Amblichus (qu. Iamblichus, Basil. iii. p. 256), and Cyrillus (Basil. iv. p. 702). Heimbach (Anecdota, i. p. 202) is inclined to think that, like the expression δ μακροπρύμν, it was used by the Graeco-Roman jurists of and after the age of Justinian as a designation of honour in speaking of their predecessors who had died within their memory.

Eudoxius was probably acquainted with the original writings of the classical jurists, for from Basil. ii. p. 454 (ed. Heimbach) it appears that he quoted Ulpian's treatise De Officio Proconsulis. From the citations of Eudoxius in the Basilica, he appears to have written upon the constitutions of emperors earlier than Justinian, and thence Reiz (ad Theophilum, pp. 1234—1246) infers that he commented upon the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian codes, from which those constitutions were transferred into the Code of Justinian. It is probably to the commentaries of Eudoxius, Leontius, and Patricius on the three earlier codes that Justinian (Const. Tanta, § 9) alludes, when he says of them "optimam sui memoriam in Legibus reliquerunt," for the imperial constitutions were often called Leges, as distinguished from the Jus of the jurists.

In Basil. ii. p. 644, Thalelaeus, who survived

Justinian, classes Eudoxius among the older teachers, and cites his exposition of a constitution of Severus and Antoninus of A. D. 199, which appears in Cod. 2. tit. 12, s. 4. Again, in Basil. i. pp. 810, 811, is cited his exposition of a constitution of Diocletian and Maximian, of A. D. 193, which appears in Cod. 2. tit. 4, s. 18, with the interpolated words excepto adulterio. In both these passages, the opinion of Heros Patricius is preferred to that of Eudoxius. In like manner, it appears from the scholiast in the fifth volume of Meerman's Thesaurus (JClorum Græcorum Commentarii), p. 56; Basil., ed. Heimbach, i. p. 403) that Dominus, Demosthenes, and Eudoxius, differed from Patricius in their construction of a constitution of the emperor Alexander, of A. D. 224, and that that constitution was altered by the compilers of Justinian's code in conformity with the opinion of Patricius. Eudoxius is cited by Patricius (Basil. iii. p. 61) on a constitution of A. D. 293 (Cod. 4. tit. 19, s. 9), and is cited by Theodorus (Basil. vi. p. 227) on a constitution of A. D. 290. (Cod. 8. tit. 55, s. 3.) In the latter passage Theodorus, who was a contemporary of Justinian, calls Eudoxius his teacher. Whether this expression is to be taken literally may be doubted, as Theodorus also calls Dominus, Patricius, and Stephanus (Basil. ii. p. 580) his teachers. (Zachariæ, Anecdota, p. xlviii.; Zimmern, R. G. G. i. §§ 106, 109.)

The untrustworthy Nic. Comnenus Papadopoli (Praenot. Mystag. pp. 345, 402) mentions a Eudoxius, Nomicus, Judex veli, and cites his Synopsis Legum, and his scholia on the Novells of Alexius Comnenus. [J. T. G.]

EUDOXIUS, a physician, called by Prosper Aquitanus a man "pravi sed exercitati ingenii," who in the time of the emperor Theodosius the Younger, A. D. 432, deserted to the Huns. (Chronicon. Pithoean. in Labbe, Nova Biblioth. MSS. Libror. vol. i. p. 59.) [W. A. G.]

EUDOXUS (Εὐδόξος) of Cnidus, the son of Aeschines, lived about B. C. 366. He was, according to Diogenes Laërtius, astronomer, geometer, physician, and legislator. It is only in the first capacity that his fame has descended to our day, and he has more of it than can be justified by any account of his astronomical science now in existence. As the probable introducer of the sphere into Greece, and perhaps the corrector, upon Egyptian information, of the length of the year, he enjoyed a wide and popular reputation, so that Laërtius, who does not even mention Hipparchus, has given the life of Eudoxus in his usual manner, that is, with the omission of all an astronomer would wish to know. According to this writer, Eudoxus went to Athens at the age of twenty-three (he had been the pupil of Archytas in geometry), and heard Plato for some months, struggling at the same time with poverty. Being dismissed by Plato, but for what reason is not stated, his friends raised some money, and he sailed for Egypt, with letters of recommendation to Nectanebis, who in his turn recommended him to the priests. With them he remained sixteen months, with his chin and eyebrows shaved, and there, according to Laërtius, he wrote the Octaëteria. Several ancient writers attribute to him the invention or introduction of an improvement upon the Octaëterides of his predecessors. After a time, he came back to Athens with a band of pupils, having in the mean time taught philosophy in Cyzicum and the Propontia: he chose Athens, Laërtius says, for the purpose of vexing Plato, at one of whose symposia he introduced the fashion of the guests reclining in a semicircle; and Nicomachus (he adds), the son of Aristotle, reports him to have said that pleasure was a good. So much for Laërtius, who also refers to some decree which was made in honour of Eudoxus, names his son and daughters, states him to have written good works on astronomy and geometry, and mentions the curious way in which the bull Apis told his fortune when he was in Egypt. Eudoxus died at the age of fifty-three. Phanocritus wrote a work upon Eudoxus (Athen. vii. p. 210, l.), which is lost.

The fragmentary notices of Eudoxus are numerous. Strabo mentions him frequently, and states (ii. p. 119, xvii. p. 806) that the observatory of Eudoxus at Cnidus was existing in his time, from which he was accustomed to observe the star Canopus. Strabo also says that he remained thirteen years in Egypt, and attributes to him the introduction of the odd quarter of a day into the value of the year. Pliny (H. N. ii. 47) seems to refer to the same thing. Seneca (Qu. Nat. vii. 3) states him to have first brought the motions of the planets (a theory on this subject) from Egypt into Greece. Aristotle (Metaph. xii. 8) states him to have made separate spheres for the stars, sun, moon, and planets. Archimedes (in Arenar.) says he made the diameter of the sun nine times as great as that of the moon. Vitruvius (ix. 9) attributes to him the invention of a solar dial, called δωδεχῆρ: and so on.

But all we positively know of Eudoxus is from the poem of ARATUS and the commentary of Hipparchus upon it. From this commentary we learn that Aratus was not himself an observer, but was the versifier of the Φαινόμενα of Eudoxus, of which Hipparchus has preserved fragments for comparison with the version by Aratus. The result is, that though there were by no means so many nor so great errors in Eudoxus as in Aratus, yet the opinion which must be formed of the work of the former is, that it was written in the rudest state of the science by an observer who was not very competent even to the task of looking at the risings and settings of the stars. Delambre (Hist. Astr. Anc. vol. i. p. 107) has given a full account of the comparison made by Hipparchus of Aratus with Eudoxus, and of both with his own observations. He cannot bring himself to think that Eudoxus knew anything of geometry, though it is on record that he wrote geometrical works, in spite of the praises of Proclus, Cicero, Ptolemy, Sextus Empiricus (who places him with Hipparchus), &c., &c. Eudoxus, as cited by Hipparchus, neither talks like a geometer, nor like a person who had seen the heavens he describes: a bad globe, constructed some centuries before his time in Egypt, might, for anything that appears, have been his sole authority. But supposing, which is likely enough, that he was the first who brought any globe at all into Greece, it is not much to be wondered at that his reputation should have been magnified. As to what Proclus says of his geometry, see EUCLIDES.

Rejecting the Οκταήρης mentioned by Laërtius, which was not a writing, but a period of time, and also the fifth book of Euclid, which one manuscript of Euclid attributes to Eudoxus (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 12), we have the following works, all lost, which he is said to have written:

Γαυμετρούμενα, mentioned by Proclus and Laërtius, which is not, however, to be taken as the title of a work: Ὀργάνικη, mentioned by Plutarch: Ἀστρονομία δὲ ἑνὲς, by Suidas: two books, Εὐκλείδης or Κόσμοτροπος, and Θαυρόμενα, mentioned by Hipparchus, and the first by an anonymous biographer of Aratus: Περὶ Θεῶν καὶ Κόσμου καὶ τῶν Μετεωρολογουμένων, mentioned by Eudocia: Γύς Περίοδος, a work often mentioned by Strabo, and by many others, as to which Harless thinks Semler's opinion probable, that it was written by Eodorus of Rhodes. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 10, &c.; Weidler, Hist. Astron.; Diog. Laërt. iii. 86-91; Delambre, Hist. de l'Astron. Anc. vol. i.; Hipparchus, Comment. in Aratum; Böhmer, Dissertatio de Eudoro Cnidio, Helmstad. 1715; Ideker, in the Abhandl. der Berliner Akad. d. Wissenschaft for the year 1828, p. 189, &c., and for the year 1830, p. 49, &c.; Letronne, Journal d. Sav. 1840, p. 741, &c.) [A. D. M.]

EUDOXUS (Εὐδόξος), a Greek physician, born at Cnidos in Caria, who lived probably in the fifth or fourth century B. C., as he was mentioned by the celebrated astronomer of the same name. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 90.) He is said to have been a great advocate for the use of gymnastics. [W. A. G.]

EUDOXUS (Εὐδόξος). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, was by birth a Sicilian and the son of Agathocles. He gained eight victories, three at the city Dionysia, and five at the Lenaea. His Ναυκλήριος and Τροδοίμαχος are quoted. (Apollod. ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 90; Poll. vii. 201; Zenob. Adag. i. 1; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 492, vol. iv. p. 508.)

2. Of Rhodes, an historical writer, whose time is not known. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.; Apollon. Hist. Com. 24; Etyim. Mag. s. v. Ἀδρίας; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 59, ed. Westermann.)

3. Of Cyzicus, a geographer, who went from his native place to Egypt, and was employed by Ptolemy Evergetes and his wife Cleopatra in voyages to India; but afterwards, being robbed of all his property by Ptolemy Lathyrus, he sailed away down the Red Sea, and at last arrived at Gades. He afterwards made attempts to circumnavigate Africa in the opposite direction, but without success. (Strab. ii. pp. 98-100; Plin. ii. 67.) He must have lived about A. C. 130. [P. S.]

EVELPIDES (Εὐελπίδης), a celebrated oculist in the time of Celsus, about the beginning of the Christian era, several of whose medical formulae have been preserved. (Cels. de Med. pp. 120, 122, 123, 124.) [W. A. G.]

EVELPISTUS (Εὐελπίστos), an eminent surgeon at Rome, who lived shortly before the time of Celsus, and therefore probably about the end of the first century A. C. (Cels. de Med. vii. praef. p. 137.) He is perhaps the same person one of whose plasters is preserved by Scribonius Largus, de Compos. Medicam. c. 215, p. 230. [W. A. G.]

EVELTHON (Εὐέλθων), king of Salamis in Cyprus. When Arcesilans III. was driven from Cyprus in an attempt to recover the royal privileges, probably about A. C. 529 or 528 (see vol. i. p. 477), his mother Pheretima fled to the court of Evelthon, and pressed him with the most persevering entreaties for an army to enforce her son's restoration. The king at last sent her a golden spindle and distaff, saying that such were the more appropriate presents for women. (Her. iv. 162, v. 164; Polyæn. viii. 47.) [E. F.]

EVERMERUS or EUHEMERUS (Εὐήμερος), a Sicilian author of the time of Alexander the Great and his immediate successors. Most writers call him a native of Messene in Sicily (Plut. de Is. et Os. 23; Lactant. de Fals. Relig. l. 11; Etyim. M. s. v. Spordis), while Arnobius (iv. 15) calls him an Agrigentine, and others mention either Tegea in Arcadia or the island of Cos as his native place. (Athen. xv. p. 658.) His mind was trained in the philosophical school of the Cyrenaics, who had before his time become notorious for their scepticism in matters connected with the popular religion, and one of whom, Theodorus, is frequently called an atheist by the ancients. The influence of this school upon Evermerus seems to have been very great, for he subsequently became the founder of a peculiar method of interpreting the legends and myths of the popular religion, which has often and not unjustly been compared with the rationalism of some modern theologians in Germany. About B. C. 316 we find Evermerus at the court of Cassander in Macedonia, with whom he was connected by friendship, and who, according to Eusebius (Praep. Evang. ii. 2, p. 59), sent him out on an exploring expedition. Evermerus is said to have sailed down the Red Sea and round the southern coasts of Asia to a very great distance, until he came to an island called Panchaea. After his return from this voyage he wrote a work entitled Ἱερὰ Ἀναγράφη, which consisted of at least nine books. The title of this "Sacred History," as we may term it, was taken from the ἀναγραφὰ, or the inscriptions on columns and walls, which existed in great numbers in the temples of Greece, and Evermerus chose it because he pretended to have derived his information from public documents of that kind, which he had discovered in his travels, especially in the island of Panchaea. The work contained accounts of the several gods, whom Evermerus represented as having originally been men who had distinguished themselves either as warriors, kings, inventors, or benefactors of man, and who after their death were worshipped as gods by the grateful people. Zeus, for example, was, according to him, a king of Crete, who had been a great conqueror; and he asserted that he had seen in the temple of Zeus Triphylus a column with an inscription detailing all the exploits of the kings Uranus, Cronus, and Zeus. (Euseb. l. c.; Sext. Empir. ix. 17.) This book, which seems to have been written in a popular style, must have been very attractive; for all the fables of mythology were dressed up in it as so many true and historical narratives; and many of the subsequent historians, such as the uncritical Diodorus (see Fragm. lib. vi.) adopted his mode of dealing with myths, or at least followed in his track, as we find to be the case with Polybius and Dionysius. Traces of such a method of treating mythology occur, it is true, even in Herodotus and Thucydides; but Evermerus was the first who carried it out systematically, and after his time it found numerous admirers. In the work of Diodorus and other historians and mythographers, we meet with innumerable stories which have all the appearance of being nothing but Evermeristic interpretations of ancient myths, though they are frequently taken by modern critics for genuine legends. Evermerus was much attacked and treated with contempt, and Eratosthenes called him a Bergaeon, that is, as great a liar as Antiphanes of Berga (Polyb.

xxxiii. 12, xxxiv. 5; Strab. i. p. 47, ii pp. 102, 104, vii. p. 299; but the ridicule with which he is treated refers almost entirely to his pretending to have visited the island of Panchaea, a sort of Thule of the southern ocean; whereas his method of treating mythology is passed over unnoticed, and is even adopted. His method, in fact, became so firmly rooted, that even down to the end of the last century there were writers who acquiesced in it. The pious believers among the ancients, on the other hand, called Evemerus an atheist. (Plut. de Plac. Philos. i. 7; Aelian, V. H. ii. 31; Theophil. ad Autoly. iii. 6.) The great popularity of the work is attested by the circumstance that Ennius made a Latin translation of it. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 42; Lactant. de Fals. Relig. i. 11; Varro, de Re Rust. i. 48.) The Christian writers often refer to Evemerus as their most useful ally to prove that the pagan mythology was nothing but a heap of fables invented by mortal men. (Hieron. Columna, Prolegom. in Evemerum, in his Q. Ennii quae supersunt Fragm. p. 482, &c., ed. Naples, 1590; Sevin, in the Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscript. viii. p. 107, &c.; Fourmont, ibid. xv. p. 265, &c.; Foucher, ibid. xxxiv. p. 435, &c., xxxv. p. 1, &c.; Lobeck, Aglaoph. i. p. 138, &c.) [L. S.]

EVENIUS (Εὐένιος), a seer of Apollonia, and father of Deiphobus. He was one of the most distinguished citizens of Apollonia; and one night, when he was tending the sheep of Helios, which the noble Apolloniatae had to do in turns, the flock was attacked by wolves, and sixty sheep were killed. Evenius said nothing of the occurrence, but intended to purchase new sheep, and thus to make up for the loss. But the thing became known, and Evenius was brought to trial. He was deprived of his office, and his eyes were put out as a punishment for his carelessness and negligence. Hereupon the earth ceased to produce fruit, and the sheep of Helios ceased to produce young. Two oracles were consulted, and the answer was, that Evenius had been punished unjustly, for that the gods themselves had sent the wolves among the sheep, and that the calamity under which Apollonia was suffering should not cease until Evenius should have received all the reparation he might desire. A number of citizens accordingly waited upon Evenius, and without mentioning the oracles, they asked him in the course of their conversation, what reparation he would demand, if the Apolloniatae should be willing to make any. Evenius, in his ignorance of the oracles, merely asked for two acres of the best land in Apollonia and the finest house in the city. The deputies then said that the Apolloniatae would grant him what he asked for, in accordance with the oracle. Evenius was indignant when he heard how he had been deceived; but the gods gave him a compensation by bestowing upon him the gift of prophecy. (Herod. ix. 92–95; Conon. Narrat. 30, who calls him Peithenius instead of Evenius.) [L. S.]

EVENOR, a distinguished painter, was the father and teacher of PARRHASIUS. (Plin. xxxv. 9. s. 36. § 1; Suid., Harpocr., Phot., s. v.) He flourished about B. C. 420. [P. S.]

EVENOR (Εὐένωρ), a Greek surgeon, who apparently wrote on fractures and luxations, and who must have lived in or before the third century B. C., as he is mentioned by Heraclides of Tarentum (ap. Galen. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv.

40. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736.) He is very possibly the same person who is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xx. 73, xxi. 105), and whose work entitled "Curationes" is quoted by Caelius Aurelianus. (de Morb. Acut. ii. 16. p. 115; de Morb. Chron. iii. 8. p. 478.) [W. A. G.]

EVENUS (Εὐένος), the name of three mythical personages. (Hea. Theog. 345; Hom. Il. ii. 692, ix. 557; Plut. Parall. Mên. 40; Apollod. i. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

EVENUS (Εὐένος or Εὐηνός, but the former is more correct). In the Greek Anthology there are sixteen epigrams under this name, which are, however, the productions of different poets. (Brunck, Anaol. vol. i. pp. 164–167; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. pp. 96–99.) In the Vatican MS. some of the epigrams are headed Εὐίνου, the 7th is headed Εὐήνου Ἀσκαλωνίτου, the 12th Εὐίνου Ἀθηναίου, the 14th Εὐήνου Σικελιώτου, and the last Εὐήνου γραμματικῶ.

The best known poets of this name are two elegiac poets of Paros, mentioned by Eratosthenes (ap. Harpocrat. s. v. Εὐένος), who says that only the younger was celebrated, and that one of them (he does not say which) was mentioned by Plato. There are, in fact, several passages in which Plato refers to Evenus, somewhat ironically, as at once a sophist or philosopher and a poet. (Apolog. p. 267, s. p. 20, b., Phaed. p. 60, d., Phaedr. p. 267, a.) According to Maximus Tyrius (Diss. xxxviii. 4. p. 225), Evenus was the instructor of Socrates in poetry, a statement which derives some countenance from a passage in Plato (Phaed. l. c.), from which it may also be inferred that Evenus was alive at the time of Socrates's death, but at such an advanced age that he was likely soon to follow him. Eusebius (Chron. Arm.) places him at the 80th Olympiad (B. C. 460) and onwards. His poetry was gnomic, that is, it formed the vehicle for expressing philosophic maxims and opinions. The first six of the epigrams in the Anthology are of this character, and may therefore be ascribed to him with tolerable certainty. Perhaps, too, the fifteenth should be assigned to him.

The other Evenus of Paros wrote Ἐπικρινά, as we learn from the express testimony of Artemidorus (Oneirocr. i. 5), and from a passage of Arrian (Epictet. iv. 9), in which Evenus is mentioned in conjunction with Aristideia. [See vol. i. p. 296.] A few other fragments of his poetry are extant. Among them is a line which Aristotle (Metaphys. iv. 5, Eth. Eudem. ii. 7) and Plutarch (Moral. ii. p. 1102, c.) quote by the name of Evenus, but which is found in one of the elegies of Theognis (vv. 467–474), whence it is supposed that that elegy should be ascribed to Evenus. There are also two hexameters of Evenus. (Aristot. Eth. Nicom. vii. 11.)

None of the epigrams in the Anthology are expressly assigned to this Evenus; but it is not unlikely that the 12th is his. If the 8th and 9th, on the Cnidian Aphrodite of Praxiteles, and the 10th and 11th, on Myron's cow, are his, which seems not improbable, then his date would be fixed. Otherwise it is very difficult to determine whether he lived before or after the other Evenus. As he was certainly less famous than the contemporary of Socrates, the statement of Eratosthenes that only the younger was celebrated, would imply that he lived before him; and this view is maintained, in opposition to the general opinion of

Of the other poets of this name next to nothing is known beyond the titles, quoted above, in the Palatine Anthology. Jacobs conjectures that the Sicilian and the Ascalonite are the same, the name Ἀσκαλωνίτου being a corruption of Ἀσκαλωνίτου, but he gives no reason for this conjecture. The epigrams of one of these poets, we know not which, were in the collection of Philip, which contained chiefly the verses of poets nearly contemporary with Philip himself.

(Wagner, de Eoanis Poetis elegiacis, Vratial. 1828; Schreiber, Disput. de Eoanis l'ariis, Götting. 1839; Souchay, Sur les Poètes élégiaques, in the Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, vol. x. p. 598; Schneidewin, Delect. Poet. Græc. eleg. vol. i. p. 133; Gaisford, Poet. Min. Græc. vol. iii. p. 277; Boissonade, Græc. Poet. p. 163; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. pp. 893, 894; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 727.) [P. S.]

EVER'ES (Ἐβήρης), a son of Pterelaüs, was the only one among his brothers that escaped in their fight with the sons of Electryon. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, &c.; comp. ALCMENE and AMPHITRYON.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8, iii. 6. § 7.) [L. S.]

EVERGETES (Ἐβεργέτης), the "Benefactor," was a title of honour, frequently conferred by the Greek states upon those from whom they had received benefits, and was afterwards assumed by many of the Greek kings in Egypt and other countries. [PTOLEMAEUS.]

EVERSA, a Theban, who joined Callicritus in opposing in the Boeotian assembly the views of Persens, and was in consequence murdered with Callicritus by order of the king. (Liv. xlii. 13, 40.) [CALICRITUS.]

EVETES (Ἐβήτης) and EUKE'NIDES (Ἐυκηνίδης), were Athenian comic poets, contemporary with Epicharmus, about B. C. 485. Nothing is heard of comic poetry during an interval of eighty years from the time of Susarion, till it was revived by Epicharmus in Sicily, and by Evetes, Euxenides, and Myllus at Athens. The only writer who mentions these two poets is Suidas (s. v. Ἐπιχάρμος). Myllus was not unfrequently mentioned. [MYLLUS.] (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 26.)

There is also a Pythagorean philosopher, Evetes, of whom nothing is known but his name. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 36.) [P. S.]

EUGAMON (Ἐυγάμων), one of the Cyclic poets. He was a native of Cyrene, and lived about A. C. 568, so that he was a contemporary of Pseisistratus, Stesichorus, and Aristeas. His poem, which was intended to be a continuation of the Odyssey, and bore the title of Ἐυγαμονία, consisted of two books or rhapsodies, and formed the conclusion of the epic cycle. It contained an account of all that happened after the fight of Odysseus with the suitors of Penelope till the death of Odysseus. The substance of the poem, which itself is entirely lost, is preserved in Proclus's Chrestomathia. (Comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796.) As Eugamon lived at so late a period, it is highly probable that he made use of the productions of earlier poets; and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. vi. p. 751; comp. Eclog. Prosp. Eclog. x. 12) expressly states that Eugamon incorporated in his Telegonia a whole epic poem of Musæus, entitled "Thesprotis."

Whether the Telegonia ascribed to the Lacedæmonian Cinæthion was an earlier work than that of Eugamon, or whether it was identical with it, is uncertain. The name Telegonia was formed from Telegonus, a son of Odysseus and Circe, who killed his father. (Comp. Bode, Gesch. der Episch. Dichtk. p. 839, &c.) [L. S.]

EU'GENES (Ἐυγένης), the author of an epigram, in the Greek Anthology, upon the statue of Anacreon intoxicated. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 453; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 188; Paus. i. 93. § 1.) The epigram seems to be an imitation of one by Leonidas Tarentinus on the same subject. (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 230; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. i. p. 163, No. xxxviii.) [P. S.]

EUGENI'ANUS (Ἐυγενιανός), a physician in the latter half of the second century after Christ, a friend and contemporary, and probably also a pupil of Galen, with whom he was acquainted while they were both at Rome. (Galen. de Meth. Med. viii. 2. vol. x. p. 535, 536.) It was at his request that Galen was induced to resume his work "De Methodo Medendi," which he had begun to write for the use of Hieron, and which he had laid aside after his death. (Ibid. vii. 1. p. 456.) It was also at his request that Galen wrote his work "De Ordine Librorum Suorum," (vol. xiv. p. 49.) [W. A. G.]

M. EUGENICUS, a brother of Joannes Eugenius, who was a celebrated ecclesiastical writer, none of whose works, however, has yet appeared in print. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 653.) M. Eugenius was by birth a Greek, and in early life he was engaged as a schoolmaster and teacher of rhetoric. But his great learning and his eloquence raised him to the highest dignities in the church, and about A. D. 1436 he succeeded Josephus as archbishop of Ephesus. Two years later, he accompanied the emperor Joannes Palaeologus to the council of Florence, in which he took a very prominent part; for he represented not only his own diocese, but acted as proxy for the patriarchs of Antioch and Jerusalem. He opposed the Latin church with as much bitterness as he defended the rights of the Greek church with zeal. In the beginning of the discussions at the council, this disposition drew upon him the displeasure of the emperor, who was anxious to reunite the two churches, and also of the pope Eugenius. This gave rise to most vehement disputes, in which the Greeks chose Eugenius as their spokesman and champion. As he was little acquainted with the dialectic subtleties and the scholastic philosophy, in which the prelates of the West far surpassed him, he was at first defeated by the cardinal Julian; but afterwards, when Bessarion became his ally, the eloquence of Eugenius threw all the council into amazement. The vehemence and bitterness of his invectives against the Latins, however, was so great, that a report was soon spread and believed, that he was out of his mind; and even Bessarion called him an evil spirit (caecodæmon). At the close of the council, when the other bishops were ready to acknowledge the claims of the pope, and were ordered by the emperor to sign the decrees of the council, Eugenius alone steadfastly refused to yield, and neither threats nor promises could induce him to alter his determination. The union of the two churches, however, was decreed. On his return to Constantinople, he was received by the people with the greatest enthusiasm, and the most extravagant veneration was paid him. During the remainder of his life he continued to oppose the Latin church wherever he could; and it was mainly owing to his influence that, after his death, the union was broken off. For, on his death-bed in 1447, he solemnly requested Georgius Scholarius, to continue the struggle against the Latins, which he himself had carried on, and Georgius promised, and faithfully kept his word. The funeral oration on Eugenius was delivered by the same friend, Georgius.

M. Eugenius was the author of many works, most of which were directed against the Latin church, whence they were attacked by those Greeks who were in favour of that church, such as Joseph of Methone, Bessarion, and others. The following are printed either entire or in part. 1. A Letter to the emperor Palaeologus, in which he cautions the Greeks against the council of Florence, and exposes the intrigues of the Latins. It is printed, with a Latin version and an answer by Joseph of Methone, in Labbeus, Concil. vol. xiii. p. 677. 2. A Circular, addressed to all Christendom, on the same subject, is printed in Labbeus, l. c. p. 740, with an answer by Gregorius Protosyncellus. 3. A Treatise on Liturgical Subjects, in which he maintains the spiritual power of the priesthood. It is printed in the Liturgiae, p. 138, ed. Paris, 1560. 4. A Profession of Faith, of which a fragment, with a Latin translation, is printed in Allatius, de Consensu, iii. 3. § 4. 5. A Letter to the emperor Palaeologus, of which a fragment is given in Allatius, de Synodo Octava, 14, p. 544. His other works are still extant in MS., but have never been published. A list of them is given by Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 670, &c.; comp. Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. Appendix, p. 111, &c.) [L. S.]

EUGENIUS, an African confessor, not less celebrated for his learning and sanctity than for the courage with which he advocated the doctrines of the orthodox faith during the persecution of the Arian Vandals towards the close of the fifth century. At first tolerated by Hunneric, who acquiesced in his elevation to the see of Carthage in A. D. 480, he was subsequently transported by that prince, after the stormy council held in February A. D. 484, to the deserts of Tripoli, from whence he was recalled by the tardy clemency of Gundamund, but eight years afterwards was arrested, tried and condemned to death by Thrasimund, who, however, commuted the sentence to banishment. The place fixed upon was Vienne in Languedoc, where Alaric at that period held sway. Here Eugenius founded a monastery near the tomb of St. Amaranthus, where he passed his time in devout tranquillity until his death on the 13th of July A. D. 505.

Under the name of Eugenius we possess a confession of faith drawn up in accordance with the doctrines recognised by the council of Nicaea, and presented on the part of the orthodox African prelates to Hunneric, under the title, Professio fidei Catholicorum episcoporum Hunnerico regi oblata. It will be found in the Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun. 1677, vol. viii. p. 683, and an account of its contents in Schröck, Kirchengeschichte, vol. xviii. p. 97. Gennadius mentions several other works by this author, but they no longer exist. For the original documents connected with the Vandal persecution see "Victor Vitensis de persecutione Vandalica" with the notes of Ruinart, Paris, 1694; the "Vita S. Fulgentii" in the Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun.

EUGENIUS, who was bishop of Toledo from A. D. 646 to 657, is mentioned under DRACONTIUS as the editor and enlarger of the work by Dracontius upon the Creation. He is known also as the author of thirty-two short original poems composed on a great variety of subjects, chiefly however moral and religious, in heroic, elegiac, trochaic, and sapphic measures. These were published by Sirmond at Paris, 8vo. 1619, will be found also in the collected works of Sirmond (Paris 1696 and Venice 1728), in the Bibl. Patr. Max. Lugdun. 1677, vol. xii. p. 345, and in the edition of Dracontius by Rivinus, Lipsæ. 1651. Two Epigrams by Eugenius—one on the invention of letters, the other on the names of hybrid animals, are contained in the Anthologia Latina of Burmann, ii. 264, v. 164, or n. 386, 387, ed. Meyer. [W. R.]

EUGENIUS, praefectus praetorio Orientis in A. D. 547 or 540. He was the author of an Edict concerning the accounts of publicans, which is inserted in the collection of the Edicts praefectorum praetorio. (Biener, Geschichte der Novellen Justinians, p. 532; Zachariae, Anecdota, p. 261.) [J. T. G.]

EUGENIUS, a Greek physician, of whom it is only known that he must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ, as one of his medical formulae is quoted by Andromachus. (ap. Galen. de Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vii. 6. vol. xiii. p. 114.) He is also quoted by Gariopontus (de Febr. c. 7), from which it would appear either that some of his works were extant in the eleventh century, or that some sources of information concerning him were then to be had which do not now exist. [W. A. G.]

EU'GEON (Εὐγόων or Εὐγόων), of Samos, one of the earliest Greek historians mentioned by Dionsysius of Halicarnassus. (Jud. de Thucyd. 5; comp. Suid. s. v.) [L. S.]

EUGESIPPUS (Εὐγεσίππος), the author of a work on the distances of places in the Holy Land, of which a Latin translation is printed in Leo Allatius' Συμπυρρά. He lived about A. D. 1040, but no particulars are known about him. [L. S.]

EUGRAPHIUS, a Latin grammarian, who is believed to have flourished as late as the end of the tenth century, is the author of a few unimportant notes upon Terence, referring chiefly to the prologues. They were first published by Faernus (Florent. 8vo. 1565), were subsequently improved and enlarged by Lindenbrogius (4to. Paris, 1502, Franc. 1623) and Westerhiovius (Hag. Com. 4to. 1726), and are given in all the more complete editions of the dramatist. We hear also of a MS. in the Bibliothèque du Roi at Paris, intitled Commentum in Terentium, bearing the name of Eugraphius, which Lindenbrogius did not think worth publishing. [W. R.]

EU'HODUS, a freedman of the emperor Septimius Severus and tutor to Caracalla, who was nursed by his wife Euhodia. At the instigation of the young prince he contrived the ruin of the too powerful Plautianus [PLAUTIANUS]; but although loaded with honours on account of this good service, he was put to death in A. D. 211, almost immediately after the accession of his foster-son, from a suspicion, probably, that he entertained friendly feelings towards the hated Geta. When Tertullian

(ed Scap. c. 4) says that young Antoninus was reared upon Christian milk, he refers to Proculus, the steward of Euhodus, for there is no reason to believe that either Euhodus or his wife professed the true faith, as some have imagined. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 3, 6, lxxvii. 1.) [W. R.]

EVIPPE (Ἐβίππη), the name of five mythological personages, concerning whom nothing of interest is related. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Paus. ix. 34. § 5; Parthen. Errat. 3; Eratosth. Catast. 18; Or. Met. v. 303.) [L. S.]

EVIPPUS (Ἐβίππος). 1. A son of Thestius and Eurythemia, who, together with his brothers, was killed by Meleager. (Apollod. i. 7. § 10, 8. § 3.)

2. A son of Megareus, who was killed by the Cithæronæan lion. (Paus. i. 41. § 4.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Il. xvi. 417; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀλδάρδα.) [L. S.]

EULAEUS (Ἐδλαῖος), an eunuch, became one of the regents of Egypt and guardians of Ptolemy Philometor on the death of Cleopatra, the mother of the latter, in B. C. 173. The young king was then 13 years old, and he is said to have been brought up in the greatest luxury and effeminacy by Eulæus, who hoped to render his own influence permanent by the corruption and consequent weakness of Ptolemy. It was Eulæus who, by refusing the chairs of Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) to the provinces of Coelo-Syria and Palestine, involved Egypt in the disastrous war with Syria in B. C. 171. (Polyb. xxviii. 16; Diod. Fragm. lib. xxx. Exc. de Leg. xviii. p. 624, de Virt. et Vit. p. 579; Liv. xlii. 29, xlv. 11, 12; App. Syr. 66; Just. xxxiv. 2.) [E. E.]

EULO'GIUS. [ECLOGIUS.]

EULO'GIUS, FAVONIUS, a rhetorician of Carthage, and a contemporary and disciple of St. Augustine. (August. de Cur. pro Mort. 11.) Under his name we possess a disputation on Cicero's Somnium Scipionis, which contains various discussions on points of the Pythagorean doctrine of numbers. The treatise was first printed by A. Schott at the end of his Quæstiones Tullianæ (Antwerp, 1613, 8vo.), and afterwards in the edition of Cicero's de Officiis, by Grævius (1688), from which it is reprinted with some improvements in Orelli's edition of Cicero, vol. v. part. 1, pp. 397—413. [L. S.]

EUMACHUS (Εὐμαχος). 1. A Corinthian, son of Chrysis, was one of the generals sent by the Corinthians in the winter of B. C. 431 in command of an armament to restore Evarchus, tyrant of Astacus, who had been recently expelled by the Athenians. (Thuc. ii. 33.)

2. A native of Neapolis, who, according to Athenæus (xiii. p. 577), wrote a work entitled Ἱστορίαι τῶν περὶ Ἀντίβας. It is perhaps the same Eumachus of whose work entitled Nephegrionis a fragment is still extant in Phlegon. (Mirab. c. 18.) [C. P. M.]

EUMAEUS (Εὐμαῖος), the famous and faithful swineherd of Odysseus, was a son of Ctesius, king of the island of Syria; he had been carried away from his father's house by a Phœnician slave, and Phœnician sailors sold him to Laërtes, the father of Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xv. 403, &c.; comp. Odysseus.) [L. S.]

EUMARIDAS (Εὐμαρίδας), of Paros, a Pythagorean philosopher, who is mentioned by Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth. 36); but it is uncertain whether the reading is correct, and whether we ought not to read Thymaridas, who is known as a celebrated Pythagorean. (Iamb. l. c. 23, with Kiessling's note.) [L. S.]

EUMARUS, a very ancient Greek painter of monochromes, was the first, according to Pliny, who distinguished, in painting, the male from the female, and who "dared to imitate all figures." His invention was improved upon by Simon of Cleonæ. (xxv. 8. s. 34.) Müller (Arch. d. Kunst, § 74) supposes that the distinction was made by a difference of colouring; but Pliny's words seem rather to refer to the drawing of the figure. [P. S.]

EUMA'THIUS. [EUSTATHIUS, No. 5.]

EUMELUS (Εὐμηλος), a son of Admetus and Alcesteis, who went with eleven ships and warriors from Phærae, Boeæ, Glaphyræ, and Ialocus to Troy. He was distinguished for his excellent horses, which had once been under the care of Apollo, and with which Eumelus would have gained the prize at the funeral games of Patroclus, if his chariot had not been broken. He was married to Iphthima, the daughter of Icarus. (Hom. Il. ii. 711, &c. 764, xxiii. 375, 536, Od. iv. 798; Strab. ix. p. 436.) There are three other mythological personages of this name. (Anton. Lib. 15, 18; Paus. vii. 18. § 2.) [L. S.]

EUMELUS (Εὐμηλος), one of the three sons of Parysades, King of Bosphorus. After his father's death he engaged in a war for the crown with his brothers Satyrus and Prytanis, who were successively killed in battle. Eumelus reigned most prosperously for five years and five months, A. C. 309—304. (Diod. xx. 22—26; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. pp. 282, 285.) [P. S.]

EUMELUS (Εὐμηλος). 1. Of Corinth, the son of Amphilytus, a very ancient Epic poet, belonged, according to some, to the Epic cycle. His name, like Eucheir, Eugrammus, &c., is significant, referring to his skill in poetry. He was of the noble house of the Bacchiadæ, and flourished about the 5th Olympiad, according to Eusebius (Chron. *), who makes him contemporary with Arctinus. (Comp. Cynil, c. Julian. i. p. 13; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 144.)

Those of the poems ascribed to him, which appear pretty certainly genuine, were genealogical and historical legends. To this class belonged his Corinthian History (Pana. ii. 1. § 1, 2. § 2, 3. § 8; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 148; Tzet. Schol. ad Lycophr. 1024, comp. 174, 480), his προσβίον ἐς Ἀἴαντα, from which some lines are quoted by Pausanias, who considered it the only genuine work of Eumelus (iv. 4. § 1, 33. §§ 2, 3, v. 19. § 2), and the Europia (Euseb. l. c.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 151; Schol. ad Hom. Il. ii. p. 121.) He also wrote Bougonia, a poem on bees, which the Greeks called Βουγόνα and Βουγυεῖς. (Euseb. l. c.; Varro. R. R. ii. 5. § 5, ed. Schneid.) Some writers ascribed to him a Τριτανόμαχία, which also was attributed to Arctinus. (Athen. vii. p. 277, d., comp. i. p. 22, c.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. i. 1165.)

The cyclic poem on the return of the Greeks from Troy (νόστος) is ascribed to Eumelus by a Scholiast on Pindar (Ol. xiii. 31), who writes the name wrongly, Eumolpus. The lines quoted by this Scholiast are also given by Pausanias, under the name of Eumelus. (Vossius, de Hist. Græcæ pp. 5, 6, ed. Westermann; Welcker, die Epische Cyclic, p. 274.)

* A little lower, Eusebius places him again at Ol. 9, but the former date seems the more correct.

2. A Peripatetic philosopher, who wrote περί τῆς ἀρχαίας κομῆδας. (Schol. MS. ad Aeschin. c. Ti-march. § 39. 4.) Perhaps he is the same from whom Diogenes Laërtius (v. 5) quotes an account of the death of Aristotle. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 8.) [P. S.]

EUMELUS (Εὐμήλος), a painter, whose productions were distinguished for their beauty. There was a Helen by him in the forum at Rome. He probably lived about A. D. 190. (Philostr. Imag. Proem. p. 4; Vit. Soph. ii. 5.) He is supposed to have been the teacher of Aristodemus, whose school was frequented by the elder Philostratus. [P. S.]

EUMELUS (Εὐμήλος), a veterinary surgeon, of whom nothing is known except that he was a native of Thebes. (Hippiatr. p. 12.) He may perhaps have lived in the fourth or fifth century after Christ. Some fragments, which are all that remain of his writings, are to be found in the Collection of Writers on Veterinary Surgery, first published in Latin by J. Ruellius, Paris, 1530, fol., and in Greek by S. Grynaeus, Basil, 1537, 4to. [W. A. G.]

EUMENES (Εὐμένης). 1. Ruler or dynast of the city of Amastria on the Euxine, contemporary with Antiochus Soter. The citizens of Heracleia wished to purchase from him his sovereignty, as Amastria had formerly belonged to them; but to this he refused to accede. He, however, soon after gave up the city to Ariobarzanes, king of Pontus. (Memnon, 16, ed. Orelli.) Droysen (Hel-lenismus, vol. ii. p. 230) supposes this Eumenes to be the nephew of Philaetærus, who afterwards became king of Pergamus [EUMENES I.]; but there do not seem any sufficient grounds for this identification.

EU'MENES (Εὐμένης) of CARDIA, secretary to Alexander the Great, and after his death one of the most distinguished generals among his successors. The accounts of his origin vary considerably, some representing his father as a poor man, who was obliged to subsist by his own labour, others as one of the most distinguished citizens of his native place. (Plut. Eum. i; Corn. Nep. Eum. i; Aelian, V. H. xii. 43.) The latter statements are upon all accounts the most probable: it is certain, at least, that he received a good education, and having attracted the attention of Philip of Macedon on occasion of his visiting Cardia, was taken by that king to his court, and employed as his private secretary. In this capacity he soon rose to a high place in his confidence, and after his death continued to discharge the same office under Alexander, whom he accompanied throughout his expedition in Asia, and who seems to have treated him at all times with the most marked confidence and distinction, of which he gave a striking proof about two years before his death, by giving him in marriage Artonia, a Persian princess, the daughter of Artabazus, at the same time that he himself married Statoris, the daughter of Dareius. (Arrian, Anab. vii. 4.) A still stronger evidence of the favour which Eumenes enjoyed with Alexander is, that he was able to maintain his ground against the influence of Hephaestion, with whom he was continually at enmity. (Arrian, Anab. vii. 13, 14; Plut. Eum. 2.) Nor were his services confined to those of his office as secretary: he was more than once employed by Alexander in military commands, and was ultimately appointed by him to the post of hipparch or leader of one of the chief divisions of

In the discussions and tumults which ensued on the death of Alexander, Eumenes at first, aware of the jealousy with which as a Greek he was regarded by the Macedonian leaders, refrained from taking any part; but when matters came to an open rupture, he was mainly instrumental in bringing about a reconciliation between the two parties. In the division of the satrapies which followed, Eumenes obtained the government of Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus: but as these provinces had never yet been conquered, and were still in the hands of Ariarathes, Antigonus and Leonnatus were appointed to reduce them for him. Antigonus, however, disdained compliance, and Leonnatus was quickly called off to Greece by his ambitious projects. [LEONNATUS.] In these he endeavoured to persuade Eumenes, who had accompanied him into Phrygia, to join; but the latter, instead of doing so, abruptly quitted him, and hastening to Perdiccas, revealed to him the designs of Leonnatus. By this proof of his fidelity, he secured the favour of the regent, who henceforward reposed his chief confidence in him. As an immediate reward, Perdiccas proceeded in person to subdue for him the promised satrapies, defeated and put to death Ariarathes, and established Eumenes in the full possession of his government, A. C. 322. (Plut. Eum. 3; Diod. xviii. 3, 16; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 69, a; Corn. Nep. Eum. 2.) Here, however, he did not long remain, but accompanied the regent and the royal family into Cilicia. In the following spring, when Perdiccas determined to proceed in person against Ptolemy, he committed to Eumenes the chief command in Asia Minor, and ordered him to repair at once to the Hellespont, to make head against Antipater and Craterus. Eumenes took advantage of the interval before their arrival to raise a numerous and excellent body of cavalry out of Paphlagonia, to which he was indebted for many of his subsequent victories. Meanwhile, a new enemy arose against him in Neoptolemus, governor of Armenia, who had been placed under his command by Perdiccas, but then revolted from him, and entered into correspondence with Antipater and Craterus. Eumenes, however, defeated him before the arrival of his confederates, and then turned to meet Craterus, who was advancing against him, and to whom Neoptolemus had made his escape after his own defeat. The battle that ensued was decisive; for although the Macedonian phalanx suffered but little, Craterus himself fell, and Neoptolemus was slain by Eumenes with his own hand, after a deadly struggle in the presence of the two armies. (Plut. Eum. 4—7; Diod. xviii. 29—32; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 70, b, 71, a; Corn. Nep. Eum. 3, 4; Justin, xiii. 6, 8.) This took place in the summer of 321 B. C.

But while Eumenes was thus triumphant in Asia, Perdiccas had met with repeated disasters in Egypt, and had finally fallen a victim to the discontent of his troops, just before the news arrived of the victory of Eumenes and the death of Craterus. It came too late: the tide was now turned, and the intelligence excited the greatest indignation among the Macedonian soldiers, who had been particularly attached to Craterus, and who hated Eumenes as a foreigner, for such they considered him. A general assembly of the army was held, in which Eumenes, Attalus, and Alcetas, the remaining leaders of the party of Perdiccas, were condemned to death. The conduct of the war against them was assigned to Antigonus; but he did not take the field until the following summer (a. c. 320). Eumenes had wintered at Celsæne in Phrygia, and strengthened himself by all means in his power, but he was unable to make head against Antigonus, who defeated him in the plains of Orcynium in Cappadocia; and finding himself unable to effect his retreat into Armenia, as he had designed to do, he adopted the resolution of disbanding the rest of his army, and throwing himself, with only 700 troops, into the small but impregnable fortress of Nora, on the confines of Lycania and Cappadocia. (Plut. Eum. 8—10; Diod. xviii. 37, 40, 41; Corn. Nep. Eum. 5.) Here he was closely blockaded by the forces of Antigonus; but, confident in the strength of his post, refused all offers of capitulation, and awaited the result of external changes. It was not long before these took place: the death of Antipater caused a complete alteration in the relations of the different leaders; and Antigonus, who was anxious to obtain the assistance of Eumenes, made him the most plausible offers, of which the latter only availed himself so far as enabled him to quit his mountain fortress, in which he had now held out nearly a year, and withdraw to Cappadocia. Here he was busy in levying troops and gathering his friends together, when he received letters from Polysperchon and Olympias, entreating his support, and granting him, in the name of the king, the supreme command throughout Asia. Eumenes was, whether from interest or from real attachment, always disposed to espouse the cause of the royal family of Macedonia, and gladly embraced the offer: he eluded the pursuit of Menander, who marched against him by order of Antigonus, and arrived in Cilicia, where he found the select body of Macedonian veterans called the Argyraspids, under Antigones and Teutamus. These, as well as the royal treasures deposited at Quinda, had been placed at his disposal by Polysperchon and Olympias: but though welcomed at first with apparent enthusiasm, Eumenes was well aware of the jealousy with which he was regarded, and even sought to avoid the appearance of commanding the other generals by the singular expedient of erecting a tent in which the throne, the crown and sceptre of Alexander were preserved, and where all councils of war were held, as if in the presence of the deceased monarch. (Plut. Eum. 11—13; Diod. xviii. 42, 53, 58—61; Polyæn. iv. 8 § 2; Justin. xiv. 2.) By these and other means Eumenes succeeded in conciliating the troops under his command, so that they rejected all the attempts made by Ptolemy and Antigonus to corrupt their fidelity. At the same time he made extensive levies of mercenaries, and having assembled in all a numerous army, he advanced into Phœnicia, with the view of reducing the maritime towns, and sending a fleet from thence to the assistance of Polysperchon. This plan was, however, frustrated by the arrival of the fleet of Antigonus, and the advance of that general himself with a greatly superior force. Eumenes in consequence retired into the interior of Asia, and took up his winter-quarters in Babylonia. (Diod. xviii. 61—63, 73.)

vanced into Susiana, where he was joined by Peucestes at the head of all the forces of Media, Persia, and the other provinces of Upper Asia. Still he did not choose to await here the advance of Antigonus; and leaving a strong garrison to guard the royal treasures at Susa, he took post with his army behind the Pasitigris. Antigonus, who had followed him out of Babylonia, and effected his junction with Seleucus and Pithon, now marched against him; but having met with a check at the river Copratas, withdrew by a cross march through a difficult country into Media, while Eumenes took up his quarters at Persepolis. He had many difficulties to contend with, not only from the enemy, but from the discontent of his own troops, the relaxation of their discipline when they were allowed to remain in the luxurious provinces of Persia, and above all from the continual jealousies and intrigues of the generals and satraps under his command. But whenever they were in circumstances of difficulty or in presence of the enemy, all were at once ready to acknowledge his superiority, and leave him the uncontrolled direction of everything. The two armies first met on the confines of Gabiene, when a pitched battle ensued, with no decided advantage to either side; after which Antigonus withdrew to Gadamarga in Media, while Eumenes established his winter-quarters in Gabiene. Here Antigonus attempted to surprise him by a sudden march in the depth of the winter; but he was too wary to be taken unprepared: he contrived by a stratagem to delay the march of his adversary until he had time to collect his scattered forces, and again bring matters to the issue of a pitched battle. Neither party obtained a complete victory, and Eumenes would have renewed the combat the next day; but the baggage of the Macedonian troops had fallen into the hands of the enemy, and the Argyraspids, furious at their loss, agreed to purchase its restoration from Antigonus by delivering up their general into his hands. The latter is said to have been at first disposed to spare the life of his captive, which he was strongly urged to do by Nearchus and the young Demetrius; but all his other officers were of the contrary opinion, and Eumenes was put to death a few days after he had fallen into the hands of the enemy. (Plut. Eum. 13—19; Diod. xix. 12—15, 17—34, 37—44; Corn. Nep. Eum. 7—12; Justin. xiv. 3, 4; Polyæn. iv. 8 § 3, 4.) These events took place in the winter of 317 to 316 a. c.*

Eumenes was only forty-five years old at the time of his death. (Corn. Nep. Eum. 13.) Of his consummate ability, both as a general and a statesman, no doubt can be entertained; and it is probable that he would have attained a far more important position among the successors of Alexander, had it not been for the accidental disadvantage of his birth. But as a Greek of Cardia, and not a native Macedonian, he was constantly looked upon with dislike, and even with contempt, both by his opponents and companions in arms, at the very time that they were compelled to bow beneath his genius. This prejudice was throughout the greatest obstacle with which he had to contend, and it may be regarded as the highest proof of his ability that he overcame it even to the extent to which he was able. It must be borne in mind also, if we praise him for his fidelity to the royal house of Macedonia, that this same disadvantage, by rendering it impossible for him to aspire to any independent authority, made it as much his interest as his duty to uphold the legitimate occupants of the throne of Alexander. He is described by Plutarch (Eum. 11) as a man of polished manners and appearance; with the air of a courtier rather than a warrior; and his oratory was more subtle and plausible than energetic. Craft and caution seem indeed to have been the prevailing points in his character; though he was able also to exhibit, when called for, the utmost energy and activity. [E. H. B.]

* In the relation of these events, the chronology of Droysen has been followed. Mr. Clinton (who places the death of Eumenes early in 315 a. c.) appears to have been misled by attaching too much importance to the archonships, as mentioned by Diodorus. See Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachf. p. 269, not.

EUMENES (Εὐμένης) I., king, or rather ruler, of PERGAMUS. He was the son of Eumenes, brother of Philætaerus, and succeeded his uncle in the government of Pergamus (B. C. 263), over which he reigned for two-and-twenty years. Soon after his accession he obtained a victory near Sardis over Antiochus Soter, and was thus enabled to establish his dominion over the provinces in the neighbourhood of his capital; but no further particulars of his reign are recorded. (Strab. xiii. p. 624; Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 401.) According to Athenæus (x. p. 445, d.), his death was occasioned by a fit of drunkenness. He was succeeded by his cousin Attalus, also a nephew of Philætaerus. It appears to be to this Eumenes (though styled by mistake king of Bithynia) that Justin (xxvii. 3) ascribes, without doubt erroneously, the great victory over the Gauls, which was in fact gained by his successor Attalus. [ATTALUS I., vol. i. p. 410, a.] [E. H. B.]

EUMENES (Εὐμένης) II., king of PERGAMUS son of Attalus I., whom he succeeded on the throne B. C. 197. (Clinton, F. H. iii. p. 403.) He inherited from his predecessor the friendship and alliance of the Romans, which he took the utmost pains to cultivate, and was included by them in the treaty of peace concluded with Philip, king of Macedonia, in 196, by which he obtained possession of the towns of Oreus and Eretria in Eubœa. (Liv. xxxiii. 30, 34.) In the following year he sent a fleet to the assistance of Flamininus in the war against Nabis. (Liv. xxxiv. 26.) His alliance was in vain courted by his powerful neighbour, Antiochus III., who offered him one of his daughters in marriage. (Appian, Syr. 5.) Eumenes plainly saw that it was his interest to adhere to the Romans in the approaching contest; and far from seeking to avert this, he used all his endeavours to urge on the Romans to engage in it. When hostilities had actually commenced, he was active in the service of his allies, both by sending his fleet to support that of the Romans under Livius and Aemilius, and facilitating the important passage of the Hellespont. In the decisive battle of Magnesia (B. C. 190), he commanded in person the troops which he furnished as auxiliaries to the Roman army, and appears to have rendered valuable services. (Liv. xxxv. 13, xxxvi. 43—45, xxxvii. 14, 18, 33, 37, 41; Appian, Syr. 22, 25, 31, 33, 38, 43; Justin, xxxi. 8.) Immediately on the conclusion of peace, he hastened to Rome, to put forward in person his claims to reward: his pretensions were favourably received by the senate, who granted him the possession of Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygia, and Lycaonia, as well as of Lyimachia, and the Thracian Chersonese. By this means Eumenes found himself raised at once from a state of comparative insignificance to be the sovereign of a powerful monarchy. (Liv. xxxvii. 45, 52—55, xxxviii. 39; Polyb. xxii. 1—4, 7, 27; Appian, Syr. 44.) About the same time, he married the daughter of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and procured from the Romans favourable terms for that monarch. (Liv. xxxviii. 39.) This alliance was the occasion of involving him in a war with Pharnaces, king of Pontus, who had invaded Cappadocia, but which was ultimately terminated by the intervention of Rome. (Polyb. xxv. 2, 4, 5, 6, xxvi. 4.) He was also engaged in hostilities with Prusias, king of Bithynia, which gave the Romans a pretext for interfering, not only to protect Eumenes, but to compel Prusias to give up Hannibal, who had taken refuge at his court. (Liv. xxxix. 46, 51; Justin. xxxii. 4; Corn. Nep. Hann. 10.)

During all this period, Eumenes enjoyed the highest favour at Rome, and certainly was not backward in availing himself of it. He was continually sending embassies thither, partly to cultivate the good understanding with the senate in which he now found himself, but frequently also to complain of the conduct of his neighbours, especially of the Macedonian kings, Philip and his successor, Perseus. In 172, to give more weight to his remonstrances, he a second time visited Rome in person, where he was received with the utmost distinction. On his return from thence, he visited Delphi, where he narrowly escaped a design against his life formed by the emissaries of Perseus. (Liv. xlii. 11—16; Diod. Ecc. Leg. p. 623, Ecc. Valer. p. 577; Appian, Mac. Exc. 9, pp. 519—526, ed. Schweigh.) But though he was thus apparently on terms of the bitterest hostility with the Macedonian monarch, his conduct during the war that followed was not such as to give satisfaction to the Romans; and he was suspected of corresponding secretly with Perseus, a charge which, according to Polybius, was not altogether unfounded; but his designs extended only to the obtaining from that prince a sum of money for procuring him a peace on favourable terms. (Polyb. Fragm. Vatican. pp. 427—429; Liv. xlii. 13, 24, 25; Appian, Mac. Exc. 16, pp. 531—2.) His overtures were, however, rejected by Perseus, and after the victory of the Romans (B. C. 167), he hastened to send his brother Attalus to the senate with his congratulations. They did not choose to take any public notice of what had passed, and dismissed Attalus with fair words; but when Eumenes, probably alarmed at finding his schemes discovered, determined to proceed to Rome in person, the senate passed a decree to forbid it, and finding that he was already arrived at Brundisium, ordered him to quit Italy without delay. (Polyb. xxx. 17, Fragm. Vatican. p. 428; Liv. Epid. xlii.) Henceforward he was constantly regarded with suspicion by the Roman senate, and though his brother Attalus, whom he sent to Rome again in B. C. 160, was received with marked favour, this seems to have been for the very purpose of exciting him against Eumenes, who had sent him, and inducing him to set up for himself. (Polyb. xxxii. 5.) The last years of the reign of Eumenes seem to have been disturbed by frequent hostilities on the part of Prusias, king of Bithynia, and the Gauls of Galatia;

but he had the good-fortune or dexterity to avoid coming to an open rupture either with Rome or his brother Attalus. (Polyb. xxxi. 9, xxxii. 5; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vales. p. 582.) His death, which is not mentioned by any ancient writer, must have taken place in B. C. 159, after a reign of 39 years. (Strab. xiii. p. 624; Clinton, P. H. iii. pp. 403, 406.)

According to Polybius (xxxii. 23), Eumenes was a man of a feeble bodily constitution, but of great vigour and power of mind, which is indeed sufficiently evinced by the history of his reign: his policy was indeed crafty and temporizing, but indicative of much sagacity; and he raised his kingdom from a petty state to one of the highest consideration. All the arts of peace were assiduously protected by him: Pergamus itself became under his rule a great and flourishing city, which he adorned with splendid buildings, and in which he founded that celebrated library which rose to be a rival even to that of Alexandria. (Strab. xiii. p. 624.) It would be unjust to Eumenes not to add the circumstance mentioned by Polybius in his praise, that he continued throughout his life on the best terms with all his three brothers, who cheerfully lent their services to support him in his power. One of these, Attalus, was his immediate successor, his son Attalus being yet an infant. (Polyb. xxxii. 23; Strab. xiii. p. 624.) A detailed account of the reign of Eumenes will be found in Van Cappelle, Commentatio de Regibus et Antiquitatibus Pergamensis, Amstel. 1842. [E. H. B.]

EUMENIDES (Εὐμενίδης), also called ERINNYES, and by the Romans FURIAE or DIRAE, were originally nothing but a personification of curses pronounced upon a guilty criminal. The name Erinny, which is the more ancient one, was derived by the Greeks from the verb ἐρίνω or ἐρινω, I hunt up or persecute, or from the Arcadian word ἐρινω, I am angry; so that the Erinnyes were either the angry goddesses, or the goddesses who hunt up or search after the criminal. (Aeschyl. Eum. 499; Pind. Ol. ii. 45; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 18.) The name Eumenides, which signifies "the well-meaning," or "soothed goddesses," is a mere euphemism, because people dreaded to call these fearful goddesses by their real name, and it was said to have been first given them after the acquittal of Orestes by the court of the Areiopagus, when the anger of the Erinnyes had become soothed. (Soph. Oed. Col. 128; Schol. ad Oed. Col. 42; Said. s. v. Εὐμενίδης.) It was by a similar euphemism that at Athens the Erinnyes were called εὐμενὲς θεαί, or the venerable goddesses. (Paus. i. 26. § 6.) Servius (ad Aen. iv. 609) makes a distinction, according to which they bore the name Diae, when they were conceived as being in heaven by the throne of Zeus, Furiae, when conceived as being on earth, and Eumenides, as beings of the lower world; but this seems to be a purely arbitrary distinction.

In the sense of curse or cursees, the word Erinnyes or Erinyes is often used in the Homeric poems (Il. ix. 454, xxi. 412, Od. xi. 280), and Aeschylus (Choeph. 406) calls the Eumenides Ἀπά, that is, curse. According to the Homeric notion, the Erinnyes, whom the poet conceives as distinct beings, are reckoned among those who inhabit Erebus, where they rest until some curse pronounced upon a criminal calls them to life and activity. (Il. ix. 571, Od. xv. 234.) The crimes which they punish are disobedience towards parents, violation of the respect due to old age, perjury, murder, violation of the law of hospitality, and improper conduct towards suppliants. (Hom. Il. ix. 454, xv. 204, xix. 259, Od. ii. 136, xvii. 475.) The notion which is the foundation of the belief in the Eumenides seems to be, that a parent's curse takes from him upon whom it is pronounced all peace of mind, destroys the happiness of his family, and prevents his being blessed with children. (Herod. iv. 149; Aeschyl. Eum. 835.) As the Eumenides not only punished crimes after death, but during life on earth, they were conceived also as goddesses of fate, who, together with Zeus and the Moerae or Parcae, led such men as were doomed to suffer into misery and misfortunes. (Hom. Il. xix. 87, Od. xv. 234.) In the same capacity they also prevented man from obtaining too much knowledge of the future. (Il. xix. 418.) Homer does not mention any particular names of the Erinnyes, nor does he seem to know of any definite number. Hesiod, who is likewise silent upon these points, calls the Erinnyes the daughters of Ge, who conceived them in the drops of blood that fell upon her from the body of Uranus. (Theog. 185; comp. Apollod. i. 1. § 4.) Epimenides called them the daughters of Cronos and Eunoymie, and sisters of the Moerae (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 406; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 42); Aeschylus (Eum. 321) calls them the daughters of Night; and Sophocles (Oed. Col. 40, 106) of Scotos (Darkness) and Ge. (Comp. some other genealogies in Hygin. Fab. p. 1; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 327; Orph. Hymn. 69. 2.) The Greek tragedians, with whom, as in the Eumenides of Aeschylus, the number of these goddesses is not limited to a few (Dyer, in the Class. Museum, vol. i. pp. 281-298; comp. Eurip. Iphig. Taur. 970; Virg. Aen. iv. 469), no particular name of any one Erinny is yet mentioned, but they appear in the same capacity, and as the avengers of the same crimes, as before. They are sometimes identified with the Poenae, though their sphere of action is wider than that of the Poenae. From their hunting up and persecuting the cursed criminal, Aeschylus (Eum. 231, Choeph. 1055) calls them κύνες or κυνηγέτιδες. No prayer, no sacrifice, and no tears can move them, or protect the object of their persecution (Aesch. Agam. 69, Eum. 384); and when they fear lest the criminal should escape them, they call in the assistance of Dicaë, with whom they are closely connected, the maintenance of strict justice being their only object. (Aesch. Eum. 511, 786; Orph. Argon. 350; Plut. de Exil. 11.) The Erinnyes were more ancient divinities than the Olympian gods, and were therefore not under the rule of Zeus, though they honoured and esteemed him (Eum. 918, 1002); and they dwell in the deep darkness of Tartarus, dreaded by gods and men. Their appearance is described by Aeschylus as Gorgo-like, their bodies covered with black, serpents twined in their hair, and blood dripping from their eyes; Euripides and other later poets describe them as winged beings. (Orest. 317, Iphig. Taur. 290; Virg. Aen. xii. 848; Orph. Hymn. 68. 5.) The appearance they have in Aeschylus was more or less retained by the poets of later times; but they gradually assumed the character of goddesses who punished crimes after death, and seldom appeared on earth. On the stage, however, and in works of art, their fearful appearance was greatly softened down, for they were represented as maidens of a grave and solemn mien, in the richly adorned attire of huntresses, with a band of serpents around their heads, and serpents or torches in their hands. With later writers, though not always, the number of Eumenides is limited to three, and their names are Tisiphone, Alecto, and Megaera. (Orph. Hymn. 68; Tetzl. ad Lycoph. 406; Virg. Aen. xii. 845.) At Athens there were statues of only two. (Schol. ad Oed. Col. 42.) The sacrifices which were offered to them consisted of black sheep and naphalia, i. e. a drink of honey mixed with water. (Schol. l. c.; Paus. ii. 11. § 4; Aeschyl. Eum. 107.) Among the things sacred to them we hear of white turtle-doves, and the narcissus. (Aelian, H. A. x. 33; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 87.) They were worshipped at Athens, where they had a sanctuary and a grotto near the Areiopagus: their statues, however, had nothing formidable (Paus. i. 28. § 6), and a festival Eumenideia was there celebrated in their honour. Another sanctuary, with a grove which no one was allowed to enter, existed at Colonus. (Soph. Oed. Col. 37.) Under the name of Mavla, they were worshipped at Megalopolis. (Paus. viii. 34. § 1.) They were also worshipped on the Asopus and at Ceryneia. (Paus. ii. 11. § 4, vii. 25. § 4; comp. Böttiger, Furienmaske, Weimar, 1801; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 201, &c.) [L.S.]

EUMENIUS, whose works are included in the collection which commonly bears the title "Duodecim Panegyrici Veteres" [DREPANUS], was a native of Autun, but a Greek by extraction; for his grandfather was an Athenian, who acquired celebrity at Rome as a teacher of rhetoric, and having subsequently removed to Gaul, practised his profession until past the age of eighty, in the city where his grandson, pupil, and successor, was born. Eumenius flourished towards the close of the third and at the beginning of the fourth centuries, and attained to such high reputation that he was appointed to the office of magister sacras memoriae, a sort of private secretary, in the court of Constantius Chlorus, by whom he was warmly esteemed and loaded with favours. The precise period of his death, as of his birth, is unknown, but we gather from his writings that he had, at all events, passed the prime of life. The city of Clèves at one period claimed him as their townsman, and set up an ancient statue, which they declared to be his effigy.

The pieces generally ascribed to this author are the following. 1. Oratio pro instaurantis scholis. Gaul had suffered fearfully from the oppression of its rulers, from civil discord, and from the incursions of barbarian foes, for half a century before the accession of Diocletian. During the reign of the second Claudius, Autun in particular, after sustaining a siege of seven months, was compelled to surrender to the half-savage Bagaydae, by whom it was almost reduced to ruins. Constantius Chlorus having resolved to restore not only the buildings of the city, but also to revive its famous school of rhetoric, called upon Eumenius, who, it would seem, had by this time retired from public life and was enjoying his dignities, to undertake the superintendence of the new seminary, allowing him, however, to retain his post at court, and at the same time doubling his salary, which thus amounted to the large sum of 600,000 sesterces, or about 5000*l.* per annum. The principal, before entering on his duties, delivered (A. D. 296 or 297) the oration now before us, in the presence of the praeses of Gallia Lugdunensis, in order that he might publicly acknowledge the liberality of the prince, might explain his own views as to the manner in which the objects in view could best be accomplished, and might declare his intention of carrying these plans into effect without any tax upon the public, by devoting one-half of his allowance to the support of the establishment. We find included (c. 14) an interesting letter addressed by Constantius to Eumenius.

2. Panegyricus Constantio Caesari dictus. A congratulatory address upon the recovery of Britain, delivered towards the close of A. D. 296, or the beginning of 297. [ALLECTUS; CARAUSIUS.]

3. Panegyricus Constantino Augusto dictus, pronounced at Treves, A. D. 310, on the birth-day of the city, in the presence of Constantine, containing an outline of the career of the emperor, in which all his deeds are magnified in most outrageous hyperboles. Heyne is unwilling to believe that Eumenius is the author of this declamation, which he considers altogether out of character with the moderation and good taste displayed in his other compositions. The chief evidence consists in certain expressions contained in chapters 22 and 23, where the speaker represents himself as a native of Autun, and, in the language of a man advanced in years, recommends to the patronage of the sovereign his five sons, one of whom is spoken of as discharging the duties of an office in the treasury.

4. Gratiarum actio Constantino Augusto Flavienus nomine. The city of Autun having experienced the liberality of Constantine, who in consideration of their recent misfortunes had relieved the inhabitants from a heavy load of taxation, assumed in honour of its patron the appellation of Flavia, and deputed Eumenius to convey to the prince expressions of gratitude. This address was spoken at Treves in the year A. D. 311.

EUMOLPUS (Εὐμόλπος), that is, "the good singer," a Thracian who is described as having come to Attica either as a bard, a warrior, or a priest of Demeter and Dionysus. The common tradition, which, however, is of late origin, represents him as a son of Poseidon and Chione, the daughter of Boreas and the Attic heroine Oreithya. According to the tradition in Apollodorus (iii. 15. § 4), Chione, after having given birth to Eumolpus in secret, threw the child into the sea. Poseidon, however, took him up, and had him educated in Ethiopia by his daughter Benthescyma. When he had grown up, he married a daughter of Benthescyma; but as he made an attempt upon the chastity of his wife's sister, Eumolpus and his son Ismarus were expelled, and they went to the Thracian king Tegyrius, who gave his daughter in marriage to Ismarus; but as Eumolpus drew upon himself the suspicion of Tegyrius, he was again obliged to take to flight, and came to Eleusis in Attica, where he formed a friendship with the Eleusinians. After the death of his son Ismarus, however, he returned to Thrace at the request of king Tegyrius. The Eleusinians, who were involved in a war with Athens, called Eumolpus to their assistance. Eumolpus came with a numerous band of Thracians, but he was slain by Erechtheus. The traditions about this Eleusinian war, however, differ very much. According to some, the Eleusinians under Eumolpus attacked the Athenians under Erechtheus, but were defeated, and Eumolpus with his two sons, Phorbas and Immaradus, were slain. (Thuc. ii. 15; Plut. Menez. p. 239; Isocrat. Panath. 78; Plut. Parall. Gr. et. Rom. 20; Schol. ad Eerip. Phoen. 854.) Pausanias (i. 38. § 3) relates a tradition that in the battle between the Eleusinians and Athenians, Erechtheus and Immaradus fell, and that thereupon peace was concluded on condition that the Eleusinians should in other respects be subject to Athens, but that they alone should have the celebration of their mysteries, and that Eumolpus and the daughters of Celeus should perform the customary sacrifices. When Eumolpus died, his younger son Ceryx succeeded him in the priestly office. According to Hyginus (Fab. 46; comp. Strab. vii. p. 321), Eumolpus came to Attica with a colony of Thracians, to claim the country as the property of his father, Poseidon. Mythology regards Eumolpus as the founder of the Eleusinian mysteries, and as the first priest of Demeter and Dionysus; the goddess herself taught him, Triptolemus, Diocles, and Celeus, the sacred rites, and he is therefore sometimes described as having himself invented the cultivation of the vine and of fruit-trees in general. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 476; Plin. H. N. vii. 53; Ov. Met. x. 93.) Respecting the privileges which his descendants enjoyed in Attica, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Εὐμόλπιδαι. As Eumolpus was regarded as an ancient priestly bard, poems and writings on the mysteries were fabricated and circulated at a later time under his name. One hexameter line of a Dionysiac hymn, ascribed to him, is preserved in Diodorus. (i. 11; Suid. s. v.) The legends connected him also with Hercules, whom he is said to have instructed in music, or initiated into the mysteries. (Hygin. Fab. 273; Theocrit. xxiv. 108; Apollod. ii. 5. § 12.) The difference in the traditions about Eumolpus led some of the ancients to suppose that two or three persons of that name ought to be distinguished. (Hesych. s. v. Εὐμόλπιδαι; Schol. ad Acad. Col. 1051; Phot. Lex. s. v. Εὐμόλπιδαι.) The tomb of Eumolpus was shewn both at Eleusis and Athens. (Paus. i. 38. § 2.) [L. S.]

EUNA'PIUS (Εὐνάπιος), a Greek sophist and historian, was born at Sardis in A. D. 347, and seems to have lived till the reign of the emperor Theodosius the Younger. He received his first education from his kinsman Chrysanthius, a sophist at Sardis, who implanted in him that love of the pagan and that hatred of the Christian religion which so strongly marked his productions. In his sixteenth year he went to Athens to cultivate his mind under the auspices of Proaerarius, who conceived the greatest esteem for the youth, and loved him like his own son. After a stay of five years, he prepared to travel to Egypt, but it would seem that this plan was not carried into effect, and that he was called back to Phrygia. He was also skilled in the medical art. During the latter period of his life, he seems to have been settled at Athens, and engaged in teaching rhetoric. He is the author of two works. 1. Lives of Sophists (Βίοι φιλοσόφων καὶ σοφιστῶν), which work is still extant. He composed it at the request of Chrysanthius. It contains 23 biographies of sophists, most of whom were contemporaries of Eunapius, or at least had lived shortly before him. Although these biographies are extremely brief, and are written in an intolerably inflated style, yet they are to us an important source of information respecting a period in the history of philosophy which, without this work, would be buried in utter obscurity. Eunapius shews himself an enthusiastic admirer of the philosophy of the New Platonists, and a bitter enemy of Christianity. His biographies were first edited with a Latin translation and a life of Eunapius by Hadrianus Junius, Antwerp, 1568, 8vo. Among the subsequent editions we may mention those of H. Commelinus (Frankfurt, 1596, 8vo.) and Paul Stephens. (Geneva, 1616, 8vo.) The best, however, which gives a much improved text, with a commentary and notes by Wyttenbach, is that of J. F. Boissonade, Amsterdam, 1822, 2 vols. 8vo. 2. A continuation of the history of Dexippus (Μετὰ Δέξιππον χρονική ιστορία), in fourteen books. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 77.) It began with the death of Claudius Gothicus, in A. D. 270, and carried the history down to A. D. 404, in which year St. Chrysostom was sent into exile, and which was the tenth year of the reign of Arcadius. This account of Photius (l. c.) seems to be contradicted by a passage of the excerpts (p. 96, ed. Bekker and Niebuhr), in which Eunapius speaks of the avarice of the empress Pulcheria, who did not obtain that dignity till A. D. 414; but the context of that passage shews that it was only a digression in the work, and that the work itself did not extend to A. D. 414. It was written at the request of Oribasius, and Photius saw two editions of it. In the first, Eunapius had given vent to his rabid feelings against Christianity, especially against Constantine the Great; whereas he looked upon the emperor Julian as some divine being that had been sent from heaven upon earth. In the second edition, from which the excerpts still extant are taken, those passages were omitted; but they had been expunged with such negligence and carelessness, that many parts of the work were very obscure. But we cannot, with Photius, regard this "editio purgata" as the work of Eunapius himself, and it was in all probability made by some bookseller or a Christian, who thus attempted to remedy the defects of the original. The style of the work, so far as we can judge of it, was as bad as that of the Lives of the Sophists, and is severely criticised by Photius. All we now possess of this work consists of the Excerpta de Legationibus, which were made from it by the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and a number of fragments preserved in Suidas. These remains, as far as they were known at the time, were published by D. Hoeschel (Augsburg, 1603, 4to.), H. Fabrotti (Paris, 1648, fol.), and in Boissonade's edition of the Lives of the Sophists. (vol. i. p. 455, &c.) A. Mai discovered considerable additions, which are published in his Scriptorum Vet. Nova Collectio, vol. ii. p. 247—316, from which they are reprinted in vol. i. of the Corpus Script. Hist. Byzant. edited by I. Bekker and Niebuhr. Whether the rhetorician Eunapius, whom Suidas (s. v. Μουσαρίων) calls ὁ ἐκ Φρυγίας, is the same as our Eunapius, is uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 538.) [L. S.]

EUNEICE (Εὐνείκη), a daughter of Nereus and Doris, caused the death of Hylas. (Hes. Theog. 247; Theocrit. xiii. 45.) [L. S.]

EUNEUS (Ἐῤῃνός or Ἐῤῃνός), a son of Jason by Hypsipyle, in the island of Lemnos, from whence he supplied the Greeks during their war against Troy with wine. He purchased Lycæon, a Trojan prisoner, of Patroclus for a silver urn. (Hom. Il. vii. 468, xxiii. 741, &c.; Strab. i. p. 41.) The Euneidae, a famous family of cithara-players in Lemnos, traced their origin to Euneus. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1327; Hesych. s. v. Ἐῤῃνίδαι.) [L. S.]

EUNICUS (Ἐῤῃνικός), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, contemporary with Aristophanes and Philyllius. Only one line of his is preserved, from his play Ἀντρέα, which was also attributed to Philyllius. The title is taken from the courtesan, Antea, who is mentioned by Demosthenes (c. Neæ, p. 1351) and Ananandrides (ap. Athen. xv. p. 570, e.) and who was also made the subject of comedies by Alexia and Antiphanes. There was also a comedy, entitled Πόλεις, which was variously ascribed to Aristophanes, Philyllius, and Eunicus. The name of this poet is sometimes given incorrectly Αἰνικός. (Suid. s. v. Αἰνικός; Eudoc. p. 69; Theognostus, ap. Bekker. Anecd. p. 1369; Athen. iii. p. 86, e., iv. p. 140, a., xiii. pp. 567, c., 586, e.; Pollux, x. 100; Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 249, 250, vol. ii. p. 856; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 444.) [P. S.]

EUNICUS, a distinguished statuary and silversmith of Mytilene, seems, from the order in which he is mentioned by Pliny, to have lived not long before the time of Pompey the Great. (Plin. xxxiii. 12. a. 55; xxiv. 8. a. 19. § 25.) [P. S.]

EUNOMIA. [ΗΘΗΛ.]

EUNOMIUS (Ἐῤῃνόμιος), was a native of Dacora, a village in Cappadocia, and a disciple of the Arian Aëtius, whose heretical opinions he adopted. He was, however, a man of far greater talent and acquirements than Aëtius, and extended his views so far, that he himself became the founder of a sect called the Eunomians or Anomœi, because they not only denied the equality between the Father and the Son, but even the similarity (ὁμοιότης). Eunomius was at first a deacon at Antioch, and in A. D. 360 he succeeded Eleusius as bishop of Cysicus. But he did not remain long in the enjoyment of that post, for he was deposed in the same year by the command of the emperor Constantius, and expelled by the inhabitants of Cysicus. (Philostorg. ix. 5; Theodoret, ii. 27, 29; Socrat. iv. 7; Sozom. vi. 8.) In the reign of Julian and Jovian, Eunomius lived at Constantinople, and in the reign of Valens, he resided in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon, until he was denounced to the emperor for harbouring in his house the tyrant Procopius, in consequence of which he was sent to Mauritania into exile. When, on his way thither, he had reached Mursa in Illyricum, the emperor called him back. Theodosius the Great afterwards exiled him to a place called Halmyria, in Moesia, on the Danube. (Sozom. vii. 17; Niceph. xii. 29.) But being driven away from that place by the barbarians, he was sent to Caesarea. Here, too, he met with no better reception; for, having written against their bishop, Basilus, he was hated by the citizens of Caesarea. At length, he was permitted to return to his native village of Dacora, where he spent the remainder of his life, and died at an advanced age, about A. D. 394. Eutropius Patricius ordered his body to be carried to Tyana, and there to be entrusted to the care of the monks, in order that his disciples might not carry it to Constantinople, and bury it in the same tomb with that of his teacher Aëtius. His works were ordered by imperial edicts to be destroyed. His contemporary, Philostorgius, who himself was a Eunomian, praises Eunomius so much, that his whole ecclesiastical history has not unjustly been called an encomium upon him. Philostorgius wrote, besides, a separate encomium upon Eunomius, which, however, is lost. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 138), who gives an abridgment of Philostorgius, and Socrates (iv. 7) judge less favourably of him; for they state that Eunomius spoke and wrote in a verbose and inflated style, and that he constantly repeated the same things over again. They further charge him with sophistry in his mode of arguing, and with ignorance of the Scriptures. It should, however, be remembered that these charges are made by his avowed enemies, such as Athanasius, Basilus the Great, Gregorius Nazianzenus, Gregorius of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and others, who attacked him not only in their general works on the history of the church, but in separate polemical treatises.

Eunomius wrote several works against the orthodox faith; and Rufinus (H. E. i. 25) remarks that his arguments were held in such high esteem by his followers, that they were set above the authority of the Scriptures. After his death, edicts were repeatedly issued that his works should be destroyed (Philostorg. xi. 5; Cod. Theod. xvi. 34), and hence most of his works themselves have not come down to us, and all that is extant consists of what is quoted by his opponents for the purpose of refuting him. The following works are known to have been written by him: 1. A commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, in seven books, which is censured by Socrates (iv. 7; comp. Suidas, s. v. Ἐῤῃνόμιος) for its verbose style and shallowness. 2. Epistles, of which Photius (Bibl. Cod. 138) read about forty, and in which he found the same faults as in the other works of Eunomius; but Philostorgius (x. 6; comp. Niceph. xii. 29) preferred them to his other writings. 3. An Exposition of Faith, which was laid before the emperor Theodosius at Constantinople in A. D. 383, when several bishops were summoned to that city to make declarations of their faith. (Socrat. v. 10; Sozom. vii. 12.) This little work is still extant, and has been edited by Valesius in his notes on Socrates (l. c.), and after him by Balus in the Nova Collect. Concil. vol. i. p. 89. The best edition is that of Ch. H. G. Rettberg, in his Marcelliana, Götting. 1794, 8vo. 4. Ἀπολογία, or a defence of his doctrines. This is the famous treatise of which Basilus wrote a refutation in five books, which accordingly contain a great many extracts from the Apologétique. The beginning and the epilogue are printed in Cave's Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 171, &c. with a Latin translation; but the whole is still extant, and was published in an English translation by W. Whiston, in his Eunomianismus Redictus, London, 1711, 8vo. The Greek original has never been published entire. After the refutation of Basilus had appeared, Eunomius wrote, 5. Ἀπολογία Ἀπολογία, which, however, was not published till after his death. Like the Apologétique, it was attacked by several orthodox writers, whose works, except that of Gregorius of Nyssa, have perished together with that of Eunomius. (Gregor. Nyss. vol. ii. pp. 289, 298, &c. ed. 1638.) See Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 207, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 169, &c. [L. S.]

EUNOMUS (Εὐνόμος), a son of Architeles, was killed by Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 6.) Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 1900) calls him Archias or Chaerias. [L. S.]

EUNOMUS (Εὐνόμος), fifth or sixth king of Sparta in the Proclid line, is described by Pausanias, Plutarch, and others, as the father of Lycurgus and Polydectes. Herodotus, on the contrary, places him in his list after Polydectes, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus gives the name to the nephew in whose stead Lycurgus governed. Simonidea, finally, makes Lycurgus and Eunomus the children of Prytanis. In all probability, the name was invented with reference to the Lycurgean Εὐνομία, and Eunomus, if not wholly rejected, must be identified with Polydectes. In the reign of Eunomus and Polydectes, says Pausanias, Sparta was at peace. (Plut. Lyc. 2; Paus. iii. 7. § 2; Herod. viii. 131; See Clinton, F. H. i. p. 143, note x, and p. 335, where the question is fully discussed; compare Müller, Doctrina, book i. 7. § 3, and § 6, note b.) [A. H. C.]

EUNOMUS (Εὐνόμος), an Athenian, was sent out in command of thirteen ships, in a. c. 388, to act against the Lacedaemonian Gorgopas, vice-admiral of Hierax, and the Aeginetan privateers. Gorgopas, on his return from Ephesus, whither he had escorted ANTALCIDAS on his mission to the Persian court, fell in with the squadron of Eunomus, which chased him to Aegina. Eunomus then sailed away after dark, and was pursued by Gorgopas, who captured four of his trimemes, in an engagement off Zoster, in Attica, while the rest escaped to the Peiraeus (Xen. Hell. v. i. §§ 5—9). This was, perhaps, the same Eunomus whom Lysias mentions (pro bon. Arist. pp. 153, 154) as one of those sent by Conon to Sicily, to persuade Dionysius I. to form an alliance with Athens against Sparta. The mission was so far successful, that Dionysius withheld the ships which he was preparing to despatch to the aid of the Lacedaemonians. [E. E.]

EUNOMUS (Εὐνόμος), a cithara-player of Locri, in Italy. One of the strings of his cithara being broken (so runs the tale) in a musical contest at the Pythian games, a cicada perched on the instrument, and by its notes supplied the deficiency. Strabo tells us there was a statue of Eunomus at Locri, holding his cithara with the cicada, his friend in need, upon it. (Strab. vi. p. 260; Casaub. ad loc.; Clem. Alex. Protrept. i.; comp. Ael. Hist. An. v. 9.) [E. E.]

EUNOMUS (Εὐνόμος). 1. A Greek physician, who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as one of his medical formulae is quoted by Aesclepiades Pharmacion. (Ap. Galen. de Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. v. 14. vol. xiii. p. 350, 351.) In the passage in question, for Εὐνόμος δ' Ἀσκληπιάδης we should probably read Εὐνόμος δ' Ἀσκληπιάδης, that is, a follower of Aesclepiades of Bithynia, who lived in the first century B. C.

2. A physician in the fourth century after Christ, mentioned in ridicule by Ausonius, Epigr. 75. [W. A. G.]

EUNONES, king of the Adorsi or Aorsi, with whom the Romans made an alliance in their war against Mithridates, king of the Bosphorus, in a. c. 58, and at whose court Mithridates took refuge, when he was unable any longer to hold out against the Romans. Eunones, taking compassion on him, wrote to the emperor Claudius on his behalf. (Tac. Ann. xii. 15, 16, 19.)

EUNOSTUS (Εὐνόστος). 1. A hero of Tanagra in Boeotia. He was a son of Elinus, and brought up by the nymph Eunoste. Ochine, the daughter of Colonus, fell in love with him; but he avoided her, and when she thereupon accused him before her brothers of improper conduct towards her, they slew him. Afterwards Ochine confessed that she had falsely accused him, and threw herself down a rock. Eunostus had a sanctuary at Tanagra in a sacred grove, which no woman was allowed to approach. (Plut. Quaest. Gr. 40.)

2. A goddess of mills, whose image was set up in mills, and who was believed to keep watch over the just weight of flour. (Heaych. s. v.; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 214, 1383.) [L. S.]

EUNUS (Εὐνός), the leader of the Sicilian slaves in the servile war which broke out in 130 B. C. He was a native of Apamea in Syria, and had become the slave of Antigeneas, a wealthy citizen of Enna in Sicily. He first attracted attention by pretending to the gift of prophecy, and by interpreting dreams; to the effect of which he added by appearing to breathe flames from his mouth, and other similar juggleries. (Diod. Exc. Photii xxxiv. p. 526.) He had by these means obtained a great reputation among the ignorant population, when he was consulted by the slaves of one Damophilus (a citizen of Enna, of immense wealth, but who had treated his unfortunate slaves with excessive cruelty) concerning a plot they had formed against their master. Eunus not only promised them success, but himself joined in their enterprise. Having assembled in all to the number of about 400 men, they suddenly attacked Enna, and being joined by their fellow-slaves within the town, quickly made themselves masters of it. Great excesses were committed, and almost all the freemen put to death; but Eunus interfered to save some who had previously shewn him kindness; and the daughter of Damophilus, who had always shewn much gentleness of disposition and opposed the cruelties of her father and mother, was kindly treated by the slaves, and escorted in safety to Catana. (Diodor. l. c. Exc. Vales. xxxiv. p. 600.) Eunus had, while yet a slave, prophesied that he should become a king; and after the capture of Enna, being chosen by his fellow-slaves as their leader, he hastened to assume the royal diadem and the title of king Antiocheus. Sicily was at this time swarming with numbers of slaves, a great proportion of them Syrians, who flocked to the standard of their countryman and fellow-bondaman. A separate insurrection broke out in the south of the island, headed by Cleon, a Cilician, who assembled a band of 5000 armed slaves, with which he ravaged the whole territory of Agrigentum; but he soon joined Eunus, and, to the surprise of all men, submitted to act under him as his lieutenant. (Diodor. l. c.; Liv. Epit. lib. lvi.) The revolt now became general, and the Romans were forced to adopt vigorous measures against the insurgents; but the praetors who first led armies against them were totally defeated. Several others successively met with the same fate; and in the year 134 B. C. it was thought necessary to send the consul C. Fulvius Flaccus to subdue the insurrection. What he effected we know not, but it is evident that he did not succeed in his object. As the next year Calpurnius Piso was employed on the same service, who defeated the servile army in a great battle near Messina. This success was followed up the next year by the consul P. Rupilius, who successively reduced Tauromenium and Enna, the two great strongholds of the insurgents. On the surrender of Enna, Eunus fled with a few followers, and took refuge in rocky and inaccessible places, but was soon discovered in a cave and carried before Rupilius. His life was spared by the consul, probably with the intention of carrying him to Rome; but he died in prison at Morgantia, of the disease called morbus pedicularis. (Florus, iii. 20; Orosius, v. 6; Diod. Erc. Photii, lib. xxiv., Erc. Vales. ib.; Plut. Sull. 36; Strab. vi. p. 272.) If we may believe Diodorus, Eunus was a man of no talents or energy, not possessing even personal courage, and owed his elevation solely to the arts by which he worked on the superstition of the multitude; but when we consider how long he maintained his influence over them, and the great successes they obtained under his rule, this appears most improbable. Some anecdotes are also related of him, which display a generosity and elevation of character wholly at variance with such a supposition. (Diod. Erc. Photii, p. 528, Erc. Vaticana, lxxiv. p. 113, ed. Dindorf.) [E. H. B.]

EVODIANUS (Ἐβδιανός), a Greek sophist of Smyrna, who lived during the latter half of the second century after Christ. He was a pupil of Aristocles, and according to others of Polemon also. He was invited to Rome, and raised there to the chair of professor of eloquence. For a time he was appointed to superintend or instruct the actors, (τοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἀδύρων τεχνίτας), which office he is said to have managed with great wisdom. He distinguished himself as an orator and especially in panegyric oratory. He had a son who died before him at Rome, and with whom he desired to be buried after his death. No specimens of his oratory have come down to us. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. ii. 16; Eudoc. p. 164; Osann, Inscript. Syllog. p. 299.) [L. S.]

EVODIUS, was born towards the middle of the fourth century at Tagaste, the native place of St. Augustin, with whom he maintained throughout life the closest friendship. After following in youth the secular profession of an agens in rebus, about the year A. D. 396 or 397, he became bishop of Uzalia, a town not far from Utica, where he performed, we are told by St. Augustin, many miracles by aid of some relics of St. Stephen the Protomartyr, left with him by Orosius, who brought them from Palestine in 416. Evodius took an active part in the controversies against the Donatists and the Pelagians, and in 427, wrote a letter to the monks of Adrumetum, with regard to some differences which had arisen in their body on these questions. After this period we find no trace of him in history, but the precise date of his death is not known.

The works of this prelate now extant are:—

1. Four epistles to St. Augustin, which will be found among the correspondence of the bishop of Hippo, numbered 160, 161, 163, 177, in the Benedictine edition.

2. An epistle, written in common with four other bishops, to Pope Innocentius I. This is contained in the appendix to the 6th volume of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustin.

3. Fragments of an epistle to the monks of Adrumetum subjoined to Ep. 216 of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustin.

Evodius is said by Sigibert to have written a treatise, now lost, on the miracles performed by the relics of St. Stephen; but the Libri duo de miraculis S. Stephani, placed at the end of the De Civitate Dei, in the 7th volume of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustin, was not composed by Evodius, but seems rather to have been addressed to him, and drawn up at his request.

A tract, found in some MSS. among the writings of Augustin, entitled De fide seu De unitate Trinitatis contra Manichæos, has been ascribed to Evodius, is considered a genuine production of St. Augustin by Erasmus, but rejected by the Benedictine editors.

(Augustin, Sermon. cccxxxiii. in Opera, vol. v. ed. Bened. de Civit. Dei, xxii. 8; Sigibertus Gembl. De Script. eccles. ep. 15.) [W. R.]

EVODUS (Ἐβόδος), the author of two short epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 288; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. ii. p. 263.) Nothing more is known of him, unless he be the same as the epic poet of Rhodes, in the time of Nero, who is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.). There was an Evodus, the tutor of Caligula. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xviii. 8.) [P. S.]

EVODUS (Ἐβόδος), a distinguished engraver of gems under the emperor Titus, A. D. 80. A beryl by him, bearing the head of Titus's daughter Julia, is preserved at Florence. (Bracci, Tab. 73; Müller, Denkm. d. alt. Kunst, T. lxix. No. 381.) [P. S.]

EUPALAMUS (Ἐυπάλαμος), one of the significant names met with in the history of ancient art [CHEIRISOPHUS], occurs more than once among the Daedalia. [DAEDALUS, SIMON.] [P. S.]

EUPALINUS, of Megara, was the architect of the great aqueduct, or rather tunnel, in Samos, which was carried a length of seven stadia through a mountain. The work was probably executed under the tyranny of Polycrates. (Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 81, note.) [P. S.]

EUPATOR (Ἐυπάτωρ), a surname assumed by many of the kings in Asia after the time of Alexander the Great, occurs likewise as the name of a king of Bosphorus in the reign of the emperor M. Aurelius. This king is mentioned by Lucian (Alexand. 57), who speaks of his ambassadors bringing the tribute which had to be paid to the Romans; and his name should perhaps be restored in a corrupt passage of Capitolinus. (Capitol. Anton. Pius, 9, where for curatorem read Eupatorem.) The following coin of Eupator represents on the reverse the heads of M. Aurelius and L. Verus. (Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 378, 379.)

COIN OF EUPATOR.

EUPATRA (Ἐυπάτρα), a daughter of Mithridates, who fell into the hands of Pompey at the close of the Mithridatic war, and walked with the other captives before his triumphal car at Rome. (Appian, Mithr. 108, 117.)

EUPEITHES (Ἐυπειθής), of Ithaca, father of Antinoüs. Once when he had attacked the Thesprotians, the allies of the Ithacans, Odysseus proreted him from the indignation of the people of Ithaca. When Odysseus after his long wanderings returned home, Eupheithes wanted to avenge the death of his son Antinous, who had been one of Penelope's suitors and was slain by Odysseus. He accordingly led a band of Ithacans against Odysseus, but fell in the struggle. (Hom. Od. xvi. 436, xxiv. 469, 523.) [L. S.]

EUPHANTUS (Εὐφάντος), of Olynthus, a Pythagorean philosopher and tragic poet, who lived a little later than the period of the tragic Pleiad. He was the disciple of Eubulides of Miletus, and the instructor of Antigonus I. king of Macedonia. He wrote many tragedies, which were well received at the games. He also wrote a very highly esteemed work, περὶ βασιλέως, addressed to Antigonus, and a history of his own times: he lived to a great age. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 110, 141.) The Euphantus whose history is quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 251, d.) must have been a different person, since he mentioned Ptolemy III. of Egypt. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 69, ed. Westermann; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöde. p. 1268.) [P. S.]

EUPHÉMĒ (Εὐφήμη), the nurse of the Muses, of whom there was a statue in the grove of the Muses near Helicon. (Paus. ix. 29. § 3.) [L. S.]

EUPHĒMUS (Εὐφήμος), a son of Poseidon by Europa, the daughter of Titius, or by Mecionius or Oria, a daughter of Orion or Euratos. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 15; Tzetz. Chil. ii. 43.) According to the account he was an inhabitant of Panopeus on the Cephissus in Phocia, and according to the other of Hyria in Boeotia, and afterwards lived at Taenarus. By a Lemnian woman, Μαλίκη, Malache, or Lamache, he became the father of Leucophaeus (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 455; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 886); but he was married to Laonome, the sister of Heracles. Euphemus was one of the Calydonian hunters, and the helmsman of the vessel of the Argonauts, and, by a power which his father had granted to him, he could walk on the sea just as on firm ground. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 162.) He is mentioned also as the ancestor of Battus, the founder of Cyrene, and the following story at once connects him with that colony. When the Argonauts carried their ship through Libya to the coast of the Mediterranean, Triton, who would not let them pass without shewing them some act of friendship, offered them a clod of Libyan earth. None of the Argonauts would accept it; but Euphemus did, and with the clod of earth he received for his descendants the right to rule over Libya. Euphemus was to throw the piece of earth into one of the chasms of Taenaron in Peloponnesus, and his descendants, in the fourth generation, were to go to Libya and take it into cultivation. When, however, the Argonauts passed the island of Calliste, or Thera, that clod of earth by accident fell into the sea, and was carried by the waves to the coast of the island. The colonization of Libya was now to proceed from Thera, and although still by the descendants of Euphemus, yet not till the seventeenth generation after the Argonauts. The seventeenth descendant of Euphemus was Battus of Thera. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 1, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 562; Hygin. Fab. 14, 173; Herod. iv. 150.) According to Apollonius Rhodius (iv. 1755), the island of Thera itself had arisen from the clod of earth, which Euphemus purposely threw into the sea. Euphemus was rewarded on the chest of Cypselus as victor, with a chariot and two horses. (Paus. v. 17. § 4.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Anton. Lib. 8; Hom. Il. ii. 846.) [L. S.]

EUPHĒMUS (Εὐφήμος), was sent by the Athenian commanders at Syracuse in the winter of B. C. 415—414 to negotiate alliance with Camarina, and was there opposed on the Syracusan side by Hermocrates. Thucydides gives us an oration in the mouth of each. The negotiation was unsuccessful. (Thuc. vi. 75—88.) [A. H. C.]

EUPHORBUS (Εὐφορβος), a son of Panthous and brother of Hyperenor, was one of the bravest among the Trojans. He was the first who wounded Patroclus, but was afterwards slain by Menelaus (Hom. Il. xvi. 806, xvii. 1—60), who subsequently dedicated the shield of Euphorbus in the temple of Hera, near Mycenae. (Paus. ii. 17. § 3.) It is a well known story, that Pythagoras asserted that he had once been the Trojan Euphorbus, that from a Trojan he had become an Ionian, and from a warrior a philosopher. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. i. 1, Heroic. 17; Diog. Laërt. viii. 4; Ov. Mel. xv. 161.) [L. S.]

EUPHORBUS (Εὐφορβος), physician to Juba II., king of Mauretania, about the end of the first century B. C., and brother to Antonius Musa, the physician to Augustus. [MUSA.] Pliny says (H. N. xxv. 38), that Juba gave the name of Euphorbia to a plant which he found growing on Mount Atlas in honour of his physician, and Galen mentions (de Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. ix. 4. vol. xiii. p. 271) a short treatise written by the king on the virtues of the plant. Salmasius tries to prove (Prolegom. ad Homon. Hyles Iatr. p. 4), that this story of Pliny is without foundation, and that the word was in use much earlier than the time of Juba, as it is mentioned by Meleager. (Carm. i. 37.) It does not, however, seem likely that Pliny would have been ignorant of a plant that was known to a poet who lived two hundred years before him; and besides, in the passage in question, the commonly received reading in the present day is not εὐφορβῆς, but ἐκ φορβῆς. [W. A. G.]

EUPHORI'ON (Εὐφορίων). 1. The father of the poet Aeschylus. (Herod. ii. 156.) [AESCHYLUS.]

2. The son of Aeschylus, and himself a tragic poet. [AESCHYLUS, vol. i. p. 42, col. 1, sub fin.]

3. Of Chalcis in Euboea, an eminent grammarian and poet, was the son of Polymnetus, and was born, according to Suidas (s. v.), in the 126th Olympiad, when Pyrrhus was defeated by the Romans, B. C. 274. He became, but at what period of his life is not known, a citizen of Athens. (Hellad. ap. Phot. Cod. 279, p. 532, Bekker.) He was instructed in philosophy by Lacydes, who flourished about B. C. 241, and Prytanis (comp. Athen. xi. p. 447, c.), and in poetry by Archebulus of Thera. Though he was sallow, fat, and bandy-legged, he was beloved by Nicia (or Nicaea), the wife of Alexander, king of Euboea. His amours are referred to in more than one passage in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Ana. vol. ii. pp. 3, 43.) Having amassed great wealth, he went into Syria, to Antiochus the Great (B. C. 221), who made him his librarian. He died in Syria, and was buried at Apameia, or, according to others, at Antioch. (Suid. s. v.) The epigram (Brunck, Ana. vol. ii. p. 43), which places his tomb at the Peiraeneus, must be understood as referring to a cenotaph.

Euphorion wrote numerous works, both in poetry and prose, relating chiefly to mythological history. The following were poems in heroic verse:—1. Holoidas, the subject of which can only be conjectured from the title. Some suppose it to have been an agricultural poem. Euphorion is mentioned among the agricultural writers by Varro (i. 1. § 9) and Columella (i. 1. § 10). (See Heyne, Excurs. iii. ad Virgil. Bucol.; Harless, ad Fabrie. Bibl. Graec. i. 694.) 2. Μοῦσικα, so called from an old name of Attica, the legends of which country seem to have been the chief subject of the poem. From the variety of its contents, which Suidas calls συμμεγείας ἱστορίας, it was also called Ἀνακτα, a title which was frequently given to the writings of that period. 3. Χυλίδες, a poem written against certain persons, who had defrauded Euphorion of money which he had entrusted to their care. It probably derived its title from each of its books consisting of a thousand verses. The fifth book, or χύλας, was entitled περὶ χρησμῶν, and contained an enumeration of oracles which had been fulfilled; and it is probably of this book in particular that the statement of Suidas concerning the object of the poem should be understood, namely, that the poet taught his defrauders that they would in the end suffer the penalty of their faithlessness. The above seems the best explanation of the passage in Suidas, which is, however, very corrupt, and has been very variously explained. (See especially Heyne and Harless, l. c., and Meineke, Euphor. pp. 20—24.) To these epic poems must be added the following, which are not mentioned by Suidas:—4. Ἀλέξανδρος, which Meineke conjectures to have been addressed to some friend of that name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ξύλοι.) 5. Ἄνιος, a mythological poem referring to Anius, the son and priest of the Delian Apollo. (Steph. Byz. Fragment. p. 744, c., ed. Pined.) 6. Ἀντιγραφὰ πρὸς Θεοφρίδαν (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 243, ed. Sylb.), a work of which nothing further is known, unless we accept the not improbable conjecture of Meursius and Schneider, who read Θεοφρίδαν for Θεοφρίδαν, and suppose that the poem was written in controversy with the grammarian Theodoridas, who afterwards wrote the epitaph on Euphorion, which is extant, with seventeen other epigrams by Theodoridas, in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anac. vol. ii. pp. 41—45.) [THEODORIDAS.] 7. Ἀπολλόδωρος, which seems to have been a mythological poem addressed to a friend of that name. (Tzetzes, Schol. ad Lycophr. 513; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1063; Suid. and Harpocrat. s. v. Ὁ κατὰθεν νόμος; Phot. s. v. Ὁ κατὰθεν λόγος.) 8. Ἀρὰ ἢ ποτηριοκλέτης (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀλλεῖη; Schol. ad Theocr. ii. 2), an attack on some person who had stolen a cup from Euphorion, which Callimachus imitated in his Ibis, and both were probably followed by Ovid in his Ibis, and by Cato and Virgil in their Draec. (Meineke, Euphor. pp. 30, 31.) 9. Ἀρτεμίδωρος, probably a poem like the Apollodorus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀσσωπὸν.) 10. Γέρας, the subject of which, as well as its genuineness, is very uncertain. (Athen. iii. p. 82, a.) 11. Δημοθένης, the title of which Meineke explains as he does the Alexander, Apollodorus, and Artemidorus, and he conjectures that the person to whom the poem was addressed was Demosthenes of Bithynia. (Choeroboscus, ap. Bekker. Anecd. Graec. ii. p. 1383.) 12. Διώνυσος, which doubtless contained a full account of the myths relating to Dionysus. (Schol. φ. ad Odys. iv. p. 136, ed. Buttmann; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρίχιον, Ἀκτῆ, Δεκάφος; Schol. ad Arat. Phaenomen. 172; Tzetzes, Schol. ad Lycophr. 320; Etym. Mag. p. 687. 26.) 13. Ἐπιστήδεις εἰς Πρωταγόραν, an elegy on an astrologer named Protagoras. (Diog. Laert. ix. 56.) This poem was doubtless in the elegiac, and not in the heroic verse. 14. Θρήξ. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀσώτες, Ὀγκάται; Parthen. Erol. xiii. p. 35, xxvi. p. 61.) 15. Ἰππομόδωρος. (Tzetzes, Schol. ad Lycophr. 451.) 16. Ἡνιον. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 354.) 17. Πολυνάρης. (Etym. Mag. p. 223. 16; Choeroboscus, ap. Bekker. Anecd. Graec. iii. p. 1381.) 18. Ἰάκυνθος. (Schol. Theocr. x. 28; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 285.) 19. Φιλοκτήτης. (Stobaeus, Serm. lviii. Tu. lix.; Tzetzes, Schol. ad Lycophr. 911.)

Euphorion was an epigrammatist as well as an epic poet. He had a place in the Garland of Meleager (Proem. 23), and the Greek Anthology contains two epigrams by him. (Brunck, Anac. vol. i. p. 256; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 189.) They are both erotic; and that such was the character of most of his epigrams, is clear from the manner in which he is mentioned by Meleager, as well as from the fact that he was among the poets who were imitated by Propertius, Tibullus, and Gallus. (Diomed. iii. p. 482. 3; Probus, ad Virgil. Ecl. x. 50.) It was probably this seductive elegiac poetry of Euphorion, the popularity of which at Rome, to the neglect of Ennius, moved the indignation of Cicero. (Tusc. Disp. iii. 19.) It was therefore quite natural that Euphorion should be a great favourite with the emperor Tiberius, who wrote Greek poems in imitation of him (Sueton. Tiber. 70; see Casaubon's note.)

Some writers have supposed that Euphorion was also a dramatic poet. Ernesti (Clav. Ciceron. s. v.) and C. G. Müller (ad Tzetz. Schol. p. 651) say, that he composed tragedies; but they give no reasons for the assertion, and none are known. Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 304) places him in his list of comic poets, mentioning as his plays the Ἀπολλόδωρος, which was an epic poem (red. sup.), and the Ἀροιδιόσια, respecting which there can be no doubt that for Εὐφορίαν we should read Εὐφρών in the passage of Athenaeus (xi. p. 503).

Euphorion's writings in prose were chiefly historical and grammatical. They were: 1. Ἱστορικὰ ὑπομνήματα. (Athen. iv. p. 154, c., xv. p. 700, d.) 2. Περὶ τῶν Ἀλεξανδρῶν (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 389, Sylb.; Schol. Theocr. ad Idyll. xvi. 34; Quintil. x. 2), which Suidas (s. v. Ἐφῶρος) attributes to the younger Ephorus. (See Meineke, Euphor. pp. 39, 40.) 3. Περὶ τῶν Ἰσθμίων. (Athen. iv. p. 182, e. et alib.) 4. Περὶ Μεσσηνίων. (Athen. iv. p. 184, a.) 5. A grammatical work of great celebrity, which related chiefly to the language of Hippocrates, and appears to have been entitled Δέξις Ἱπποκράτους.

The character of Euphorion as a poet may be pretty clearly understood from the statements of the ancient writers, and from his extant fragments, as well as from the general literary character of his age. He lived at the time when the literature of the Alexandrian school had become thoroughly established, when originality of thought and vigour of expression were all but extinct, and though the ancient writers were most highly valued, their spirit was lost, and the chief use made of them was to heap together their materials in elaborate compilations and expand them by trivial and fanciful additions, while the noble forms of verse in which they had embodied their thoughts were made the vehicles of a mass of cumbrous learning. Hence the complaints which the best of succeeding writers made of the obscurity, verbosity, and tediousness of Euphorion, Callimachus, Parthenius, Lycophron, and the other chief writers of the long period during which the Alexandrian grammarians ruled the literary world. (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 571; Cic. de Dir. ii. 64; Lucian. de Conscr. Hist. 57, vol. ii. p. 65.) These faults seem to have been carried to excess in Euphorion, who was particularly distinguished by an obscurity, which arose, according to Meineke, from his choice of the most out of the way subjects, from the cumbrous learning with which he overloaded his poems, from the arbitrary changes which he made in the common legends, from his choice of obsolete words, and from his use of ordinary words with a new meaning of his own. The most ancient and one of the most interesting judgments concerning him is in an epigram by Crates of Mallus (Brunck, Anac., vol. ii. p. 3), from which we learn that he was a great admirer of Choerilus [CHOERILUS, vol. i. p. 697, b.], notwithstanding which, however, the fragments of his poetry shew that he also imitated Antimachus. Meineke conjectures that the epigram of Crates was written while the contest about receiving Antimachus or Choerilus into the epic canon was at its height, and that some of the Alexandrian grammarians proposed to confer that honour on Euphorion. In the same epigram Euphorion is called Ῥομφικὸς, which can only mean that he endeavoured, however unsuccessfully, to imitate Homer,—a fact which his fragments confirm. (Comp. Cic. de Dir. l. c.) That he also imitated Hesiod, may be inferred from the fact of his writing a poem entitled Ἡσιόδου; and there is a certain similarity in the circumstance of each poet making a personal wrong the foundation of an epic poem.—Hesiod in the Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι, and Euphorion in the Χελιδόες.

As above stated, Euphorion was greatly admired by many of the Romans, and some of his poems were imitated or translated by Cornelius Gallus; but the arguments by which Heyne and others have attempted to decide what poems of Euphorion were so translated, are quite inconclusive. (Voisin, de Hist. Græc. pp. 142, 143, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 594, &c.; Meineke, de Euphorionis Chalcidensis Vita et Scriptis, Götting. 1823, in which the fragments are collected; a new edition of this work forms part of Meineke's Analecta Alexandrina, Berol. 1843; Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. pp. 311, 312.)

4. Of Chersonesus, an author of that kind of licentious poetry which was called Πρωΐνα, is mentioned by Hephaestion (de Metr. xv. 59), who gives three verses, which do not, however, appear to be consecutive, but are probably single verses chosen as specimens of the metre. But yet some information may be gleaned from them, for the poet refers to Ῥίος in honour of the "young Dionysus," celebrated at Pelusium. Hence Meineke infers that this Euphorion was an Egyptian Greek, and that the Chersonesus of which he was a native was the city of that name near Alexandria. He also conjectures, and upon good grounds, that the "young Dionysus" was Ptolemy Philopator, who began to reign in a. c. 220. It is probable that the passage in Strabo (viii. p. 382) refers to this Euphorion, and that Ἐδφφονιος in that passage is an error for Ἐδφφίων. There is an example of the same confusion in Athenæus (xi. p. 495, c.). That those who make this Euphorion the same as the Chalcidian are quite wrong, is proved by the fact that the lines are neither hexameters nor elegiacs, but in the priapeian metre, which is a kind of antispastic. (Meineke, Analecta Alexandrina, Epim. i.) [P. S.]

EUPHORI'ON (Ἐδφφίων), a Greek physician or grammarian, who wrote a commentary on Hippocrates in six books, and must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Erotianus. (Gloss. Hippocr. p. 12.) [W. A. G.]

EUPHORI'ON, a distinguished statuary and silver-chaser, none of whose works were extant in Pliny's time. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19, § 25.) [P. S.]

EUPHRADES, THEMIST'US. [THEMIST'US.]

EUPHRA'NOR (Ἐδφφάνωρ). 1. Of Seleucia, a disciple of Timon and a follower of his sceptical school. Eubulus of Alexandria was his pupil. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 115, 116.)

2. A slave of the philosopher Lycon, who was manumitted by his master's will. (Diog. Laërt. v. 73.)

3. A Pythagorean philosopher, who is mentioned by Athenæus (iv. pp. 182, 184, xiv. p. 634) as the author of a work on flutes and flute players. (Περὶ ἀλλῶν καὶ περὶ ἀλλήλων.) It is not impossible that the Evapor mentioned by Iamblichus (Vit. Pyth. 36) among the Pythagoreans, is the same as our Euphranor.

4. A Greek grammarian, who was upwards of one hundred years old at the time when Apion was his pupil. (Suid. s. v. Ἀπίων.) [L. S.]

EUPHRA'NOR (Ἐδφφάνωρ). 1. One of the greatest masters of the most flourishing period of Grecian art, and equally distinguished as a statuary and a painter. (Quintil. xii. 10. § 6.) He was a native of the Corinthian isthmus, but he practised his art at Athens, and is reckoned by Plutarch as an Athenian. (De Glor. Ath. 2.) He is placed by Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19) at Ol. 104, no doubt because he painted the battle of Mantinea, which was fought in Ol. 104, 3 (a. c. 367), but the list of his works shews, almost certainly, that he flourished till after the accession of Alexander. (a. c. 336.)

As a statuary, he wrought both in bronze and marble, and made figures of all sizes, from colossal statues to little drinking-cups. (Plin. xxxv. 8, s. 40, § 25.) His most celebrated works were, a Paris, which expressed alike the judge of the goddesses, the lover of Helen, and the slayer of Achilles; the very beautiful sitting figure of Paris, in marble, in the Museo Pio-Clementino is, no doubt, a copy of this work: a Minerva, at Rome, called the Catulian, from its having been set up by Q. Lutatius Catulus, beneath the Capitol: an Agathodaemon (simulacrum Boni Eventus), holding a patera in the right hand, and an ear of corn and a poppy in the left: a Latona puerpera, carrying the infants, Apollo and Diana, in the temple of Concord; there is at Florence a very beautiful relief representing the same subject: a Key-bearer (Cleiduchus), remarkable for its beauty of form: colossal statues of Valour and of Greece, forming no doubt a group, perhaps Greece crowned by Valour. (Müller, Archæol. d. Kunst, § 405, n. 3): a woman wrapt in wonder and adoration (admirantem et adorantem): Alexander and Philip riding in four-horse chariots, and other quadrigae and bigae. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. a. 19, § 16.) The statue of Apollo Patroüs, in his temple in the Cerameicus at Athens, was by Euphranor. (Paus. i. 3. § 3.) Lastly, his statue of Hephaestus, in which the god was not lame, is mentioned by Dion Chrysostom. (Orat. p. 466, c.)

As a painter, Euphranor executed many great works, the chief of which were seen, in the time of Pausanias, in a porch in the Cerameicus. On the one side were the twelve gods; and on the opposite wall, Theseus, with Democracy and Demos (Δημοκρατία τε καὶ Δῆμος), in which picture Theseus was represented as the founder of the equal polity of Athens. In the same place was his picture of the battle between the Athenian and Boeotian cavalry at Mantinea, containing portraits of Epaminondas and of Gryllus, the son of Xenophon. (Paus. i. 3. § 2, 3.) There were also some celebrated pictures by him at Epheus, namely, Ulysses, in his feigned madness, yoking an ox with a horse (it is difficult to understand the next words of Pliny, "et palliati cogitantes"); and a commander anathing his sword. (Plin. xxxv. 11. a. 40. § 25.)

Euphranor also wrote works on proportion and on colours (de Symmetria et Coloribus, Plin. l. c.), the two points in which his own excellence seems chiefly to have consisted. Pliny says that he was the first who properly expressed the dignity of heroes, by the proportions he gave to their statues; and Hirt observes that this statement is confirmed by the existing copy of his Paris. (Gesch. d. Bild. Kunst, p. 208.) He made the bodies somewhat more slender, and the heads and limbs larger. His system of proportion was adopted, with some variation, by his great contemporary, Lysippus: in painting, Zeuxis had already practised it. It was, no doubt, with reference to proportion, as well as colouring, that he used to say that the Theseus of Parrhasius had been fed on roses, but his on flesh. (Plin. l. c.; Plut. de Glor. Ath. 2.) In his great picture of the twelve gods, the colouring of the hair of Hera was particularly admired. (Lucian, Imag. 7.) Of the same picture Valerius Maximus relates that Euphranor invested Poseidon with such surpassing majesty, that he was unable to give, as he had intended, a nobler expression to Zeus. (viii. 11, ext. 5.) It is said that the idea of his Zeus was at length suggested by his hearing a scholar recite the description in Homer:—"Ἀμφόρως δ' ἀπα χαίρουσ', &c." (Eustath. ad Il. i. 529.) Müller believed that Euphranor merely copied the Zeus of Phidias. (Arch. d. Kunst, § 140, n. 3.) Plutarch (l. c.), amidst much praise of the picture of the battle of Mantinea, says that Euphranor painted it under a divine inspiration (οὐκ ἀνθρώπου δαίμονος). Philostratus, in his rhetorical style, ascribes to Euphranor τὸ εὐκριν (light and shade) καὶ τὸ εὐκριν (expression) καὶ τὸ εἰσέχον τε καὶ ἐξέχον (perspective and foreshortening). (Vit. Apoll. ii. 9.) Pliny (l. c.) says that Euphranor was, above all men, diligent and willing to learn, and always equal to himself. His disciples were, Antidotus (Plin. l. c. § 27), Carmanides (ib. § 42), and Leonidas of Anthedon. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀνθηδων.) He was himself a disciple of Ariston, the son of Aristeides of Thebes. [ARISTEIDES.]

2. An architect of little note, who wrote de

praeceptis symmetriarum. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 14.) [P. S.]

EUPHRATES (Εὐφράτης), an eminent Stoic philosopher of the time of Hadrian. According to Philostratus (Vit. Soph. i. 7, Vit. Apoll. i. 13), he was a native of Tyre, and according to Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἐριφρατία), of Epiphaneia in Syria; whereas Eunapius (p. 3, ed. Boissonade) calls him an Egyptian. At the time when Pliny the younger served in Syria, he became acquainted with Euphrates, and seems to have formed an intimate friendship with him. In one of his letters (Epist. i. 10) he gives us a detailed account of the virtues and talents of Euphrates. His great power as an orator is acknowledged also by other contemporaries (Arrian, Dissert. Epictet. iii. 15, iv. 8; M. Aurel. x. 31), though Apollonius of Tyana charges him with avarice and servile flattery. When he had arrived at an advanced age, and was tired of life, he asked and obtained from Hadrian the permission of putting an end to himself by poison. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 8.) [L. S.]

EUPHRON (Εὐφρων), a citizen of Sicily, who held the chief power there during the period of its subjection to Sparta. In b. c. 368 the city was compelled by Epameinondas to join the Theban alliance; and, though its constitution appears to have remained unchanged, the influence of Euphron was no doubt considerably diminished. In order, therefore, to regain it, he took advantage of the dissatisfaction of the Arcadians and Argives with the moderation of Epameinondas, in leaving the old oligarchical governments undisturbed [EPAMEINONDAS], and, representing to them that the supremacy of Lacedaemon would surely be restored in Sicily if matters continued as they were, he succeeded, through their assistance, in establishing democracy. In the election of generals which followed, he himself was chosen, with four colleagues. He then procured the appointment of his own son, Adeas, to the command of the mercenary troops in the service of the republic; and he further attached these to his cause by an unsparing use, not only of the public money and the sacred treasures, but of the wealth also of many whom he drove into banishment on the charge of Laconism. His next step was to rid himself of his colleagues; and having effected this by the exile of some and the murder of the rest, he became tyrant of Sicily. He was not, however, entirely independent, for the citadel was occupied by a Theban garrison, sent there, as it would seem, after the democratic revolution; and we find Euphron co-operating with that officer in a campaign against Philus, probably in b. c. 365. Not long after this oligarchy was again established in Sicily, by Aeneias, of Stympalia, the Arcadian general, and apparently with the concurrence of the Theban garrison. Euphron upon this fled to the harbour, and, having sent to Corinth for the Spartan commander Pasimelus, delivered it up to him, making many professions at the same time (to which little credit seems to have been given) of having been influenced in all he had done by attachment to the interests of Lacedaemon. Party-strife, however, still continuing at Sicily, he was enabled, by help from Athens, to regain possession of the city; but he was aware that he could not hold it in the face of opposition from the Theban garrison (to say nothing of his having now decisively incurred the enmity of Sparta), and he therefore betook himself to Thebes, hoping to obtain, by corruption and intrigue, the banishment of his opponents and the restoration of his own power. Some of his enemies, however, followed him thither, and when they found that he was indeed advancing towards the attainment of his object, they murdered him in the Cadmeia, while the council was actually assembled there. Being arrested and brought before the council, they pleaded their cause boldly, justified their deed, and were acquitted. But Euphron's partisans were numerous at Sicyon, and having brought home his body, they buried it in the Agora—an unusual honour (see Plut. Arat. 53)—and paid worship to him as a hero and a founder (Ἀρχηγέτης). (Xen. Hell. vii. 1—3; Diod. x. 69, 70.) [E. E.]

EUPHRON (Εὐφρών), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, whose plays, however, seem to have partaken largely of the character of the middle comedy. We have the titles and some considerable fragments of the following plays:—Ἀδελφοί, Ἀλκχρῆ, Ἀποδιδούσα (according to the excellent emendation of Meineke, Εὐφρών for Εὐφορίων, Athen. xi. p. 503, a.), Διδυμοί, Θεὸν Ἀγορῆ, Θεοποι, Μοῖσαι, Παραδιδόμενη (or, as Meineke thinks it should perhaps be, Παρεκδιδόμενη, which is the title of a play of Antiphanes), Συνέφητοι. (Suid. s. v.; Athen. passim; Stobaeus, Flor. xv. 2, xxviii. 11, xxviii. 12; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 477, 478, vol. iv. pp. 486—495; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 444.) [P. S.]

EUPHRONIDES (Εὐφρονίδης), of Corinth, a Greek grammarian, who is mentioned among the teachers of Aristophanes of Byzantium. (Suid. s. v. Ἀριστοφάνους.) [L. S.]

EUPHRONIDES, a statuary, contemporary with Lysippus and Alexander the Great, Ol. 114, a. c. 324. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. a. 19.) [P. S.]

EUPHRONIUS. [EUPHROION, No. 4.]

EUPHROSYNE. [CHARITES.]

EUPITHIUS (Εὐπίθιος), an Athenian grammarian, the author of one epigram in the Greek Anthology (Bruck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 402; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 110), which contains all we know of him, and from the contents of which, as well as from its title in the Vatican MS., τοῦ στίχων τὴν καθόλου, we learn that Eupithius had spent much grammatical labour on the punctuation and accentuation of the καθολικὴ προσφῶδι, or ἡ καθόλου (sc. τῆς γῆς) of Herodian. Herodian flourished under the emperor Marcus Antoninus. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. x. pp. 186, 187, vol. xiii. p. 335; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 475.) [P. S.]

EUPLUS (Εὐπλῦς), an engraver of gems, whose time and country are unknown. The name is seen on a gem of Love sitting on a Dolphin. Some take the inscription ΕΤΙΛΑΟ, not for the name of the artist, but for an allusion to the subject of the gem. (Bracci, Tab. 72.) [P. S.]

EUPOLEMUS (Εὐπόλεμος). 1. One of the generals of Cassander, was sent by him in 314 a. c. to invade Caria, but was surprised and taken prisoner by Ptolemy, who commanded that province for Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 68.) He must have been liberated again directly, as the next year we find him commanding the forces left by Cassander in Greece, when he moved northward against Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 77.)

2. An Aetolian, one of the commanders of the Aetolian auxiliaries, who served in the army of Flamininus against Philip, king of Macedonia, a. c. 197. (Polyb. xviii. 2, 4.)

3. A general of the Aetolians, who defended Ambracia against the Roman army under M. Fulvius, a. c. 189. (Liv. xxxviii. 4—10.) When peace was granted to the Aetolians, he was carried off a prisoner to Rome, together with the Aetolian general-in-chief, Nicander. (Polyb. xxviii. 4.) It is not improbable that this was the same person with the preceding.

4. A citizen of Hypata in Thessaly, at the time it was subject to the Aetolian league. He was the leader of one of the parties in that city, and having induced his chief adversaries to return from exile under a promise of security, had them all put to death. (Liv. xli. 25.) [E. H. B.]

EUPOLEMUS (Εὐπόλεμος). 1. Is mentioned by Arrian and Aelian in the introductions to their works on tactics, as an author who had written on the military art; but he is otherwise unknown.

2. A Greek historian who lived previous to the Christian aera and wrote several works on the history of the Jews, of which the following are known by their titles: 1. Περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ βασιλέων (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. pp. 146, 148.) 2. Περὶ τῆς ἡλίου προφητείας (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 23), and Περὶ τῶν τῆς Ἀσσυρίας Ἰουδαίων. It has been supposed that Eupolemus was a Jew, but from the manner in which Josephus (l. c.) speaks of him, we must infer that he was not a Jew. (Comp. Euseb. Praep. Evang. x. 17, 30; Hieronym. de illustr. Script. 38; Chron. Alexandr. pp. 148, 214; C. G. A. Kuhlmei, Eupolemi fragmenta prolegom. et commentar. instructa, Berlin, 1840, 8vo.) [L. S.]

EUPOLÉMUS (Εὐπόλεμος), an Argive architect, who built the great Heraeum at Mycenae, after its destruction by fire in a. c. 423. The entablature was ornamented with sculptures representing the wars of the gods and giants, and the Trojan war. A full description of the other works of art connected with this temple is given by Pausanias. (Paus. ii. 17. § 3; Thuc. iv. 133.) [P. S.]

EU'POLIS (Εὐπόλις), son of Sosipolis, an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, and one of the three who are distinguished by Horace, in his well-known line,

"Eupolis, atque Cratinus, Aristophanesque poetae,"

a judgment which is confirmed by all we know of the works of the Attic comedians.

Eupolis is said to have exhibited his first drama in the fourth year of the 87th Olympiad, a. c. 428, two years before Aristophanes, who was nearly of the same age as Eupolis. (Anon. de Com. p. xxix; Cyrill. c. Julian. i. p. 13, b.; Syncell. Chron. p. 257, c.) According to Suidas (s. v.), Eupolis was then only in the seventeenth year of his age; he was therefore born in a. c. 445. (Respecting the supposed legal minimum of the age at which a person could produce a drama on the stage, see Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. ii. Introd. pp. lvi.—lviii.) The date of his death cannot be so easily fixed. The common story was, that Alcibiades, when sailing to Sicily, threw Eupolis into the sea, in revenge for an attack which he had made upon him in his Βάπται. But, to say nothing of the improbability of even Alcibiades venturing on such an outrage, or the still stranger fact of its not being alluded to by Thucydides or any other trustworthy historian, the answer of Cicero is conclusive, that Eratosthenes mentioned plays produced by Eupolis after the Sicilian expedition. (Ad Att. vi. 1.) There is still a fragment extant, in which the poet applies the title στρατηγόν to Aristarchus, whom we know to have been στρατηγός in the year B. C. 414, that is, four years later than the date at which the common story fixed the death of Eupolis. (Schol. Victor. ad. Iliad. xiii. 353.) The only discoverable foundation for this story, and probably the true account of the poet's death, is the statement of Suidas, that he perished at the Hellespont in the war against the Lacedaemonians, which, as Meineke observes, must refer either to the battle of Cynossema (A. C. 411), or to that of Aegospotami (A. C. 405). That he died in the former battle is not improbable, since we never hear of his exhibiting after A. C. 412; and if so, it is very likely that the enemies of Alcibiades might charge him with taking advantage of the confusion of the battle to gratify his revenge. Meineke throws out a conjecture that the story may have arisen from a misunderstanding of what Lysias says about the young Alcibiades (i. p. 541). There are, however, other accounts of the poet's death, which are altogether different. Aelian (N. A. x. 41) and Tzetzes (Chil. iv. 245) relate, that he died and was buried in Aegina, and Pausanias (ii. 7. § 4) says, that he saw his tomb in the territory of Sicyon. Of the personal history of Eupolis nothing more is known. Aelian (l. c.) tells a pleasant tale of his faithful dog, Augras, and his slave Ephialtes.

The chief characteristic of the poetry of Eupolis seems to have been the liveliness of his fancy, and the power which he possessed of imparting its images to the audience. This characteristic of his genius influenced his choice of subjects, as well as his mode of treating them, so that he not only appears to have chosen subjects which other poets might have despaired of dramatizing, but we are expressly told that he wrought into the body of his plays those serious political views which other poets expounded in their parabases, as in the Δήμοι, in which he represented the legislators of other times conferring on the administration of the state. To do this in a genuine Attic old comedy, without converting the comedy into a serious philosophic dialogue, must have been a great triumph of dramatic art. (Platon. de Div. Clar. p. xxvi.) This introduction of deceased persons on the stage appears to have given to the plays of Eupolis a certain dignity, which would have been inconsistent with the comic spirit had it not been relieved by the most graceful and clever merriment. (Platon. l. c.) In elegance he is said to have even surpassed Aristophanes (Ibid.; Macrob. Sat. vii. 5), while in bitter jesting and personal abuse he emulated Cratinus. (Anon. de Com. p. xxix.; Pers. Sat. i. 124; Lucian. Jov. Acc. vol. ii. p. 832.) Among the objects of his satire was Socrates, on whom he made a bitter, though less elaborate attack than that in the Clouds of Aristophanes. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 97, 180; Etym. Mag. p. 18. 10; Lucian. Pisc. vol. i. p. 595.) Innocence seems to have afforded no shelter, for he attacked Autolycus, who is said to have been guilty of no crime, and is only known as having been distinguished for his beauty, and as a victor in the pancratium, as vehemently as Callias, Alcibiades, Melanthius, and others. Nor were the dead exempt from his abuse, for there are still extant some lines of his, in which Cimon is most unmercifully treated. (Plut. Cim. 15; Schol. ad Aristid. p. 515.) It is hardly necessary to observe that these attacks were mingled with much obscenity. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 741, 1142, Nub. 296, 541.)

A close relation subsisted between Eupolis and Aristophanes, not only as rivals, but as imitators of each other. Cratinus attacked Aristophanes for borrowing from Eupolis, and Eupolis in his Βάνται made the same charge, especially with reference to the Knights, of which he says,

ἐνενοήσα τῷ φαλακρῷ τούτῳ κάδωρσάμεν.

The Scholiasts specify the last Parabasis of the Knights as borrowed from Eupolis. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Equit. 528, 1288, Nub. 544, foll.) On the other hand, Aristophanes, in the second (or third) edition of the Clouds, retorts upon Eupolis the charge of imitating the Knights in his Marios (Nub. l. c.), and taunts him with the further indignity of jesting on his rival's baldness. There are other examples of the attacks of the two poets upon one another. (Aristoph. Pax. 762, and Schol.; Schol. ad Vesp. 1020; Schol. ad Platon. p. 331, Bekker; Stobaeus, Serm. iv. p. 53.)

The number of the plays of Eupolis is stated by Suidas at seventeen, and by the anonymous writer at fourteen. The extant titles exceed the greater of these numbers, but some of them are very doubtful. The following fifteen are considered by Meineke to be genuine: Ἀλγες, Ἀστροτέντοι ἢ Ἀνδρογύναι, Αὐτόλκοι, Βάνται, Δήμοι, Διαστῶν, Εἰλωτες, Κόλακες, Μαρκῆς, Νουμπηναί, Πόλεις, Προσπάλτιοι, Ταξιαρχοί, Τέτρινοσκόκι, Χρυσέων γένος. An analysis of these plays, so far as their subjects can be ascertained, will be found in the works quoted below, and especially in that of Meineke. The following are the plays of Eupolis, the dates of which are known:—

- B. C. 425. At the Lenaean. Νουμπηναί. Third Prize. 1st. Aristophanes, Ἀχαρνεῖς. 2nd. Cratinus, Χειμαῖομένα.
- " 423 or 422. Ἀστροτέντοι.
- " 421. Μαρκῆς. Probably at the Lenaean.
- " " Κόλακες. At the great Dionysia.
- " First Prize. 2nd. Aristoph. Εἰρήνη.
- " 420. Αὐτόλκοι.

Eupolis, like Aristophanes and other comic poets, brought some of his plays on the stage in the name of another person, Apollodorus. (Athen. v. p. 216, d.)

Hephaestion (p. 109, ed. Gaif.) mentions a peculiar choriambic metre, which was called Eupolidean, and which was also used by the poets of the middle and of the new comedy.

The names of Eupolis and Eubulus are often confounded.

EUPOMPIDAS (Εὐπομπίδας), son of Daimechus, one of the commanders in Plataea during its siege by the Lacedaemonians, A. C. 429—8. He with Theaetetus, a prophet, in the winter following this second year, devised the celebrated plan for passing the lines of circumvallation, which, originally intended for the whole number of the besieged, was in the end successfully executed by 212 of them, under the guidance of the same two leaders. (Thuc. iii. 20—23.) [A. H. C.]

EUPOMPUS (Εὐπόμπος), of Sicyon, one of the most distinguished Greek painters, was the contemporary of Zeuxis, Parrhasius, and Timanthes, and the instructor of Pamphilus, the master of Apelles. He was held in such esteem by his contemporaries, that a new division was made of the schools of art, and he was placed at the head of one of them. Formerly only two schools had been recognised, the Greek Proper or Hellenic, and the Asiatic; but the fame of Eupompus led to the creation of a new school, the Sicyonian, as a branch of the Hellenic, and the division then adopted was the Ionian, the Sicyonian, and the Attic, the last of which had, no doubt, Apollodorus for its head. Another instance of the influence of Eupompus is his celebrated answer to Lysippus, who, at the beginning of his career, asked the great painter whom he should take for his model; and Eupompus answered that he ought to imitate nature herself, and no single artist. The only work of Eupompus which is mentioned is a victor in the games carrying a palm. (Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 6, xxxv. 9, 10. s. 36. §§ 3, 7.) [P. S.]

EUPREPES, celebrated in the racing annals of Rome as having carried off 782 chaplets of victory, —a greater number than any single individual before his time had ever won. He was put to death when an old man, upon the accession of Caracalla (A. D. 211), because the colours which he wore in the circus were different from those patronised by the prince, who favoured the Blues. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 1.) [W. R.]

EURIPIDAS, or EURIPIDES (Εὐριπίδης, Εὐριπίδης), an Aetolian, who, when his countrymen, with the help of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian, had gained possession of Cynaetha, in Arcadia (B. C. 220), was at first appointed governor of the town; but the Aetolians soon after set fire to it, fearing the arrival of the Macedonian succours for which Aratus had applied. In the next year, B. C. 219, being sent as general to the Eleans, then allied with Aetolia, he ravaged the lands of Dyme, Pharsæ, and Tritæa, defeated Miccus, the lieutenant-general of the Achæans, and seized an ancient stronghold, named Teichos, near Cape Araxus, whence he infested the enemy's territory more effectually. In the winter of the same year he advanced from Psophis, in Arcadia, where he had his head-quarters, to invade Sicyonia, having with him a body of 2200 foot and 100 horse. During the night he passed the encampment of the Macedonians, in the Phlissian territory, without being aware of their vicinity; on discovering which from some foragers in the morning, he turned back, hoping to pass them again, and to arrive at Psophis without an engagement; but, falling in with them in the passes of Mount Apeleura, between Phlius and Styμφalus, he basely deserted his troops, and made his escape to Psophis, with a small number of horsemen, while almost all the Eleans were either cut to pieces by the Macedonians, or perished among the mountains. Philip then advanced on Psophis, and compelled it to capitulate, Euripides being allowed to return in safety to Aetolia. In B. C. 217 we find him acting again as general of the Eleans, who had requested that he might be sent to superintend Pyrrhus. He ravaged Achaia in this campaign, but was pursued and defeated by Lycus, the lieutenant-general of the Achæans. (Polyb. iv. 19, 59, 69—72, v. 94, 95.) [E. E.]

EURIPIDES (Εὐριπίδης). 1. A tragic poet of Athens, is mentioned by Suidas as having flourished earlier than his more celebrated namesake. He was the author of twelve plays, two of which gained the prize. (Suid. s. v. Εὐριπίδης.)

2. The distinguished tragic writer, of the Athenian demus of Phlya in the Cecropid tribe, or, as others state it, of Phyle in the tribe Oeneis, was the son of Mnesearebus and Cleito, and was born in B. C. 485, according to the date of the Arundel marble, for the adoption of which Hartung contends. (Ew. Restitutus, p. 5, &c.) This testimony, however, is outweighed by the other statements on the subject, from which it appears that his parents were among those who, on the invasion of Xerxes, had fled from Athens to Salamis (Herod. vii. 41), and that the poet was born in that island in B. C. 480. (See Clinton, sub anno.) Nor need we with Müller (Greek Literature, p. 358) set it down at once as a mere legend that his birth took place on the very day of the battle of Salamis (Sept. 23), though we may look with suspicion on the way in which it was contrived to bring the three great tragic poets of Athens into connexion with the most glorious day in her annals. (Hartung, p. 10.) Thus it has been said that, while Euripides then first saw the light, Aeschylus in the maturity of manhood fought in the battle, and Sophocles, a beautiful boy of 15, took part in the chorus at the festival which celebrated the victory. If again we follow the exact date of Eratosthenes, who represents Euripides as 75 at his death in B. C. 406, his birth must be assigned to B. C. 481, as Müller places it. It has also been said that he received his name in commemoration of the battle of Artemisium, which took place near the Euripus not long before he was born, and in the same year; but Euripides was not a new name, and belonged, as we have seen, to an earlier tragic writer. (See, too, Thuc. ii. 70, 79.) With respect to the station in life of his parents, we may safely reject the account given in Stobæus (see Barnes, Eur. Vit. § 5), that his father was a Boeotian, banished from his country for bankruptcy. His mother, it is well known, is represented by Aristophanes as a herb-seller, and not a very honest one either (Ach. 454, Thesm. 387, 456, 910, Eq. 19, Ran. 839; Plin. xxii. 22; Suid. s. vv. Ἐκδιδίε, βασκαρικὸς; Hesych. s. v. Ἐκδιδίε); and we find the same statement made by Gellius (xv. 20) from Theopompus; but to neither of these testimonies can much weight be accorded (for Theopompus, see Plut. Lys. 30; Ael. V. H. iii. 18; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 1; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 24; C. Nep. Alc. 11), and they are contradicted by less exceptionable authorities. That the family of Euripides was of a rank far from mean is asserted by Suidas (s. v.) and Moschopulus (Vit. Eur.) to have been proved by Philochorus in a work no longer extant, and seems, indeed, to be borne out by what Athenæus (x. p. 424, e.) reports from Theophrastus, that the poet, when a boy, was cup-bearer to a chorus of noble Athenians at the Thargelian festival,—an office for which nobility of blood was requisite. We know also that he was taught rhetoric by Prodicus, who was certainly not moderate in his terms for instruction, and who was in the habit, as Philo-tratus tells us, of seeking his pupils among youths of high rank. (Plat. Apol. p. 19, e.; Stallb. ad loc.; Arist. Rhet. iii. 14. § 9; Philostr. Vit. Soph. Prodicus.) It is said that the future distinction of Euripides was predicted by an oracle, promising that he should be crowned with "sacred garlands," in consequence of which his father had him trained to gymnastic exercises; and we learn that, while yet a boy, he won the prize at the Eleusinian and Thesean contests (see Dict. of Ant. pp. 374, 964), and offered himself, when 17 years old, as a candidate at the Olympic games, but was not admitted because of some doubt about his age. (Oenom. ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. v. 33; Gell. xv. 20.) Some trace of his early gymnastic pursuits is remarked by Mr. Keble (Praef. Acad. xxix. p. 605) in the detailed description of the combat between Eteocles and Polynices in the Phoenissae. (v. 1392, &c.) Soon, however, abandoning these, he studied the art of painting (Thom. Mag. Vit. Eur.; Suid. a. v.), not, as we learn, without success; and it has been observed that the veiled figure of Agamemnon in the Iphigenia of Timanthes was probably suggested by a line in Euripides' description of the same scene. (Iph. in Aul. 1550; Barnes, ad loc.; comp. Ion, 183, &c.) To philosophy and literature he devoted himself with much interest and energy, studying physics under Anaxagoras, and rhetoric, as we have already seen, under Prodicus. (Diod. i. 7, 38; Strab. xiv. p. 645; Heracl. Pont. Alleg. Homer. § 22.) We learn also from Athenaeus that he was a great book-collector, and it is recorded of him that he committed to memory certain treatises of Heraclitus, which he found hidden in the temple of Artemis, and which he was the first to introduce to the notice of Socrates. (Athen. i. p. 3, a.; Tatian, Or. c. Graec. p. 143, b.; Hartung, Eur. Rest. p. 131.) His intimacy with the latter is beyond a doubt, though we must reject the statement of Gellius (l. c.), that he received instruction from him in moral science, since Socrates was not born till B.C. 468, twelve years after the birth of Euripides. Traces of the teaching of Anaxagoras have been remarked in many passages both of the extant plays and of the fragments, and were impressed especially on the lost tragedy of Melanippa the Wise. (Orest. 545, 971; Pors. ad loc.; Plat. Apol. p. 26, d. e.; Troad. 879, Hel. 1014; Fragm. Melanipp., ed. Wagner, p. 255; Cic. Tusc. Disp. i. 26; Hartung, p. 109; Barnes, ad Eur. Heracl. 529; Valck. Diatr. c. 4, &c.) The philosopher is also supposed to be alluded to in the Alkestis (v. 925, &c.; comp. Cic. Tusc. Disp. iii. 14). "We do not know," says Müller (Greek Literature, p. 358), "what induced a person with such tendencies to devote himself to tragic poetry." He is referring apparently to the opposition between the philosophical convictions of Euripides and the mythical legends which formed the subjects of tragedy; otherwise it does not clearly appear why poetry should be thought incompatible with philosophical pursuits. If, however, we may trust the account in Gellius (l. c.), it would seem,—and this is not unimportant for our estimation of his poetical character,—that the mind of Euripides was led at a very early period to that which afterwards became the business of his life, since he wrote a tragedy at the age of eighteen. That it was, therefore, exhibited, and that it was probably no other than the Rhesus are points unwarrantably concluded by Hartung (p. 6, &c.), who ascribes also to the same date the composition of the Veiled Hippolytus. The representation of the Peliades, the first play of Euripides which was acted, at least in his own name, took place in B.C. 455. This statement rests on the authority of his anonymous life, edited by Elmaley from a MS. in the Ambrosian library, and compared with that by Thomas Magister; and it is confirmed by the life in the MSS. of Paris, Vienna, and Copenhagen. In B.C. 441, Euripides gained for the first time the first prize, and he continued to exhibit plays until B.C. 408, the date of the Orestes. (See Clinton, sub annis.) Soon after this he left Athens for the court of ARCHELAUS, king of Macedonia, his reasons for which step can only be matter of conjecture. Traditional scandal has ascribed it to his disgust at the intrigue of his wife with Cephisophon, and the ridicule which was showered upon him in consequence by the comic poets. But the whole story in question has been sufficiently refuted by Hartung (p. 165, &c.), though objections may be taken to one or two of his assumptions and arguments. The anonymous author of the life of Euripides reports that he married Choerilla, daughter of Mnesilochus, and that, in consequence of her infidelity, he wrote the Hippolytus to satirize the sex, and divorced her. He then married again, and his second wife, named Melitto, proved no better than the first. Now the Hippolytus was acted in B.C. 428, the Thesmophoriazusae of Aristophanes in 414, and at the latter period Euripides was still married to Choerilla, Mnesilochus being spoken of as his κρηστής with no hint of the connexion having ceased. (See Thesm. 210, 289.) But what can be more unlikely than that Euripides should have allowed fourteen years to elapse between his discovery of his wife's infidelity and his divorce of her? or that Aristophanes should have made no mention of so piquant an event in the Thesmophoriazusae? It may be said, however, that the name Choerilla is a mistake of the grammarians for Melitto; that it was the latter whose infidelity gave rise to the Hippolytus; and that the intrigue of the former with Cephisophon, subsequent to 414, occasioned Euripides to leave Athens. But this is inconsistent with Choerilla's age, according to Hartung, who argues thus:—Euripides had three sons by this lady, the youngest of whom must have been born not later than 434, for he exhibited plays of his father (?) in 404, and must at that time, therefore (?), have been thirty years old (comp. Hartung, p. 6); consequently Choerilla must have become the wife of Euripides not later than 440. At the time, then, of her alleged adultery she must have been upwards of fifty, and must have been married thirty years. But it may be urged that Choerilla may have died soon after the representation of the Thesmophoriazusae (and no wonder, says Hartung, if her death was hastened by so atrocious an attack on her husband and her father!), and Euripides may then have married a young wife, Melitto, who played him false. To this it is answered, that it is clear from the Frogs that his friendship with Cephisophon, the supposed gallant, continued unbroken till his death. After all, however, the silence of Aristophanes is the best refutation of the calumny. [CEPHISOPHON.] With respect to the real reason for the poet's removal into Macedonia, it is clear that an invitation from Archelaus, at whose court the highest honours awaited him, would have much temptation for one situated as Euripides was at Athens. The attacks of Aristophanes and others had probably not been without their effect; there was a strong, violent, and unscrupulous party against him, whose intrigues and influence were apparent in the results of the dramatic contests; if we may believe the testimony of Varro (ap. Gell. xvii. 4), he wrote 75 tragedies and gained the prize only five times; according to Thomas Magister, 15 of his plays out of 92 were successful. After his death, indeed, his high poetical merits seem to have been fully and generally recognized; but so have been those of Wordsworth among ourselves even in his lifetime; and yet to the poems of both, the φαινόμενα σωφροσύνης of Pindar is perhaps especially applicable. Euripides, again, must have been aware that his philosophical tenets were regarded, whether justly or not, with considerable suspicion, and he had already been assailed with a charge of impiety in a court of justice, on the ground of the well-known line in the Hippolytus (607), supposed to be expressive of mental reservation. (Arist. Rhét. iii. 15. § 8.) He did not live long to enjoy the honours and pleasures of the Macedonian court, as his death took place in B. C. 406. Most testimonies agree in stating that he was torn in pieces by the king's dogs, which, according to some, were set upon him through envy by Arrhidæus and Cræteus, two rival poets. But even with the account of his end scandal has been busy, reporting that he met it at the hands of women while he was going one night to keep a criminal assignation,—and this at the age of 75! The story seems to be a mixture of the two calumnies with respect to the profligacy of his character and his hatred of the female sex. The Athenians sent to ask for his remains, but Archelaus refused to give them up, and buried them in Macedonia with great honour. The regret of Sophocles for his death is said to have been so great, that at the representation of his next play he made his actors appear uncrowned. (Ael. V. H. xiii. 4; Diod. xiii. 103; Gell. xv. 20; Paus. i. 20; Thom. Mag. Vit. Eur.; Suid. s. v. Εὐριπίδης; Steph. Byz. s. v. Βοπυλακός; Eur. Arch. ed. Wagner, p. 111; see Barnes, Vit. Eur. § 31; Bayle, Dict. Histor. s. v. Euripides, and the authorities there referred to.) The statue of Euripides in the theatre at Athens is mentioned by Pausanias (i. 21). The admiration felt for him by foreigners, even in his lifetime, may be illustrated not only by the patronage of Archelaus, but also by what Plutarch records (Nic. 29), that many of the Athenian prisoners in Sicily regained their liberty by reciting his verses to their masters, and that the Carthaginians on one occasion having at first refused to admit into their harbour an Athenian ship pursued by pirates, allowed it to put in when they found that some of the crew could repeat fragments of his poems.

We have already intimated that the accounts which we find in Athenæus and others of the profligacy of Euripides are mere idle scandal, and scarcely worthy of serious refutation. (Athen. xiii. pp. 557, e., 603, e.; comp. Suid. l. c.; Arist. Ran. 1045; Schol. ad loc.) On the authority of Alexander Aetolus (ap. Gell. xv. 20; comp. Ael. V. H. viii. 13) we learn that he was, like his master Anaxagoras, of a serious temper and averse to mirth (σπουδαῖος καὶ μωροφύλης); and though such a character is indeed by no means incompatible with vicious habits, yet it is also one on which men are very apt to avenge themselves by reports and insinuations of the kind we are alluding to. Certainly the calumny in question seems to be contradicted in a great measure by the spirit of the Hippolytus, in which the hero is clearly a great favourite with the author, and from which it has been inferred that his own tendency was even to asceticism. (Keble, Praef. Acad. p. 606, &c.) It may be added, that a speculative character, like that of Euripides, is one over which such lower temptations have usually less power, and which is liable rather to those of a spiritual and intellectual kind. (See Butler's Anal. part ii. c. 6.) Nor does there appear to be any better foundation for that other charge which has been brought against him, of hatred to the female sex. The alleged infidelity of his wife, which is commonly adduced to account for it, has been discussed above; and we may perhaps safely pass over the other statement, found in Gellius (xv. 20), where it is attributed to his having had two wives at once,—a double dose of matrimony! The charge no doubt originated in the austerity of his temper and demeanour above mentioned (Suid. s. v.); but certainly he who drew such characters as Antigone, Iphigenia, and, above all, Alceste, was not blind to the gentleness, the strong affection, the self-abandoning devotedness of women. And if his plays contain specimens of the sex far different from these, we must not forget, what has indeed almost passed into a proverb, that women are both better and worse than men, and that one especially characteristic of Euripides was to represent human nature as it is. (Arist. Poët. 46.)

With respect to the world and the Deity, he seems to have adopted the doctrines of his master, not unmixed apparently with pantheistic views. [ANAXAGORAS.] (Valck. Diatr. 4—6; Hartung, Eur. Rest. p. 95, &c.) To class him with atheists, and to speak in the same breath, as Sir T. Browne does (Rel. Med. § 47), of “the impieties of Lucian, Euripides, and Julian,” is undoubtedly unjust. At the same time, it must be confessed that we look in vain in his plays for the high faith of Aeschylus, which ever recognizes the hand of Providence guiding the troubled course of events and over-ruling them for good; nor can we fail to admit that the pupil of Anaxagoras could not sympathise with the popular religious system around him, nor throw himself cordially into it. Aeschylus indeed rose above while he adopted it, and formally retaining its legends, imparted to them a higher and deeper moral significance. Such, however, was not the case with Euripides; and there is much truth in what Müller says (Greek Literature, p. 358), that “with respect to the mythical traditions which the tragic muse had selected as her subjects, he stood on an entirely different footing from Aeschylus and from Sophocles. He could not bring his philosophical convictions with regard to the nature of God and His relation to mankind into harmony with the contents of these legends, nor could he pass over in silence their incongruities. Hence it is that he is driven to the strange necessity of carrying on a sort of polemical discussion with the very materials and subjects of which he had to treat.” (Herc. Fur. 1316, 1317, Androm. 1138, Orest. 406, Ion, 445, &c., Fragm. Beller. ed. Wagner, p. 147; Clem. Alex. Protr. 7.) And if we may regard the Bacchæ, written to wards the close of his life, as a sort of recantation of these views, and as an avowal that religious mysteries are not to be subjected to the bold scrutiny of reason (see Müller, Gr. Lit. p. 379, Eumen. § 37; Keble, Prael. Acad. p. 609), it is but a sad picture of a mind which, wearied with scepticism, and having no objective system of truth to satisfy it, acquiesces in what is established as a deadening relief from fruitless speculation. But it was not merely with respect to the nature and attributes of the gods that Euripides placed himself in opposition to the ancient legends, which we find him altering in the most arbitrary manner, both as to events and characters. Thus, in the Orestes, Menelaüs comes before us as a selfish coward, and Helen as a worthless wanton; in the Helena, the notion of Stesichorus is adopted, that the heroine was never carried to Troy at all, and that it was a mere εἰδωλον of her for which the Greeks and Trojans fought (comp. Herod. ii. 112—120); Andromache, the widow of Hector and slave of Neoptolemus, seems almost to forget the past in her quarrel with Hermione and the perils of her present situation; and Electra, married by the policy of Aegisthus to a peasant, scolds her husband for inviting guests to dine without regard to the ill-prepared state of the larder. In short, with Euripides tragedy is brought down into the sphere of every-day life, τὰ οἰκεία πράγματα, ὡς χροῖμεθ', ὡς ζῶμεν (Arist. Ran. 957); men are represented, according to the remark of Aristotle so often quoted (Poët. 46), not as they ought to be, but as they are; under the names of the ancient heroes, the characters of his own time are set before us; it is not Medea, or Iphigenia, or Alcestis that is speaking, says Mr. Keble (Prael. Acad. p. 596), but abstractedly a mother, a daughter, or a wife. All this, indeed, gave fuller scope, perhaps, for the exhibition of passion and for those scenes of tenderness and pathos in which Euripides especially excelled; and it will serve also to account in great measure for the preference given to his plays by the practical Socrates, who is said to have never entered the theatre unless when they were acted, as well as for the admiration felt for him by the poets of the new comedy, of whom Menander professedly adopted him for his model, while Philémon declared that, if he could but believe in the consciousness of the soul after death, he would certainly hang himself to enjoy the sight of Euripides. (Schlegel, Dram. Lit. lect. vii.; Aelian, V. H. ii. 13; Quint. Inst. Or. x. 1; Thom. Mag. Vit. Eurip.; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc. i. p. 286, iv. p. 48.) Yet, even as a matter of art, such a process can hardly be justified: it seems to partake too much of the fault condemned in Boileau's line:

and it is a graver question whether the moral tendency of tragedy was not impaired by it,—whether, in the absence especially of a fixed external standard of morality, it was not most dangerous to tamper with what might supply the place of it, however ineffectually, through the medium of the imagination,—whether indeed it can ever be safe to lower to the common level of humanity characters hallowed by song and invested by tradition with an ideal grandeur, in cases where they do not tend by the power of inveterate association to colour or countenance evil. And there is another obvious point, which should not be omitted while we are speaking of the moral effect of the writings of Euripides, viz. the enervating tendency of his exhibitions of passion and suffering, beautiful as they are, and well as they merit for him from Aristotle the praise of being “the most tragic of poets.” (Poët. 26.) The philosopher, however, qualifies this commendation by the remark, that, while he provides thus admirably for the excitement of pity by his catastrophes, “he does not arrange the rest well” (εἰ καὶ τὰ ἄλλα μὲν εὖ οἰκονομεῖ); and we may mention in conclusion the chief objections which, artistically speaking, have been brought with justice against his tragedies. We need but allude to his constant employment of the “Deus ex machina,” the disconnection of his choral odes from the subject of the play (Arist. Poët. 82; Hor. Ep. ad Pis. 191, &c.), and the extremely awkward and formal character of his prologues. On these points some good remarks will be found in Müller (Greek Lit. pp. 362—364) and in Keble. (Prael. Acad. p. 590, &c.) Another serious defect is the frequent introduction of frigid γυνήματα and of philosophical disquisitions, making Medea talk like a sophist, and Hecuba like a free-thinker, and aiming rather at subtlety than simplicity. The poet, moreover, is too often lost in the rhetorician, and long declamations meet us, equally tiresome with those of Alfieri. They are then but dubious compliments which are paid him in reference to these points by Cicero and by Quintilian, the latter of whom says that he is worthy to be compared with the most eloquent pleaders of the forum (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 8; Quint. Inst. Or. x. 1); while Cicero so admired him, that he is said to have had in his hand his tragedy of Medea at the time of his murder. (Ptol. Hephaest. v. 5.)

Euripides has been called the poet of the sophists,—a charge by no means true in its full extent, as it appears that, though he may not have escaped altogether the seduction of the sophistical spirit, yet on the whole, the philosophy of Socrates, the great opponent of the sophists, exercised most influence on his mind. (Hartung, Eur. Rest. p. 128, &c.)

On the same principles on which he brought his subjects and characters to the level of common life, he adopted also in his style the every-day mode of speaking, and Aristotle (Rhet. iii. 2. § 5) commends him as having been the first to produce an effect by the skilful employment of words from the ordinary language of men (comp. Long. de Subl. 31), peculiarly fitted, it may be observed, for the expression of the gentler and more tender feelings. (See Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice, act v. sc. 1; comp. Müller, Greek Lit. p. 366.)

According to some accounts, Euripides wrote, in all, 75 plays; according to others, 92. Of these, 18 are extant, if we omit the Rhesus, the genuineness of which has been defended by Vater and Hartung, while Valckenaer, Hermann, and Müller have, on good grounds, pronounced it spurious. To what author, however, or to what period it should be assigned, is a disputed point. (Valcken. Diatr. 9, 10; Hermann, de Rheso tragedia, Opusc. vol. iii.; Müller, Gr. Lit. p. 380, note.) A list is subjoined of the extant plays of Euripides, with their dates, ascertained or probable. For a fuller account the reader is referred to Müller (Gr. Lit. p. 367, &c.) and to Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 239, &c.), the latter of whom gives a catalogue also of the lost dramas.

Alceſtis. B. C. 438. This play was brought out as the last of a tetralogy, and stood therefore in the place of a satyric drama, to which indeed it bears, in some parts, great similarity, particularly in the representation of Hercules in his cups. This circumstance obviates, of course, the objection against the scene alluded to, as a "lamentable interruption to our feelings of commiseration for the calamities of Admetus,"—an objection which, as it seems to us, would even on other grounds be untenable. (See Herm. Dissert. de Eurip. Alceſt., prefixed to Monk's edition of 1837.) While, however, we recognize this satyric character in the Alceſtis, we must confess that we cannot, as Müller does, see anything farcical in the concluding scene.

Medea. B. C. 431. The four plays represented in this year by Euripides, who gained the third prize, were Medea, Philoctetes, Diodes, and Messores or Oepurati, a satyric drama. (See Hartung, Eur. Rest. pp. 332—374.)

Hippolytus Coronifer. B. C. 428. In this year Euripides gained the first prize. For the reason of the title Coronifer (στέφανοφόρος), see vv. 72, &c. There was an older play, called the Veiled Hippolytus, no longer extant, on which the present tragedy was intended as an improvement, and in which the criminal love of Phædra appears to have been represented in a more offensive manner, and as avowed by herself boldly and without restraint. For the conjectural reasons of the title Καλυπτόμενος, applied to this former drama, see Wagner, Fragm. Eurip. p. 220, &c.; Valcken. Proef. in Hippol. pp. 19, 20; comp. Hartung. Eurip. Rest. pp. 41, &c., 401, &c.

Hecuba. This play must have been exhibited before B. C. 423, as Aristophanes parodies a passage of it in the Clouds (1148), which he brought out in that year. Müller says that the passage in the Hecuba (645, ed. Porz.), οἷον δὲ καὶ τῆς α. γ. λ., "seems to refer to the misfortunes of the Spartans at Pylos B. C. 425." This is certainly possible; and, if it is the case, we may fix the representation of the play in B. C. 424.

Heracleidae. Müller refers it, by conjecture, to B. C. 421.

Suppliants. This also he refers, by conjecture, to about the same period.

Ion, of uncertain date.

Hercules Furens, of uncertain date.

Andromache, referred by Müller, on conjecture, to the 90th Olympiad. (B. C. 420—417.)

Troades. B. C. 415.

Electra, assigned by Müller, on conjecture and from internal evidence, to the period of the Sicilian expedition. (B. C. 415—413.)

Helen. B. C. 412, in the same year with the last play of the Andromeda. (Schol. ad Arist. Them. 1012.)

Iphigenia at Tauri. Date uncertain.

Orestes. B. C. 408.

Phoenissæ. The exact date is not known; but the play was one of the last exhibited at Athens by its author. (Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 53.)

Bacchæ. This play was apparently written for representation in Macedonia, and therefore at a very late period of the life of Euripides. See above.

Iphigenia at Aulis. This play, together with the Bacchæ and the Alcæon, was brought out at Athens, after the poet's death, by the younger Euripides. [No. 3.]

Cyclops, of uncertain date. It is interesting as the only extant specimen of the Greek satyric drama, and its intrinsic merits seem to us to call for a less disparaging criticism than that which Müller passes on it.

Besides the plays, there are extant five letters, purporting to have been written by Euripides. Three of them are addressed to king Archelaus, and the other two to Sophocles and Cephisophon respectively. Bentley, in a letter to Barnes (Bentley's Correspondence, ed. Wordsw. vol. i. p. 64), mentions what he considers the internal proofs of their spuriousness, some of which, however, are drawn from some of the false or doubtful statements with respect to the life of Euripides. But we have no hesitation in setting them down as spurious, and as the composition of some later ἀποκαλῶν, though Barnes, in his preface to them, published subsequently to Bentley's letter, declares that he who denies their genuineness must be either very impudent or deficient in judgment.

The editio princeps of Euripides contains the Medea, Hippolytus, Alceſtis, and Andromache, in capital letters. It is without date or printer's name, but is supposed, with much probability, to have been edited by J. Lascaris, and printed by De Alopa, at Florence, towards the end of the 15th century. In 1503 an edition was published by Aldus at Venice: it contains 18 plays, including the Rhesus and omitting the Electra. Another, published at Heidelberg in 1597, contained the Latin version of Aemil. Portus and a fragment of the Danaë, for the first time, from some ancient MSS. in the Palatine library. Another was published by P. Stephens, Geneva, 1602. In that of Barnes, Cambridge, 1694, whatever be the defects of Barnes as an editor, much was done towards the correction and illustration of the text. It contains also many fragments, and the spurious letters. Other editions are that of Musgrave, Oxford, 1778, of Beck, Leipzig, 1778—88, of Matthiæ, Leipzig, 1813—29, in 9 vols. with the Scholia and fragments, and a variorum edition, published at Glasgow in 1821, in 9 vols. 8vo. The fragments have been recently edited in a separate form and very satisfactorily by Wagner, Wratław, 1844. Of separate plays there have been many editions, e. g. by Porson, Elmsley, Valckenaer, Monk, Pflugk, and Hermann. There are also numerous translations of different plays in several languages, and the whole works have been translated into English verse by Potter, Oxford, 1814, and into German by Bothe, Berlin, 1800. The Jocasta, by Gascoigne and Kinwelmarsh, represented at Gray's Inn in 1566, is a very free translation from the Phoenissæ, much being added, omitted, and transposed.

3. The youngest of the three sons of the above, according to Suidas. After the death of his father he brought out three of his plays at the great Dionysia, viz. the Alcæon (no longer extant), the Iphigenia at Aulis, and the Bacchæ. (Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 67.) Suidas mentions also a nephew of the great poet, of the same name, to whom he ascribes the authorship of three plays, Medea, Orestes, and Polyxena, and who, he tells us, gained a prize with one of his uncle's tragedies after the death of the latter. It is probable that the son and the nephew have been confounded. Aristophanes too (Eccles. 825, 826, 829) mentions a certain Euripides who had shortly before proposed a property-tax of a fortieth. The proposal made him at first very popular, but the measure was thrown out, and he became forthwith the object of a general outcry, about B.C. 394. It is doubtful whether he is to be identified with the son or the nephew of the poet. (See Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, pp. 493, 506, 520.) [E. E.]

EUROPA (Εὐρώπη), according to the Iliad (xiv. 321), a daughter of Phoenix, but according to the common tradition a daughter of Agenor, was carried off by Zeus, who had metamorphosed himself into a bull, from Phoenicia to Crete. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 1; Mosch. ii. 7; Herod. i. 173; Paus. vii. 4. § 1, ix. 19. § 1; Ov. Met. ii. 839, &c.; Comp. AGENOR.) Europe, as a part of the world, was believed to have received its name from this fabulous Phoenician princess. (Hom. Hymn. in Apoll. 251; Herod. iv. 45.) There are two other mythical personages of this name (Hes. Theog. 357; Pind. Pyth. iv. 46), which occurs also as a surname of Demeter. (Paus. ix. 39. § 4.) [L. S.]

EUROPUS (Εὐρώπυς), a son of Macedon and Oreithyia, the daughter of Cecrops, from whom the town of Europus in Macedonia was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

EUROPS (Εὐρώπυς), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Aegialeus and king of Sicyon, and the other a son of Phoroneus. (Paus. ii. 5. § 5, 34. § 5.) [L. S.]

EUROTAS (Εὐρώτας), a son of Myles and grandson of Lelex. He was the father of Sparte, the wife of Lacedaemon, and is said to have carried the waters, stagnating in the plain of Lacedaemon, into the sea by means of a canal, and to have called the river which arose therefrom after his own name, Eurotas. (Paus. iii. 1. § 2.) Apollodorus (iii. 10. § 3) calls him a son of Lelex by the nymph Cleochareia, and in Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ταῖγερων) his mother is called Taygete. (Comp. Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 15, Ol. vi. 46, ad Lycoph. 886.) [L. S.]

EURYALE (Εὐρύαλη), the name of three mythical beings. (Hes. Theog. 276; Pind. Pyth. xxii. 20; Apollod. i. 4. § 3; Val. Flacc. v. 312; comp. ORION.) [L. S.]

EURYALUS (Εὐρύαλος). 1. A son of Mecisteus, is mentioned by Apollodorus (i. 9. § 16) among the Argonauts, and was one of the Epigoni who took and destroyed Thebes. (Paus. ii. 20. § 4; Apollod. iii. 7. § 2.) He was a brave warrior, and at the funeral games of Oedipus he conquered all his competitors (Hom. Il. xxiii. 608) with the exception of Epeius, who excelled him in wrestling. He accompanied Diomedes to Troy, where he was one of the bravest heroes, and slew several Trojans. (Il. ii. 565, vi. 20; Paus. ii. 30. § 9.) In the painting of Polygnotus at Delphi, he was represented as being wounded; and there was also a statue of him at Delphi, which stood between those of Diomedes and Aegialeus. (Paus. x. 10. § 2, 25. § 2.)

2. One of the suitors of Hippodameia. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 127.)

3. A son of Odysseus and Evippe, also called Dorycleus or Leontophron, was killed by Telemachus. (Parthen. Erot. 3; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796.) There are four other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. i. 8. § 5; Hom. Od. viii. 115, &c.; Virg. Aen. ix. 176, &c.; Paus. iv. 20. § 3.) [L. S.]

EURYANASSA. [PELOPA.]

EURYANAX (Εὐρύναξ), a Spartan of the royal house of the Agida. He was the son of Doreus, and was one of the commanders of the Lacedaemonians at the battle of Plataeae, B.C. 479. (Herod. ix. 10, 53, 55.) [See DORIEUS, vol. i. p. 1067, a.] [C. P. M.]

EURYBATES (Εὐρύβατης). 1. By Latin writers called Eribotes, was a son of Teleon, and one of the Argonauts. He was skilled in the medical art, and dressed the wound which Oileus received from one of the Stympthalian birds. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 73, ii. 1040; Hygin. Fab. 14; Val. Flacc. i. 402.)

2. The herald of Odysseus, who followed his master to Troy. He is humorously described as hump-backed, of a brown complexion, and with curly hair; but he was honoured by his master, since he was kind and obedient. (Hom. Il. i. 319, ii. 184, ix. 170, Od. xix. 246.) [L. S.]

EURYBATES (Εὐρύβατης), an Argive, the commander of 1000 volunteers who went to the assistance of the Aeginetans in their war with the Athenians just before the Persian invasion. He had practised the pentathlon, and challenged four of the Athenians to single combat. Three he slew, but fell himself by the hand of the fourth. (Herod. vi. 92, ix. 75.) [C. P. M.]

EURYBATOS (Εὐρύβατος). 1. A Laconian, who was victor in the wrestling-match, in OI. 18, when this species of contest was first introduced. (Paus. v. 8. § 7.)

2. An Ephesian, whom Croesus sent with a large sum of money to the Peloponnesus to hire mercenaries for him in his war with Cyrus. He, however, went over to Cyrus, and betrayed the whole matter to him. In consequence of this treachery, his name passed into a proverb amongst the Greeks. (Diod. Excerpt. de Virt. et Vit. p. 553; Ulpian, in Dem. de Coron. p. 137; Aeschin. in Ctes. c. 43; Plat. Protag. p. 327.) [C. P. M.]

EURYBIA (Εὐρύβια), a daughter of Pontus and Ge, who became by Crisus the mother of Astraea, Pallas, and Perseus. (Hes. Theog. 375; Apollod. i. 2. § 2.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8; Diod. iv. 16.) [L. S.]

EURYBIADES. [THEMISTOCLES.]

EURYCLEIA (Εὐρύκλεια). 1. According to a Thessalian tradition, a daughter of Athamas and Themisto, and the wife of Melas, by whom she became the mother of Hyperes. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 221.)

2. A daughter of Ops, was purchased by Laërtes and brought up Telemachus. When Odysseus returned home, she recognized him, though he was in the disguise of a beggar, by a scar, and afterwards she faithfully assisted him against the suitors. (Hom. Od. i. 429, &c., iv. 742, &c., xix. 385, &c., xxii. xxiii.) [L. S.]

EURYCLEIDAS (Εὐρύκλειδας), an Athenian orator, who, together with Micon or Micion, possessed much influence with the people, which they used unworthily, as the Athenians under their guidance launched forth, according to Polybius, into the most unrestrained flattery towards the kings, whose favour they desired to gain, especially Ptolemy IV. (Philopator) of Egypt. Pausanias tells us that Philip V. of Macedonia caused them both to be removed by poison. (Polyb. v. 106; Paus. ii. 9.) [E. E.]

EURYCLES (Εὐρύκλης), a Spartan architect, who built the finest of the baths at Corinth, and adorned it with beautiful marbles. (Paus. ii. 3. § 5.) [P. S.]

EURYCLES (Εὐρύκλης), a Greek physician or grammarian, who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is mentioned by Erotianus. (Gloss. Hippocr. p. 308.) He appears to have written a commentary on Hippocrates, de Articulis, which does not now exist. [W. A. G.]

EURYCRATES (Εὐρυκράτης) I., was the 11th king of Sparta in the Agid house: his reign was coincident with the conclusion of the first Messenian war. (Paus. iii. 3. § 3.)

II. Grandson of the above, called also (Herod. vii. 204) Eurycratides, was 13th of the same line, and reigned during the earlier and disastrous part of the war with Tegea (Herod. i. 65), which his grandson Anaxandrides brought to a happy issue. (Paus. iii. 3. § 5.) [A. H. C.]

EURYCYDE. [ENDYMION.]

EURYDAMAS (Εὐρύδαμας). 1. A son of Irus and Demonassa, was one of the Argonauts. (Hygin. Fab. 14.) Apollonius Rhodius (i. 67; comp. Orph. Arg. 164) calls him a son of Cimenus.

2. One of the suitors of Penelope, who was killed by Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xviii. 297, xxii. 283.) There are two more mythical personages of this name (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Hom. Il. v. 148), which Ovid (Id. 331) uses as a surname of Hector in the sense of "ruling far and wide." [L. S.]

EURYDAMIDAS (Εὐρύδαμίδας), son of Agis IV., king of Sparta. At the death of his father he was yet a child. According to Pausanias, he was poisoned by Cleomenes with the assistance of the ephors, and the royal power of his family transferred to his brother Euclides. The truth of this story is, however, questionable. (Paus. ii. 9. § 1, iii. 10. § 6; Manso, Sparta, vol. iii. 2, p. 136.) [C. P. M.]

EURYDICE (Εὐρύδικη). The most celebrated of the many mythical personages bearing this name is Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus. [ΟΡΦΕΥΣ.] There are seven others beside, viz. one of the Danaides (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5), a daughter of Adrastus and mother of Lamedon (Apollod. iii. 12. § 3), a daughter of Lacedaemon and wife of Acrisius (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2, iii. 10. § 3; Paus. iii. 13. § 6), a daughter of Clymenus and wife of Neator (Hom. Od. iii. 452), the wife of Lycurgus and mother of Archemorus (Apollod. i. 9. § 14), the wife of Creon, king of Thebes (Soph. Antigone), and, according to the "Cypria," the wife of Aeneias. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) [L. S.]

EURYDICE (Εὐρύδικη). 1. An Illyrian princess, wife of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and mother of the famous Philip. According to Justin (vii. 4, 5), she engaged in a conspiracy with a paramour against the life of her husband; but though the plot was detected, she was spared by Amyntas out of regard to their common offspring. After the death of the latter (B. C. 369), his eldest son, Alexander, who succeeded him on the throne, was murdered after a short reign by Ptolemy Alorites, and it seems probable that Eurydice was concerned in this plot also. From a comparison of the statements of Justin (vii. 5) and Diodorus (xv. 71, 77, xvi. 2), it would appear that Ptolemy was the paramour at whose instigation Eurydice had attempted the life of her husband; and she certainly seems to have made common cause with him after the assassination of her son. (Thirlwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 164.) But the appearance of another pretender to the throne, Pausanias, who was joined by the greater part of the Macedonians, reduced Eurydice to great difficulties, and led her to invoke the assistance of the Athenian general Iphicrates, who readily espoused her cause, drove out Pausanias, and reinstated Eurydice and Ptolemy in the full possession of Macedonia, the latter being declared regent for the young king Perdiccas. (Aeschin. de Fals. Leg. §§ 8, 9; Corn. Nep. Iphicrat. 3; Suidas, s. v. Κάπαρος.) Justin represents Eurydice as having subsequently joined with Ptolemy in putting to death Perdiccas also; but this is certainly a mistake. On the contrary, Perdiccas in fact put Ptolemy to death, and succeeded him on the throne: what part Eurydice took in the matter we know not, any more than her subsequent fate. (Diod. xvi. 2; Syncell. p. 263, b.)

2. An Illyrian by birth, wife of Philip of Macedon, and mother of Cynane or Cynna. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b.; Kuhn, ad Aelian. V. H. xiii. 36; Paus. v. 17. § 4.) According to Dicaearchus (ap. Athen. xiii. p. 557, c.), her name was Audata.

3. Daughter of Amyntas, son of Perdiccas III., king of Macedonia, and Cynane, daughter of Philip. Her real name appears to have been Adea (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b.); at what time it was changed to that of Eurydice we are not told. She was brought up by her mother, and seems to have been early accustomed by her to those masculine and martial exercises in which Cynane herself delighted. (Polyaen. viii. 60; Athen. xiii. p. 560.) She accompanied her mother on her daring expedition to Asia [CYNANE]; and when Cynane was put to death by Alcetas, the discontent expressed by the troops, and the respect with which they looked on Eurydice as one of the surviving members of the royal house, induced Perdiccas not only to spare her life, but to give her in marriage to the unhappy king Arrhidaeus. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b.) We hear no more of her during the life of Perdiccas; but after his death her active and ambitious spirit broke forth: she demanded of the new governors, Pithon and Arrhidaeus, to be admitted to her due share of authority, and by her intrigues against them, and the favour she enjoyed with the army, she succeeded in compelling them to resign their office. But the arrival of her mortal enemy, Antipater, disconcerted her projects: she took an active part in the proceedings at Tripardaisus, and even delivered in person to the assembled soldiery an harangue against Antipater, which had been composed for her by her secretary Asclepiodorus; but all her efforts were unavailing, and Antipater was appointed regent and guardian of the king. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 71; Diod. xviii. 39.) She was now compelled to remain quiet, and accompanied her husband and Antipater to Europe. But the death of Antipater in 319, the more feeble character of Polysperchon, who succeeded him as regent, and the failure of his enterprises in Greece, and above all, the favourable disposition he evinced towards Olympias, determined her again to take an active part: she concluded an alliance with Cassander, and, as he was wholly occupied with the affairs of Greece, she herself assembled an army and took the field in person. Polysperchon advanced against her from Epirus, accompanied by Aeacides, the king of that country, and Olympias, as well as by Roxana and her infant son. But the presence of Olympias was alone sufficient to decide the contest: the Macedonian troops refused to fight against the mother of Alexander, and went over to her side. Eurydice fled from the field of battle to Amphipolis, but was seized and made prisoner. She was at first confined, together with her husband, in a narrow dungeon, and scantily supplied with food; but soon Olympias, becoming alarmed at the compassion excited among the Macedonians, determined to get rid of her rival, and sent the young queen in her prison a sword, a rope, and a cup of hemlock, with orders to choose her mode of death. The spirit of Eurydice remained unbroken to the last; she still breathed defiance to Olympias, and prayed that she might soon be requited with the like gifts; then, having paid as well as she could the last duties to her husband, she put an end to her own life by hanging, without giving way to a tear or word of lamentation. (Diod. xix. 11; Justin, xiv. 5; Athen. xiii. p. 560, f.; Aelian, V. H. xiii. 36.) Her body was afterwards removed by Cassander, and interred, together with that of her husband, with royal pomp at Aegae. (Diod. xix. 52; Athen. iv. p. 155, a.)

4. Daughter of Antipater, and wife of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus. The period of her marriage is not mentioned by any ancient writer, but it is probable that it took place shortly after the partition of Triparadeisus, and the appointment of Antipater to the regency, B. C. 321. (See Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachfolger, p. 154.) She was the mother of three sons, viz. Ptolemy Ceraunus, Meleager, who succeeded his brother on the throne of Macedonia, and a third (whose name is not mentioned), put to death by Ptolemy Philadelphus (Paus. i. 7. § 1); and of two daughters, Ptolemaïs, afterwards married to Demetrius Poliorcetes (Plut. Demetr. 32, 46), and Lysandra, the wife of Agathocles, son of Lysimachus. (Paus. i. 9. § 6.) It appears, however, that Ptolemy, who, like all the other Greek princes of his day, allowed himself to have several wives at once, latterly neglected her for Berenice (Plut. Pyrrh. 4); and it was probably from resentment on this account, and for the preference shewn to the children of Berenice, that she withdrew from the court of Egypt. In 287 we find her residing at Miletus, where she welcomed Demetrius Poliorcetes, and gave him her daughter Ptolemaïs in marriage, at a time when such a step could not but be highly offensive to Ptolemy. (Plut. Demetr. 46.)

5. An Athenian, of a family descended from the great Miltiades. (Plut. Demetr. 14; Diod. xx. 40.) She was first married to Ophellias, the conqueror of Cyrene, and after his death returned to Athens, where she married Demetrius Poliorcetes, on occasion of his first visit to that city. (Plut. Demetr. 14.) She is said to have had by him a son called Corrhabus. (Id. 53.)

6. A daughter of Lysimachus, king of Thrace, who gave her in marriage to Antipater, son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, when the latter invoked his assistance against his brother Alexander. (Justin, xvi. 1; Euseb. Arm. p. 155.) After the murder of Antipater [see vol. i. p. 202, a.], she was condemned by her father to perpetual imprisonment. (Justin, xvi. 2.)

7. The sister and wife of Ptolemy Philopator is called by Justin (xxx. 1) Eurydice, but her real name was Arsinoë. [ARSINOË, No. 5.] [E. H. B.]

EURY'LEON (Εὐρύλεων), is said to have been the original name of Ascanius. (Dionys. i. 70; Apollon, de Reg. Rom. i.) [L. S.]

EURY'LEON (Εὐρύλεων). 1. One of the companions of Doriaea, with whom he went out to establish a colony, Heracleia in Sicily. Nearly all the Spartan colonists, however, were slain by the Carthaginians and Eggestaeans. Euryleon was the only one of the leaders who escaped: he gathered the remnants of the Lacedaemonians and took possession of Minoa, a colony of Selinus, and assisted the Selinuntians in getting rid of their tyrant Peithagoras. (Herod. v. 46; comp. DORIEA.)

2. A commander of the Lacedaemonians in their first war against the Messenians. He was of Theban extraction, and a descendant of Cadmus. (Paus. iv. 7. § 3.) [L. S.]

EURY'LOCHUS (Εὐρύλοχος), one of the companions of Odysseus in his wanderings. He was the only one that escaped from the house of Circe, while his friends were metamorphosed into swine; and when Odysseus went to the lower world, Eurylochus and Perimedes performed the prescribed sacrifices. It was on his advice that the companions of Odysseus carried off some of the oxen of Helios. (Hom. Od. x. 203, &c., xi. 23, &c., xii. 339, &c.) Another personage of the same name is mentioned among the sons of Aegyptus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) [L. S.]

EURY'LOCHUS (Εὐρύλοχος), a Spartan commander, in the sixth year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 426, was sent with 3000 heavy-armed of the allies, at the request of the Aetolians to act with them against the Messenians of Naupactus, where Demosthenes, whom they had recently defeated, was still remaining, but without any force. Eurylochus assembled his troops at Delphi, received the submission of the Ozolian Locrians, and advanced through their country into the district of Naupactus. The town itself was saved by Acarnanian succours obtained by Demosthenes, on the introduction of which, Eurylochus retired, but took up his quarters among his neighbouring allies with a covert design in concert with the Ambraclots against the Amphilocheian Argives, and Acarnanians. After waiting the requisite time he set his army in motion from Proschium, and, by a well-chosen line of march contriving to elude the Amphilocheians and their allies, who were stationed to oppose him, effected a junction with his friends at Olpae. Here, on the sixth day following, the enemy, under Demosthenes, attacked him. Eurylochus took the right wing opposed to Demosthenes with the Messenians and a few Athenians; and here, when already taking them on the flank, he was surprised by the assault of an ambuscade in his rear; his troops were routed, himself slain, and the whole army in consequence defeated. (Thuc. iii. 100—102, 105—109.) [A. H. C.]

EURY'LOCHUS (Εὐρύλοχος). 1. A native of Lusine in Arcadia, whose name is frequently mentioned by Xenophon in the Anabasis. On one occasion, when the army was marching through the territory of the Carduchii, he protected Xenophon, whose shield-bearer had deserted him. He was one of the deputies sent by the army to Anaxibius. Afterwards we find him counselling his comrades to extort from Seuthes the pay which he owed them. (Xen. Anab. iv. 2. § 21, 7. § 11, vii. 1. § 32. 6. § 40.)

2. A sceptical philosopher, a disciple of Pyrrho, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 68). The same writer mentions another Eurylochus of Larissa, to whom Socrates refused to place himself under obligation by accepting money from him, or going to his house (ii. 25). [C. P. M.]

EURY'MACHUS (Εὐρύμαχος), the name of four mythical personages, viz. one of the suitors of Hippodameia (Paus. vi. 21. § 6), a prince of the Phlegyæ who attacked and destroyed Thebes after the death of Amphion and Zethus (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 933), a son of Theano (Paus. x. 27), and one of the suitors of Penelope. (Hom. Od. i. 399, &c., xii. 88.) [L. S.]

EURY'MACHUS (Εὐρύμαχος), grandson of another Eurymachus and son of Leontiades, the Theban commander at Thermopylae, who led his men over to Xerxes. Herodotus in his account of the father's conduct relates, that the son in after time was killed by the Plataeans, when at the head of four hundred men and occupying their city. (Herod. vii. 233.) This is, no doubt, the same event which Thucydides (ii. 1—7) records as the first overt act of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 431. The number of men was by his account only a little more than three hundred, nor was Eurymachus the actual commander, but the enterprise had been negotiated by parties in Plataea through him, and the conduct of it would therefore no doubt be entrusted very much to him. The family was clearly one of the great aristocratical houses. Thucydides (ii. 2) calls Eurymachus "a man of the greatest power in Thebes." [A. H. C.]

EURYMÉDE (Εὐρυμέδης), the name of two mythical personages. [GLAUCUS; MELLAGER.]

EURY'MEDON (Εὐρυμέδων). 1. A Cabeirus, a son of Hephaestus and Cabeiro, and a brother of Alcon. (Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 22; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 21.)

2. One of the attendants of Nestor. (Hom. Il. viii. 114, xi. 620.)

3. A son of Ptolemaeus, and charioteer of Agamemnon; his tomb was shewn at Mycenae. (Hom. Il. iv. 228; Paus. ii. 16. § 5.) There are two more mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Od. vii. 58; Apollod. iii. 1. § 2.) Eurymedon signifies a being ruling far and wide, and occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Poseidon (Pind. Ol. viii. 31), Persens (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1514), and Hermes (Hesych. s. v.) [L. S.]

EURY'MEDON (Εὐρυμέδων), a son of Thucles, an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war, held in its fifth year, B. C. 428, the command of sixty ships, which the Athenians, on hearing of the intestine troubles of Corcyra, and the movement of the Peloponnesian fleet under Alcidas and Brasidas to take advantage of them, hastily despatched to maintain their interest there. This, it was found, had already been secured by Nicostratus with a small squadron from Naupactus. Eurymedon, however, took the chief command; and the seven days of his stay at Corcyra were marked by the wildest cruelties inflicted by the commons on their political opponents. These were no doubt encouraged by the presence of so large an Athenian force: how far they were personally sanctioned, or how far they could have been checked by Eurymedon, can hardly be determined. (Thuc. iii. 80, 81, 85.)

In the following summer he was united with Hippocrates in command of the whole Athenian force by land, and, co-operating with a fleet under Nicias, ravaged the district of Tanagra, and obtained sufficient success over some Thebans and Tanagraeans to justify a trophy. (Thuc. iii. 91.)

At the end of this campaign, he was appointed one of the commanders of the large reinforcements destined for Sicily, and early in A. C. 425 set sail with forty ships, accompanied by his colleague Sophocles, and by Demosthenes also, in a private capacity, though allowed to use the ships for any purpose he pleased on the coast of Peloponnesus. They were ordered to touch at Corcyra on their way, and information of the arrival there of a Peloponnesian squadron made the commanders so anxious to hasten thither, that it was against their will, and only by the accident of stormy weather, that Demosthenes contrived to execute his project of fortifying Pylos. [DEMOSTHENES.] This however, once completed, had the effect of recalling the enemy from Corcyra: their sixty ships passed unnoticed by Eurymedon and Sophocles, then in Zacynthus, and made their way to Pylos, whither on intelligence from Demosthenes, the Athenian squadron presently pursued them. Here they appear to have remained till the capture of the Spartans in the island; and after this, proceeded to Corcyra to execute their original commission of reducing the oligarchical exiles, by whose warfare from the hill Istone the city was suffering severely. In this they succeeded: the exiles were driven from their fortifications, and surrendered on condition of being judged at Athens, and remaining, till removal thither, in Athenian custody; while, on the other hand, by any attempt to escape they should be considered to forfeit all terms. Into such an attempt they were treacherously inveigled by their countrymen, and handed over in consequence by the Athenian generals to a certain and cruel death at the hands of their betrayers. This shameful proceeding was encouraged, so Thucydides expressly states, by the evident reluctance of Eurymedon and Sophocles to allow other hands than their own to present their prizes at Athens, while they should be away in Sicily. To Sicily they now proceeded; but their movements were presently put an end to by the general pacification effected under the influence of Hermocrates, to which the Athenian commanders themselves, with their allies, were induced to accede. For this, on their return to Athens, the people, ascribing the defeat of their ambitious schemes to corruption in their officers, condemned two of them to banishment, visiting Eurymedon, who perhaps had shown more reluctance than his colleagues, with the milder punishment of a fine. (Thuc. iii. 115, iv. 2—8, 13, 46—48, 65.)

Eurymedon is not known to have held any other command till his appointment at the end of B. C. 414, in conjunction with Demosthenes, to the command of the second Syracusan armament. He himself was sent at once, after the receipt of Nicias's letter, about mid-winter, with a supply of money and the news of the intended reinforcements: in the spring he returned to meet Demosthenes at Zacynthus. Their subsequent joint proceedings belong rather to the story of his more able colleague. In the night attack on Epipolæ he took a share, and united with Demosthenes in the subsequent representations to Nicias of the necessity for instant departure. His career was ended in the first of the two sea fights. His command was on the right wing, and while endeavouring by the extension of his line to outflank the enemy, he was, by the defeat of the Athenian centre, cut off and surrounded in the recess of the harbour, his ships captured, and himself slain. Diodorus, writing perhaps from Ephorus, relates, that Agatharchus was the Syracusan general opposed to him, and represents the defeat as having begun with Eurymedon's division, and thence extended to the centre. (Thuc. vii. 16, 31, 33, 42, 43, 49, 52; Diod. xiii. 3, 11, 13; Plut. Nicias, 20, 24.) [A.H.C.]

EURYMEDON (Εὐρυμέδων). 1. Of Myrrhinus, a friend of Plato, who, in his will, appointed him one of his executors. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 42, 43.)

2. Of Tarentum, a Pythagorean philosopher mentioned by Iamblichus. (Vita Pyth. 36.)

3. A person who was suborned by Demophilus to bring an accusation of impiety against Aristotle for speaking irreverently of Hermes in a poem, which is preserved in Athenæus. (xv. p. 696.) [L.S.]

EURYNOME (Εὐρύνομη). 1. A daughter of Oceanus. When Hephæstus was expelled by Hera from Olympus, Eurynome and Thetis received him in the bosom of the sea. (Hom. Il. xviii. 395, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 2.) Previous to the time of Cronos and Rhea, Eurynome and Ophion had ruled in Olympus over the Titans, but after being conquered by Cronos, she had sunk down into Tartarus or Oceanus. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 503, &c.; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 1191.) By Zeus she became the mother of the Charites, or of Asopus. (Hea. Theog. 908; Apollod. iii. 12. § 6.)

2. A surname of Artemis at Phigalea in Arcadia. Her sanctuary which was surrounded by cypresses, was opened only once in every year, and sacrifices were then offered to her. She was represented half woman and half fish. (Paus. viii. 41. § 4.) There are four more mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Od. xviii. 168; Apollod. iii. 9. § 2.) [ADRASTUS, AGENOR.] [L.S.]

EURYNOMUS (Εὐρύνομος), a daemon of the lower world, concerning whom there was a tradition at Delphi, according to which, he devoured the flesh of dead human bodies, and left nothing but the bones. Polygnotus represented him in the Lesche at Delphi, of a dark-blue complexion, shewing his teeth, and sitting on the skin of a vulture. (Paus. x. 28. § 4.) There are two other mythical personages of this name, one mentioned by Ovid (Mét. xii. 311) and the other in the Odyssey (ii. 22.) [L.S.]

EURYPHA'MUS or EURYPHE'MUS (Εὐρύφαιμος), a Pythagorean philosopher of Metapontum. (Iamblich. de Vita Pyth. 30, 36.) Lysis was his fellow-pupil and his faithful friend. Euryphe-mus was the author of a work Περὶ βίου, which is lost, but a considerable fragment of it is preserved in Stobæus. (Serm. tit. 103. 27.) [L.S.]

EURYPHON (Εὐρύφων), a celebrated physician of Cnidos in Caria, who was probably born in the former half of the fifth century B. C., as Soranus (Vita Hippocr. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 851) says that he was a contemporary of Hippocrates, but older. The same writer says that he and Hippocrates were summoned to the court of Perdiccas, the son of Alexander, king of Macedonia; but this story is considered very doubtful, if not altogether apocryphal. [HIPPOCRATES.] He is mentioned in a corrupt fragment of the comic poet Plato, preserved by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." vii. 44. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 149), in which, instead of ἄνθρωπος, Meineke reads ἄνθρωπος. He is several times quoted by Galen, who says that he was considered to be the author of the ancient medical work entitled Κνιδίαι Γράμματα (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Morb. Vulgar.

VI." i. 29. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 886, where for Βλας, we should read Κνιδίαις), and also that some persons attributed to him several works included in the Hippocratic Collection (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. proæm. vol. xvi. p. 3), viz. those entitled Περὶ Διαιτῆς Τῶναιῶν, de Salubri Victus Ratione (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Rat. Vict. in Morb. Acut." i. 17. vol. xv. p. 455), and Περὶ Διαιτῆς, de Victus Ratione. (De Aliment. Facult. i. l. vol. vi. p. 473.) He may perhaps be the author of the second book Περὶ Νοσῶν, De Morbis, which forms part of the Hippocratic Collection, but which is generally allowed to be spurious, as a passage in this work (vol. ii. p. 284) is quoted by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Morb. Vulgar. VI." i. 29. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 888), and attributed to Eurypbon (see Littré's Hippocr. vol. i. pp. 47, 363); and in the same manner M. Ermerin (Hippocr. de Rat. Vict. in Morb. Acut. pp. 368, 369) conjectures that he is the author of the work Περὶ Γυναικείης Φόβας, de Natura Muliebri, as Soranus appears to allude to a passage in that treatise (vol. ii. p. 533) while quoting the opinions of Eurypbon. (De Arte Obetr. p. 124.) From a passage in Caelius Aurelianus (de Morb. Chron. ii. 10. p. 390) it appears, that Eurypbon was aware of the difference between the arteries and the veins, and also considered that the former vessels contained blood. Of his works nothing is now extant except a few fragments, unless he be the author of the treatises in the Hippocratic Collection that have been attributed to him. [W. A. G.]

EURYPON, otherwise called EURYTION (Εὐρύπων, Εὐρύτιων), grandson of Procles, was the third king of that house at Sparta, and thenceforward gave it the name of Euryponidae. Plutarch talks of his having relaxed the kingly power, and played the demagogue; and Polyænus relates a war with the Arcadians of Mantinea under his command. (Paus. iii. 7. § 1; Plut. Lyc. 2; Polyænen. ii. 13.) [A.H.C.]

EURYP'TOLEMUS (Εὐρύπτολεμος). 1. One of the family of the Alcmaeonidae, the son of Megacles and father of Isodice, the wife of Cimon. (Plut. Cimon, 4.)

2. Son of Peisianax, and cousin of Alcibiades. We find him coming forwards on the occasion of the trial of the victorious generals after the battle of Arginussæ to oppose the illegal proceedings instituted against them. His speech on the occasion is quoted by Xenophon. He asked that a day should be granted for the separate trial of each prisoner (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 16, &c.)

3. Another Euryptolemus, of whom nothing else is known, is mentioned by Xenophon as having been sent as ambassador to the Persian court. He could not have been the same with the cousin of Alcibiades, as he had not returned from his mission when the latter was at Athens ready to welcome his cousin on his return from banishment (Hell. i. 3. § 13; 4. § 7, 19.) [C. P. M.]

EURYPYLUS (Εὐρύπυλος). 1. A son of Euameon and Opa. (Hygin. Fab. 81.) He appears in the different traditions about him, as a hero of Ormenion, or Hyria, or as a king of Cyrene. In the Iliad he is represented as having led the men of Ormenion and other places to Troy with forty ships, and he is one of those who offer to fight with Hector. (ii. 734, vii. 167.) He slew many a Trojan, and when he himself was wounded by Paris, he was nursed and cured by Patroclus.

(xi. 841, xv. 390; comp. Apollod. iii. 10. § 8; Hygin. Fab. 97; Or. Met. xiii. 357.) According to a genealogy of the heroes of Ormenion he was a son of Hyperochus, and the father of Ormenus. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii. 42.) Among the heroes of Hyrie, he is mentioned as a son of Poseidon and Celaeno, and went to Libya before Cyrene who fought against the lion that attacked his flocks, and in Libya he became connected with the Argonauts. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1561; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 902.) He is said to have been married to Sterope, the daughter of Helios, by whom he became the father of Lycaon and Leucippus. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 57; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 886.) The tradition which connects him with the legends about Dionysus, is given under ΔΙΩΝΥΣΗΣ, and Eurypylos as connected with Dionysus, dedicated a sanctuary to Soteria at Patrae (Paus. vii. 21. § 2), which also contained a monument of him, and where sacrifices were offered to him every year after the festival of Dionysus. (ii. 19. §§ 1, 3, ix. 41. § 1.) From Pausanias we learn that Eurypylos was called by some a son of Dexamenus. (Comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 341, &c., 2nd edit.)

2. A son of Poseidon and Astypalaea, was king of Cos, and was killed by Heracles who on his return from Troy landed in Cos, and being taken for a pirate, was attacked by its inhabitants. (Apollod. ii. 7. §§ 1, 8.) According to another tradition Heracles attacked the island of Cos, in order to obtain possession of Chalciope, the daughter of Eurypylos, whom he loved. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. iv. 40; comp. Hom. Il. ii. 676, xiv. 250 &c., xv. 25.)

3. A son of Teiephus and Astyoche, was king of Meesia or Cilicia. Eurypylos was induced by the presents which Priam sent to his mother or wife, to assist the Trojans against the Greeks. Eurypylos killed Machaon, but was himself slain by Neoptolemus. (Hygin. Fab. 112; Strab. xiii. p. 584; Paus. iii. 26. § 7; Diet. Cret. iv. 14; Eastath. ad Hom. p. 1697.) There are three other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. ii. 7. §§ 1, 7. § 10, 8. § 3.) [L. S.]

EURYPYLUS (Εὐρύπυλος), is referred to as an author by Athenaeus (xi. p. 508), but is otherwise unknown. [L. S.]

EURYSACES (Εὐρύσακς), a son of the Telemachian Ajax and Tecmessa, was named after the broad shield of his father. (Soph. Aj. 575; Eastath. ad Hom. p. 857; Serv. ad Aen. i. 623; Philost. Heroic. 11. 2.) An Athenian tradition related, that Eurysaces and his brother Philaeus had given up to the Athenians the island of Salamis, which they had inherited from their grandfather, and that the two brothers received in return the Attic franchise. One of the brothers then settled at Brauron, and the other at Melite. Eurysaces was honoured like his father, at Athens, with an altar. (Plut. Sol. 10; Paus. i. 35. § 2.) [L. S.]

EURYSTERNOS (Εὐρύστερνος), that is, the goddess with a broad chest, is a surname of Ge (Hea Theog. 117), under which she had a sanctuary on the Crathis near Aegae in Achaia, with a very ancient statue. (Paus. vii. 25. § 8, v. 14. § 8.) [L. S.]

EURYSTHENES (Εὐρύσθενης), and PRO-CLES (Προκλής), the twin sons of Aristodemus, were born, according to the common account before, but, according to the genuine Spartan story, after their father's return to Peloponnesus and occupation of his allotment of Laconia. He died immediately after the birth of his children and had not even time to decide which of the two should succeed him. The mother professed to be unable to name the elder, and the Lacedaemonians in embarrassment applied to Delphi, and were instructed to make them both kings, but give the greater honour to the elder. The difficulty thus remaining was at last removed at the suggestion of Panites, a Messenian, by watching which of the children was first washed and fed by the mother; and the first rank was accordingly given to Eurysthenes and retained by his descendants. (Herod. vi. 51, 52.) The mother's name was Argeia, and her brother Theras was, during their minority, their joint-guardian and regent. (Herod. iv. 147.) They were married to two sisters, twins like themselves, the daughters of Thersander, the Heraclidean king of Cleonae, by name Lathria and Anaxandra, whose tombs were to be seen at Sparta in the time of Pausanias (iii. 16. § 5). The two brothers are said to have united with the son of Temenus to restore Aegyptus, the son of Creophontes, to Messenia. Otherwise, they were, according to both Pausanias and Herodotus, in continual strife, which perhaps may give a meaning to the strange story related in Polyaeus (i. 10), that Procles and Temenus attacked the Eurystheidae then in occupation of Sparta, and were successful through the good order preserved by the flute, the benefit of which on this occasion was the origin of the well-known Spartan practice. Ephorus in Strabo (viii. p. 366) states, that they maintained themselves by taking foreigners into their service, and these Clinton understands by the name Eurystheidae; but Müller considers it to be one of the transfers made by Ephorus in ancient times of the customs of his own. Cicero (de Div. ii. 43) tells us, that Procles died one year before his brother, and was much the more famous for his achievements. (Compare Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 333; Müller, Dor. i. 5. §§ 13, 14.) [A. H. C.]

EURYSTHEUS. [HERACLES.]

EURYTION (Εὐρύτιον). 1. A son of Iruus and Demonassa, and a grandson of Actor, is mentioned among the Argonauts. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollon. Rhod. i. 71.) According to others he was a son of Actor, and he is also called Eurytus. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 175.) When Peleus was expelled from his dominions, he fled to Eurytion and married his daughter Antigone; but in shooting at the Calydonian boar, Peleus inadvertently killed his father-in-law. (Apollod. iii. 13. § 1. &c.)

2. A centaur who took to flight during the fight of Heracles with the centaurs; but he was afterwards killed by Heracles in the dominions of Dexamenus, whose daughter Eurytion was on the point of making his wife. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4, &c.; comp. Diod. iv. 33; Hygin. Fab. 31.) Two other mythical personages of this name are mentioned by Apollodorus (ii. 5. § 10) and Virgil. (Aen. v. 495, &c.) [L. S.]

EURYTION. [EURYPON.]

EURYTUS (Εὐρύτος). 1. A son of Melaneus and Stratonicæ (Schol. ad Soph. Trach. 268), was king of Oechalia, probably the Thessalian town of this name. (Müller, Dor. ii. 11. § 1.) He was a skilful archer and married to Antioche, by whom he became the father of Iole, Iphitus, Molion or Deïon, Clytiua, and Toxenus. (Diod. iv. 37.) He was proud of his skill in using the bow, and is even said to have instructed Heracles in his art. (Theocrit. xxiv. 105; Apollod. ii. 4. § 9; Soph. l. c.) He offered his daughter Iole as prize to him who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Heracles won the prize, but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give up Iole, because they feared lest he should kill the children he might have by her. (Apollod. ii. 6. § 1.) Heracles accordingly marched against Oechalia with an army: he took the place and killed Eurytus and his sons. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 7.) According to a tradition in Athenæus (xi. p. 461) he put them to death because they had demanded a tribute from the Euboeans. According to the Homeric poems, on the other hand, Eurytus was killed by Apollo whom he presumed to rival in using the bow. (Od. viii. 226.) The remains of the body of Eurytus were believed to be preserved in the Carnasian grove; and in the Messenian Oechalia sacrifices were offered to him every year. (Paus. iv. 3. § 6, 27. § 4, 33. § 5.)

2. A son of Actor and Molione of Elis. (Hom. II. ii. 621; Apollod. ii. 7. § 2; Paus. ii. 15. § 1; Eurip. Iph. Aul. 270.) [MOLIONES.]

3. A son of Hermes and Antianeira, and brother of Echion, was one of the Argonauts. (Apollod. i. 9. § 16; Hygin. Fab. 14, 160; Val. Flacc. i. 439.) He is sometimes also called Erytus. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 179; Apollon. Rhod. i. 51; Orph. Arg. 133.) There are two more mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. iii. 10, § 5, i. 6. § 2.) [L. S.]

EURYTUS (Εὐρύτος), an eminent Pythagorean philosopher, whom Iamblichus in one passage (de Vit. Pyth. 28) describes as a native of Croton, while in another (ibid. 36) he enumerates him among the Tarentine Pythagoreans. He was a disciple of Philolaus, and Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 6, viii. 46) mentions him among the teachers of Plato, though this statement is very doubtful. It is uncertain whether Eurytus was the author of any work, unless we suppose that the fragment in Stobæus (Phys. Ed. i. p. 210), which is there ascribed to one Eurytus, belongs to our Eurytus. (Ritter, Gesch. der Pythag. Philos. p. 64, &c.) [L. S.]

EUSEBIUS (Εὐσέβιος) of CAESAREA, the father of ecclesiastical history, took the surname of Pamphili, to commemorate his devoted friendship for Pamphilus, bishop of Caesarea. He was born in Palestine about A. D. 264, towards the end of the reign of the Emperor Gallienus. He spent his youth in incessant study, and probably held some offices in the church of Caesarea. In A. D. 303, Diocletian's edict was issued, and the persecution of the Christians began. Pamphilus was imprisoned in 307, and was most affectionately attended on by Eusebius for two years, at the end of which time he suffered martyrdom, and Eusebius fled to Tyre, where he was kindly received by the bishop Paulinus; but afterwards he removed to Egypt, and was imprisoned there in the course of the persecution. After his release he returned to Caesarea, and succeeded Agapius as bishop of that see about 315. He was summoned to the council of Nicea in 327, and was there appointed to receive Constantine with a panegyric oration, and to sit on his right hand. The course of events now made it necessary for him to form a distinct opinion on the relation of the first two Persons in the Trinity. There is no doubt that in many of his works, especially in those which he wrote before this time, but also in others, several expressions may be found inconsistent with each other, some of which can only be understood in a semianian sense. Thus in the Demonstratio Evangelica he speaks of the Son as ἀφρομοιμενος τῇ Πατρὶ κατὰ πάντα, ὁμοιος κατ' οὐσίαν. In the Præparatio Evangel. iv. 3, he denies that the Son is like the Father ὡς ὁμοιος; for (he adds) ἡ Πατὴρ προβάλλει τοῦ Υἱοῦ καὶ τῆς γυνέσεως αὐτοῦ προβάλλει; only the Son is not created, and everything perishable must be separated from our conception of His nature. But with regard to all his earlier statements of doctrine, we must remember that till Arius's opinions, with their full bearings and consequences, were generally known, it was very possible for a person to use language apparently somewhat favourable to them, quite unintentionally, since the true faith on the subject of our Lord's divinity had not yet been couched in certain formulae, of which the use after the controversy was mooted, became as it were the test of a man's opinions; nor had general attention been called to the results of differences apparently trifling. Eusebius's views on the subject seem to have been based on those of Origen, though indeed he deprecated the discussion of the question as above human comprehension, recommending men to be satisfied with the scriptural declaration, "So God loved the world, that he gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life:" "not," as he argues, "whosoever knows how He is generated from the Father." But in the Ecclesiastica Theologia (after the rise of Arianism) he declares (i. 8, ix. 5) against those who reckon Christ among the κτίσματα, asserting God to be the Father of Christ, but the Creator of all other beings. Again: in the Ecclesiastical History (x. 4) he calls Him αὐτοθεός, and in other places uses language which proves him to have fully believed in His divinity. He was, however, of course disposed to regard Arius with mildness, and wrote to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, in his defence; arguing that though Arius had called Christ κτίσμα Θεοῦ τέλειον, he had added ἀλλ' οὐχ ὡς ἐν τῶν κτισμάτων. Thus he took his seat at the council of Nicea not indeed as a partizan of Arius, but as anxious to shield him from censure for opinions whose importance, either for good or evil, he considered exaggerated. He accordingly appeared there as head of the moderate section of the council, and drew up a creed which he hoped would satisfy both the extreme parties, of which the Arian was favoured by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nicea; while their opponents were led by Alexander, whose deacon Athanasius, afterwards so famous, accompanied him to the council, and rendered him great service. This formula, which is to be found in Socrates (Hist. Eccl. i. 5), chiefly differs from the Nicene Creed in containing the expression ὁμοούσιος πατρὶ (from Col. i. 15) instead of the declaration that Christ is of the same substance with the Father, expressed in the adjective ὁμοούσιος, and the phrase "Very God of Very God," is not found in it after "God of God, Light of Light." This creed was accepted by Arius; but Alexander insisted on the addition of ὁμοούσιος, to which Constantine himself was favourable, and a majority of the council decreed its insertion. Eusebius at first hesitated to sign it, but afterwards did so; because, as he told the people of Caesarea in a pastoral letter explanatory of the proceedings at the council (Socrat. i. 5), the emperor had assured him that by the phrase need only be understood an assertion that the Son of God is wholly different from every created being; and that as His nature is entirely spiritual, He was not born from the Father by any division, or separation, or other corporeal process. Eusebius, however, always retained his mild feelings on this subject; for he wished to reinstate Arius in his church, in opposition to Athanasius, and he was intimate with his namesake, the bishop of Nicomedeia, a decided Arian. Eusebius had a very strong feeling against pictures of our Lord, and other novelties, which were then creeping into the Church. When Constantia, the widow of Licinius and sister of Constantine, requested him to send her such a picture, he refused, and pronounced all such representations worthy only of heathenism. (Vit. Const. l. 3. p. 1069.) These pictures he destroyed when they came in his way, considering them inconsistent with 2 Cor. v. 10 ("Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we Him no more"); and he greatly objected (Hist. Eccl. vii. 18) to a practice prevalent at Caesarea of offering up figures of Christ as an act of thanksgiving for recovery from sickness. It cannot be denied that in some of his objections to pictures of our Lord, he appears to overlook the practical importance of His Incarnation to our Christian life. Eusebius remained in favour with the imperial family till his death. He was offered the see of Antioch on the death of Eustathius, but declined it, considering the practice of translations objectionable, and, indeed, contrary to one of the canons agreed upon at the recent council of Nicaea. For this moderation he was exceedingly praised by Constantine, who declared that he was universally considered worthy to be the bishop not of one city only, but almost of the whole world. (Socrat. H. E. i. 18.) He died about A. D. 340; so that his birth, his elevation to high office, and his death, nearly coincide in time with those of his imperial patron.

The character of Eusebius, and his honesty as a writer, have been made the subject of a fierce attack by Gibbon, who (Decline and Fall, c. xvi.), accuses him of relating whatever might redound to the credit, and suppressing whatever would tend to cast reproach on Christianity, and represents him as little better than a dishonest sycophant, anxious for nothing higher than the favour of Constantine; and resumes the subject in his "Vindication" of the fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of the history. For the charge of sycophancy there is but little foundation. The joy of the Christians at Constantine's patronage of the true religion was so great, that he was all but deified by them both before and after his death; and although no doubt Niebuhr (Lectures on Roman History, ed. lxxix. ed. Schmitz.) has sufficiently shewn that Constantine, at least up to the time of his last illness, can only be considered as a pagan; yet, considering that his accession not only terminated the persecution which had raged for ten years, but even established Christianity as the state religion, it is not surprising that Eusebius, like others, should be willing to overlook his faults, and regard him as an especial favourite of Heaven. As to the charge of dishonesty, though we could neither expect nor wish a Christian to be impartial in Gibbon's sense, yet Eusebius has certainly avowed (H. E. viii. 2), that he omits almost all account of the wickedness and dissensions of the Christians, from thinking such stories less edifying than those which display the excellence of religion, by reflecting honour upon the martyrs. The fact that he avows this principle, at once diminishes our confidence in him as an historian and acquits him of the charge of intentional deceit, to which he would otherwise have been exposed. But besides this, Eusebius has written a chapter (Præp. Evang. xii. 31) bearing the monstrous title,—"How far it may be lawful and fitting to use falsehood as a medicine for the advantage of those who require such a method." Now at first sight this naturally raises in our minds a strong prejudice against a person who, being a Christian in profession, could suppose that the use of falsehood can ever be justified; and no doubt the thought was suggested by the pious frauds which are the shame of the early Church. But when we read the chapter itself, we find that the instances which Eusebius takes of the extent to which the principle may be carried are the cases in which God is described in the Old Testament as liable to human affections, as jealousy or anger, "which is done for the advantage of those who require such a method." From this explanation it would appear that Eusebius may have meant nothing more than the principle of accommodating the degree of enlightenment granted from time to time to the knowledge and moral state of mankind; and his only error consists in giving the odious name of falsehood to what is practically the most real truth. (See Arnold, Essay appended to Sermons, vol. ii.)

1. The Chronicon (χρονικὴ παντοδαπῆς ιστορίας), a work of great value to us in the study of ancient history. For some time it was only known in a fragmentary state, but was discovered entire in an Armenian MS. version at Constantinople, and published by Mai and Zohrab at Milan, in 1818. It is in two books. The first, entitled χρονογραφία, contains a sketch of the history of several ancient nations, as the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Medes, Persians, Lydians, Hebrews, and Egyptians. It is chiefly taken from the πενταβιβλίον χρονολογικὸν of Africanus [AFRICANUS, SEX. JULIUS], and gives lists of kings and other magistrates, with short accounts of remarkable events from the creation to the time of Eusebius. The second book consists of synchronological tables, with similar catalogues of rulers and striking occurrences, from the time of Abraham to the celebration of Constantine's Vicennalia at Nicomedeia, A. D. 327, and at Rome, A. D. 328. Eusebius's object in writing it was to give an account of ancient history, previous to the time of Christ, in order to establish belief in the truth of the Old Testament History, and to point out the superior antiquity of the Mosaic to any other writings. For he says that whereas different accounts had been given of the age of Moses, it would be found from his work that he was contemporary with Cecrops, and therefore not only prior to Homer, Hesiod, and the Trojan war, but also to Hercules, Musæus, Castor, Pollux, Herme-

Apollo, Zeus, and all other persons deified by the Greeks. In the course of the work Eusebius gives extracts from Berosus, Sanchoniathon, Polyhistor, Cephalion, and Manetho, which materially increase its value. Of this Chronicon an abridgement was found by Mai in the Vatican library, at the end of a copy of Theodoret's Haereticæ Fabulæ, also in two parts, to the second of which is added by the abbreviator, a list of bishops of the five patriarchal sees, Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, together with the boundaries of these patriarchates as they existed in the ninth century. This has been published by Mai, together with a commentary on St. Luke and twenty Quæstiones Evangelicæ, also by Eusebius, in the Scriptorum Vaticanorum Nova Collectio, Rome, 1825. The Quæstiones are short disquisitions on certain points of the Gospel histories, e. g. why the evangelists give Joseph's genealogy rather than Mary's; in what sense our Lord is said to sit on David's throne, &c. The Chronicon was translated into Latin by Jerome, and published by J. J. Scaliger, Leyden, 1606, of which another enlarged edition appeared at Amsterdam, 1658. It was again published at Venice, in Armenian, Greek, and Latin, by J. Baptist Aucher, 1818. Mai and Zohrab's edition has been noticed above. The historical importance of their discovery is explained by Niebuhr, in his essay entitled Historischer Gewinn aus der Armenischen Uebersetzung der Chronik des Eusebius, published in his Kleine Schriften.

2. The Præparatio Evangelica (εὐαγγελικὴ προπαρασκευὴ) in fifteen books, inscribed to Theodotus, bishop of Laodiceia, is a collection of various facts and quotations from old writers, by which it was supposed that the mind would be prepared to receive the evidences of Christianity. This book is almost as important to us in the study of ancient philosophy, as the Chronicon is with reference to history, since in it are preserved specimens from the writings of almost every philosopher of any note whose works are not now extant. It was translated into Latin by George of Trebisond, and published at Treviso, 1480. This translation is said to be a very bad one, and the Greek work itself first appeared at Paris, 1544, edited by Robert Stephens, and again in 1628, also at Paris, with a Latin version, by F. Viger, who republished his edition at Cologne, 1688. The Præparatio Evangelica is closely connected with another work written soon after it, viz.:

3. The Demonstratio Evangelica (εὐαγγελικὴ ἀποδείξις) in twenty books, of which ten are extant, is a collection of evidences, chiefly from the Old Testament, addressed principally to the Jews. This is the completion of the preceding work, giving the arguments which the Præparatio was intended to make the mind ready to receive. The two together form a treatise on the evidences of considerable ability and immense learning. The Demonstratio was translated into Latin by Donatus of Verona, and published either at Rome or Venice in 1498 and at Cologne in 1542. The Greek text appeared with that of the Præparatio, at Paris, in the editions both of R. Stephens and Viger.

4. The Ecclesiastical History (ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία), in ten books. The work was finished in the lifetime of Crispus, i. e. before 326, whom (x. 9) he commemorates as θεοφιλέστατον καὶ κατὰ πάντα τοῦ πατρὸς ὄμιον. The history terminates with the death of Licinius,

A. D. 324. When Constantine visited Caesarea, he offered to give Eusebius anything which would be beneficial to the Church there; Eusebius requested him to order an examination to be made of all documents connected with the history of martyrs, so as to get a list of the times, places, manner, and causes of their deaths, from the archives of the provinces. On this the history is founded; and of its general trustworthiness, with the limitation necessary from the principle of omission noticed above, there can be no doubt whatever. The first book consists of a discussion on our Lord's pre-existence, the prophecies respecting Him, the purpose of His revelation, and many facts relating to His life, together with the story of His correspondence with Abgarus or Agbarus, tetrarch of Edessa. [ABGARUS.] The second book begins the history of the Church after our Lord's Ascension, with an account of the death of Pilate, the history of Simon Magus, St. Peter's preaching at Rome, and the various labours of other apostles and disciples. The rest of the work gives an account of the principal ecclesiastical writers, heresies, and persecutions, including the beautiful stories of the martyrs at Lyons and Vienne, and the death of Polycarp. Many accounts of different scenes and periods in church history had been written before, as by Hegesippus, Papias, Irenæus, and Clemens of Alexandria; but Eusebius was the first who reduced them all into one whole, availing himself largely of the labours of his predecessors, but giving a unity and completeness to them all. The History was turned into Latin by Rufinus, though with many omissions and interpolations, and published at Rome, 1474. The Greek text, together with that of the histories of Socrates, Theodoret, Sozomen, and Evagrius, appeared at Paris, 1549, edited by R. Stephens, and again at Geneva, 1612, with little alteration from the preceding edition. In this edition the text of Eusebius was that which had been published by Valesius at Paris, in 1659, with many emendations, after a careful recension of the MSS. in the Bibliothèque du Roi; and again at Amsterdam, with the other historians, in 1695. The same histories, with the remaining fragments of Theodorus and the Arian Philostorgius, were published at Cambridge in three folio volumes, 1720. The Cambridge edition was furnished with notes by W. Reading, and republished at Turin, 1746—48. More recent editions are Heinichen, in three volumes, Leipzig, 1827, which contains the commentary of Valesius and very copious notes, and another at Oxford in 1838, by Dr. Burton, regius professor of divinity in that University.

The History has been translated into various languages: into English by Parker, 1703, by Catter, 1736, and by Dalrymple, 1778; into German, Eusebii Kirchengeschichte aus dem Griech. und mit Anmerkungen erläutert von F. A. Stroth, 1778; into Italian in the Biblioteca degli Autori volgarezzati, Venice, 1547; and into French by Cousin, Paris, 1675.

5. De Martyribus Palaestinas (περὶ τῶν ἐν Παλαιστίνῃ μαρτυρούντων), being an account of the persecutions of Diocletian and Maximin from A. D. 303 to 310. It is in one book, and generally found as an appendix to the eighth of the Ecclesiastical History.

6. Against Hierocles (πρὸς τὰ πρὸς Φιλοστράτου εἰς Ἀπολλωνίου τον Τυανέα διὰ τὴν Ἱεροκλήν παράφθεσθαι αὐτοῦ τε καὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ σύγκρισιν). Hierocles had advised Diocletian to begin his persecution, and had written two books, called λόγοι φιλαληθείας, comparing our Lord's miracles to those of Apollonius of Tyana. (See Lactantius, Inst. v. 2, 3, 4.) In answering this work, Eusebius reviews the life of Apollonius by Philostrophus. It was published in Greek and Latin by F. Morell (among the works of Philostratus) at Paris, 1608, and with a new translation and notes by Olearius, Leipzig, 1709.

7. Against Marcellus (κατὰ Μαρκελλοῦ), bishop of Ancyra, in two books. Marcellus had been condemned for Sabellianism at Constantinople, A. D. 336, and this work was written by desire of the synod which passed sentence. The most important edition is by Rettberg, Götting, 1794-8.

8. De Ecclesiastica Theologia (περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς θεολογίας, τῶν πρὸς Μάρκελλον ἐλέγχων βιβλ. γ'). This is a continuation of the former work, and both were edited with a Latin version and notes by Montagu, bishop of Chichester, and appended to the Demonstratio Evangelica, Paris, 1628.

9. De Vita Constantini, four books (εἰς τὸν βίον τοῦ μακαρίου Κωνσταντίνου βασιλέως λόγοι τέσσαρες), a panegyric rather than a biography. They have generally been published with the Ecclesiastical History, but were edited separately by Heinsichen, 1830.

10. Onomasticon de Locis Hebraicis (περὶ τῶν τοπωνυμίων ὡς ἐν τῇ βίβλ. γραφῇ) a description of the towns and places mentioned in Holy Scripture, arranged in alphabetical order. This is ascribed to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, as is also the tenth book of the Ecclesiastical History. It was translated into Latin by Jerome, and published at Paris with a commentary, by Jacques Bonpere, 1639, and again at Amsterdam, by J. Cleve, 1707.

Besides these, several epistles of Eusebius are preserved by different writers, e. g. by Socrates (i. 8) and Theodoret (i. 12); and he wrote commentaries on various parts of Scripture, many of which are not extant.

The first edition of all the works of Eusebius was published in Latin at Basle, in four volumes, as variorum interpretationes, 1542, which reappeared at Paris in a more correct form, 1580. Since that time it has been usual to edit his works separately, and the chief of these editions have been given with the account of each work.

(See Cave, Script. Eccl. Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. c. 4; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. ii. p. 787, &c.; Waddington, History of the Church, ch. vi.; Jortin, Eccl. Hist. iii. The last two contain interesting discussions on the religious opinions of Eusebius. [G. E. L. C.]

EUSEBIUS, of DORYLÆUM, born at the end of the fifth century, began his public life as a layman, and held an office about the imperial court of Constantinople, which gave him the title of Agens in Rebus. One day, as Nestorius, then bishop of Constantinople, was preaching against the propriety of applying the term Θεοτόκος to the Virgin Mary, and was maintaining at once the eternal generation of the divine Logos, and the human birth of the Man Jesus, a voice cried out, "No, the Eternal Word Himself submitted to the second birth." A scene of great confusion followed, and an active opposition to the Nestorian doctrine began. There is little doubt that the voice proceeded from Eusebius. (See the question discussed by Neander Kirchengesch. vol. ii. p. 1073, note.) On another occasion, he produced in church an act of accusation against Nestorius, whom he denounced as reviving the heresies of Paul of Samosata. (Leontius, contra Nestorian. et Eutych. iii.) The interest which he took in this controversy probably induced him to alter his profession, and to enter into holy orders. He afterwards became bishop of Dorylæum, a town in Phrygia on the river Thyrrabus (a feeder of the Sangarius), not far from the Bithynian frontier. In this office he was among the first to defend against Eutyches the doctrine of Christ's twofold nature, as he had already maintained against Nestorius the unity of His person. He first privately admonished Eutyches of his error; but, as he failed in convincing him, he first denounced him at a synod summoned by Flavius, bishop of Constantinople, and then proceeded to the council which Theodosius had summoned to meet at Ephesus, to declare the Catholic belief on the point mooted by Eutyches. The assembly met A. D. 449 under the presidency of Dioscurus, bishop of Alexandria, a partisan of Eutyches. It was disgraced by scenes of the greatest violence, which gained for it the title of σύνodus ληστρική, and besides sanctioning the monophysite doctrine, it decreed the deposition of Eusebius. But Leo the Great, bishop of Rome, interfered and prevailed upon Marcian, the successor of Theodosius, to convene another general council to revise the decrees of this disorderly assembly. It met at Chalcedon, A. D. 451, and Eusebius presented a petition at it addressed to Marcian and his colleague Valentinian. He was restored to his see, and the doctrine of Eutyches finally condemned. A Contestatio adversus Nestorium by Eusebius is extant in a Latin translation amongst the works of Marius Mercator, part ii. p. 18. There are also a Libellus adversus Eutycheten Synodo Constantinopolitano oblatus (Concil. vol. iv. p. 151), Libellus adversus Dioscurum Synodo Chalcedonensi oblatus (ib. p. 380), and Epistola ad Marcianum Imperatorem (ib. p. 95). (Evangrins, Hist. Eccl. ii. 4; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Neander, l. c. and vol. ii. p. 959.) [G. E. L. C.]

EUSEBIUS of EMISA, born of a noble family at Edessa in Mesopotamia at the end of the third century. He was a man of considerable learning, having received instructions from Eusebius of Caesarea and other teachers of high repute. He went to Alexandria, that he might avoid ordination, and devote himself to philosophy, but afterwards removed to Antioch, became intimate with Flaccillus, its bishop, and was ordained. At this time Athanasius was deposed from the see of Alexandria, and Eusebius of Nicomedeia, then bishop of Constantinople, wished to instal his namesake into the vacant office. He wisely declined the questionable honour, knowing that the Alexandrians were too warmly attached to Athanasius to tolerate any other patriarch. He accepted, however, the see of Emisa in Syria (the city from which Elagabalus had been chosen emperor by the soldiers); but on proceeding there to take possession, he was driven away by a tumultuous mob, who had heard a report of his being a sorcerer, based upon the fact that he was fond of astronomical studies. He fled to Laodiceia, and lived with George, bishop of that place, by whose exertions he was afterwards restored to Emisa. He was a great favourite with the emperor Constantius, whom he accompanied on some military expeditions. He died at Antioch, about A. D. 360. His enemies accused him of Sabellianism, but the truth of the charge is denied by Sozomen (iii. 5). He wrote several books enumerated by Jerome (de Script. 90), e. g. a treatise against the Jews, Homilies, &c. Some homilies on the Gospels, and about fifty on other subjects, are extant under his name; but they are probably spurious, and of more recent date. They were published at Paris, 1575, and at Antwerp, 1602. Some of the homilies ascribed to Eusebius of Caesarea, are attributed to this Eusebius. [G. E. L. C.]

EUSEBIUS, MAGISTER SCRINIORUM, one of the commission of Nine appointed by Theodosius in A. D. 429 to compile a code upon a plan which was afterwards abandoned for another. [Diodorus, vol. i. p. 1018.] [J. T. G.]

EUSEBIUS, a MONK of Nitria, a town of Egypt, to the west of the Canopic branch of the Nile, was one of the "four tall brothers" banished by Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, for defending the opinions of Origen, at the beginning of the fifth century, A. D. The three others were Dioscurus, Ammonius, and Euthymius. They fled to Constantinople, where they were kindly received by Chrysostom, and have obtained a place in ecclesiastical history, from the fact that his protecting them was made a pretext for his deposition. There seems no doubt that they were men of real piety. (Sozomen. vi. 30; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. ii. p. 1436.) [CHRYSOStOM; EPIPHANIUS.] [G. E. L. C.]

EUSEBIUS, of MYNDUS in Caria, a distinguished New Platonist and contemporary of Eupapius, who mentions him (p. 48, ed. Boissonade), and ranks him in what is called the golden chain of New Platonists. Stobaeus, in his Sermones, has preserved a considerable number of ethical fragments from the work of one Eusebius, whom some consider to be the same as the New Platonist, whereas others are inclined to attribute them to a Stoic of that name. (Wytttenbach, ad Eunap. p. 171.) [L. S.]

EUSEBIUS, of NICOMEDIEA, the friend and protector of Arius, was maternally connected, though distantly, with the emperor Julian, and born about A. D. 324. He was first bishop of Berytus (Beirut) in Syria, and then of Nicomedia, which Diocletian had made his residence, so that it was in fact the capital of the Eastern empire till Constantine fixed his court at Byzantium. He first comes under the notice of history by taking the part of Arius after his excommunication by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria. [ARIUS.] He wrote a defence of the heretic to Paulinus, bishop of Tyre, and the letter is preserved in Theodoret (i. 6). Eusebius states in it his belief that there is one Being Unbegotten and one Begotten by Him, but not from his substance, having no share in the nature or essence of the Unbegotten, but yet πρὸς τελείαν θεοότητα διαφέρων τε καὶ ὁμώμενος τοῦ Πεντηκόντου γενόμενος.

So warmly did Eusebius take part with Arius, that the Arians were sometimes called Eusebians; and at the Nicene council he exerted himself vigorously against the application of the term ὁμοούσιος to the Son. But his opposition was unsuccessful, the Homoousians triumphed, and Eusebius joined his namesake of Caesarea in affixing his signature to the Creed, though he took the word in a sense which reduces it merely to ὁμοιος κατ' οὐσίαν.

He declined, however, to sign the anathema which the council issued against Arius, though not, as he says in the petition which he afterwards presented to the bishops, "because he differed from the doctrine as settled at Nicea, but because he doubted whether Arius really held what the anathema imputed to him." (Sozom. ii. 16.) But very soon after the council had broken up, Eusebius shewed a desire to revive the controversy, for which he was deprived of his see and banished into Gaul. On this occasion Constantine addressed a letter to the people of Nicomedia, censuring their exiled bishop in the strongest manner, as disaffected to his government, as the principal supporter of heresy, and a man wholly regardless of truth. (Theodor. Hist. Eccl. i. 20.) But he did not long remain under the imperial displeasure. Constantia, the emperor's sister, was under the influence of an Arian presbyter, and was thereby induced to plead in favour of that party with her brother, and one result of her interference was the restoration of Eusebius to his see; and he soon so completely regained Constantine's favour, as to be selected to administer baptism to him in his last illness. His Arian feelings however broke out again. He procured the deprivation of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, and, if we may believe Theodoret (i. 21), by suborning a woman to bring against him a false accusation of the most infamous kind. He was an active opponent of Athanasius, and exerted himself to procure the restoration of Arius to the full privileges of churchmanship, menacing Alexander, bishop of Constantinople, with deposition unless he at once admitted him to the holy communion, in which he would have succeeded but for the sudden death of Arius. Soon after this Alexander died, and Eusebius managed to procure his own election to the vacant see, in defiance of a canon against translations agreed to at Nicea. He died about A. D. 342.

Though Eusebius lies under the disadvantage of having his character handed down to posterity almost entirely by the description of theological enemies, yet it is difficult to imagine that he was in any way deserving of esteem. His signature to the Nicene creed was a gross evasion, nor can he be considered to have signed it merely as an article of peace, since he was ever afterwards a zealous opponent of its principles. It can scarcely be doubted that he was worldly and ambitious, and if Theodoret's story above referred to be true, it would be horrible to think that a Christian bishop should have been guilty of such gross wickedness. At the same time, considering the entire absence of the critical element in the historians of that age, the violent bitterness of their feelings on subjects of theological controversy, and the fact that Theodoret wrote many years after Eusebius's death, we shall be slow to believe in such an accusation, which rests only on the authority of the most vehement of the church historians of the time, while Socrates, the most moderate and least credulous, merely says (i. 18), that Eustathius was deposed nominally for Sabellianism, "though some assign other causes;" and Sozomen (ii. 18) tells us, that some accused Eustathius of leading an irregular life, but does not hint that this charge rested on a wicked contrivance of Eusebius. Athanasius himself gives another cause for the deposition of Eustathius—that Eusebius had accused him of slandering Helena, the mother of Constantine. (Athan.

Hist. Ari. § 5.) We regret in this instance, as in others, that we have not the complete work of Philostorgius, the Arian historian, who, however, in one of his remaining fragments, does not hesitate to attribute miracles to Eusebius. (Waddington, Church Hist. ch. vii.) Athanasius (Orat. ii.) considers him as the teacher rather than the disciple of Arius; and afterwards, when the Arians were divided among themselves into parties, those who maintained the perfect likeness which the substance of the Son bore to that of the Father (Homoeousians) against the Consubstantialists, on the one hand, and the pure Arians, or Anomoians, on the other, pleaded the authority of this Eusebius. The tenets of this party were sanctioned by the Council of Seleucia, A. D. 359. (Theodor. l. c.; Sozom. l. c.; Socrates, ii. 5; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Neander, Kirchengeschichte, vol. ii. p. 773, &c.; Tillemont, sur les Ariens, art. 66; see also an encyclical letter from the synod of Egyptian bishops to be found in Athan. Apol. c. Ar. § 10.) [G. E. L. C.]

EUSEBIUS, surnamed SCHOLASTICUS, a Greek historian who lived about A. D. 400, for he is said to have been an eye-witness of the war of the Romans against Gainas, king of the Goths. He was a follower of Troilus, and wrote the history of the Gothic war, in hexameter verse, in four books. His work is said to have been very popular at the time, but has not come down to us. (Socrat. H. E. vi. 6; Niceph. H. E. xiii. 6.) [L. S.]

EUSEBIUS VERCELLENSIS, an active champion of orthodoxy during the troubles which agitated the church in the middle of the fourth century, was a native of Sardinia, passed his early life as an ecclesiastical reader at Rome, and in A. D. 340 was, by Pope Julius, ordained bishop of Vercelli, where, although an utter stranger, he in a very brief space acquired the love and respect of all by the simplicity of his life, and by the interest which he manifested in the spiritual welfare of his flock and his clergy. The latter he was wont to assemble in his house and retain for long periods, living with them in common, and stimulating them by his example to acts of devotion and self-denial. This is said to be the first instance upon record of an attempt to combine the duties of an active priesthood with monastic observances, and is believed to have led the way to the institution of regular canons, and to have suggested many of the principles upon which cathedral establishments were formed and regulated. Eusebius, in A. D. 354, at the request of Liberius, undertook, in company with Lucifer of Cagliari and the deacon Hilarius, an embassy to Constantius, by whom the persecution of Athanasius had been sanctioned. In consequence of their urgent representations the council of Milan was summoned the following year, where Eusebius pleaded the cause of the true faith with so much freedom and energy, that the Arian emperor, we are told, in a transport of rage drew his sword upon the orator, whom he banished on the spot to Scythopolis, a city in the Decapolis of Syria. From thence he was transported into Cappadocia, and afterwards to the Thebaid, where he remained until restored to liberty by the edict of Julian, published in A. D. 362, pronouncing the recall of the exiled prelates. Repairing to Alexandria, in compliance with the request of Athanasius, he was present at the great council (of 362), and his name is appended to the proceedings, being the only signature expressed in Latin characters. From Alexandria, Eusebius proceeded to Antioch, where he attempted in vain to heal the dissensions excited by the election of Paulinus; and after visiting many churches in the East, returned at length to his own diocese, where he died, according to St. Jerome, in A. D. 370.

We possess three Epistolæ of this father. 1. Ad Constantium Augustum. 2. Ad presbyteros et plebes Italicas, written on the occasion of his banishment, to which is attached Libellus facti, a sort of protest against the violent conduct of the Arian bishop Patrophilus, who was in some sort his jailor during his residence at Scythopolis. 3. Ad Gregorium Episc. Hisp., found among the fragments of Hilarius (xi. § 5). He executed also a translation of the commentary drawn up by his namesake, Eusebius of Caesarea, on the Psalms; and an edition of the Evangelists, from a copy said to be transcribed by his own hand, preserved at Vercelli, was published at Milan, 4to. 1748, by J. A. Irico.

The abovementioned letters are given in the Bibl. Patr. Max., Lugdun. 1677, vol. v. p. 1127; in the Bibl. Patr. of Galland, vol. v. p. 78, and in all the larger collections of the fathers. (Hieron. de Viris Ill. c. 96.) [W. R.]

EUSTATHIUS. (Eὐστάθιος.) 1. Bishop of ANTIOCH, was a native of Side, a town in Pamphylia, but according to Nicetas Choniates (v. 9), he was descended from a family of Philippi in Macedonia. He was a contemporary of the emperor Constantine the Great, and was at first bishop of Beroea in Syria, but the council of Nicea appointed him bishop of Antioch. (Nicet. Chon. v. 6.) At the opening of the council of Nicea he is said to have been the first who addressed the emperor in a panegyric. (Theodoret, i. 7.) Eustathius was a zealous defender of the Catholic faith, and a bitter enemy of the Arians, who therefore did everything to deprive him of his position and influence. A synod of Arian prelates was convened at Antioch, at which such heavy, though unfounded, charges were brought against him, that he was deposed, and the emperor sent him into exile to Trajanopolis in Thrace, in A. D. 329 or 330. (Socrat. i. 24; Sozomen, ii. 19; Theodoret, i. 21; Philostorg. ii. 7.) A long time after, his innocence and the calumnies of his enemies became known through a woman who had been bribed to bear false witness against him, and who, on her death-bed, confessed her crime; but it was too late, for Eustathius had already died in his exile. He is praised by the ecclesiastical writers as one of the worthiest and holiest men. (Athanas. Ep. ad Solim. p. 629; Sozomen, ii. 19.) Eustathius was the author of several works, but among those which now bear his name, there are two which can scarcely have been his productions, viz., the address which he is said to have delivered to the emperor Constantine at the council of Nicea, and which is printed with a Latin version in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 132, &c., and secondly, a commentary, or ὁράματα, on the Hexæmeron, which was edited, with a Latin translation and copious notes, by Leo Allatius, Lugdun. 1629, 4to. This work is not mentioned by any ancient writer, and the only authority for ascribing it to Eustathius, is the MS. used by Allatius, in which it bears his name. But the work itself also contains proofs that it cannot have been written by Eustathius. A work against Origen, entitled Κατὰ Ἀπρίλιου διαγνώσκους εἰς τὰ τῆς ἑρμηνείας δεικνύμενα on the other hand, is mentioned by Hieonymus (de Script. illustr. 85; comp. Socrat. vi 13), and is undoubtedly genuine. It is printed at the end of Allatius's edition of the commentary on the Hexæmeron. Eustathius wrote further Homilies, Epistles, and an Interpretation of the Psalms, of which some fragments are still extant. They are collected in Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. pp. 135—149; comp. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 138, &c.

2. Bishop of BERYTUS, was present at the council of Chalcedon in A. D. 451, and had been one of the presidents at the council of Berytus, held in A. D. 448. (Acta Concil. ii. p. 281. ed. Binian.; Zacharias Mitylen. de Mund. Opif. p. 166, ed. Barth.)

3. Of CAPPADOCIA, a New Platonist, was a pupil of Iamblichus and Aedesius. When the latter was obliged to quit Cappadocia, Eustathius was left behind in his place. Eunapius, to whom alone we are indebted for our knowledge of Eustathius, declares that he was the best man and a great orator, whose speech in sweetness equalled the songs of the Seirens. His reputation was so great, that when the Persians besieged Antioch, and the empire was threatened with a war, the emperor Constantius was prevailed upon to send Eustathius, although he was a pagan, as ambassador to king Sapor, in A. D. 358, who is said to have been quite enchanted by the oratory of the Greek. His countrymen and friends who longed for his return, sent deputies to him, but he refused to come back to his country on account of certain signs and prodigies. His wife Sosipatra is said to have even excelled her husband in talent and learning. (Eunap. Vit. Soph. pp. 21, 47, &c. ed. Hadr. Junius; comp. Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. vol. ii. p. 273, &c.)

4. Of EPIPHANEA in Syria, a rhetorician of the times of the emperor Anastasius. He wrote an historical work in nine books, intitled Χρονική έκτακτική. It consisted of two parts, the first of which embraced the history from the creation to the time of Aeneias; and the second from the time of Aeneias down to the twelfth year of the reign of the emperor Anastasius. With the exception of a few fragments, the whole work is lost. (Evagrius, iii. 37, vi. in fin.; Nicephor. Prooem. and xiv. 57; Suidas, s. v. Εὐστάθιος.) There is another Eustathius of Epiphaneia, who belongs to an earlier date, and was present among the Arians at the synod of Seleucia, in A. D. 359. (Epiphani. lxxiii. 26; Chron. Alexandr. p. 296. ed. Cange.)

5. An EROTIC writer, or novelist whose name is written in some MSS. "Eumathius." With regard to his native place, he is called in the MSS. of his work Μακρμεβολίτης, which is usually referred to Constantinople, or Παρεμβολίτης, according to which he would be a native of the Egyptian town of Parembole. He appears to have been a man of rank, and high in office, for the MSS. describe him as πρωτονοβελίσμιος and μέγας χαρτοφύλαξ, or chief keeper of the archives. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but it is generally believed that he cannot be placed earlier than the twelfth century of our era, so that his work would be the latest Greek novel that we know of. Some writers, such as Cave, confound him with Eustathius, the archbishop of Thessalonica, from whom he must surely be distinguished. The novel which he wrote, and through which alone his name has come down to us, bears the title, τὸ κατ' ἑορταμὴν καὶ ἑορταμὴν δράμα, and consists of eleven books, at the end of the last of which the author himself mentions the title. It is a story of the love of Hysminias and Hysmine, written in a very artificial style. The tale is monotonous and wearisome; the story is frigid and improbable, and shews no power of invention on the part of its author. The lovers are of a very sensual disposition. It was first edited with a Latin translation by Guilbert Gaurimin, Paris, 1617, 8vo., who published, the year after, his preface and notes to it. The Latin translation is reprinted in the Leiden edition of Parthenius. (1612, 12mo.) Somewhat improved reprints of Gaurimin's edition appeared at Vienna, 1791, 8vo. and Leipsig. 1792, 8vo. There is a very good French translation by Lebas, Paris, 1828, 12mo., with a critical introduction concerning the author and his novel. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 136, &c.; Th. Græce. in Jahn's Jahrbücher for 1836, fourth supplement. vol. p. 267, &c.)

6. Bishop of SEBASTIA in Armenia, who, together with Basilus of Ancyra, was the author of the sect of the Macedonians. (Suid. s. v. Εὐστάθιος.) He was originally a monk, and is said to have been the first who made the Armenians acquainted with an ascetic life. For this reason some persons ascribed to him the work on Ascetics, which is usually regarded as the production of St. Basilus. He must have been a contemporary of Constantine the Great, for Nicephorus states, that although he had signed the decrees of the council of Nicea, he yet openly sided with the Arians. (Epiphani. lxxv. 1, &c.; Sozomen. iii. 13; Nicephor. ix. 16.)

7. Archbishop of THESSALONICA, was a native of Constantinople, and lived during the latter half of the twelfth century. At first he was a monk in the monastery of St. Florus, but afterwards he was appointed to the offices of superintendent of petitions (ἐπὶ τῶν δεήσεων), professor of rhetoric (μαθητῶν ῥητόρων), and diaconus of the great church of Constantinople. After being bishop elect of Myra, he was at once raised to the archbishopric of Thessalonica, in which office he remained until his death in A. D. 1198. The funeral orations which were delivered upon him by Euthymius and Michael Choniates are still extant in MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. The praise which is bestowed upon him by Nicetas Choniates (viii. p. 238 x. p. 334) and Michael Psellus (Du Cange, Glossar. s. v. ῥήτορας) is perfectly justified by the works of Eustathius that have come down to us: they contain the amplest proofs that he was beyond all dispute the most learned man of his age. His works consist of commentaries on ancient Greek poets, theological treatises, homilies, epistles, &c., the first of which are to us the most important. These commentaries shew that Eustathius possessed the most extensive knowledge of Greek literature, from the earliest to the latest times; while his other works exhibit to us the man's high personal character, and his great power as an orator, which procured him the esteem of the imperial family of the Comneni. The most important of all his works is, 1. His commentary on the Iliad and Odyssey (Παρεμβολαὶ εἰς τὴν Ὀμήρου Ἰλιάδα καὶ Ὀδυσσεύειαν), or rather his collection of extracts from earlier commentators of those two poems. This vast compilation was made with the most astonishing diligence and perseverance from the numerous and extensive works of the Alexandrian grammarians and critics, as well as from later commentators; and as nearly all the works from which Eustathius made his extracts are lost, his commentary is of incalculable value to us, for he has preserved at least the substance of their remarks and criticisms. The number of authors whose works he quotes, is prodigious (see the list of them in Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 457, &c.); but although we may admit that he had not read all of them, and that he quoted some at second-hand, yet there seems to be no sufficient reason for believing that he was not personally acquainted with the greatest of the ancient critics, such as Aristophanes of Byzantium, Aristarchus, Zenodotus and others, whose works were accessible to him in the great libraries of Constantinople. If, on the other hand, we look upon the work as a commentary, and estimate it by the standard of what a good commentary should be, we find it extremely deficient in plan and method; the author, however, cannot be blamed for these deficiencies, as his title does not lead us to expect a regular commentary. His remarks are, further, exceedingly diffuse, and frequently interrupted by all kinds of digressions; the many etymological and grammatical fancies which we meet with in his work are such as we might expect. There is very little in the commentary that is original, or that can be regarded as the opinion of Eustathius himself. He incorporated in it everything which served to illustrate his author, whether it referred to the language or grammar, or to mythology, history, and geography. The first edition of it was published at Rome, 1542—1550, in 4 vols. fol., of which an inaccurate reprint appeared at Basle in 1559-60. The Florence edition by A. Potius (1730, 3 vols. fol.), contains only the commentary to the first five books of the Iliad with a Latin translation. A tolerably correct reprint of the Roman edition was published at Leipzig in two sections; the first, containing the commentary on the Odysey in 2 vols. 4to., appeared in 1825-26, and the second, or the commentary on the Iliad, in 3 vols. 4to. was edited by G. Stalbaum, 1827-29. Useful extracts from the commentary of Eustathius are contained in several editions of the Homeric poems. 2. A commentary on Dionysius Periegetes, dedicated to Joannes Ducas, the son of Andronicus Camaterus, is on the whole of the same kind and of the same diffuseness as the commentary on Homer. Its great value consists in the numerous extracts from earlier writers to illustrate the geography of Dionysius. It was first printed in R. Stephens's edition of Dionysius (Paris, 1547, 4to.), and afterwards also in that of H. Stephens (Paris, 1577, 4to., and 1697, 8vo.), in Hudson's Geograph. Minor. vol. iv., and lastly, in Bernhardt's edition of Dionysius (Leipzig, 1828, 8vo.). 3. A commentary on Pindar, which however seems to be lost, at least no MS. of it has yet come to light. The introduction to it, however, is still extant, and was first edited by Tafel in his Eustathii Thessalonicensis Opuscula, Frankfurt, 1832, 4to., from which it was reprinted separately by Schneidewin, Eustathii proemium commentariorum Pindaricorum, Göttingen, 1837, 8vo. The other works of Eustathius which were published for the first time by Tafel in the Opuscula just mentioned, are chiefly of a theological nature; there is, however, among them one (p. 367, &c.) which is of great historical interest, viz. the account of the taking of Thessalonica by the Normans in A. D. 1185.

The name Eustathius is one of very common occurrence during the Byzantine period, and a list of all the known Eustathii is given by Fabricius. (Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 149, &c.) [L. S.]

lation of the nine discourses of St. Basil on the Creation. He was an African by birth, flourished about the middle of the fifth century, and was the brother of the Syncletica Diaconissa, so lauded by Sedulius.

This version, which bears the title Novem S. Basilii Sermones in principium Genesios, is given in the edition of St. Basil, published at Paris by Garnier, fol. 1721, vol. i. pp. 681—676. [W. R.]

EUSTATHIUS ROMANUS, a celebrated Græco-Roman jurist, of the noble family of the Maleini, was honoured with the rank of Patricius, and filled various high offices at Constantinople. He was first a puiune judge (ἄντις κερύης) under Romanus junior (Basil. vii. p. 677, schol.), and continued to fill the same office under Nicephorus Phocas (reigned A. D. 963—969), then was made Quæstor, and was afterwards made Magister Officiorum under Basileius Bulgaroctonus (reigned 975—1025). Basileius Porphyrogenitus, in a novel inserted in the collection of Leunclavius (J. G. R. ii. p. 173), speaks of the uninterrupted prosperity of his family for 100 or 120 years. (Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delin. p. 58; Heimbach, de Basil. Orig. p. 79.)

He is quoted by the four appellations, "Eustathius," "Patricius," "Romanus," and "Magister." Harmenopolus, in the Prolegomena to his Hexabiblon (§ 20), mentions his obligations to the Romaica of Magister, who was evidently a judge as well as an interpreter of law, for Harmenopolus frequently cites his decisions and decrees: Harmenopolus also several times cites Patricius, and, wherever such a citation occurs, there is always a marginal reference in manuscripts to the Biblion Romaicum, which appears to be the same as the Romaica of Magister. In Harmenopolus (4. tit. 12. § 10), is a passage cited from Patricius, with a marginal reference to the Biblion Romaicum, and the same passage is attributed in a scholium on the Basilica (60. tit. 37, vol. vii. p. 678) to Romanus. This work of Magister was divided into titles, and the titles Περὶ Γενεῶν, Περὶ Κληρονομίας and Περὶ Δικηῶν, are cited in the Hexabiblon (5. tit. 9. §§ 11, 12, 13). Mortreuil (Histoire du Droit Byzantin, ii. p. 503, Paris, 1844,) identifies the Biblion Romaicum with the Practica of Eustathius. The Συνεμματα, or observations of Magister, are also mentioned in the Hexabiblon (3. tit. 3. § 111).

Sometimes, when Magister is cited in Harmenopolus, there is a marginal reference to the Μικρὸν κατὰ Τροίχειον, and in Basil. vii. p. 22, mention is made of the Τροίχειον τοῦ Μαδστορος; but the work which now exists in manuscript, and passes under the name of the Μικρὸν κατὰ Τροίχειον, or Synopsis Minor, has been usually attributed to Docimus, or Docimius, and is of a later date than Eustathius. (Reiz. Index Nom. Prop. in Harmenop. s. vv. Magister; Patricius, Μικρὸν, in Meerman. Thes. Suppl. pp. 389—400; Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delin. § 47.)

The names of Eustathius and Romanus occur several times in the Scholia on the Basilica, e. g. Basil. iv. p. 489, iii. p. 340. 56. 480, vii. 678. 694. The Τρόμνημα of Eustathius is cited Basil. iii. p. 116. It is a tract of the date A. D. 1025, de Duobus Consobrinis qui Duas Consobrinas ducebant, and is printed in the collection of Leunclavius (J. G. R. i. p. 141). Heimbach (Anecdota, i. p. lxxi.) mentions a manuscript in the Vatican at Rome (cod. 226, fol. 294—300) under the title Τρόμνημα Εὐσταθίου περὶ βίου (sic) τοῦ ῥωμαίου. He supposes that the title ought to be read Ἐὐσταθίου περὶ βίου Ἐδωτόχου τοῦ ῥωμαίου.

In the last-cited passage, the Scholium gives an extract from the Practica, and mentions Patricius as the author. Eustathius is here to be understood, and not, as Heimbach and Fabricius supposed, the earlier Patricius Heroa. The Πείρα, or Practica, of Eustathius is cited in the Scholia, Basil. vii. p. 516. 676-7. The Practica is a work written not by Eustathius himself, but by some judge or assessor of the judgment-seat. It consists of 75 titles, under which are contained extracts from proceedings in causes tried at Constantinople, and determined by various judges, especially by Eustathius Romanus. Most of these causes were heard in the Hippodromus, a name of a court paralleled by our English Cockpit. The Πείρα (which appears better to deserve publication than some of those remains of Graeco-Roman Jurisprudence which have been lately given to the world by Heimbach and Zachariae) exists in manuscript in the Medicean Library at Florence (Cod. Laurent. lxxx. fol. 478, &c.), with the title Βιβλίον, ὅπερ παρὰ μὲν τινῶν ονομάζεται Πείρα, παρὰ δὲ τινῶν διδασκαλία ἐκ τῶν πράξεων τοῦ μεγάλου κυροῦ Ἐδωτάχου τοῦ ῥωμαίου. (Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delia. § 41.)

Another unpublished work of Eustathius is his treatise Περὶ Ὑποβάλλου, which is in manuscript at Paris. The meaning of the word ὑποβάλλον has been a subject of much dispute. (Du Cange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Graec. s. v.) It seems ordinarily to mean that to which the wife is entitled by agreement or particular custom upon the death of her husband, over and above the dowry she brought him.

2. To Eustathius Romanus has been falsely ascribed a work concerning prescription and the legal effect of periods of time from a moment to a hundred years. This work was published with a Latin version by Schardius (Basil. 1561), and immediately afterwards in Greek only by Cujas, along with his own treatise on the same subject. It has since been often reprinted under various names. It may be found in the collection of Leunclavius (ii. p. 297) with the title De Temporum Intervallis, with Scholia of Athanasius and others. The last edition is that by Zachariae. (Al' Pwral, oder die Schrift über die Zeitabschnitte, 8vo. Heid. 1836.) The work is commonly attributed to Eustathius, Antecessor Constantinopolitanus. If this inscription be correct, the Professor must have been of earlier date than Eustathius Romanus, for the treatise De Temporum Intervallis appears to have been originally compiled in the seventh century. The edition of Schardius gives the work nearly in its original form; Cujas, Leunclavius, and Zachariae present us with a second edition of the same work as revised about the eleventh century by some editor, who has added scholia of his own, and introduced references to the Basilica. (Biener, Gesch. der Novellen, p. 124.)

Nessel (cited by Sammet, Diss. de Hypobolo in Moer. Thea. Suppl. p. 382) attributes, not to Eustathius Romanus, but to the earlier professor Eustathius, a synopsis of juridical actions, entitled Αἱ ἀγῶναι ἐν οὐράνῃ, which is found appended in manuscript to the Proceiron actum. (Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delia. § 48; Heimbach, de Basil. Orig. p. 144.)

3. An Edict of the Eustathius who was Pr. Pr. Orientis under Anastasius in A. D. 506, is published by Zachariae (Anecdota, p. 270). [J. T. G.]

EUSTA'THIUS (Ἐδωτόχης), a Greek physician in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ, to whom two of the letters of St. Basil are addressed. A. D. 373, 374. (vol. iii. Epist. 151, 189, ed. Bened.) In some MSS. he is called by the title "Archiatr." The second of these letters is by some persons attributed to St. Gregory of Nyssa, and is accordingly printed in the third volume of his works, p. 6, &c., ed. Bened. [W. A. G.]

EUSTHENIUS, CLAUDIUS, secretary (ὁ ἐπιστολῆς) to Diocletian, wrote the lives of Diocletian, Maximianus Herculus, Galerius and Constantius, assigning to each a separate book. (Vopisc. Carin. 18.) [W. R.]

EUSTO'CHIUS (Ἐδωτόχης), a Cappadocian sophist of the time of the emperor Constantine. He wrote a history of the life of that emperor and a work on the antiquities of Cappadocia and other countries. (Suid. s. v. Ἐδωτόχης; Steph. Byz. s. v. Πατριάρχαιον.) [L. S.]

EUSTO'CHIUS (Ἐδωτόχης), a physician of Alexandria, who became acquainted with the philosopher Plotinus late in life, and attended him in his last illness, A. D. 270. He arranged the works of Plotinus. (Porphyr. Vita Plot. in Plot. Opera, vol. i. p. l. li. lii. ed. Oxon.) [W. A. G.]

EUSTRATIUS (Ἐδωτρίτιος), a presbyter of the Greek church at Constantinople, is the author of a work on the Condition of the Human Soul after Death, which is still extant. Respecting his life and the time at which he lived, nothing is known, except what can be gathered from the work itself. It is directed against those who maintained that the souls ceased to act and operate as soon as they quitted the human body. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 171) knew the work, and made some extracts from it, which is a proof that Eustratius must have lived before Photius. Further, as Eustratius repeatedly mentions the works of Dionysius Areiopagita, he must have lived after the publication of those works, which appear to have been circulated about A. D. 500. It is therefore very probable that Eustratius lived at the time of Eutychius, patriarch of Constantinople, that is, about A. D. 560, as in fact Eustratius himself says in almost as many words. His work was first edited by L. Allatius in his de Occidentaliū atque Orientaliū perpetui in Dogmate Pargytorii consensio, Rom. 1655, 8vo., pp. 319—581. The style of Eustratius, as Photius remarks, is clear, though very different from classic Greek, and his arguments are generally sound. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 725; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 416.) Some other persons of the name of Eustratius are enumerated by Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 264, note.) [L. S.]

EUSTRATIUS (Ἐδωτρίτιος), one of the latest commentators on Aristotle, lived about the beginning of the twelfth century after Christ, under the emperor Alexius Comnenus, as metropolitan of Nicea. According to a hint in the Commentary to the tenth book of the Ethica Nicomachea (if this part of the Commentary is composed by him), he appears to have also lived at Constantinople, and to have written his commentary in this place. (Comp. ad Arist. Eth. Nic. x. 9. § 13, p. 472, ed. Zell.) Of his life we know nothing else. Of his writings only two are extant, and these in a very fragmentary state: viz. 1. A Commentary to the second book of the Analytica, published by Aldus Manutius, Venice, 1534, and translated into Latin by A. Gratarolus. (Venice, 1542, 1568, fol.)

2. A Commentary to Aristotle's Ethica Nicomachea, published in the Greek language with some other commentaries on the same work, Venice, 1536, fol., and in the Latin language by J. Bernardus Felicinus, Ven. 1541, 1589, fol., Paris. 1543, Helms. 1662, 4to. But, according to the latest researches, this commentary consists of very different materials, and great parts of it are the work of other interpreters, as Aspasius and Michael Ephesius. This has been proved chiefly by the researches of Schleiermacher, in his writings on the Greek Scholia to the Ethics of Aristotle (printed in the Abhandlungen der Berliner Akademie der Wissenschaften of the year 1816—1817, p. 263, &c.). Schleiermacher has shewn that the author of the commentary to the first book of the Ethics cannot possibly be the same person as the author of the commentary to the sixth book, because very different interpretations of the Ἠθικὰ Νικομάχεια of Aristotle are given in the two passages cited. (See Stahr, Aristotelia, ii. pp. 261, 262; Schleiermacher, p. 267.) Probably Eustratius is only the author of the commentary to the sixth book, which is much better than the rest, and from which the commentaries to the second, third, and fourth book greatly differ. But perhaps the commentary to the first is also to be ascribed to Eustratius, and the difference on the signification of the Ἠθικὰ Νικομάχεια may have been occasioned by Eustratius himself borrowing one opinion or the other from more ancient interpreters.

The commentaries of Eustratius greatly differ from similar works of elder commentators by their not being uninterrupted treatises on philosophical subjects, but commentaries in the proper sense of the word, explaining single words and things. It is this which renders them of great importance. In the middle ages Robert of Lincoln translated this commentary into Latin, and Albertus Magnus and St. Thomas Aquinas made considerable use of it in their interpretation of Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. pp. 215, 264; Buhle's Aristotle, vol. i. p. 299.) [A. S.]

EUTELIDAS, statuary. [CHRYSOthemis.]

EUTELIDAS (Εὐτέλιδας), a Laedaemonian who gained a prize at Olympia in wrestling and in the pentathlon of boys, in B. C. 628 (Ol. 38), which was the first Olympiad in which the pentathlon, and the second in which wrestling was performed by boys. (Paus. v. 9. § 1, vi. 15, § 4, &c.) [L. S.]

EUTHALIUS (Εὐθάλιος), bishop of Sulce, lived, according to some, at the time of the great Athanasius; and Cave, in the London edition of his Hist. Lit., places him in A. D. 398, whereas, in the Beale edition (i. p. 466), he places him about A. D. 458. The latter supposition agrees with a statement of Euthalius himself, in his Introduction to the Life of St. Paul. When Euthalius was yet a young man, he divided the Epistles of St. Paul into chapters and verses; and after his elevation to the bishopric, he did the same with the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles. The Epistles of St. Paul, however, had been divided in that manner before him, about A. D. 396; but Euthalius added the arguments of the chapters, indexes, and the passages of Scripture to which allusions are made in the Epistles. This work he afterwards sent to Athanasius the younger, who was bishop of Alexandria in A. D. 490. A portion of it was first published by cardinal Ximenes, in 1514.

Erasmus, in his several editions of the New Testament, incorporated the Argumenta to the Epistles of St. Paul and the Acts. The Prologue on the Life of St. Paul, with a prefatory Epistle, was first edited by J. H. Boeclerus at the end of his edition of the New Testament, Argentorat. 1645 and 1660, 12mo., from which it was afterwards often reprinted. All the works of Euthalius were edited by L. Zaccagni, in his Collectanea monum. vet. Eccles. Græcæ, Rome, 1698, 4to. Whether Euthalius also wrote a commentary on the Gospel of St. Luke and on the Acts, is uncertain, at least there is no distinct mention of them, and no MSS. are known to exist. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 287, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 252.) [L. S.]

EUTHIAS (Εὐθίας), an Athenian orator of the time of Demosthenes. He brought an accusation against Phryne, and as he failed in his attempt to bring about her condemnation, he abstained ever after from speaking in the courts of justice. (Athen. xiii. p. 590; Alciph. Epist. i. 10, &c.; Suidas. s. v. Εὐθίας; Schol. ad Hermog. p. 45.) [L. S.]

EUTHYCLES (Εὐθυκλῆς). 1. An Athenian comic poet of the old comedy, whose plays Ἀσπασίη ἢ Ἐπιστολή and Ἀναδότην are mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Εὐθυκλῆς and βοῖς ἑβδόμος), and the former is quoted by Athenæus (iii. p. 124, c.). Nothing more is known of him. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 270, 271, vol. ii. p. 890; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 448.)

2. Of Rhegium, a Pythagorean philosopher. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. cc. 27, 36.) [P. S.]

EUTHYCRATES (Εὐθυκράτης), a Greek statuary, whom Pliny places at Ol. 120, a. c. 300. (xxiv. 8. a. 19.) He was the most distinguished son and pupil of Lysippus, whom he imitated more in his diligence than in his gracefulness, preferring severe truth to elegance of expression. (Plin. l. c. § 7.) This feature of his style was seen in a most excellent statue of Hercules, at Delphi, and in his statues of Alexander, the hunter Thestius, and the Thestiadæ: the rest of the passage, in which Pliny enumerates his works, is hopelessly corrupt. (See Sillig. Catal. Artif. s. v.) According to Tatian, Euthycrates made statues of courtizans. (Orat. in Græc. 52. p. 114, ed. Worth.) [P. S.]

EUTHYDEMUS (Εὐθύδημος), an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war, was, at the close of its eighteenth year, B. C. 414, raised from a particular to a general command in the army besieging Syracuse. The object was to meet the urgent entreaty of Nicias for immediate relief from the burden of the sole superintendence, without making him wait for the arrival of the second armament. This position he appears to have occupied to the end, though probably subordinate as well to Demosthenes and Eurymedon as to Nicias. Whether he as well as his colleague Menander took part in the night attack on Epipolæ appears doubtful. He is expressly named by Thucydides only once again, as united, in the last desperate engagement in the harbour, with Demosthenes and Menander in command of the ships. Diodorus names him in the previous sea-fight, as opposed on the left wing to the Syracusan Sicæus. Plutarch, who mentions his appointment with Menander, ascribes the occurrence of the second sea-fight, in which the Athenians received their first defeat, to the eagerness of the two new commanders to display their abilities. But this looks very like a late conjecture, such as Ephorus was fond of making.

and is further inconsistent with the language of Thucydides, who represents the Syracusans as acting on the offensive, and shews in Nicias's letter that they had it in their power to force an engagement. Of his ultimate fate we are ignorant: his name (it is probably his) occurs as far back as the eighteenth year of the war, s. c. 422, among the signatures to the Lacedaemonian treaties. (Thuc. v. 19, 24, vii. 16, 69; Diod. xiii. 13; Plut. Nicias, c. 20.) [A. H. C.]

EUTHYDE'MUS (Εὐθύδემος). 1. A sophist, was born at Chios, and migrated with his brother Dionysodorus to Thurii in Italy. Being exiled thence, they came to Athens, where they resided many years. The pretensions of Euthydemus and his brother are exposed by Plato in the dialogue which bears the name of the former. A sophism of Euthydemus, as illustrating the "fallacy of composition," is mentioned by Aristotle. (Plat. Euthydemus, Cratyl. p. 386; Arist. Rhet. ii. 24, § 3, Soph. El. 20; Ath. xi. p. 506, b; Sert. Emp. adv. Math. vii. 13.)

2. Son of Cephalus of Syracuse, and brother to Lysias the orator. (Plat. Rep. i. p. 328; see vol. i. p. 668, a.)

3. Son of Diocles, and a disciple of Socrates, whom Xenophon represents as rebuking him, after his peculiar fashion, for imagining himself to know more than he did. (Plat. Conv. p. 222; Xen. Mem. i. 2, § 29, iv. 2.)

4. A man of Sicily, who made himself tyrant of the city, together with Timocleidas. On their deposition, according to Pausanias, the supreme power was committed to Cleinias, the father of Aratus. [CLEINIAS, No. 5.]

5. A writer on cookery, referred to by Athenaeus, who quotes certain verses of his on salted fish, set forth by him in joke as a genuine fragment of Hesiod. (Athen. iii. p. 116, a. xii. p. 516, c.) [E. E.]

EUTHYDE'MUS (Εὐθύδემος), king of Bactria, was a native of Magnesia. (Polyb. xi. 34.) We know nothing of the circumstances attending his elevation to the sovereignty of Bactria, but he seems to have taken advantage of dissensions among the descendants of those who had first established the independence of that country, and to have wrested the sovereign power either from Diodotus II. or some of his family. He then extended his power over the neighbouring provinces, so as to become the founder of the greatness of the Bactrian monarchy, though not the actual founder of the kingdom, as has been erroneously inferred from a passage in Strabo. (Strab. xi. p. 515; Polyb. xi. 34; Wilson's Ariana, p. 220.) Antiochus the Great, after his expedition against Parthia in a. c. 212, proceeded to invade the territories of the Bactrian king. Euthydemus met him on the banks of the Arius, but was defeated and compelled to fall back upon Zariaspa, the capital of Bactria. (Polyb. x. 49.) From hence he entered into negotiations with Antiochus, who appears to have despaired of effecting his subjugation by force, as he was readily induced to come to terms, by which he confirmed Euthydemus in the regal dignity, and gave one of his own daughters in marriage to his son Demetrius. In return for this, Euthydemus lent him his support in his Indian expedition. (Polyb. xi. 34.) The commencement of the reign of Euthydemus may be referred with much probability to about a. c. 220. (Wilson's Ariana, p. 221.) Silver coins of this prince, of Greek style of workmanship and bearing Greek inscriptions, have been found in considerable numbers at Bokhara, Balkh, and other places within the limits of Bactria, thus attesting the extent to which Greek civilization had been introduced into those remote regions. (Ibid. p. 222.) [E. H. B.]

COIN OF EUTHYDEMUS.

EUTHY'MANES, or more correctly EUTHY'MENES (Εὐθύμηνες), of Massilia, is referred to several times as the author of a geographical work, the real nature of which, however, is unknown. (Plut. de Plac. Philo. 4; Athen. ii. c. 90; Lydus de Mens. 68; Artemid. Epit. p. 63.) Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 141) mentions an Euthymenes as the author of Xporak, but whether they are the same or different persons, cannot be determined. [L. S.]

EUTHYME'DES, a Greek painter of some note, whose time is unknown. (Plin. xxxv. ii. a. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

EUTHY'MIDAS, a leading man at Chalcis in Euboea, was driven out of his native city by the Roman party, and made an unsuccessful attempt in b. c. 192 to bring it under the power of the Aetolians. (Liv. xxxv. 37, 38.)

EUTHY'MIDES, a vase-painter, whose name occurs frequently on vessels found at Adria on the Po, and at Volci. (Müller, Arch. d. Kunst, § 257, n. 7.) [P. S.]

EUTHY'MIUS ZIGABE'NUS, a Greek monk of the convent of the Virgin Mary at Constantinople, lived about the beginning of the 12th century of our era, at the time of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, with whom he was connected by intimate friendship. In a. d. 1118, when the emperor died, Euthymius was still alive; and he himself says that he twice heard the emperor dispute against the enemies of the Greek church—that is, probably against the Latins. Respecting his life, see especially Anna Comnena (lib. xv.) and L. Allatius. (De Consens. utr. Eccles. ii. 10. 5.) Euthymius was the author of several works, all of which are still extant in numerous MSS., but the following only have been printed: 1. Πανσλαβηματικὴ τῆς ὁρθοδόξου πίστεως, directed against heretics of every class, was written by the command of Alexius Comnena. It is divided into 28 titles, and its substance is taken chiefly from the early ecclesiastical fathers. A Latin translation of it was published by P. F. Zinus, Venice, 1555, fol., reprinted at Lyons, 1556, 8vo., and at Paris, 1560, 8vo. The Greek original has not yet been published, except the last title, which is contained in Sylburg's Saracenia, pp. 1—54. 2. Victory and Triumph over the impious, manifold, and execrable sect of the Messalians, &c., together with fourteen anathemata pronounced against them. It was edited in Greek, with a Latin version and notes.

by J. Tollius, in his Ner Italica, Traject. ad Rhen. 1606, 4to., pp. 106—125. 3. A Commentary on all the Psalms of David, and on the ten Cantica. The Greek original has not yet been printed; but a Latin translation by Philip Saulus first appeared at Verona, 1560, fol., and has often been reprinted. 4. A commentary on the four Gospels, is a compilation from St. Chrysostom and others of the early fathers. The Greek original has never been printed, but there is a very good Latin translation by J. Hentenius, Louvain, 1544, fol., reprinted at Paris, 1347, 1560, and 1602, 8vo. The work is considered one of great value, both in style and matter, and has often been made great use of by modern divines. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 328, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 646, &c.) There are a great many other persons of the name of Euthymus, respecting whom see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 345, &c. [L. S.]

EUTHYMUS (Εὐθύμος), a hero of Locri in Italy, was a son of Asclepius or of the river-god Caecina. He was famous for his strength and skill in boxing, and delivered the town of Temessa from the evil spirit Polites, to whom a fair maiden was sacrificed every year. Euthymus himself disappeared at an advanced age in the river Caecina. (Strab. vi. p. 255; Aelian, V. H. viii. 18; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1409.) He gained several victories at Olympia (OL 74, 76, and 77); and a statue of his at Olympia was the work of Pythagoras. (Pans. vi. 6. § 2, 10. § 2.) [L. S.]

EUTOCIUS (Εὐτόκιος) of Ascalon, the commentator on Apollonius of Perga and on Archimedes, must have lived about A. D. 560. At the end of some of his commentaries on Archimedes he says he used "the edition recognised by Isidore of Miletus, the mechanic, our master." This Isidore was one of Justinian's architects, who built the church of St. Sophia. The Greek originals of the following works of Eutocius are preserved: Commentaries on the first four books of the Conics of Apollonius; on the Sphere and Cylinder, on the Quadrature of the Circle, and on the Two Books on Equilibrium of Archimedes. These have been printed in the Greek edition of APOLLONIUS, and in the two Greek editions of ARCHIMEDES; and Latin versions have been given with several of the versions of these two writers, sometimes complete, sometimes in part. There has been no separate print of Eutocius. These commentaries were of ordinary value, as long as geometrical help in understanding the text was required. Torelli wishes that Eutocius had applied himself to all the writings of Archimedes. But they have a merit which will preserve them, independently of their mathematical value; they contain incidentally so much information on the lost writings of Greek geometers, and on the methods of Greek arithmetic, that they are integrant parts of the history of Greek learning. Torelli found them frequently given, by way of citation, a more satisfactory text of Archimedes than that of the remaining manuscripts, which he attributes to the goodness of Isidore's edition: "haec causa fuit, cur Archimedes in Eutocii domo conquererem ubi melius quaedam quam in propria habitabat." (Torelli Proleg. ad Archimed.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 361.) [A. De M.]

of whom nothing more is known, except what may be inferred from his titles of Scholasticus and Illustris, respecting the meaning of the latter of which see Du Cange, Gloss. Med. et Inf. Lat. s. v. Illustris; Gloss. Med. et Inf. Graec. p. 513. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 895). [P. S.]

EUTO'LMIUS, a patronus causarum at Constantinople, who was one of the commission of Sixteen, headed by Tribonian, who were employed by Justinian (A. D. 530—33) to compile the Digest. (Const. Tanta, § 9.) [J. T. G.]

EUTRAPELUS, P. VOLU'MNIUS, a Roman knight, obtained the surname of Eutrapelus (Εὐτράπελος) on account of his liveliness and wit (See respecting this word Aristot. Rhet. ii. 12.) Two of Cicero's letters are addressed to him (ad Fam. vii. 32, 33); and in a letter to Pectus, B. C. 46 (ad Fam. ix. 26), Cicero gives an amusing account of a dinner-party at the house of Eutrapelus, at which he was present.

Eutrapelus was an intimate friend of Antony, and a companion of his pleasures and debauches. (Cic. Philipp. xiii. 2.) The fair Cytheria, the mistress of Antony, was originally the freedwoman and mistress of Volumnius Eutrapelus, whence we find her called Volumnia, and was surrendered to Antony by his friend. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 26, Philipp. ii. 24.) After Caesar's death, Eutrapelus, in consequence of his connexion with Antony, became a person of considerable importance; and we find that Cicero availed himself of his influence in order to get a letter presented to Antony, in which he begged for a libera legatio. (ad Att. xv. 8.) On the defeat of Antony before Mutina in B. C. 43, Eutrapelus, in common with Antony's other friends, was exposed to great danger, but was protected and assisted by Atticus. The latter soon had an opportunity of returning this favour; for, on Antony's return into Italy, Eutrapelus, who was praefectus fabrum in his army, protected Atticus, who feared for his own safety on account of his connexion with Cicero and Brutus. Eutrapelus further erased from the list of proscriptions, at the intercession of Atticus, the name of the poet L. Julius Calidus, which he had inserted himself. (Nepos, Att. 9, 10, 12.) Eutrapelus is mentioned by Horace. (Epist. i. 18. 31.)

EUTRESITES (Εὐτρεσίτης), a surname of Apollo, derived from Eutresis, a place between Plataeae and Thespie, where he had an ancient oracle. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Εὐτρεσίς; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 268.) [L. S.]

EUTROPIA. 1. A native of Syria, became, by her first husband, whose name is unknown, the mother of Flavia Maximiana Theodora, who was married to Constantius Chlorus upon the reconstruction of the empire under Diocletian. Eutropia was at that time the wife of Maximianus Herculius, to whom she bore Maxentius and Fausta, afterwards united to Constantine the Great. Upon the conversion of her son-in-law, Eutropia also embraced Christianity, and repaired to Palestine. In consequence of her representations, the emperor took measures for abolishing the superstitious observances which had for ages prevailed at the oak of Mamre, so celebrated as the abode of Abraham, and caused a church to be erected on the spot.

A medal published on the authority of Goltzius alone, with the legend GAL. VAL. EUTROP., is considered as unquestionably spurious. (Aurel. Vict. Epit. xl.; Euseb. H. E. iii. 52. Tillemont,

2. Grand-daughter of the foregoing, being the daughter of Constantius Chlorus and Flavia Maximiana Theodora, and therefore the sister of Delmatius, Julius Constantius, Hannibalianus, Constantia, and Anastasia, and half-sister of Constantine the Great. (See the genealogical table prefixed to CONSTANTINUS I.) She is believed to have been the wife of Nepotianus, who was consul A. D. 301; but at all events she was certainly the mother of that Nepotianus who assumed the purple on the 3rd of June, A. D. 350, and she perished in the proscription which followed his death twenty-eight days afterwards. (NEPOTIANUS.) (Aurel. Vict. Epit. xlii.; Zosim. ii. 43; Athanas. Apolog. vol. i. p. 677, ed. Paris, 1627.) [W. R.]

EUTROPIUS, the eunuch. [ARCADIUS.]

EUTROPIUS, a man of high rank in that portion of Upper Moesia which was called Dardania, married Claudia, daughter of Crispus, the brother of Claudius Gothicus, and by her became the father of Constantius Chlorus. See the genealogical table in vol. i. p. 831. [W. R.]

EUTROPIUS, a Roman historian who has been styled Flavius Eutropius by Sigonius and some of the earlier scholars without the slightest authority from MSS. or any ancient source for such an addition. Considerable doubts are entertained with regard to the native country of this writer. The only positive witness is Suidas, who terms him a learned Italian (Ἰταλὸς σοφιστής); but these words have been interpreted to signify merely that he wrote in Latin. The arguments of certain French writers, who have sought to prove from Symmachus that he was the countryman of Ausonius, and those of Vinetius, who endeavours from various considerations to demonstrate that he must have been a Greek, are singularly feeble and frivolous. We know from his own statements, taken in combination with various passages in the Byzantines, that he held the office of a secretary (Epistolaris Ἐπιστολογράφος) under Constantine the Great, that he was patronised by Julian the Apostate, whom he accompanied in the Persian expedition, and that he was alive in the reign of Valentinian and Valens, to the latter of whom his book is dedicated. To these particulars our certain information is limited. That he is the same individual with the Eutropius who, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus, was proconsul of Asia about A. D. 371, and who is spoken of by Libanius and Gregory Nazianzen, or with the Eutropius who, as we gather from the Codex Theodosianus, was praefectus praetorio in A. D. 380 and 381, are pure conjectures resting upon no base save the identity of name and embarrassed by chronological difficulties. In no case must he be confounded with the ambitious eunuch, great chamberlain to the emperor Arcadius, so well known from the invective of Claudian; and still less could he have been the disciple of Augustin, as not a few persons have fancied, since, if not actually dead, he must have reached the extreme verge of old age at the epoch when the bishop of Hippo was rising into fame. The only other point connected with the personal career of this author which admits of discussion, is his religion. It has been confidently asserted that it can be proved from his own words that he was a Christian. But how any one could, by any possible stretch of ingenuity, twist such a conclusion out of the passage in question (x. 116, sub fin.), even if we retain the reading "Nimius religionis Christianae insectator," it is very hard for an unprejudiced reader to imagine; and it is equally difficult to perceive upon what grounds we can reject or evade the testimony of Nicephorus Gregoras, who insists that the praises bestowed by Eutropius upon Constantine are peculiarly valuable, because they proceed from one who cherished hostile feelings towards that prince in consequence of differing from him in religion (διὰ τὸ τῆς θρησκείας ἀκονίστητον) and of being the contemporary and partizan (ἡλικιώτην καὶ ἀρκεσμέτην) of Julian; moreover, as if to leave no room for doubt, he declares that the observations of Eutropius, inasmuch as he was a gentile professing a different faith from Constantine (Ἕλληνας δὲ καὶ ἀλλοφύλου θρησκείας τρέφοντας), are tainted with heathen bitterness (ἀπόβουον Ἕλλητικῆς πικρίας), and then goes on to adduce some examples of unfair representations.

The only work of Eutropius now extant is a brief compendium of Roman history in ten books, extending from the foundation of the city to the accession of Valens, by whose command it was composed, and to whom it is inscribed. The author, at the conclusion of the last chapter, promises a more detailed and elaborate narrative of the events in which his imperial protector was the chief agent, but we know not whether this pledge was ever redeemed. Suidas indeed records that Eutropius wrote "other things," but without specifying what these were; and Priscian quotes from some Eutropius as a grammatical authority upon the sound of the letter x, but drops no hint that this personage is the historian.

In drawing up the abridgment which has descended to us, the compiler appears to have consulted the best authorities, although not always with discrimination, and to have executed his task in general with care, although manifest errors may occasionally be detected in facts as well as in chronology, and all occurrences likely to reflect dishonour on the Roman name are sedulously glossed over or entirely omitted. The style is in perfect good taste and keeping with the nature of the undertaking. We find a plain, clear, precise, simple, familiar narrative, in which the most important events are distinctly brought out without ostentation and without any pretensions to ornament or to rhythmical cadence in the structure of the periods. The language is, for the most part, exceedingly pure, although, as might be expected, the critical eye of modern scholarship has detected several words and combinations not sanctioned by the usage of the purest models. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that this little work should have become exceedingly popular at a period when the taste for deep learning and original investigation was on the decline, and that for many ages it should have been extensively employed as a school-book. We find the substance of it copied into the chronicles of Hieronymus, Prosper, Cassiodorus, and many others: it is closely followed by Rufus, Orosius, and by a host of monkish annalists; while it is incorporated verbatim, with many additions, in the well-known Historia Miscella, a sort of historical farrago, which is commonly, but erroneously, supposed to have been compounded by Paul, son of Warnefrid ud Theodolinda, at one time deacon of Aquileia, and being usually designated Paulus Diaconus. Paul, however, did publish an edition of Eutropius, who he expanded at both extremities, affixing several chapters to the commencement and bringing down the work to his own times, while by others it was continued as low as the year 813.

Thus at the revival of literature, the history of Eutropius existed under three forms: 1. The genuine ten books as they proceeded from the author. 2. The editions as extended by Paulus Diaconus and others. 3. The entire but largely interpolated copy contained in the Historia Miscella.

The Editio Princeps, which was printed at Rome, 1471, together with all the other editions which appeared during the 15th century, belong to me or other of the last two denominations. The first attempt to restore the pure original text was by Egnatius, in his edition printed at Venice in 1516, along with Suetonius and Aurelius Victor. But the great restorer of Eutropius was Schonhorius, a canon of Bruges, who published an edition from the Codex Gandavensis at Basle, 8vo., 1546 and 1552; farther improvements were made by Vinetus (Pictav. 8vo. 1554), who made use of a Bourdeaux MS.; by Sylburgius, in the third volume of his Scriptt. histor. Rom. (fol. Franc. 1588), aided by a Fulda MS.; and by Merula (Lug. Bat. Els. 8vo. 1592).

Of the very numerous editions which have appeared since the close of the 16th century, the most notable are those of Hearne, Oxon. 8vo. 1703; of Havercamp, with a copious collection of commentaries, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1729; of Gruner, Coburg. 8vo. 1752 and 1768; of Verheyk, with voluminous notes, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1762 and 1793; of Tzschucke, containing a new revision of the text, an excellent dissertation, together with good critical and explanatory observations, 8vo. Lips. 1796, and again improved in 1804; and of Grosse, Hall. 8vo. 1813; Hanov. 1816; Lips. 1825. On the whole, the most useful for the student are those of Tzschucke and Grosse.

Eutropius was twice translated into Greek. One of these versions, executed by Capito Lycius before the time of Justinian, has perished; that by a certain Paezanius still exists, has been frequently published, and is contained in the editions of Hearne, Havercamp, and Verheyk. Many translations are to be found into English, French, Italian, and German, none of them deserving any particular notice.

In illustration, the dictionaries of Grosse, Samuel, 1811 and 1819; and of Seebode, Hanov. 1818, 1825, and 1828; Moller, Disputatio de Eutropio, 4to., Altdorf. 1685; the excellent dissertation of Tzschucke prefixed to this edition; the preface of Verheyk, and the prooemium of Grosse, may be consulted.

EUTROPIUS (Εὐτρόπιος), a physician who lived probably in the fourth century after Christ, as he is mentioned along with Ausonius by Marcellus Empiricus (in Praefat.) as having been one of his immediate predecessors. He wrote a medical work which is noticed by Marcellus, but is no longer extant. [W. A. G.]

EUTYCHES (Εὐτυχῆς). 1. An engraver of gems, was one of the sons of Dioscurides. His name is seen on an extant gem, with the inscription ΕΤΤΥΧΗΣ ΔΙΟΣΚΟΤΡΙΔΙΟΣ ΑΙΓΕΑΙΟΣ. (Bracci, P. ii. tab. 73; R. Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 42.)

2. Of Bithynia, a sculptor, who is known by a statue in the worst style of ancient art, with the inscription ΕΤΤΥΧΗΣ ΒΕΙΤΤΝΕΤΣ ΤΕΧΝΗΤΗΣ ΕΠΙΟΙΕΙ. (Wincklemann, Gesch. d. Kunst, b. x. c. 1. § 21.) [P. S.]

EUTYCHES or EUTYCHIUS, a disciple of Priscian, taught Latin grammar publicly at Constantinople, and wrote a treatise in two books, De discernendis conjugationibus Libri II., inscribed to his pupil Craterus. This work was first published by Camerarius, Tubing. 4to. 1537, along with Marius Victorinus, is included in the "Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui" of Putschius, Hanov. 4to. 1605, and has been recently edited in a more correct and complete form by Lindemann (Corpus Grammat. Lat. i. p. 151) from a MS. now at Vienna, but formerly in the monastery of Bobbio. Here the author is termed Eutyechius and not Eutyches.

EUTYCHES (Εὐτυχῆς), a presbyter and abbot at Constantinople, in the 5th century, who headed the party opposed to the Nestorian doctrines [NESTORIUS]. Nestorius having maintained that there are in Christ two persons or substances (ὑποστάσεις), one divine (the Λόγος), and one human (Jesus), but with only one aspect, and united not by nature, but by will and affection;—Eutyches carried his opposition to this system so far as to assert that in Christ there is but one nature, that of the Incarnate Word. The declaration "the word was made flesh" implies, according to Eutyches, that He so took human nature upon Him, that His own nature was not changed. From this it follows that His body is not a mere human body, but a body of God. There can be no doubt that this doctrine, if pushed to its logical consequences, would be highly dangerous, since it would destroy all the practical benefits of our belief in the Incarnation, as it involves the denial that we have a High Priest who can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities. If this is borne in mind, the horror which it excited can be accounted for; and although we do not know that Eutyches, any more than many other teachers of error, did carry out his principles to their practical conclusions, still the means which were adopted to support his cause were such as to prevent our feeling any sympathy with it. His opinions became popular in the Alexandrian Church, where the doctrines of Nestorius had been most loudly condemned, and where the patriarch Dioscurus was eminently violent and unscrupulous. Eutyches was first warned of his error privately by Eusebius, bishop of Dorylaeum, and was then denounced by him as a heretic, before a synod which assembled at Constantinople, under the presidency of Flavian, patriarch of that city. He was condemned, in spite of the extent of his influence at court, where Chrysaphius, eunuch and chief chamberlain to Theodosius II., was a close friend of Dioscurus, and godson to Eutyches. Besides this, Chrysaphius had a strong desire to crush the partisans of Pulcheria, the emperor's sister, who was warmly attached to Flavian. By his influence Theodosius was persuaded to declare himself dissatisfied with the decision of Flavian's synod, and to refer the matter to a general council, to meet at Ephesus, A. D. 449, under the presidency of Dioscurus. This is the celebrated Ἀποτρικὴ σύνοδος, an appellation which it most richly deserved. It was composed almost entirely of partisans of Eutyches. Flavian, and those who had judged him on the former occasion, though allowed to be present, were not to be suffered to vote. Theodoret, the historian, who had been a friend of Nestorius, was not to vote without the permission of Dioscurus; and a number of frantic Egyptian monks accompanied their abbot, Barsumas, to whom, as a vigorous opponent of Nestorius, a seat and vote in the council were assigned. For the emperor had avowed, in his letters of convocation, that his great object was πάντων διαβολικῶν ἑκκοφαί ρίζαν, meaning by this phrase the Nestorian doctrines. When the council met, all opponents of Eutyches were silenced by the outcries of the monks, the threats of the soldiers who were admitted to hear the deliberations, and the overbearing violence of the president. Flavian, Eusebius, and Theodoret were deposed, and the doctrines of Eutyches formally sanctioned; and this was regarded as a victory gained over the Eastern church by its Alexandrian rival, which two bodies often came into conflict from the different dogmatical tendencies prevalent in each. The deposed prelates, however, applied for aid to Leo the Great, bishop of Rome, who had been himself summoned to the council, but, instead of appearing there, had sent Julius, bishop of Puteoli, and three other legates, from whom therefore he obtained a correct account of the scenes which had disgraced it. He was ready to interfere, both on general grounds, and from the notion, which had already begun to take root, that to him, as the successor of St. Peter, belonged a sort of oversight over the whole church. Things were changed too at Constantinople: Chrysaphius was disgraced and banished, and Pulcheria restored to her brother's favour. In the year 450, Theodosius II. died; Pulcheria married Marcian, and procured for him the succession to the throne. A new general council was summoned at Nicaea, and afterwards adjourned to Chalcedon, A. D. 451, which 680 bishops attended. The proceedings were not altogether worthy of a body met to decide on such subjects; yet, on the whole, something like decorum was observed. The result was that Dioscurus and Eutyches were condemned, and the doctrine of Christ in one person and two natures finally declared to be the faith of the church. We know nothing of the subsequent fate of Eutyches, except that Leo wrote to beg Marcian and Pulcheria to send him into banishment, with what success does not appear. There are extant a confession of faith presented by Eutyches to the council of Ephesus

(the βουλὴ Ἀποτρικὴ), and two petitions to the emperor Theodosius (Concil. vol. iv. pp. 134, 241, 250); but no works of his are in existence. This schism was continued among the monks by Endocia, widow of Theodosius, and to such an extent, that Marcian was obliged to send an armed force to put it down. The followers of Eutyches, however, under the name of Monophysites, continued to propagate their opinions, though with little success, till the 6th century, when a great revival of those doctrines took place under the auspices of Jacob Baradaeus, who died bishop of Edessa, A. D. 588. From him they were called Jacobites, and under this title still constitute a very numerous church, to which the Armenians and Copts belong. (Eragrius, Hist. Eccles. i. 9; Theodoret, Ep. 79, 82, 92, &c.; Cave, Script. Eccles. Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Neander, Kirchengesch. iii. p. 1079, &c.) [G. E. L. C.]

EUTYCHIANUS. [COMAZON.]

EUTYCHIANUS (Εὐτυχιανός). There are two persons of this name in the history of Constantinople: the one is called an historian, and must have lived at the time of Constantine the Great. He is styled chief secretary of the emperor, and a sophist; but nothing further is known. (Georg. Codinus, Select. de Orig. Constant. 17.) The second was a friend of Agathius the historian, who undertook to write the history of his own time on the advice of Eutychianus. (Agath. Prooem.) [L. S.]

EUTYCHIANUS (Εὐτυχιανός), a physician who lived probably in or before the fourth century after Christ, as one of his medical formulæ is quoted by Marcellus Empiricus (De Medicam. c. 14. p. 303), who calls him by the title of "Archiatr." He may perhaps be the same physician who is called Terentius Eutychianus by Theodorus Priscianus (De Medic. iv. 14.) [W. A. G.]

EUTYCHIDES, T. CAECILIUS, a freedman of Atticus. After his manumission by Atticus, his name naturally was T. Pomponius Eutychides; but when Atticus was adopted by Q. Caecilius, his freedman also altered his name into T. Caecilius Eutychides. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15.) [L. S.]

EUTYCHIDES (Εὐτυχίδης). 1. Of Sicyon, a statuary in bronze and marble, is placed by Pliny at Ol. 120, B. C. 300. (xxxiv. 8. s. 19.) He was a disciple of Lysippos. (Paus. vi. 2. § 4.) He made in bronze a statue of the river Eurotas, "in quo artem ipso amne liquidiorum plurimi dixere" (Plin. l. c. § 16), one of the Olympic victor Timotheus, of Elis, and a highly-prized statue of Fortune for the Syrians on the Orontes. (Paus. l. c.) There is a copy of the last-named work in the Vatican Museum. (Visconti, Mus. Pio-Clem. t. iii. tab. 46.) His statue of Father Liber, in the collection of Asinius Pollio, was of marble. (Plin. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.) A statue of Priapus is mentioned in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Ana. ii. p. 311; Jacobs, iii. p. 24, No. xiv.) as the work of Eutychides, but it is not known whether Eutychides of Sicyon is meant. Cantharus of Sicyon was the pupil of Eutychides. [CANTHARUS.]

2. A painter of unknown time and country. He painted Victory driving a biga. (Plin. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 34.)

3. A sculptor, whose name occurs in a sepulchral epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Ana. vol. iii. p. 307; Jacobs, vol. iv. p. 274, No. dccxix.) [P. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (Εὐτυχίος), was originally a monk of the town of Amaseia, whence he was sent by his fellow-citizens to Constantinople, as proxy for their bishop. The great talent he displayed in some theological controversy gained him general admiration, and the emperor in A. D. 553 raised him to the highest dignity in the church at Constantinople. In the same year he accordingly presided at an ecumenical synod, which was held in that city. In A. D. 564, he incurred the anger of the emperor Justinian, by refusing to give his assent to a decree respecting the incorruptibility of the body of Christ previous to his resurrection, and was expelled from his see in consequence. He was at first confined in a monastery, then transported to an island, Princepo, and at last to his original convent at Amaseia. In 578, the emperor Tiberius restored him to his see, which he henceforth retained until his death in 585, at the age of 73. There is extant by him a letter addressed to pope Vigilius, on the occasion of his elevation in A. D. 553. It is printed in Greek and Latin among the Acta Synodi quintae, Concil. vol. v. p. 425, &c. He also wrote some other treatises, which, however, are lost. (Evang. iv. 38; Gregor. Moral. xiv. 29; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 413, &c.) [L. S.]

EUXENIDAE (Εὐξεινίδαι), a noble family among the Arginetae, celebrated by Pindar in his ode (Nem. vii.) in honour of one of its members, Sogenes, who was victorious in the boys' pentathlon in the 54th Nemean (according to Hermann's emendation of the Scholia), that is, in B. C. 467. The poet also mentions the victor's father, Thearion, with whom he seems to have been intimate. The ode contains some considerable difficulties, and has been very differently explained by Böckh, Dissen, and Hermann. (Pindar, l. c.; Schol., and Böckh and Dissen's notes; Hermann, de Sogenis Arginetae Victoria quinquartii Dissertatio, Lipsæ. 1822, Opuscula, vol. iii. p. 22.) [P. S.]

EUXENIDAS, a painter, who instructed the celebrated Aristides, of Thebes. He flourished about the 95th or 100th Olympiad, B. C. 400 or 380. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. a. 36. § 7.) [P. S.]

EUXENIDES. [ΕΥΞΕΝΙΔΗΣ.]

EUXENUS (Εὐξενος). 1. Is mentioned by Dicaeuchus of Halicarnassus (i. 34) as a ωοπότης ἀρχαῖος, who wrote upon early Italian traditions. As he is not mentioned anywhere else, and as it is strange to find an ancient Greek writing upon Italian myths, some critics have proposed to read Εὐριππος, instead of Εὐξενος; but Ennius can scarcely be deemed among the mythographers.

2. Of Heracleia, was the instructor of Apollonius of Tyre in Pythagorean philosophy, of which he is said to have possessed a very competent knowledge. (Philost. Vit. Apoll. i. 7.) [L. S.]

EUXITHEUS (Εὐξίθεος), a Pythagorean philosopher, from whom Athenæus (iv. p. 157) quotes the opinion that the souls of all men were confined by the gods to their bodies and to this world as a punishment, and that unless they remained there for the period appointed by the deity, they would be doomed to still greater sufferings. [L. S.]

416 (Ol. 91) and B. C. 412 (Ol. 92.) On his return from Olympia, Exaenetus was escorted into the city by a magnificent procession of 300 chariots, each drawn by two white horses. (Diod. xiii. 34, 82; Aelian, V. H. ii. 8.) [L. S.]

EXEDARES. [ARACIDAR, p. 363, a.]

EXITTIUS, quaestor in B. C. 43, and one of Antony's supporters, is called by Cicero (Philipp. xiii. 13) the frater (probably the cousin-german) of Philadelphus, by which name he means to indicate C. Annii Cimber. [Comp. CIMBER, ANNIIUS.]

EXSUPERANTIUS, JULIUS, a Roman historian, with regard to whom we possess no information, but who, from the character of his style, is believed to have flourished in the fifth or sixth century. Under his name we have a short tract, entitled De Marii, Lepidi, ac Sertorii bellis civilibus, which many suppose to have been abridged from the Histories of Sallust.

It will be found appended to the editions of Sallust by Wasse, Cantab. 4to. 1710; by Corte, Lipsæ. 4to. 1724; by Havercamp, Amstel. 4to. 1742; and by Gerlach, Basil. 4to. 1823. (Mollerus, Disp. de Julio Exsuperantio. Alfort. 4to. 1690.) [W. R.]

EXSUPERATORIUS, one of the twelve titles assumed by the Emperor Commodus, who ordained that the month of December should be distinguished by this name. [COMMODOUS.] (Dion Cass. lxxii. 15; Zonar. xii. 5; Lamprid. Commod. 11; Aurel. Vict. de Cæs. xvii.; Eutrop. viii. 7; Suidas, s. v. Κόμμοδος.) [W. R.]

EXSUPERIUS, descended from a family of Bordeaux, was professor of rhetoric first at Toulouse, and subsequently at Narbonne, where he became the preceptor of Flavius Julius Delmatius, and of his brother Hannibalianus, who, after their elevation, procured for their instructor the dignity of Præses Hispaniæ. Having acquired great wealth, he retired to pass the remainder of his life in tranquillity at Cahors (Cadurca). He is known to us only from a complimentary address by Ausonius, who calls upon him to return and shed a lustre upon the city of his ancestors. (Auson. Prof. xvii.) [W. R.]

EZEKIELUS (Ἐzekīēlos), the author of a work in Greek entitled Ἐξαγωγή, which is usually called a tragedy, but which seems rather to have been a metrical history, in the dramatic form, and in iambic verse, written in imitation of the Greek tragedies. The subject was the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. The author appears to have been a Jew, and to have lived at the court of the Ptolemies, at Alexandria, about the second century B. C. Considerable fragments of the work are preserved by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 28, 29), Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. p. 344, fol.), and Eustathius (ad Hexaëm. p. 25). These fragments were first collected, and printed with a Latin version, by Morell, Par. 1580 and 1590, 8vo., and were reprinted in the Poetas Christ. Græc., Par. 1609, 8vo., in Lectius's Corpus Poet. Græc. Trag. et Com., Col. Allob. 1614, fol., in Bignius's Collect. Poet. Christ., appended to the Biblioth. Patr. Græc., Par. 1624, fol., in the 14th volume of the Bibl. Patr. Græc., Par. 1644—1654, fol., and in a separate form, with a German translation and notes, by L. M. Philippson, Berlin, 1830, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 505-6; Welcker, die Griech. Tragöden. p. 1270.) [P. S.]

F.

FABATUS, CALPU'RNIIUS, a Roman knight, accused by suborned informers in A. D. 64, of being privy to the crimes of adultery and magical arts which were alleged against Lepida, the wife of C. Cassius. By an appeal to Nero, judgment against Fabatus was deferred, and he eventually eluded the accusation. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8.) Fabatus was grandfather to Calpurnia, wife of the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. viii. 10.) He possessed a country house, Villa Camilliana, in Campania. (Id. vi. 30.) He long survived his son, Pliny's father-in-law, in memory of whom he erected a portico at Comum, in Cisalpine Gaul. (v. 12.) According to an inscription (Gruter, Inscript. p. 382), Fabatus died at Comum. The following letters are addressed by Pliny to Fabatus, his proseuer (iv. 1, v. 12, vi. 12, 30, vii. 11, 16, 23, 32, viii. 10). [W. B. D.]

FABATUS, L. RO'SCIUS, was one of Caesar's lieutenants in the Gallic war, and commanded the thirteenth legion on the Lower Rhine, in the winter of B. C. 54. It was during this winter that Ambiorix [ΑΜΒΙΟΡΙΧ] induced the Eburones and Nervii to attack in detail the quarters of the Roman legions, but in the operations consequent on their revolt Fabatus seems to have taken no part, since the district in which he was stationed remained quiet. (Caes. B. G. v. 24.) He apprised Caesar, however, of hostile movements in Armorica in the same winter. (Ibid. 53.) Fabatus was one of the praetors in B. C. 49, and was sent by Pompey from Rome to Caesar at Ariminum, with proposals of accommodation, both public and private. He was charged by Caesar with counter-proposals, which he delivered to Pompey and the consuls at Capua. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 12; Caes. B. C. i. 8, 10; Dion Cass. xli. 5.) Fabatus was despatched on a second mission to Caesar by those members of the Pompeian party who were anxious for peace. (Dion Cass. l. c.) As Cicero mentions his meeting with L. Caesar at Minturnae on his return from Ariminum, and as L. Caesar was the companion of Fabatus, at least on their first journey to and from C. Caesar, Fabatus, though not expressly named by him, probably met Cicero at Minturnae also, and communicated Caesar's offers, January 22. B. C. 49. (Cic. ad Att. vii. 13.) According to Cicero (ad Att. vii. 14), Fabatus and L. Caesar, on their return from Ariminum, delivered Caesar's offer to Pompey, not at Capua, but at Teanum. Fabatus was killed April 14th or 15th, B. C. 43, in the first of the battles in the neighbourhood of Mutina, between M. Antony and the legions of the senate. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 33.) [W. B. D.]

Whether the annexed coin, which bears the name of L. Roscius Fabatus, belongs to the Fabatus above mentioned, is doubtful. It represents on the obverse the head of Juno Sospita, and the re-

FABERIUS. 1. Seems to have been a debtor of M. Cicero's, since in several of his letters to Atticus (ad Att. xii. 21, 25, 51, xiii. 8), Cicero speaks of him as a person from whom a certain sum was due, and should be demanded, in case of the purchase of some gardens in Rome (Horti Drusi-ani, Lamiani, &c.), which Cicero wished to buy. He was however, after a time, disposed to be lenient with Faberius (ad Att. xv. 13). If by Meto (in Epist. ad Att. xii. 51) Caesar be meant, in allusion to his reformation of the calendar (Suet. Caes. 40), the interest on the money owed by Faberius to Cicero may have been affected by the extension of the current year B. C. 46. Cicero seems to have been cautious of giving offence to Faberius; and if he were the same person with Caesar's private secretary, mentioned below, and the transaction between them, as has been supposed, referred to property sold or confiscated during the civil wars, Cicero's reluctance to enforce payment may in B. C. 45 have been prudent as well as lenient.

2. One of the private secretaries of C. Julius Caesar. After Caesar's assassination, in B. C. 44, Antony attached to himself Faberius, by whose aid he inserted whatever he chose into the late dictator's papers. Since a decree of the senate had previously declared all Caesar's acts, and his will, valid and binding on the state, Antony, by employing one of Caesar's own secretaries, could insert, without danger of detection, whatever he wished into the papers (στομωτήματα), since the autograph of Faberius made it difficult to distinguish the genuine from the spurious memoranda. (Appian, B. C. iii. 5.) Dion Cassius (xliv. 3) says that Antony secured the services of Caesar's secretaries, but he does not name Faberius. [W. B. D.]

FABIA, the name of two daughters of the patrician M. Fabius Ambustus. The elder was married to Ser. Sulpicius, a patrician, and one of the military tribunes of the year B. C. 376, and the younger to the plebeian C. Licinius Stolo, who is said to have been urged on to his legislation by the vanity of his wife. Once, so the story runs, while the younger Fabia was staying with her sister, a licitor knocked at the door to announce the return of Ser. Sulpicius from the forum. This noise frightened the younger Fabia, who was unaccustomed to such things, and her elder sister ridiculed her for her ignorance. This, as well as the other honours which were paid to Servilius, deeply wounded the vanity of the younger Fabia, and her jealousy and envy made her unhappy. Her father perceived that she was suffering from something, and contrived to elicit the cause of her grief. He then consoled her by telling her that shortly she should see the same honours and distinctions conferred upon her own husband, and thereupon he consulted with C. Licinius Stolo about the steps to be taken for this purpose; and L. Sextius being let into the secret, a plot was formed of which the legislation of C. Licinius and L. Sextius was the result. (Liv. vi. 34; Zonar. vii. 24; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 20.) The improbability and inconsistency of this story has long since been exploded, for how could the younger Fabia have been ignorant of or startled by the distinctions enjoyed by her sister's husband, as her own father had been invested with the same office in B. C. 381? The story must therefore be considered as one of those inventions by which a defeated party endeavours to console itself, namely, by tracing the conqueror's actions to base and ignoble motives.

FABIA GENS, one of the most ancient patrician gentes at Rome, which traced its origin to Hercules and the Arcadian Evander. (Ov. Fast. ii. 237, as Pont. iii. 3. 99; Juv. viii. 14; Plut. Fab. Mar. 1; Paul. Diac. s. c. Faenii, ed. Müller.) The name is said to have originally been Fodii or Forii, which was believed to have been derived from the fact of the first who bore it having invented the method of catching wolves by means of ditches (foveae), whereas, according to Pliny, (H. N. xviii. 3), the name was derived from faba, a bean, a vegetable which the Fabii were said to have first cultivated. The question as to whether the Fabii were a Latin or a Sabine gens, is a disputed point. Niebuhr and, after him, Götting (Gesch. der Röm. Staatsv. pp. 109, 194,) look upon them as Sabines. But the reason adduced does not seem satisfactory; and there is a legend in which their name occurs, which refers to a time when the Sabines were not yet incorporated in the Roman state. This legend, it is true, is related only by the pseudo-Aurelius Victor (de Orig. Gent. Rom. 22); but it is alluded to also by Plutarch (Romul. 22) and Valerius Maximus (ii. 2. § 9). When Romulus and Remus, it is said, after the death of Amulius, offered up sacrifices in the Lupercal, and afterwards celebrated a festival, which became the origin of the Lupercalia, the two heroes divided their band of shepherds into two parts, and each gave to his followers a special name: Romulus called his the Quinctilii, and Remus his the Fabii. (Comp. Ov. Fast. ii. 361, &c., 375, &c.) This tradition seems to suggest, that the Fabii and Quinctilii in the earliest times had the superintendence of the sacra at the Lupercalia, and hence the two colleges of the Luperci retained these names even in much later times, although the privilege had ceased to be confined to those two gentes. (Cic. Phil. ii. 34, xiii. 15, pro Cael. 26; Propert. iv. 26; Plut. Cael. 61.) It was from the Fabia gens that one of the Roman tribes derived its name, as the Claudia, in later times, was named after the Claudia gens. The Fabii do not act a prominent part in history till after the establishment of the commonwealth; and three brothers belonging to the gens are said to have been invested with seven successive consulships, from a. c. 485 to 479. The house derived its greatest lustre from the patriotic courage and tragic fate of the 306 Fabii in the battle on the Cremera, a. c. 477. [VIBULANUS, K. FABIVS, No. 3.] But the Fabii were not distinguished as warriors alone: several members of the gens act an important part also in the history of Roman literature and of the arts. The name occurs as late as the second century after the Christian era. The family-names of this gens under the republic are:—AMBUSTUS, BUTEO, DORSO, LABEO, LEGINUS, MAXIMUS (with the cognomen Aemilianus, Allobrogicus, Eburnus, Gurgus, Rellicanus, Servilianus, Verrucosus), PICTOR, and VIBULANUS. The other cognomina, which do not belong to the gens, are given below. [L. S.]

The only cognomina that occur on coins are Hispaniensis [see Vol. i. p. 180, a.], Labeo, Maximus, and Pictor. The two coins represented below have no cognomen upon them, and it is doubtful to whom they are to be referred. The former has on the obverse the two-faced head of Janus, and on the reverse the prow of a ship: the latter exhibits on the obverse a female head, and on the reverse Victory in a biga; the letters EX A. PV. denote Ex Argentio Publico. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 209, &c.)

FABIANUS, PAPIRIUS, a Roman rhetorician and philosopher in the time of Tiberius and Caligula. He was the pupil of Arellius Fuscus and of Blandus in rhetoric, and of Sextius in philosophy: and although much the younger of the two, he instructed Albutius Silas in eloquence. (Senec. Controv. ii. proem. pp. 134-6, iii. p. 204, ed. Bipont.) The rhetorical style of Fabianus is described by the elder Seneca (Controv. iii. proem.), and he is frequently cited in the third book of Controversias, and in the Suasoriae. His early model in rhetoric was his instructor Arellius Fuscus; but he afterwards adopted a less ornate form of eloquence, though he never attained to perspicuity and simplicity. Fabianus soon, however, quitted rhetoric for philosophy; and the younger Seneca places his philosophical works next to those of Cicero, Asinius Pollio, and Livy the historian. (Senec. Epist. 100.) The philosophical style of Fabianus is described in this letter of Seneca's, and in some points his description corresponds with that of the elder Seneca. (Controv. ii. proem.) Both the Senecas seem to have known, and certainly greatly esteemed Fabianus. (Cf. Controv. iii. proem. with Epist. 11.) Fabianus was the author of a work entitled [Rerum?] Civilium; and his philosophical writings exceeded Cicero's in number. (Senec. Epist. 100.) He had also paid great attention to physical science, and is called by Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 15, a. 24) rerum naturae peritissimus. From Seneca (Natur. Quaest. iii. 27), he appears to have written on Physics; and his works entitled De Animalibus and Causarum Naturalium Libri are frequently referred to by Pliny (H. N. generally in his Elenchos or summary of materials, i. ii. vii. ix. xi. xii. xiii. xiv. xv. xvii. xxiii. xxviii. xxxvi., and specially, but without mention of the particular work of Fabianus, ii. 47. § 121, ii. 102. § 223, ix. 8. § 25, xii. 4. § 20, xv. 1. § 4, xxiii. 11. § 62, xxviii. 5. § 54). [W. B. D.]

FABIANUS, VALERIUS, a Roman of rank sufficient to aspire to the honours of the state, was convicted before the senate in A. D. 62, of conspiring with Vincius Rufinus, Antonius Primus, and others, to impose on his aged and wealthy relative, Domitius Balbus, a forged will. Fabianus was degraded from the senatorian order by the Lex Cornelia Testamentaria or De Falsis. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 40; comp. Instit. iv. 18. § 7; Paulus, Recept. Sententiarum, v. tit. 25.) [W. B. D.]

FABYLIUS, or FABILLUS, a professor of literature in the third century A. D., who instructed the younger Maximinus in the Greek language, and was the author of several Greek epigrams, which were mostly inscriptive lines for the statues and portraits of his youthful pupil. (Capitolin. Maximian. Jun. 1.) [W. B. D.]

FABRICIA GENS, seems to have belonged originally to the Hernican town of Aletrium, where Fabricii occur as late as the time of Cicero (pro Cluent. 16, &c.). The first Fabricius who occurs in history is the celebrated C. Fabricius Lucinus, who distinguished himself in the war against Pyrrhus, and who was probably the first of the Fabricii who quitted his native place and settled at Rome. We know that in B. C. 306, shortly before the war with Pyrrhus, most of the Hernican towns revolted against Rome, but were subdued and compelled to accept the Roman franchise without the suffrage: three towns, Aletrium, Ferentinum, and Verulae, which had remained faithful to Rome, were allowed to retain their former constitution; that is, they remained to Rome in the relation of isopolity. (Liv. ix. 42, &c.) Now it is very probable that C. Fabricius Lucinus either at that time or soon after left Aletrium and settled at Rome, where, like other settlers from isopolite towns, he soon rose to high honour. Besides this Fabricius, no members of his family appear to have risen to any eminence at Rome; and we must conclude that they were either men of inferior talent, or, what is more probable, that being strangers, they laboured under great disadvantages, and that the jealousy of the illustrious Roman families, plebeian as well as patrician, kept them down, and prevented their maintaining the position which their sire had gained. LUSCINUS is the only cognomen of the Fabricii that we meet with under the republic: in the time of the empire we find a Fabricius with the cognomen VMENTO. There are a few without a cognomen. [L. S.]

FABRICIUS. 1. C. and L. FABRICIUS belonged to the municipium of Aletrium, and were twins. According to Cicero (pro Cluent. 16, &c.), they were both men of bad character; and C. Fabricius, in particular, was charged with having allowed himself to be made use of as a tool of Oppianicus, about B. C. 67, to destroy A. Cluentius. [A. CLUENTIVS, No. 2.]

bridge of stone, which connected the city with the island in the Tiber, and which was called, after him, pons Fabricius. The time at which the bridge was built is expressly mentioned by Dion Cassius (xxxvii. 45), and the name of its author is still seen on the remnants of the bridge, which now bears the name of ponte quattro capi. On one of the arches we read the inscription: "L. FABRICIUS, C. F. CUR. VIAR. FACIUNDUM CORRAVIT IDEMQUE PROBAVIT;" and on another arch there is the following addition: "Q. LEPIDUS, M. F., M. LOLLIVS, M. F., EX S. C. PROBAVERUNT," which probably refers to a restoration of the bridge by Q. Lepidus and M. Lollius. The scholiast on Horace (Sat. ii. 3, 36) calls the Fabricius who built that bridge a consul, but this is obviously a mistake. (Becker, Handbuch d. Röm. Alterthümer, vol. i. p. 699.) There is also a coin bearing the name of L. Fabricius. (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. vol. v. p. 210.)

3. Q. FABRICIUS was tribune of the people in B. C. 57, and well disposed towards Cicero, who was then living in exile. He brought before the people a motion that Cicero should be recalled, as early as the month of January of that year. But the attempt was frustrated by P. Clodius by armed force. (Cic. ad Qu. Frat. i. 4, post Red. in Sen. 8, pro Sext. 35, &c., pro Milon. 14.) In the Monumentum Ancyranum and in Dion Cassius (xlviii. 35), he is mentioned as consul suffectus of the year B. C. 36. [L. S.]

FABULLUS, FA'BIUS, one of the several persons to whom the murder of Galba, in A. D. 69, was attributed. He carried the bleeding head of the emperor, which, from its extreme baldness, was difficult to hold, in the lap of his sagum, until, compelled by his comrades to expose it to public view, he fixed it on a spear and brandished it, says Plutarch, as a bacchanal her thyrsus, in his progress from the forum to the praetorian camp (Plut. Galb. 27; comp. Sueton. Galb. 20). But for the joint statement of Plutarch (l.c.) and Tacitus (Hist. i. 44), that Vitellius put to death all the murderers of Galba, this Fabullus might be supposed the same with Fabius Fabullus, legatus of the fifth legion, whom the soldiers of Vitellius, A. D. 69, chose as one of their leaders in the mutiny against Alienus Caccina [CAECINA, No. 9], when he prematurely declared for Vespasian. (Tacit. Hist. iii. 14.) [W. B. D.]

FACUNDUS, styled "Episcopus Hermianensis," from the see which he held in the province of Byzacium, in Africa Propria, lived about the middle of the sixth century. When Justinian (A. D. 544) published an edict condemning, 1st, the Epistle of Ibas, bishop of Edessa; 2d, the doctrine of Theodore, bishop of Mopuestia; and 3d, certain writings of Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus or Cyrrus; and anathematizing all who approved of them, his edict was resisted by many, as impugning the judgment of the general council of Chalcedon (held A. D. 451), at which the prelates whose sentiments or writings were obnoxious were not only not condemned, but two of them, Ibas and Theodore, restored to their sees, from which they had been expelled. Facundus was one of those who rejected the Emperor's edict; and was requested by his brethren (apparently the other bishops of Africa) to prepare a defence of the Council on the three points (currently termed by ecclesiastical writers the "tria capitula") on which its judgment was impugned. He was at Constantinople, engaged in this work, when the pope, Vigilius (A. D. 547), arrived, and directed him and all the other bishops who were there, about seventy in number, to give their opinion on the "tria capitula" in writing in seven days. The answer of Facundus consisted of extracts from his unfinished work; but as, from the haste and excitement under which it was prepared, and the inaccuracy of some of its quotations, it did not satisfy its author, he afterwards finished and published his larger work, as being a more moderate and better arranged defence of the council. Vigilius having been induced to approve of the condemnation of Ibas, Theodore, and Theodoret, though with a reservation of the authority of the council of Chalcedon, Facundus, with the bishops of Africa and of some other provinces, refused to have communion with him and with those who joined in the condemnation; and being persecuted for this, he was obliged to conceal himself. During this concealment, at the request of some persons whom he does not name, he wrote his reply to Mocian, a scholasticus or pleader, who had written against the decision of the council of Chalcedon. Nothing further is known of Facundus. Two of his writings, viz. Pro Defensione Trium Capitulorum Libri XII., and Contra Mocianum Liber, were published with notes by Sirmond (8vo. Paris. 1629). These works, with Sirmond's notes, are reprinted in the edition of the works of Optatus, by Philippus Priorius, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. x. ed. Lyon, A. D. 1677, and vol. xi. ed. Venice, by Gallandius, A. D. 1765. Another work of Facundus, entitled Epistola Fidei Catholice in Defensione Trium Capitulorum, was first published in the Spicilegium of D'Achery (vol. iii. p. 106 of the first edition, or vol. iii. p. 307. ed. of 1723), chiefly with the view of showing that Facundus continued out of communion with the Pope and the Catholic Church, and so of weakening his authority: for the Protestants had cited a passage from his Defensio Trium Capitulorum against the doctrine of the Real Presence. This letter is reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Gallandius. Cassiodorus (Expos. in Psalm cxxvii. sub fin.) speaks of two books of Facundus De duabus Naturis Domini Christi. By some scholars he is thought to mean the two first books of the Defensio; but Fabricius thinks that he speaks of a separate work of Facundus now lost. (Facundus, works as above; Victor Tunnicliff, Chronicon; Isidor. Hisp. De Scrip. Eccles. c. 19; Baronius, Annal. ad Ann. 546, 547, and Pagius, Critic. in Baron.; Cave, *Hist. FADIA. 1. A daughter of Q. Fadius Gallus. She was fraudulently robbed of her paternal inheritance by P. Sextilius Rufus. (Cic. de Fin. ii. 17, &c.)

2. A daughter of C. or Q. Fadius, married to the triumvir M. Antonius, at the time when he was yet a young man. She bore him several children. (Cic. Philipp. ii. 2, xiii. 10, ad Att. xvi. 11.) [L. S.]

FADILLA. 1. AURELIA FADILLA, a daughter of Antoninus Pius and Faustina. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 35.)

2. FADILLA, a daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina. (Gruter, p. cclii. 3; Murator, p. 242. 3, p. 590. 4.)

3. JUNIA FADILLA, a descendant of M. Antoninus or M. Aurelius, betrothed to Maximus Caesar. (Capitolin. Maximin. juv. l.) [W. R.]

FADIUS, the name of a family of the municipium of Arpinum. Some of the members of it settled at Rome, while others remained in their native place. The Fadii appear in history about the time of Cicero, but none of them rose to any higher office than the tribuneship. The only cognomina that occur in the family, are GALLUS and RUFUS. The following have no surnames:—

1. C. or Q. FADIUS, for in one of the two passages in which he is mentioned, he is called Caius, and in the other Quintus. He was a libertinus, and seems to have possessed considerable wealth, for his daughter, who was married to M. Antonius, is called a rich woman. (Cic. Philipp. ii. 2, ad Att. xvi. 11.)

2. L. FADIUS, was ædile in his native place of Arpinum, in B. C. 44. (Cic. ad Att. xv. 15, 17, 20.)

FADUS, CUSPIUS, a Roman eque of the time of the Emperor Claudius. After the death of King Agrippa, in A. D. 44, he was appointed by Claudius procurator of Judæa. During his administration peace was restored in the country, and the only disturbance was created by one Teudas, who came forward with the claim of being a prophet. But he and his followers were put to death by the command of Cuspius Fadius. He was succeeded in the administration of Judæa by Tiberius Alexander. (Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, xx. 5. § 1, Bell. Jud. ii. 11. § 5; Tac. Hist. v. 9; Zonar. xii. 11; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 11.) [L. S.]

FALACER, or, more fully, divus pater Falacer, is mentioned by Varro (de L. L. v. 84, vii. 45) as an ancient and forgotten Italian divinity, whom Hartung (Die Rel. d. Röm. ii. p. 9) is inclined to consider to be the same as Jupiter, since falandum, according to Festus, was the Etruscan name for "heaven." [L. S.]

FALANIUS, a Roman eque, one of the first victims of the public accusers in the reign of Tiberius. He was charged, A. D. 15, with profaning the worship of Augustus Caesar, first by admitting a player of bad repute to the rites, and secondly by selling with his garden a statue of the deceased emperor. Tiberius acquitted Falanius, remarking that the gods were quite able to take care of their own honour. (Tac. Ann. i. 73; Dion Cass. lvi. 24.) [W. B. D.]

P. FALCIDIUS, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 40, was the author of the Lex Falcidia de Legatis, which remained in force in the sixth century A. D., since it was incorporated by Justinian in the Institutes. It is remarkable that Dion Cassius (xlviii. 33) mistakes its import. He says that the heres, if unwilling to take the hereditas, was allowed by the Falcidian law to refuse it on taking a fourth part only. But the Lex Falcidia enacted that at least a fourth of the estate or property of the testator should be secured to the heres scriptus. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Legatum.) The Falcidius mentioned by Cicero in his speech for the Manilian law (19), had the prænomen Caius. He had been tribune of the people and legatus, but in

FALCO, Q. SO'SIUS, a Roman of high birth and great wealth, consul for the year A. D. 193, one of those whom Commodus had resolved to put to death that very night on which he himself was slain. When the Praetorians became disgusted with the reforms of Pertinax, they endeavoured to force the acceptance of the throne upon Falco, and actually proclaimed him emperor. The plot, however, failed, and many of the ringleaders were put to death; but Falco, whose guilt was by no means proved, and who was even believed by many to be entirely innocent, was spared, and, retiring to his property, died a natural death. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 22, lxxiii. 8; Capitolin. Pertin. 8.) [W. R.]

FALCONIA PROBA, a poetess, greatly admired in the middle ages, but whose real name, and the place of whose nativity, are uncertain. We find her called Platonis Veccia, Faltonia Avicia, Valeria Faltonia Proba, and Proba Valeria; while Rome, Orta, and sundry other cities, claim the honour of her birth. Most historians of Roman literature maintain that she was the noble Avicia Faltonia Proba, the wife of Olybrius Probus, otherwise called Hermogenianus Olybrius, whose name appears in the Fasti as the colleague of Ausonius, A. D. 379; the mother of Olybrius and Probinus, whose joint consulate has been celebrated by Claudian; and, according to Procopius, the traitress by whom the gates of Rome were thrown open to Alaric and his Goths. But there seems to be no evidence for this identification; and we must fall back upon the testimony of Isidorus, with whose words, "Proba uxor Adelfii Proconsulis," our knowledge begins and ends, unless we attach weight to a notice found at the end of one of the MS. copies written in the tenth century, quoted by Montfaucon in his Diarium Italicum (p. 86), "Proba uxor Adolphi mater Olibrii et Alipeii cum Constantii bellum adversus Magnentium conscripsisset, conscripsit et hunc librum."

The only production of Falconia now extant is a Cento Virgilianus, inscribed to the Emperor Honorius, in terms which prove that the dedication must have been written after A. D. 393, containing narratives in hexameter verse of striking events in the Old and New Testament, expressed in lines, half lines, or shorter portions of lines derived exclusively from the poems of Virgil, which are completely exhausted in the process. Of course no praise, except what is merited by idle industry and clever dullness, is due to this patch-work; and we cannot but marvel at the gentle terms employed by Boccaccio and Henry Stephens in reference to such trash. We learn from the proemium that she had published other pieces, of which one upon the civil wars is particularly specified, but of these no trace remains. The Homeroeciones, by some ascribed to Falconia, belong in reality to Eudoxia.

The Cento Virgilianus was first printed at Venice, fol. 1472, in a volume containing also the Epigrams of Ausonius, the Consolatio ad Liviam, the pastorals of Calpurnius, together with some hymns and other poems; this was followed, in the same century, by the editions published at Rome, 4to. 1481; at Antwerp, 4to. 1489, and at Brixia, 8vo. 1496. The most elaborate are those of Meibomius, Helmst. 4to. 1597, and of Kromayer, Hal. Magd. 8vo. 1719. (See also the Bibliotheca Max.

FALCULA, C. FIDICULA'NIUS, a Roman senator, was one of the judices at the trial of Statius Albius Oppianicus, who in B. C. 74 was accused of attempting to poison his step-son, A. Cluentius. The history of this remarkable trial is given elsewhere (CLUENTIUS). Falcula was involved in the general indignation that attended the conviction of Oppianicus. The majority of judices who condemned Oppianicus was very small. Falcula was accused by the tribune, L. Quintius, of having been illegally balloted into the concilium by C. Verres, at that time city praetor, for the express purpose of convicting Oppianicus, of voting out of his proper decuria, of giving sentence without hearing the evidence, of omitting to apply for an adjournment of the proceedings, and of receiving 40,000 sesterces as a bribe from the prosecutor, A. Cluentius.

He was, however, acquitted, since his trial did not take place until after the excitement that followed the Judicium Albium had in some measure subsided. But eight years later, B. C. 66, Falcula was again brought to public notice by Cicero, in his defence of Cluentius. After recapitulating the circumstances of the Judicium Albium, Cicero asks, if Falcula were innocent, who in the concilium at Oppianicus's trial could be guilty? an equivocal plea that inferred without asserting the guilt of Falcula, in B. C. 74. In his defence of A. Caecina, in B. C. 69, Cicero ushers in the name of Falcula, a witness against the accused, with ironical pomp, and proceeds to point out gross inconsistencies in Falcula's evidence. Great uncertainty is thrown over the history of Falcula by the circumstance that it suited Cicero, from whose speeches alone we know any thing of him, to represent at different times, in different lights, the Judicium Albium. When Cicero was pleading against C. Verres, Oppianicus was unjustly condemned, and Falcula was an illegal corrupt judge; when he defended Cluentius, it was necessary to soften the details of the Albium Judicium; when he spoke for Caecina, it was his interest to direct public feeling against Falcula. (Cic. pro Cluent. 37, 41, pro Caecina. 10; Pseudo-Ascon. in Act. I. Verr. p. 146; Schol. Gronov. in Act. I. in Verr. p. 396. ed. Orelli.) [W. B. D.]

FALISCUS, GRATIUS, the author of a poem upon the chase, of whom only one undoubted notice is to be found in ancient writers. This is contained in the Epistles from Pontus (iv. 16, 33), where Ovid speaks of him as a contemporary in the same couplet with Virgil:—

"Tityrus antiquas et erat qui pasceret herbas, Aptaque venanti Gratus arma daret."

(Comp. Cynegol. 23.) Some lines in Manilius have been supposed to allude to Gratus, but the terms in which they are expressed (Astron. ii. 43) are too vague to warrant such a conclusion. Wernsdorf, arguing from the name, has endeavoured, not without some shadow of reason, to prove that he must have been a slave or a freedman, but the rest of his conjectures are mere fancies. The cognomen, or epithet, Faliscus, was first introduced by Barth, on the authority of a MS. which no one else ever saw, and probably originated in a forced and false interpretation of one of the lines in the poem, "At contra nostris labellia lina Faiiscis" (v. 40), where, upon referring to the context, it will at once be seen that nostris here denotes merely Italian, in contradistinction to the various foreign tribes spoken of in the preceding verses.

The work itself, which consists of 540 hexameters, is entitled Cynageticum Liber, and professes to set forth the apparatus (arma) necessary for the sportsman, and the manner in which the various requisites for the pursuit of game are to be procured, prepared, and preserved (artes armorum). Among the arma of the hunter are included not only nets, gins, snares (retia, pedicæ, laquei), darts and spears (jacula, venabula), but also horses and dogs, and a large portion of the undertaking (vv. 150—430) is devoted to a systematic account of the different kinds of hounds and horses.

The language of the Cynagetica is pure, and not unworthy of the age to which it belongs; but there is frequently a harshness in the structure of the periods, a strange and unauthorised use of particular words, and a general want of distinctness, which, in addition to a very corrupt text, render it a task of great difficulty to determine the exact meaning of many passages. Although considerable skill is manifested in the combination of the parts, the author did not possess sufficient power to overcome the obstacles which were triumphantly combated by Virgil. The matter and arrangement of the treatise are derived in a great measure from Xenophon, although information was drawn from other ancient sources, such as Dercylus the Arcadian, and Hagnon of Boeotia. It is remarkable, that both the Greek Oppianus, who flourished probably under Caracalla, and the Roman Nemesianus, the contemporary of Numerianus, arrogate to themselves the honour of having entered upon a path altogether untrodden. Whether we believe them to be sincere and ignorant, or suspect them of deliberate dishonesty, their bold assertion is sufficient to prove that the poem of Faliscus had in their day become almost totally unknown.

The Cynagetica has been transmitted to modern times through the medium of a single MS., which was brought from Gaul to Italy by Actius Sannasarius about the beginning of the sixteenth century, and contained also the Cynagetics of Nemesianus, and the Halieutics ascribed to Ovid. A second copy of the first 189 lines was found by Janus Ulisius appended to another MS. of the Halieutica.

The Editio Princeps was printed at Venice, 8vo. February, 1534, by Aldus Manutius, in a volume, containing also the Halieutica of Ovid, the Cynageticæ and Carmen Bucolicum of Nemesianus, the Bucolica of Calpurnius Siculus, together with the Venatio of Hadrianus; and reprinted at Augsburg in the July of the same year. The best editions are those contained in the Poetæ Latini Minores of Burmann (vol. i. Lug. Bat. 1731), and of Wernsdorf, vol. i. p. 6, 293, ii. p. 34, iv. pt. ii. p. 790, 806, v. pt. iii. p. 1445), whose prolegomena embrace all the requisite preliminary information.

A translation into English verse with notes, and the Latin text, by Christopher Wase, was published at London in 1654, and a translation into German, also metrical, by S. E. G. Perlet, at Leipzig, in 1826. [W. R.]

FALTO, the name of a family of the Valeria gens.

1. Q. VALERIUS Q. F. P. N. FALTO, was the first Praetor Peregrinus at Rome (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Praetor). The occasion for a second praetorship was, that the war with Carthage required two commanders, and A. Postumius Albinus, one of the consuls for the year B. C. 242, being at the time priest of Mars, was forbidden by the Pontifex Maximus to leave the city. Falto was second in command of the fleet which, in that year, the last of the first Punic war, the Romans dispatched under C. Lutatius Catulus [CATULUS] against the Carthaginians in Sicily. After Catulus had been disabled by a wound at the siege of Drepanum, the active duties of the campaign devolved on Falto. His conduct at the battle of the Aegates so much contributed to the victory of the Romans that, on the return of the fleet, Falto demanded to share the triumph of Catulus. His claim was rejected, on the ground that an inferior officer had no title to the recompense of the chief in command. The dispute was referred to arbitration; and the arbiter, Atilius Calatinus, decided against Falto, alleging that, as in the field the consul's orders took precedence of the praetor's, and as the praetor's auspices, in case of dispute, were always held inferior to the consul's, so the triumph was exclusively a consular distinction. The people, however, thought that Falto merited the honour, and he accordingly triumphed on the 6th of October, B. C. 241. Falto was consul in B. C. 239. (Liv. Epit. xix.; Fast. Capit.; Val. Max. i. l. § 2, ii. 8. § 2.)

2. P. VALERIUS Q. F. P. N. FALTO, brother of the preceding, was consul in B. C. 238. The Boian Gauls, after having been at peace with Rome for nearly half a century, in this year resumed hostilities, and formed a league with their kindred tribes on the Po, and with the Ligurians. Falto was despatched with a consular army against them, but was defeated in the first battle with great loss. The senate, on the news of his defeat, ordered one of the praetors, M. Genucius Cipus [CIPUS], to march to his relief. Falto, however, regarded this as an intrusion into his province, and, before the reinforcement arrived, attacked the Boians a second time and routed them. But on his return to Rome he was refused a triumph, not merely on account of his defeat, but because he had rashly fought with a beaten army without awaiting the arrival of the praetor. (Zonar. viii. 18; Oros. iv. 12.)

3. M. VALERIUS FALTO, one of the envoys sent by the senate, B. C. 205, to Attalus I. king of Pergamus. Their mission was to fetch the Idaean mother to Italy, according to an injunction of the Sibylline Books. Falto was of quaestorian rank at this time, but the date of his quaestorship is not known. On the return of the envoys to Rome Falto was sent forward to announce the message of the Delphic oracle, which they had consulted on their journey, to the senate—"The best man in the state must welcome the goddess or her representative on her landing." (Liv. xxix. 11.) Falto was one of the curule aediles, B. C. 203, when a supply of Spanish grain enabled those magistrates to sell corn to the poor at a sesterce the bushel. (xxx. 26.) Falto was praetor B. C. 201. His province was Bruttium, and two legions were allotted to him. (xxx. 40, 41.) [W. B. D.]

FANGO, or PHANGO, C. FUFICIUS, originally a common soldier, and probably of African blood, whom Julius Caesar raised to the rank of senator. When, in B. C. 40, Octavianus annexed Numidia and part of the Roman Africa to his share of the triumviral provinces, he appointed Fango his prefect. But his title in Numidia was opposed by T. Sextius, the prefect of M. Antonius. They appealed to arms, and after mutual defeats and victories, Fango was driven into the hills that bounded the Roman province to the north-west. There, mistaking the rushing of a troop of wild buffaloes for a night attack of Numidian horse, he slew himself. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 22-24; Appian, B. C. v. 26.) In Cicero's epistles to Atticus (xiv. 10.), Frangones is probably a misreading for Fangones, and refers to C. Fuficius. [W. B. D.]

FA'NNIA. 1. A woman of Minturnae, of bad repute. C. Titinius married her, nevertheless, because she had considerable property. Soon after he repudiated her for her bad conduct, and at the same time attempted to rob her of her dowry. C. Marius, who was to decide between them, requested Titinius to restore the dowry; but when this was refused, C. Marius pronounced sentence, declaring the woman guilty of adultery, but compelling her husband to restore her dowry, because he had married the woman although he knew what she was. The woman gratefully remembered the service thus done to her, and, when Marius, in B.C. 88, on his escape from the marshes, came to Minturnae, Fannia received him into her house, and took care of him as well as she could. (Val. Max. viii. 2. § 3; Plut. Mar. 38, who erroneously calls her husband Tinnius.)

2. The second wife of Helvidius Priscus. In the reign of Nero, when her husband was exiled, she accompanied him to Macedonia. In the reign of Vespasian she accompanied him a second time into exile. After the death of her husband she persuaded Herennius Senecio to write the life of Helvidius Priscus. The biographer was put to death by Domitian, and Fannia was punished for her suggestion by being sent into exile. (Plin. Epist. i. 5, vii. 19; Suet. Vesp. 15.) [L. S.]

FA'NNIA GENS, plebeian. No members of it are mentioned in Roman history previous to the second century B. C., and the first of them who obtained the consulship was C. Fannius Strabo, in B.C. 161. The only family-name which occurs in this gens under the republic is STRABO: the others are mentioned without a cognomen. There are a few coins belonging to this gens: one of them is given under CRATONIUS; another figured below bears on

FANNIUS. 1. C. FANNIUS was tribune of the people in B.C. 187. When L. Scipio Asiaticus was sentenced to pay a large sum of money to the treasury, the praetor, Q. Terentius Culleo, declared, that he would arrest and imprison Scipio, if he refused to pay the money. On that occasion C. Fannius declared in his own name and that of his colleagues (with the exception of Tib. Gracchus), that they would not hinder the praetor in carrying his threat into effect. (Liv. xxxviii. 60.)

2. C. FANNIUS, a Roman eque, is called a frater germanus of Titinius, and had some transactions with C. Verres in B.C. 84. (Cic. in Verr. i. 49.)

3. M. FANNIUS, was one of the judges in the case (Quaestio de Sicuriis) of Sex. Roscius of America, in B.C. 80. (Cic. pro Sex. Rosc. 4; Schol. Gronov. ad Roscias. p. 427, ed. Orelli.)

4. L. FANNIUS and L. MAGIUS served in the army of the legate Flavius Fimbria, in the war against Mithridates, in B.C. 84; but they deserted and went over to Mithridates, whom they persuaded to enter into negotiations with Sertorius in Spain, through whose assistance he might obtain the sovereignty of Asia Minor and the neighbouring countries. Mithridates entered into the scheme, and sent the two deserters, in B.C. 74, to Sertorius to conclude a treaty with him. Sertorius promised Mithridates Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and Gallograecia, as rewards for assisting him against the Romans. Sertorius at once sent M. Varius to serve Mithridates as general, and L. Fannius and L. Magius accompanied him as his councillors. On their advice Mithridates began his third war against the Romans. In consequence of their desertion and treachery Fannius and Magius were declared public enemies by the senate. We afterwards find Fannius commanding a detachment of the army of Mithridates against Lucullus. (Appian, Mithrid. 68; Plut. Sertor. 24; Oros. vi. 2, Cic. in Verr. i. 34; Pseudo-Ascon. in Verrin. p. 183, ed. Orelli.)

5. C. FANNIUS, one of the persons who signed the accusation which was brought against P. Clodius in B.C. 61. A few years later, B.C. 59, he was mentioned by L. Vettius as an accomplice in the alleged conspiracy against Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 24.) Orelli, in his Onomasticon, treats him as identical with the C. Fannius who was tribune in B.C. 59; but if this were correct, Cicero (L. c.) would undoubtedly have described him as tribune. He may, however, be the same as the Fannius who was sent in B.C. 43 by M. Lepidus as legate to Sex. Pompeius, and who, at the close of the same year, was outlawed, and took refuge with Sex. Pompeius in Sicily. In B.C. 36, when Sex. Pompeius had gone to Asia, Fannius and others deserted him, and went over to M. Antonius. (Cic. Philipp. xiii. 6; Appian, B. C. iv. 84, v. 139.)

6. C. FANNIUS, tribune of the people in B.C. 59, when C. Julius Caesar and Bibulus were consuls. Fannius allowed himself to be made use of by Bibulus in opposing the lex agraria of J. Caesar. He belonged to the party of Pompey, and in B.C. 49 he went as praetor to Sicily. The fall of Pompey in the year after seems to have brought about the fall of Fannius also. (Cic. pro Sext. 53, in Vatin. 7, ad Att. vii. 15, viii. 15, xi. 6.)

7. FANNIUS, one of the commanders under Cassius, in B.C. 42. (Appian, B. C. iv. 72.) He may be the same as the C. Fannius mentioned by Josephus (Ant. Jud. xiv. 10. § 15), who, however, describes him as σπαρταγὸς δῆατος, the last of which words is probably incorrect.

8. C. FANNIUS, a contemporary of the younger Pliny, who was the author of a work on the deaths of persons executed or exiled by Nero, under the title of Exitus Occisorum aut Relegatorum. It consisted of three books, but more would have been added if Fannius had lived longer. The work seems to have been very popular at the time, both on account of its style and its subject. (Plin. Epist. v. 5.) [L. S.]

FA'NNIUS CAEPIO. [CAEPIO.]

FA'NNIUS CHAE'REAS. [CHAE'REAS.]

FA'NNIUS QUADRATUS. [QUADRATUS.]

FA'SCELIS, a surname of Diana in Italy, which she was believed to have received from the circumstance of Orestes having brought her image from Tauris in a bundle of sticks (fascis, Serv. ad Aen. ii. 116; Solin. i. 2; Sil. Ital. xiv. 260). Fascelis, however, is probably a corruption, for the purpose of making it allude to the story of Orestes bringing her image from Tauris: the original form of the name was probably Facelis or Facelina (from fur), as the goddess was generally represented with a torch in her hand. [L. S.]

FA'SCINUS, an early Latin divinity, and identical with Mutinus or Tutinus. He was worshipped as the protector from sorcery, witchcraft, and evil daemons; and represented in the form of a phallus, the genuine Latin for which is fascinum, this symbol being believed to be most efficient in averting all evil influences. He was especially invoked to protect women in childbirth and their dressing (Plin. Hist. Nat. xviii. 4, 7); and women wrapt up in the toga praetexta used to offer up sacrifices in the chapel of Fascinus. (Paul. Diac. p. 103.) His worship was under the care of the Vestals; and generals, who entered the city in triumph, had the symbol of Fascinus fastened under their chariot, that he might protect them from envy (medicus invidiae), for envy was believed to exercise an injurious influence on those who were envied. (Plin. l. c.) It was a custom with the Romans, when they praised any body, to add the word prae-fascine or prae-fascini, which seems to have been an invocation of Fascinus, to prevent the praise turning out injurious to the person on whom it was bestowed. [L. S.]

FASTIDIUS, a British bishop placed, as to time, by Gennadius, between Cyril of Alexandria and Theodotus of Ancyra. One tract by this author, entitled De Vita Christiana, is still extant, but was long ascribed to St. Augustin, or to some unknown writer, until restored to its lawful owner by Holstenius, who published an edition at Rome in 1663, from an ancient MS. in the monastery of Monte Casino. It will be found in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (vol. ix. p. 481) and a discussion upon Fastidius himself in the Prolegomena (p. xxix.). Gennadius ascribes to him another work, De Viduitate Servanda, which, however, was perhaps incorporated in the piece mentioned above, which contains a chapter De Triplici Viduitate. [W. R.]

M. FAU'CIUS, a native of Arpinum, of equestrian rank, at Rome. His life would be undeserving record but for its connection with a letter of Cicero's (Fam. xiii. 11), which incidentally throws light upon the local government and circumstances of the municipium of Arpinum, the birthplace of Marius and Cicero. The Arpinatian community possessed estates in Cisalpine Gaul, the rents of which were their only fund for the repair of their temples and the cost of their sacrifices and festivals. Fancius was one of three commissioners sent to recover the dues of his municipium, which the date of the letter, B. C. 46, renders it not improbable that the civil wars had caused to be withheld. Cicero recommends Fancius and the other commissioners to M. Brutus, who was praetor of Cisalpine Gaul. It appears from the letter that the only magistracy in Arpinum was an aedileship, and this fact adds to our acquaintance with the internal government of Italy under the dominion of Rome. Thus, Lavinium had a dictator (Cic. pro Mil. 10), Tusculum a dictator (Liv. iii. 18); Corfinium, Duumviri (Caesar, B. C. i. 23); Neapolis, Cumae, Larinum, Quatuorviri (Cic. ad Att. x. 13, pro Cluent. 8); Sidicinum and Ferentum a quaestor (Gell. x. 3). For the Fancia Curia see Liv. ix. 38. [W. B. D.]

FAVENTI'NUS, CLAU'DIUS, a centurion dismissed with ignominy by the emperor Galba from the service, who afterwards, A. D. 69, by exhibiting forged letters, induced the fleet at Misenum to revolt from Vitellius to Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. iii. 57.) From his influence with the fleet, Faventinus may have been one of the classarii milites, or legio classica, whom Nero, A. D. 68, drafted from the seamen, and Galba reduced to their former station. (Suet. Galb. 12; Plut. Galb. 15; Tac. Hist. i. 6, 31, 37; Dion Cass. lxi. 3.) [W. B. D.]

FAULA or FAUNA was, according to some, a concubine of Heracles in Italy; while, according to others, she was the wife or sister of Faunus. Latinus, who is called a son of Heracles by a concubine, was probably considered to be the son of Fauna; whereas the common tradition describes him as a son of Faunus. Fauna was identified by some of the ancients with the Greek Aphrodite (Verr. Flacc. ap. Lactant. de Fals. Relig. i. 20, Inst. Ep. ad Pentad. 20; comp. FAUNUS.) [L. S.]

FAUNUS, the son of Picus and father of Latinus, was the third in the series of the kings of the Laurentes. In his reign Faunus, like his two predecessors, Picus and Saturn, had promoted agriculture and the breeding of cattle among his subjects, and also distinguished himself as a hunter. (Plin. H. N. ix. 6; Propert. iv. 2. 34.) In his reign likewise the Arcadian Evander and Heracles were believed to have arrived in Latium. (Plut. Parall. Gr. et Rom. 38.) Faunus acts a very prominent part in the mythical history of Latium, for, independent of what he did for agriculture, he was regarded as one of the great founders of the religion of the country; hence Lactantius (l. 24, § 9) places him on an equality with Numa. He was therefore in later times worshipped in two distinct capacities: first, as the god of fields and shepherds, and secondly, as an oracular and prophetic divinity. The festival of the Faunalia, which was celebrated on the 5th of December, by the country people, with great feasting and merriment, had reference to him as the god of agriculture and cattle. (Horat. Carm. iii. 18.) As a prophetic god, he was believed to reveal the future to man, partly in dreams, and partly by voices of unknown origin. (Virg. Aen. vii. 81, &c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 2. iii. 6, de Divin. i. 45.) What he was in this respect to the male sex, his wife Fauna or Faula was to the female, whence they bore the surnames Fatuus, Fatua, or Fatuellus, Fatuella, derived from fari, fatum. (Justin, xliii. 1; Lactant. i. 22.) They are said to have given their oracles in Saturnian verse, whence we may perhaps infer that there existed in Latium collections of oracles in this metre. (Varro, de L. L. vii. 36.) The places where such oracles were given were sacred groves, one near Tibur, around the well Albunea, and another on the Aventine, near Rotas. (Virg. l. c.; Ov.

Fast. iv. 649, &c.) The rites observed in the former place are minutely described by Virgil: a priest offered up a sheep and other sacrifices; and the person who consulted the oracle had to sleep one night on the skin of the victim, during which the god gave an answer to his questions either in a dream or in supernatural voices. Similar rites are described by Ovid as having taken place on the Aventine. (Comp. Isidor. viii. 11, 87.) There is a tradition that Numa, by a stratagem, compelled Picus and his son Faunus to reveal to him the secret of calling down lightning from heaven (ELICUS), and of purifying things struck by lightning. (Arnob. v. 1; Plat. Num. 15; Ov. Fast. iii. 291, &c.) At Rome there was a round temple of Faunus, surrounded with columns, on Mount Caelius; and another was built to him, in a.c. 196, on the island in the Tiber, where sacrifices were offered to him on the ides of February, the day on which the Fabii had perished on the Cremera. (Liv. xxxiii. 42, xxxiv. 53; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. 2; Vitruv. iii. 1; Ov. Fast. ii. 193.) In consequence of the manner in which he gave his oracles, he was looked upon as the author of spectral appearances and terrifying sounds (Dionys. v. 16); and he is therefore described as a wanton and voluptuous god, dwelling in woods, and fond of nymphs. (Horat. l. c.) The way in which the god manifested himself seems to have given rise to the idea of a plurality of fauns (Fauni), who are described as monsters, half goat, and with horns. (Ov. Fast. v. 99, Heroid. iv. 49.) Faunus thus gradually came to be identified with the Arcadian Pan, and the Fauni as identical with the Greek satyrs, whence Ovid (Mel. vi. 392) uses the expression Fauni et Satyri fratres. As Faunus, and afterwards the Fauni, were believed to be particularly fond of frightening persons in various ways, it is not an improbable conjecture that Faunus may be a euphemistic name, and connected with faucus. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Röm. vol. ii. p. 183, &c.) [L. S.]

M. FAVONIUS is mentioned for the first time in a.c. 61, during the transactions against P. Clodius for having violated the sacra of the Bona Dea. On that occasion he joined Cato, whose sternness he imitated throughout life, in his attacks upon the consul Piso for defending Clodius, and displayed great zeal in the matter. The year after, he accused Metellus Scipio Nasica, probably of bribery. Cicero defended the accused, at which Favonius was somewhat offended. In the same year he sued, a second time, for the tribuneship, but he does not appear to have succeeded, for there is no evidence to prove that he was invested with that office, and Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus, who at the end of the year concluded their treaty, and were well aware that Favonius, although he was harmless, might yet be a very troublesome opponent, probably exerted their influence to prevent his gaining his end. About that time Pompey was suffering from a bad foot, and when he appeared in public with a white bandage round his leg, Favonius, in allusion to his aiming at the supremacy in the Roman republic, remarked that it was indifferent in what part of the body the royal diadem (bandage) was worn. It should be remarked that Favonius, although he belonged to the party of the Optimates, was yet a personal enemy of Pompey. In a.c. 59, when J. Caesar and Bibulus were consuls, Favonius is said to have been the last of all the senators that was prevailed upon to sanction the lex agraria of Caesar, and not until Cato himself had yielded. In a.c. 57, when Cicero proposed that Pompey should be entrusted with the superintendence of all the supplies of corn, Favonius was at the head of the opposition party, and became still more indignant at the conduct of the tribune Messius, who claimed almost unlimited power for Pompey. When Ptolemy Auletes, the exiled king of Egypt, had caused the murder of the ambassadors whom the Alexandrians had sent to Rome, Favonius openly charged him in the senate with the crime, and at the same time unmasked the disgraceful conduct of those Romans who had been bribed by the king. In the year following, when Pompey was publicly insulted during the trial of Milo, Favonius and other Optimates rejoiced in the senate at the affront thus offered to him. In the second consulship of Pompey and Crassus, in a.c. 55, the tribune Trebonius brought forward a bill that Spain and Syria should be given to the consuls for five years, and that Caesar's proconsulship of Gaul should be prolonged for the same period. Cato and Favonius opposed the bill, but it was carried by force and violence. In a.c. 54, Favonius, Cicero, Bibulus, and Calpidius spoke in favour of the freedom of the Tenedians. In the year following Favonius offered himself as a candidate for the aedileship, but was rejected. Cato, however, observed, that a gross deception had been practised in the voting, and, with the assistance of the tribunes, he caused a fresh election to be instituted, the result of which was that his friend was invested with the office. During the year of his aedileship, he left the administration of affairs and the celebration of the games to his friend Cato. Towards the end of the year, he was thrown into prison by the tribune, Q. Pompeius Rufus, for some offence, the nature of which is unknown; for according to Dion Cassius, Rufus imprisoned him merely that he might have a companion in disgrace, having himself been imprisoned a short time before; but some think, and with greater probability, that it was to deter Favonius from opposing the dictatorship of Pompey, which it was intended to propose. In a.c. 52, Cicero, in his defence of Milo, mentions Favonius as the person to whom Clodius was reported to have said, that Milo in three or four days would no longer be among the living. The condemnation of Milo, however, took place, notwithstanding the exertions to save him, in which Cato and Favonius probably took part. In 51 Favonius sued for the praetorship, but in vain; as, however, in 48 he is called praetorius, it is possible that he was candidate for the same office in the year 50 also, and that in 49 he was invested with it. In this year he and Cato opposed the proposal that a supplicatio should be decreed in honour of Cicero, who was well disposed towards both, and who appears to have been greatly irritated by this slight.

The civil war between Caesar and Pompey broke out during the praetorship of Favonius, who is said to have been the first to taunt Pompey by requesting him to call forth the legions by stamping his foot on the ground. He fled at first with the consuls and several senators to Capua, and was the only one who would not listen to any proposals for reconciliation between the two rivals; but notwithstanding his personal aversion to Pompey, he joined him and the Optimates, when they went over to Greece. In B. C. 48, we find him engaged in Macedonia, under Metellus Scipio, and during the latter's absence in Thessaly, Favonius, who was left behind on the river Halicmon with eight cohorts, was taken by surprise by Domitius Calpurnius, and was saved only by the speedy return of Metellus Scipio. Up to the last moment Favonius would not hear of any reconciliation. After the unfortunate issue of the battle of Pharsalus, Favonius, however, acted as a faithful friend towards Pompey: he accompanied him in his flight, and shewed him the greatest kindness and attention. After the death of Pompey, he returned to Italy, and was pardoned by J. Caesar, in whose supremacy he acquiesced, having gained the conviction that monarchy was better than civil war. For this reason the conspirators against the life of Caesar did not attempt to draw him into their plot; but after the murder was accomplished, he secretly joined the conspirators, and went with them to the Capitol. When Brutus and Cassius were obliged to leave Rome, he followed them, and was accordingly outlawed in B. C. 43, by the lex Pedia, as their accomplice. He was, however, a troublesome and importunate ally to the republicans, and in 42, when he presumed to influence Brutus and Cassius at their meeting at Sardis, Brutus thrust the intruder out of the house. In the battle of Philippi Favonius was taken prisoner, and on being led in chains before the conquerors, he respectfully addressed Antony, but indulged in bitter invectives against Octavianus, for having ordered several republicans to be put to death. The consequence was, as he might have expected, that he met with the same fate.

M. Favonius was not a man of strong character or principle: his sternness of manner and of conduct was mere affectation and imitation of Cato, in which he went so far as to receive and deserve the nickname of the ape of Cato. The motives for his actions, in all cases where we can trace them, were passion, personal animosity, and a desire to please Cato, the consideration of the public good having no share in them. His only honourable action is the conduct he showed towards Pompey after his defeat. He and L. Postumius are admirably characterised by the Pseudo-Sallust (ad Cæs. 2. p. 275, ed. Gerlach) as quasi magnæ navis supernæ onera. He seems to have had some talent as an orator, at least we know from Cicero that he spoke in public on several occasions, but no specimen of his oratory has come down to us (Cic. ad Att. i. 14, ii. 1, 4, vii. 1, 15, xv. 11, ad Q. Fr. ii. 3, 11, ad Fam. viii. 9, 11, pro Mil. 9, 16; Val. Max. vi. 2 § 7; Plut. Cat. Min. 32, 46, Pomp. 60, 67, Brut. 12, 34, Cæs. 41; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 7, xxxix. 14, 34, &c. xl. 45, xlv. 48, xlvii. 4; Cæs. B. C. iii. 36; Vell. Pat. ii. 53; Appian, B. C. ii. 119, &c.; Suet. Octav. 13). [L. S.]

FAVONIUS EULOGIUS. [EULOGIUS.]

FAVONIUS, a Latin orator, of whom nothing is known, except that Gellius (xv. 8) has preserved a fragment of one of his orations in support of a lex Licinia de sumptu minuendo. The question as to who this Favorinus, and what this Licinian law was, deserves some attention. A Roman senator of the name of Favorinus is altogether unknown, and hence critics have proposed to change the name in Gellius into Fannius, Augurius, or Favonius; but as all the MSS. agree in Favorinus, it would be arbitrary to make any such alteration, and we must acquiesce in what we learn from Gellius. As for the lex Licinia here spoken of, Macrobius (ii. 13), in enumerating the sumptuary laws, mentions one which was carried by P. Licinius Crassus Dives, and which is, in all probability, the one which was supported by Favorinus. The exact year in which this law was promulgated is uncertain; some assign it to the censorship of Licinius Crassus, B. C. 89, others to his consulship in B. C. 97, and others, again, to his tribuneship, B. C. 110, or his praetorship, B. C. 104. The poet Lucilius is known to have mentioned this law in his Satires; and as that poet died in B. C. 103, it is at any rate clear that the law must have been carried previous to the consulship of Licinius Crassus, i. e. previous to B. C. 97. (H. Meyer, Fragm. Orat. Rom. p. 207, &c., 2d edit.) [L. S.]

FAVORINUS. (Φαβορίνος.) 1. A philosopher and sophist of the time of the emperor Hadrian. He was a native of Arles, in the south of Gaul, and is said to have been born an Hermaphrodite or an eunuch. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. i. 8 § 1; Lucian, Bæuxot. 7; Gell. ii. 22.) On one occasion, however, a Roman of rank brought a charge of adultery against him. He appears to have visited Rome and Greece at an early age, and he acquired an intimate acquaintance of the Greek and Latin languages and literature. These attainments combined with great philosophical knowledge, very extensive learning, and considerable oratorical power, raised him to high distinctions both at Rome and in Greece. For a time he enjoyed the friendship and favour of the emperor Hadrian, but on one occasion he offended the emperor in a dispute with him, and fell into disgrace, whereupon the Athenians, to please the emperor, destroyed the bronze statue which they had previously erected to Favorinus. He used to boast of three things: that being a eunuch he had been charged with adultery, that although a native of Gaul he spoke and wrote Greek, and that he continued to live although he had offended the emperor. (Philostr. l. c.; Dion Cass. l. ix. 3; Spartian. Hadrian. 16.) Favorinus was connected by intimate friendship with Demetrius of Alexandria, Demetrius the Cynic, Cornelius Fronto, and especially with Plutarch, who dedicated to him his treatise on the principle of cold (περί τοῦ ψυχροῦ φύσεως), and among whose lost works we have mention of a letter on friendship, addressed to Favorinus. Herodes Atticus, who was likewise on intimate terms with him, looked up to him with great esteem, and Favorinus bequeathed to him his library and his house at Rome. Favorinus for some time resided in Asia Minor; and as he was highly honoured by the Ephesians, he excited the envy and hostility of Polemon, then the most famous sophist at Smyrna. The two sophists attacked each other in their declamations with great bitterness and animosity. The oratory of Favorinus was of a lively, and in his earlier years of a very passionate kind. He was very fond of displaying his learning in his speeches, and was always particularly anxious to please his audience. His extensive knowledge is further attested by his numerous works, and the variety of subjects on which he wrote. None of his works, however, has come down to us, unless we suppose with Emperius, the late editor of Dion Chrysostomus (in a dissertation de Oratione Corinthiaca falso Dioni Chrys. adscripta,

p. 10, &c. Brunsvig. 1832), that the oration on Corinth, commonly printed among those of Dion Chrysostomus, is the work of Favorinus. The following are the titles of the principal works ascribed to him: 1. Περὶ τῆς καταληπτικῆς φαντασίας, probably consisting of three books, which were dedicated respectively to Hadrian, Dryson, and Aristarchus. (Galen, vol. i. p. 6.) 2. Ἀλκιβιάδης. (Galen, iv. p. 367.) 3. A work addressed to Epictetus, which called forth a reply from Galen (iv. p. 367). 4. A work on Socrates, which was likewise attacked by Galen (iv. p. 368). 5. Πλούταρχος ἢ περὶ τῆς Ἀκαδημικῆς Διαθέσεως. (Galen, i. p. 6.) 6. Περὶ Πλάτωνος. (Suidas.) 7. Περὶ τῆς Ὀμήρου Φιλοσοφίας. (Suidas.) 8. Πυρρώνειοι Τρόποι, in ten books, seems to have been his principal work. (Philost. Vit. Soph. i. 8. § 4; Gell. xi. 5.) Favorinus in this work showed that the philosophy of Pyrrhon was useful to those who devoted themselves to pleading in the courts of justice. 9. Παρτοδοκίη Ἱστορία, consisting of at least eight books, probably contained historical, geographical, and other kinds of information. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 24, viii. 12, 47.) 10. Ἀπομνημονεύματα, of which the third book is quoted. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 40.) 11. Γνωμολογία. Philostratus (comp. Gell. xvii. 12) mentions several orations, but we have no means of judging of their merit. Besides the two principal sources, Philostratus and Suidas, see J. F. Gregor, Commentatio de Favorino, Laub. 1755, 4to; Foramann, Dissertatio de Favorino, Abo, 1789, 4to.

2. A follower of Aristotle and the peripatetic school, who is mentioned only by Plutarch (Sympos. vii. 10). He is otherwise unknown, but must at all events be distinguished from Favorinus, the friend of Herodes Atticus. [L. S.]

FAUSTA. Some very rare coins in third brass are extant bearing upon the obverse a female head, with the words FAUSTA N. F.; on the reverse a star within a wreath of laurel, and below the letters TSA. Who this Nobilissima Femina may have been is quite unknown. Some have imagined that she was the first wife of Constantine; but this and every other hypothesis hitherto proposed rests upon pure conjecture. Numismatologists seem to agree that the medal in question belongs to the age of Constantine, and it bears the clearest resemblance to that struck in honour of the Helena supposed to have been married to Crispus [HELENA]. (Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 118.) In 1823, the coin figured below was dug up near Douai. It differs in its details from that described by Eckhel, but evidently belongs to the same personage. [W. R.]

FAUSTA, CORNELIA, a daughter of the dictator L. Cornelius Sulla by his fourth wife, Caecilia Metella, and twin sister of Faustus Cornelius Sulla, was born not long before B. C. 88, the year in which Sulla obtained his first consulship; and she and her brother received the names of Fausta and Faustus respectively, on account of the good fortune of their father. Fausta was first married to C. Memmius, and probably at a very early age, as her son, C. Memmius, was one of the nobles who supplicated the judges on behalf of Scaurus in B. C. 54. After being divorced by her first husband, she married, towards the latter end of B. C. 55, T. Annius Milo, and accompanied him on his journey to Lanuvium, when Clodius was murdered, B. C. 52. (Plut. Sull. 34; Cic. ad Att. v. 8; Ascon. in Scaur. p. 29, in Milom. p. 33, ed. Orelli.)

Fausta was infamous for her adulteries, and the historian Sallust is said to have been one of her paramours, and to have received a severe flogging from Milo, when he was detected on one occasion in the house of the latter in the disguise of a slave. (Gell. xvii. 18; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 612.) The "Villius in Fausta Sullae gener" (Hor. Sat. i. 2. 64), who was another of her favourites, was probably the Sex. Villius who is mentioned by Cicero (ad Fam. ii. 6.) as a friend of Milo; and the names of two more of her gallants are handed down by Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 2) in a bon mot of her brother Faustus.

FAUSTA, FLAVIA MAXIMIANA, the daughter of Maximianus Herculius and Eutropia, was married in A. D. 307 to Constantine the Great, to whom she bore Constantine, Constantius, and Constans. She acquired great influence with her husband in consequence of having saved his life by revealing the treacherous schemes of her father, who, driven to despair by his failure, soon after died at Tarsus. But although, on this occasion at least, she appeared in the light of a devoted wife, she at the same time played the part of a most cruel stepmother, for, in consequence of her jealous machinations, Constantine was induced to put his son Crispus to death. When, however, the truth was brought to light by Helena, who grieved deeply for her grandchild, Fausta was shut up in a bath heated far above the common temperature, and was thus suffocated, probably in A. D. 326. Zosimus seems inclined to throw the whole blame in both instances on Constantine, whom he accuses as the hypocritical perpetrator of a double murder, while others assign the promiscuous profligacy of the empress as the true origin of her destruction, but in reality the time, the causes, and the manner of her death are involved in great obscurity in consequence of the vague and contradictory representations of our historical authorities. (CONSTANTINUS, p. 835; CRISPUS, p. 892; Zosim. ii. 10, 29; Julian, Orat. i; Auctor, de Mort. persae. 27; Eutrop. x. 2, 4; Victor. Epit. 40, 41; Philostorg. H. E. ii. 4; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. art. lrii. p. 224, and Notes sur Constantin, xvii; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 98.) [W. R.]

COIN OF FLAVIA MAXIMIANA FAUSTA.

FAUSTINA. 1. ANNIA GALERIA FAUSTINA, commonly distinguished as Faustina Senior, whose descent is given in the genealogical table prefixed to the life of M. AURELIUS, married Antoninus Pius, while he was yet in a private station, and, when he became emperor, in A. D. 138, received the title of Augusta. She did not, however, long enjoy her honour, for she died, A. D. 141, in the thirty-seventh year of her age. The profligacy of her life, and the honours with which she was loaded both before and after her decease, have been noticed under ANTONINUS PIUS. The medals bearing her name and effigy exceed, both in number and variety of types, those struck in honour of any other royal personage after death. One of these represents the temple dedicated to her memory in the Via Sacra, which still remains in a very perfect state. (Capitolin. Anton. Pius, 3, 5; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 37.)

2. ANNIA FAUSTINA, or Faustina Junior, was the daughter of the elder Faustina. During the life of Hadrian she was betrothed to the son of Aelius Caesar; but upon the accession of her father, Antoninus Pius, the match was broken off, in consequence of the extreme youth of L. Verus, and it was fixed that she should become the bride of M. Aurelius, although the marriage was not solemnized until A. D. 145 or 146. She died in a village on the skirts of Mount Taurus, in the year A. D. 175, having accompanied the emperor to Syria, when he visited the East for the purpose of restoring tranquillity after the rebellion of Avidius Cassius, which is said to have been excited by her intrigues [M. AURELIUS; AVIDIUS CASSIUS]. Her profligacy was so open and infamous, that the good nature or blindness of her husband, who cherished her fondly while alive, and loaded her with honours after her death, appear truly marvellous. (Dion Cass. lxxi. 10, 22, 29, 31; Capitolin. M. Aurel. 6, 19, 26; Eutrop. viii. 5; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 78.)

COIN OF FAUSTINA JUNIOR.

3. DOMITIA FAUSTINA, a daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 78.)

4. ANNIA FAUSTINA, a grand-daughter or great-grand-daughter of M. Aurelius, was the third of the numerous wives of Elagabalus. The marriage, COIN OF ANNIA FAUSTINA WIFE OF ELAGABALUS.

as we infer from medals, took place about A. D. 221, but a divorce must speedily have followed. (Dion Cass. lxxix. 5; Herodian, v. 14; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 261.)

5. MAXIMA FAUSTINA, the third wife of Constantius, whom he married at Antioch in A. D. 360, a short period before his death. She gave birth to a posthumous daughter, who received the name of Flavia Maxima Constantia, and was eventually united to the emperor Gratian. We know nothing with regard to the family of this Faustina, but she appears again in history along with her child, as one of the supporters of the rebel Procopius, who made good use of the presence of the youthful princess to inflame the zeal of his soldiers by re-kindling their enthusiasm for the glories of the house from which she sprung. (Ducange, Fam. Byz. p. 48, 59; Amm. Marc. xxi. 6. § 4, 15. § 6, xxvi. 7. § 10, 9. § 8.) [W. R.]

FAUSTINUS, a presbyter, who adhered to the sect established by the intemperate Lucifer of Cagliari, flourished towards the close of the fourth century. Of his personal history we know almost nothing, except in so far as it can be gleaned from three tracts which bear his name.

1. Faustini de Trinitate a. De Fide contra Arianos ad Flacillam Imperatricem Libri VII. This treatise, the subject of which is sufficiently explained by the title, has been erroneously ascribed to the Spanish bishop Gregorius. It is divided into seven books, or rather chapters, and must have been composed not later than A. D. 385, since Flacilla, the first wife of Theodosius, died in that year.

2. Faustini Fides Theodosio Imperatori oblata. A short Confession of Faith, written probably between the years 379-381, at which period Faustinus appears to have resided at Eleutheropolis.

3. Libellus Precum, presented to Valentinianus and Theodosius about A. D. 384. It contains a defence of the tenets of the Luciferians, craves the protection of the emperors, and is believed to have been the joint work of Faustinus and Marcellinus. Attached to it we find a Praefatio, from which we learn that the authors had twenty years before taken a most active part in favour of Ursinus against Damasus [DAMASUS], and had suffered much persecution in consequence. This introduction, which is extremely violent in its representations, appears not to have been drawn up until after the publication of the favourable rescript by Theodosius to the petitions of the Libellus.

The De Trinitate was first printed in the Orthodoxograph. of Heroldus, fol. Basil. 1555; the Libellus, by Sirmond (8vo. Paris, 1650, and Sirmond, Oper. vol. i. p. 230. fol. Paris, 1696), together with the rescript of Theodosius and ancient testimonies regarding the controversy between Damasus and Ursinus; the Fides by Queanel in the Canones et Constitut. Eccl. Rom., vol. ii. p. 138, 4to. Paris, 1675. The collected works of Faustinus will be found in the Bibl. Max. Patrum, Lugdun. 1677, vol. v. p. 637, and under their best form in the Bibl. Patrum of Galland, vol. viii. p. 441. (Gennadius, de Viris Ill. 11.) [W. R.]

FAUSTULUS, the royal shepherd of Amulius and husband of Acca Laurentia. He found Romulus and Remus as they were nursed by the she-wolf, and carried the twins to his wife to be brought up. (Liv. l. 5.) He was believed to have been killed, like Remus, by near relatives, while he was endeavouring to settle a dispute between them, and to have been buried in the forum near the rostra, were a stone figure of a lion marked his tomb. Others, however, believed that Romulus was buried there. (Festus, s. v. Niger Lapis; Dionys. i. 87; Hartung, Die Reliq. d. Röm. vol. ii. p. 190.) [L. S.]

FAUSTUS, a tragic poet of the time of Juvenal (vii. 12).

FAUSTUS, an African bishop of the Manicheans, who, according to St. Augustin, was a man of great natural shrewdness and persuasive eloquence, but altogether destitute of cultivation or learning. He published about A. D. 400 an attack upon the Catholic faith, a work known to us from the elaborate reply by the bishop of Hippo, Contra Faustum Manicheum," extending to thirty-five books, arranged in such a manner that the arguments of the heretic are first stated in his own words, and then confuted. (See vol. viii. of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustine.) [W. R.]

FAUSTUS, surnamed REGENSIUS (otherwise Regensis, or Regiensis) from the episcopal see over which he presided, was a native of Brittany, the contemporary and friend of Sidonius Apollinarius. Having passed his youth in the seclusion of a cloister, he succeeded Maximus, first as abbot of Lerina, afterwards in A. D. 472, as bishop of Riez, in Provence, and died about A. D. 490, or, according to Tillemont, some years later. For a considerable period he was regarded as the head of the Semipelagians [CASSIANUS], and, in consequence of the earnestness and success with which he advocated the doctrines of that sect, was stigmatised as a heretic by the Catholic followers of St. Augustin, while his zeal against the Arians excited the enmity of Euric, king of the Visigoths, by whom he was driven into exile about A. D. 481, and did not return until A. D. 484, after the death of his persecutor. Notwithstanding the heavy charges preferred against the orthodoxy of this prelate, it is certain that he enjoyed a wide reputation, and possessed great influence, while alive, and was worshipped as a saint after death, by the citizens of Riez, who erected a basilica to his memory, and long celebrated his festival on the 18th of January.

The works of Faustus have never been collected and edited with care, and hence the accounts given by different authorities vary considerably. The following list, if not absolutely complete, embraces every thing of importance:—

1. Professio Fidei, contra eos, qui per solum Dei Voluntatem alios dicunt ad Vitam aترahi, alios in Mortem deprimi. (Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun. 1677, vol. viii. p. 523.)

2. De Gratia Dei et Humanae Mentis libero Arbitrio Libri II. (Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun. vol. viii. p. 525.)

These two treatises, composed about A. D. 475, present a full and distinct development of the sentiments of the author with regard to original sin, predestination, free will, election, and grace, and demonstrate that his views corresponded closely with those entertained by Cassianus.

3. Responsio ad Objectu quaedam de Ratione Fidei Catholice; an essay, as the title implies, on some points connected with the Arian controversy. It is included in the collection of ancient French ecclesiastical writers published by P. Pithou, 4to. 1586.

4. Sermones Sex ad Monachos, together with an

Admonitio and exhortations, all addressed to the monks of Lerina, while he presided over their community. (Martene et Durand, Scriptor. et Monumentor. amplius Collectio, vol. ix. p. 142. fol. Paris, 1733; Broekie, Codes Regularum, &c. Append. p. 469, fol. Aug. Vind. 1759; Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun. 1677. vol. viii. p. 545, 547; Banage, Thesaurus Monumentor. &c. vol. i. p. 350. fol. Amst. 1725.)

5. Homilia de S. Marini Laudibus, erroneously included among the homilies ascribed to Eusebius Emesenus, who flourished under Constantius before the establishment of a monastery at Lerina. (Bibl. Magna Patr. Colon. Agripp. fol. 1618, vol. v. p. 1. No. 12.)

6. Epistolae. Nineteen are to be found in the third part of the fifth volume of the Bibl. Mag. Patr. Colon. Agripp. fol. 1618, and the most interesting are contained in Bibl. Max. Patr. Lugdun. vol. viii. p. 524, 548—554. See also Banage, Thes. Mon. vol. i. p. 343. These letters are addressed to different persons, and treat of various points connected with speculative theology, and the heresies prevalent at that epoch. (Sidon. Apollin. Carm. Euchar. ad Faustum; Gennad. de Viris Ill. 85; Baronius, Annal. vol. vi. ad ann. 490; Tillemont, vol. xvi. p. 433; Wiggers, de Joanne Cassiano, &c. Rostoch. 1824, 1825, and other historians of semipelagianism enumerated at the end of the article CASSIANUS.) [W. R.]

FAUSTUS, A'NNIUS, a man of equestrian rank, and one of the informers (delatores) in the reign of Nero, was condemned by the senate in A. D. 69, on the accusation of Vibius Crispus. (Tac. Hist. ii. 10.)

FEBRIS, the goddess of fever, or rather the averter of fever. She had three sanctuaries at Rome, the most ancient and celebrated of which was on the Palatine; the second was on the arx, which was adorned with the monuments of Marius, and the third in the upper part of the vicus longus. In these sanctuaries amulets were dedicated which people had worn during a fever. (Val. Max. ii. 5. § 6; Cic. de Leg. ii. 11; de Nat. Deor. iii. 25; Aelian, V. H. xii. 11). The worship of this divinity at Rome is sufficiently accounted for by the fact, that in ancient times the place was visited by fevers as much as at the present day. [L. S.]

FE'BRUUS, an ancient Italian divinity, to whom the month of February was sacred, for in the latter half of that month great and general purifications and lustrations were celebrated, which were at the same time considered to produce fertility among men as well as beasts. Hence the month of February was also sacred to Juno, the goddess of marriage, and she was therefore surnamed Februata, or Februtis. (Fest. s. v. Februaris; Arnob. iii. 30.) The name Februus is connected with februare (to purify), and februus (purifications). (Varro, de L. L. vi. 13; Ov. Fast. ii. 31, &c.) Another feature in the character of this god, which is however intimately connected with the idea of purification, is, that he was also regarded as a god of the lower world, for the festival of the dead (Feralia) was likewise celebrated in February (Macrob. Sat. i. 4, 13; Ov. Fast. ii. 535, &c.); and Anysius (ap. J. Lydum, de Mens. i. p. 68) states, that Februus in Etruscan signified the god of the lower world (καταχθόνιος). Hence Februus was identified with Pluto. When the expiatory sacrifices were burnt, the people threw the ashes backwards over their heads into the water. (Serr. ad Virg. Georg. i. 43; Isidor. Orig. v. 33; Voss. in Virg. Ecol. viii. 101.) [L. S.]

FELICITAS, the personification of happiness, to whom a temple was erected by Lucullus in a. c. 75, which, however, was burnt down in the reign of Claudius. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 8; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, iv. 18, 23; comp. Cic. in Verr. iv. 2, 57.) Felicitas is frequently seen on Roman medals, in the form of a matron, with the staff of Mercury (caduceus) and a cornucopia. Sometimes also she has other attributes, according to the kind of happiness she represents. (Lindner, de Felicitate Dea ex Numis illustrata, Arnstadt, 1770; Rasche, Les Num. ii. 1, p. 956.) The Greeks worshipped the same personification, under the name of Eudæia, who is frequently represented in works of art. [L. S.]

FELIX, an agnomen, having, like Magnus and Augustus, a personal rather than a general or family import. (Senec. De Clement. 14.) It was given to the dictator Sulla, and became a frequent addition to the imperial titles, being probably borrowed from the formula "felix faustum." [W. B. D.]

FELIX, ANTONIUS, procurator of Judæa, was a brother of the freedman Pallas, and was himself a freedman of the emperor Claudius I. Seizus (α. ε. Κλαύδιος) calls him Claudius Felix; and it is probable that he was known by his patron's name as well as by that which marked his relation to the empress's mother, Antonia, by whom he may have been manumitted. The date of his appointment by Claudius to the government of Judæa is uncertain. It would seem from the account of Tacitus (Ann. xii. 54), that he and Ventidius Cumanus were for some time joint procurators, Galilee being held by Cumanus, and Samaria by Felix; that both of them connived at the acts of violence and robbery mutually committed by their respective subjects, and enriched themselves by the spoils which each party brought back from their incursions; that Quadratus, who commanded in Syria, was commissioned to take cognizance of these proceedings, and to try both the provincials and their governors; and that, while he condemned Cumanus, he saved Felix by placing him openly among the judges and thus deterring his accusers. But, if we follow Josephus, we must believe that Cumanus was sole procurator during the disturbances in question, and that, when he was condemned and deposed, Felix was sent from Rome as his successor, probably about a. d. 51, and with an authority extending over Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, and Petæa (Joseph. Ant. xx. 3-7, Bell. Jud. ii. 12; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 19; Voss. ad loc.). In his private and his public character alike Felix was unscrupulous and profligate, and he is unjustly described in the killing words of Tacitus (Hist. v. 9), "per omnem sævitiam et Ethnicum jus regium servili ingenio exercuit." Having fallen in love with Drusilla, daughter of Agrippa I., and wife of Azizus, king of Emesa, he induced her to leave her husband; and she was still living with him in a. d. 60, when St. Paul preached before him "of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come." (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7. § 2; Act. xxiv. 25.) Jonathan, the high priest, having become obnoxious to him by unpalatable advice, he procured his assassination. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 8. § 5, Bell. Jud. ii. 13. § 3; Euseb.

Hist. Eccl. ii. 20.) His government, however, though cruel and oppressive, was strong. Disturbances were vigorously suppressed, the country was cleared of the robbers who infested it, and the seditions raised by the false prophets and other impostors, who availed themselves of the fanaticism of the people, were effectually quelled. (Joseph. Ant. xx. 8, Bell. Jud. ii. 13; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 21; comp. Act. xxi. 38, xxiv. 2.) He was recalled in a. d. 62, and succeeded by Porcius Festus; and the chief Jews of Caesarea (the seat of his government) having lodged accusations against him at Rome, he was saved from condign punishment only by the influence of his brother Pallas with Nero (Joseph. Ant. xx. 8. § 9; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 22; Act. xxiv. 27). For the account which Tacitus (Hist. v. 9) gives of his marriage with one Drusilla, clearly a different person from the Jewess already mentioned, and a grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, see Vol. I. p. 1075, b, and comp. Cassaub. ad Sueton. Claud. 28. [E. E.]

FELIX, BULLA, a celebrated robber chief, who, having collected a band of 600 followers, ravaged Italy for the space of two years, during the reign of Septimius Severus, setting at defiance all the efforts of the imperial officers to effect his capture, till at length he was betrayed by a mistress, taken prisoner, and thrown to wild beasts. Dion Cassius (lxxvi. 21) has preserved several curious anecdotes of his exploits, which were characterized by a combination of reckless daring and consummate prudence. [W. R.]

FELIX, CA'SSIUS. [CASSIUS IATROPHYSTA.]

FELIX CLAU'DIUS. [FELIX, ANTONIUS.]

FELIX, FLA'VIUS, an African who flourished towards the close of the fifth century, the author of five short pieces in the Latin Anthology. Of these the first four celebrate the magnificence and utility of the "Thermae Alianae," constructed in the vicinity of Carthage by King Thrasimund, within the space of a single year; the fifth is a whining petition for an ecclesiastical appointment, addressed to Victorianus, the chief secretary of the Vandal monarch. (Anthol. Lat. iii. 34-37, vi. 86, ed. Burmann, or n. 291-295, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

FELIX, LAELIUS. A jurist, named Laelius, flourished in the time of Hadrian; for it appears from a fragment of Paulus, in Dig. 5. tit. 4. s. 3, that Laelius, in one of his works, mentions having seen in the palace a free woman, who was brought from Alexandria, in Egypt, in order to be exhibited to Hadrian, with five children, four of whom were brought into the world at one birth, and the fifth forty days afterwards. Gaius (Dig. 34. tit. 5. s. 7) tells the same story, without mentioning the interval of forty days; and we find from him that the name of the woman was Serapia. (Compare also Julianus, in Dig. 46. tit. 3. s. 36; Capitolin. Anton. Pius, 9; Phlegon, de Rebus Mirab. 29.) Indeed, the learned Ant. Augustinus, without sufficient reason, suspects that Gaius was no other than Laelius, designated by his prænomen. Laelius is cited by Paulus in another passage (Dig. 5. tit. 3. s. 45), which also relates to the law of hereditas.

The Laelius of the Digest is, by most writers upon the subject (e. g. Guil. Grotius, Heineccius, and Bach), identified with Laelius Felix, who wrote notes upon Q. Mucius Scaevola (librum ad Q. Mucium), from which Gellius (xv. 27) makes some interesting extracts, explaining the distinctions between the different kinds of comitia. In this work Felix cites Labeo. Zimmer (R. R. G. i. § 89), after Conradi and Bynkershoek, moved by the archaic style of the extracts in Gellius, thinks it not improbable that the Laelius Felix of that author was more ancient than the Laelius of the Digest, and that he may even be the same person with the preceptor of Varro. If this be the case, the Labeo he cites must be Q. Antistius Labeo, the father. The preceptor of Varro, however, who is stated by Gellius (xvi. 8) to have written an essay on oratorical introductions (Commentarium de Proloquiis), is, according to a different reading, not Laelius, but L. Aelius, and was perhaps the grammarian, L. Aelius Stilo. In Pliny (H. N. xiv. 13) it is doubtful whether the name mentioned in connection with Scaevola and Capito should be read Laelius, or L. Aelius. (Dirksen, Bruchstücke aus den Schriften der Römischen Juristen, p. 101; Maianusius, ad XXX. Idorum Fragm. Comment. vol. ii. p. 208—217.) [J. T. G.]

FELIX MAGNUS, a fellow-student and correspondent of Sidonius Apollinaris, and consequently lived between A. D. 430—480. Felix was of the family of the Philagii (Sidon. Propempt. ad Libell. 90, Ep. ii. 3), and was raised to the rank of patrician (Ep. ii. 5). The letters of Sidonius to Felix are curiously illustrative of the distress and dismemberment of the Roman provinces north of the Alps in the fifth century, A. D.

A poem (Carm. ix.) and five letters (ii. 3, iii. 4, 7, iv. 5, 10) are addressed by Sidonius to Felix. [W. B. D.]

FELIX, M. MINUCIUS, a distinguished Roman lawyer, the author of a dialogue entitled Octavius, which occupies a conspicuous place among the early Apologies for Christianity. The speakers are Caecilius Natalis, a Pagan, and Octavius Januarius, a true believer, who, while rambling along the shore near Ostia during the holidays of the vintage with their common friend Minucius, are led into a discussion in consequence of an act of homage paid by Caecilius to a statue of Serapis, a proceeding which calls forth severe, although indirect animadversions from Octavius. Irritated by these remarks, Caecilius commences a lengthened discourse, in which he combines a formal defence of his own practice with an attack upon the principles of his companion. His arguments are of a twofold character. On the one hand he assails revealed religion in general, and on the other the Christian religion specially. Octavius replies to all his objections with great force and eloquence; and when he concludes, Caecilius, feeling himself defeated, freely acknowledges his errors, and declares himself a convert to the truth.

The tone of this production is throughout earnest and impressive; the arguments are well selected, and stated with precision; the style is for the most part terse and pregnant, and the diction is extremely pure; but it frequently wears the aspect of a cento in which a number of choice phrases have been culled from various sources. There is, moreover, occasionally a want of simplicity, and some of the sentiments are expressed in language which borders upon declamatory inflation. But these blemishes are not so numerous as to affect seriously our favourable estimate of the work as a whole, which, in the opinion of many, entitles the author to rank not much below Lactantius. Its value in a theological point of view is not very great, since the various topics are touched upon lightly, the end in view being evidently to furnish a ready reply to the most common popular objections. The censure of Dupin, who imagined that he could detect a tendency to materialism, seems to have been founded upon a misapprehension of the real import of the passages whose orthodoxy he impugns.

It is remarkable that the Octavius was for a long period believed to belong to Arnobius, and was printed repeatedly as the eighth book of his treatise Adversus Gentes, notwithstanding the express testimony of St. Jerome, whose words (de Viris Ill. 58) are so clear as to leave no room for hesitation.

The time, however, at which Minucius Felix lived is very uncertain. By some he is placed as early as the reign of M. Aurelius; by some as low as Diocletian; while others have fixed upon various points intermediate between these two extremes. The critics who, with Van Hoven, carry him back as far as the middle of the second century, rest their opinion chiefly on the purity of his diction, upon the indications afforded by allusions to the state of the Church, both as to its internal constitution, and to the attention which it attracted from without, upon the strong resemblance which the piece bears to those Apologies which confessedly belong to the period in question, and upon the probability that the Fronto twice named in the course of the colloquy is the same with the rhetorician, M. Cornelius Fronto, so celebrated under the Antonines. But this position, although defended with great learning, can scarcely be maintained against the positive evidence afforded by St. Jerome, who, in his account of illustrious men, where the individuals mentioned succeed each other in regular chronological order, sets down Minucius Felix after Tertullian and before Cyprian, an arrangement confirmed by a paragraph in the Epistola ad Magnum, and not contradicted by another in the Apologia ad Pamphilius, where Tertullian, Cyprian, and Felix, are grouped together in the same clause. The circumstance that certain sentences in the Octavius and in the De Idolorum Vanitate are word for word the same, although it proves that one writer copied from the other, leads to no inference as to which was the original. We may therefore acquiesce in the conclusion that our author flourished about A. D. 230. That he was a lawyer, and attained to eminence in pleading, is distinctly asserted both by St. Jerome and Lactantius; but beyond this we know nothing of his personal history, except in so far as we are led by his own words to believe that he was by birth a Gentile, and that his conversion did not take place until he had attained to manhood. We are further told (Hieron. l. c.) that a book entitled De Fato, or Contra Mathematicos, was circulated under his name, but that, although evidently the work of an accomplished man, it was so different in style and general character from the Octavius, that they could scarcely have proceeded from the same pen.

It has already been remarked that this dialogue was long supposed to form a part of the treatise of Arnobius, Adversus Gentes. It was first assigned to its rightful owner, and printed in an independent form, by Balduinus (Heidelberg. 1560), who prefixed a dissertation, in which he proved his point so indisputably, that we are surprised that such an error should have escaped the keen eyes of Erasmus and other great scholars. Since that time a vast number of editions have been published, a full account of which will be found in Fasciua, Schönemann, and Bähr. For general purposes, that of Jac. Gronovius (8vo. Lug. Bat. 1707) forming one of the series of Variorum Classicarum; that of Lindner (8vo. Longosal. 1760) reprinted, with a preface by Ernesti (ibid. 1773); and that of Muralto, with a preface, by Orelli (8vo. Turic. 1836), will be found the most useful. The German translations by J. G. Russwurm (4to. Hamb. 1824), and by J. H. B. Lückert (8vo. Leip. 1836), may be consulted with advantage.

In illustration, we may read the essay of Balduinus, which is appended to the edition of Gronovius; J. D. Van Hoven, Epistola ad Gerh. Meermann, 4to. Camp. 1766, reprinted in Lindner's edition of 1773; H. Meier, Comment. de Missio Polio (8vo. Turic. 1824); and the remarks prefixed to the translation of Russwurm. FELIX, SEXTILIUS, was stationed, A.D. 70, on the frontiers of Raetia by Antonius Primus to watch the movements of Porcius Septiminius, procurator of that province under Vitellius. Felix remained in Raetia until the following year, when he assisted in quelling an insurrection of the Treviri. (Tac. Hist. iii. 5, iv. 70.) [W. B. D.]

FENESTELLA, a Roman historian, of considerable celebrity, who flourished during the reign of Augustus, and died, according to the Eusebian Chronicle, A.D. 21, in the 70th year of his age. His great work, entitled Annales, frequently quoted by Aconius, Pliny, A. Gellius, and others, extended to at least twenty-two books, as appears from a reference in Nonius, and seems to have contained very minute, but not always perfectly accurate, information with regard to the internal affairs of the city. The few fragments preserved relate almost exclusively to events subsequent to the Carthaginian wars; but whether the narrative reached from the foundation of Rome to the downfall of the republic, or comprehended only a portion of that space, we have no means of determining. We are certain, however, that it embraced the greater part of Cicero's career. In addition to the Annales, we find a citation in Diomedes from "Fenestellam in libro Epitomarum secundo," of which no other record remains; and St. Jerome speaks of Cormina as well as histories; but the Archidia, ascribed in some editions of Fulgentius to Fenestella, must belong, if such a work ever existed, to some writer of a much later epoch.

A treatise, De Sacerdotiis et Magistratibus Romanorum Libri II., published at Vienna in 1510, under the name of Fenestella, and often reprinted, is, in reality, the production of a certain Andrea Domenico Fiochi, a Florentine jurist of the fourteenth century. (Plin. H. N. viii. 7, ix. 17, xx. 1, xxx. 11; Senec. Epist. 108; Suet. Vit. Terent.; Gell. xv. 28; Lactant. de Falsa Rel.

FENIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

FERETRIUS, a surname of Jupiter, which is probably derived from ferire, to strike; for persons who took an oath called upon Jupiter, if they swore falsely, to strike them as they struck the victim they sacrificed to him. (Fest. s. v. Lapidem Silicem.) Others derived it from ferre, because he was the giver of peace, or because people dedicated (ferabant) to him spolia opima. (Fest. s. v. Feretrius; Liv. i. 10; Propert. iv. 10. 46; comp. JUPITER.) [L. S.]

FERONIA, an ancient Italian divinity, who originally belonged to the Sabines and Faliscans, and was introduced by them among the Romans. Greek writers, as usual, describe her as of Greek origin. Dionysius (ii. 49) thus relates, that the Lacedaemonians who emigrated at the time of Lycurgus, after long wanderings (φειόμενοι), at length landed in Italy, where they founded a town Feronia, and built a temple to the goddess Feronia. But, however this may be, it is extremely difficult to form a definite notion of the nature of this goddess. Some consider her to have been the goddess of liberty, because at Terracina slaves were emancipated in her temple (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 465), and because on one occasion the freedmen at Rome collected a sum of money for the purpose of offering it to her as a donation. (Liv. xxii. 1.) Others look upon her as the goddess of commerce and traffic, because these things were carried on to a great extent during the festival which was celebrated in honour of her in the town of Feronia, at the foot of mount Soracte. But commerce was carried on at all festivals at which many people met, and must be looked upon as a natural result of such meetings rather than as their cause. (Dionys. iii. 32; Strab. v. p. 226; Liv. xxvi. 11, xviii. 4; Sil. Ital. xiii. 84.) Others again regard her as a goddess of the earth or the lower world, and as akin to Mania and Tellus, partly because she is said to have given to her son three souls, so that Evander had to kill him thrice before he was dead (Virg. Aen. iii. 564), and partly on account of her connection with Soranus, whose worship strongly resembled that of Feronia. [SORANUS.] Besides the sanctuaries at Terracina and near mount Soracte, she had others at Trebula, in the country of the Sabines, and at Luna in Etruria. (Comp. Serv. ad Aen. xi. 785; Varro, de L. L. v. 74; Müller, die Etrusker, vol. i. p. 802, vol. ii. p. 65, &c.) [L. S.]

FEROX, JULIUS. [FEROX, URSEIUS.]

FEROX, URSEIUS, a Roman jurist, who probably flourished between the time of Tiberius and Vespasian, and ought not to be confounded (as Panziroli has done, De claris Interpr. Juris. 38) with the Julius Ferox who was consul, A. D. 100, in the reign of Trajan (Plin. Ep. ii. 11, vii. 13), and who is mentioned in an ancient inscription (Gruter, vol. i. p. 349) as curator alvei et riparum Tiberis et cloacarum. The jurist Ferox was certainly anterior to the jurist Julianus, who, according to the Florentine Index to the Digest, wrote four books upon Urseus. In the Collatio Legum Mosaricarum et Romanarum (xi. 7), inserted in the collections of Antejustinian law, is an extract from Ulpian, citing a tenth book of Urseus; but what was the precise subject of his works has not been recorded, although it might perhaps be collected from an attentive examination of the extracts from Julianus ad Urseum, in the Digest. In Dig. 9. tit. 2. s. 27. § 1, Urseus is quoted by Ulpian as reporting an opinion of Proculus (et ita Proculus existimasse Urseus refert), and hence it has been inferred that Urseus was a Proculian. In a fragment of Paulus (Dig. 39. tit. 3. s. 11. § 2) occurs the controverted expression, apud Feroem Proculus ait. Conversely, in Dig. 44. tit. 5. s. 1. § 10, Cassius (i. e. C. Cassius Longinus) is quoted by Ulpian as reporting an opinion of Urseus (et Cassius existimasse Urseum refert); and, in Dig. 7. tit. 4. s. 10. § 5, again occurs, in a fragment of Ulpian, the controverted expression, Cassius apud Urseum scribit. Does the expression, apud Feroem Proculus ait, mean that Proculus is represented by Ferox as saying what follows, or does it mean that Proculus, in his notes upon Ferox, says? Is it parallel to the expression, in the mouth of an English lawyer, Littleton says, in Coke? or to the expression, Coke on Littleton, says? The former interpretation seems more probable, if we merely consider that in Dig. 9. tit. 2. s. 27. § 1, Urseus is represented as quoting Proculus, for the latter interpretation would require us to suppose that each cited the other, and it is not thought likely that a senior and more distinguished jurist would cite or comment upon a junior contemporary. But this argument is reversed in the case of Urseus and Cassius. If we admit that Cassius cites Urseus, according to the present reading in Dig. 7. tit. 4. s. 10. § 5, it seems natural to interpret Cassius apud Urseum scribit, as showing that Cassius wrote upon Urseus. There is less improbability that Cassius should have written upon Urseus than that Proculus should have done so, for Cassius was probably younger than Proculus, and, though older than Urseus, he may have thought fit to criticise the writings of a young follower of the opposite school. What are we to conclude? Are the expressions Cassius apud Urseum scribit, and apud Feroem Proculus ait, to be understood in different senses,—meaning in the first that Cassius annotated Ferox,—in the second, that Ferox annotated Proculus? Is it not more natural to suppose that Ferox annotated both, especially if there be independent grounds for supposing that he was later than both, and cited both in his writings? To this hypothesis the chief objection seems to be the passage in Dig. 44. tit. 5. s. 1. § 10; but such difficulty, if it were of importance, ought to be got over by altering the reading (in accordance with the more usual Latin order of object and subject) to “et Cassius existimasse Urseus refert.” By this simple change, we get rid of any supposition as to two jurists citing each other, and are able to suppose Ferox to have been the annotator and citer both of Proculus and Cassius. This is likely on independent grounds. In Dig. 30. s. 104, there is an extract from the work of Julianus upon Urseus Ferox, in which, apparently in the text of Urseus commented upon by Julianus, is given a responsum of Cassius. It is also by Urseus that Cassius seems to be cited in Dig. 23. tit. 3. s. 48. § 1, taken from the same work of Julianus, for the part of this extract which contains the note of Julianus follows the mention of Cassius. Again, in Dig. 23. tit. 3. s. 48. § 1 (from Julianus in libro 2, ad Urseum Feroem), Proculus is mentioned in that part of the extract which appears to be the text upon which Julianus comments. To this it may be answered, but without much plausibility, that Julianus took Urseus with the notes of Cassius and Proculus as the subject of his commentary.

It is singular that the meaning of the word apud in such connection, if it be not used in different meanings,—important though it appears to be at first view, for the sake of legal biography and chronology, to determine what that meaning is,—is still a matter of undecided controversy. On the one hand we have in an extract from Paulus (Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 65. § 8), Servius apud Alfenum notat; in another extract from Paulus (Dig. 50. tit. 16. s. 77), Servius apud Alfenum putat; and, in an extract from Marcellus (Dig. 46. tit. 3. s. 67), apud Alfenum Servius respondet. In these cases Servius, Cicero's contemporary, who was the preceptor of Alfenus Varus (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44), can scarcely be understood as commenting upon his junior. So we have Servius apud Melam scribit, in an extract from Ulpian (Dig. 33. tit. 9. s. 3. § 10). Now Mela, though he may have been born before Servius died, was probably a generation later than Servius. On the other hand, we have (Ulpian in Dig. 7. tit. 1. s. 17. § 1) Aristo apud Cassium notat. Now Cassius was an elder contemporary of Aristo, who seems to have been a pupil of Cassius (Dig. 4. tit. 8. s. 40), and to report his responsa (Dig. 17. tit. 2. s. 29. § 2), and we have evidence that Aristo wrote notes on Cassius. (Ulpian in Dig. 7. tit. 1. s. 7. § 3.) If the priority of date be allowed to determine the sense of apud, the expression Cassius apud Vitellium notat (Ulpian in Dig. 33. tit. 9. s. 3. pr.) would indicate that Cassius wrote notes upon Vitellius, for Vitellius was probably rather older than Cassius, having been commented upon by Masurius Sabinus, a contemporary of Tiberius. If it were not for the objection that Africanus was probably a junior contemporary of Julianus, the much controverted passage (Ulpian in Dig. 30. s. 39. pr.) Africanus, in libro 20. Epistolarum, apud Julianum quaerit, putatque, &c. might be interpreted to imply that a work of Julian contained an extract from the 20th book of the Epistles of Africanus, in which Africanus proposes a question and gives an opinion upon it. (See, for other interpretations of this passage, the article AFRICANUS.) The expressions Scaevola apud Julianum lib. 22. Digestorum notat (Dig. 2. tit. 14. s. 54), and in libro septimo Digestorum Juliani Scaevola notat (Ulpian in Dig. 18. tit. 6. s. 10), have been generally thought to indicate that Cervidius Scaevola commented upon Julianus, although this interpretation would seem to require in librum septimum, instead of in libro septimo. With similar ambiguity we read Scaevola apud Marcellum notat (Ulpian in Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 11. § 6). In Dig. 35. tit. 2. s. 56. § 2, is a fragment which purports to be an extract from Marcellus, and contains a note of Scaevola. Is the extract given as it appeared in the original work of Marcellus, or is it taken from an edition of Marcellus, to the original text of which were subsequently appended notes by Scaevola? From § 82 of the Fragmenta Vaticana, it is difficult to avoid concluding that the notes of Scaevola were written upon the text of Marcellus, instead of supposing that the text of Marcellus consists of cases with the remarks of Scaevola. What else can we conclude from the expressions Julianus lib. xxx. Dig. scribit,

These difficulties have induced some legal biographers (Ménage, Amoen. Jur. c. 43; Otto, Theor. Jur. Rom. 1614-5; Guil. Grotius, De Vitiis Juris ii. 4. § 4) to suppose that the word apud is used inconstantly, sometimes governing the name of the commentator, and sometimes the name of the writer who is the subject of commentary. In the present case, we believe that Urseius Ferox was junior to Cassius and Proculus, and that he commented upon them in independent works of his own, which were not considered as their works with his commentaries. We think it unlikely that Cassius, his senior, cited Ferox, and therefore are disposed to adopt the altered reading of Dig. 44. tit. 5. a. l. § 10, which we have already mentioned, and which was first suggested by Guil. Grotius, although we do not regard the alteration as absolutely necessary. The only general conclusion we are able to arrive at, from a comparison of the passages we have cited, is, that from such an expression as apud Feroceum Proculus ait, it is impossible to draw any certain inference as to the relative date of Ferox and Proculus. We think, nevertheless, that the word apud in such connection is used constantly in the same sense,—that the writer whose name it governs is in conception the principal, and the other the subordinate. Thus Proculus apud Feroceum ait means that the saying of Proculus was contained in the work of Ferox;—whether the saying were contained in the text or in the notes;—if in the text,—whether it were in the original text, or in the received text as altered by some subsequent editor;—if contained in the notes,—whether those notes were expressly written upon the text, or were composed of illustrative extracts from prior or subsequent authors appended to the text. In general, apud seems to govern the name of a writer whose work has been illustrated by notes. In the majority of cases, as in the case of Aristo apud Cassium, the notes seem to have been expressly written upon the work of the author whose name is governed by apud; but sometimes, as in the case of Servius apud Melam, it seems that extracts from the writings of a preceding author are either contained in the original text, or have been appended as notes by a subsequent editor. While, then, Servius apud Melam means Servius in Mela, in like manner, Aristo apud Cassium is a citation of Aristo from a work, which, though it contain matter in addition to the text of Cassius, would, upon the whole, be thought of as the work of Cassius. Our supposition that apud governs the name of the author who is in conception the principal, is confirmed by an instance where it may be doubted which author is the principal, and where, accordingly, a variety of expressions occurs. Julianus composed a treatise which was compiled from certain books of Minicius, with observations of his own, as we learn from the inscription of the extract in Dig. 6. tit. 1. s. 59, which is headed Julianus, lib. 6. ex Minicio. This may be compared with the fuller expression of Gaius (ii. 188), in his libris, quos ex Q. Mucio fecimus. The work so compiled might easily be thought of, either as the work of Julianus, or as the work of Minicius. In the first case it might be cited, as in Dig. 2. tit. 14. s. 56, where we read Julianus lib. 6 ex Minicio; in the second case, Julianus might be cited as from Minicius, as in Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 11. § 15, where we find Julianus lib. 10 apud Minicium ait.

The foregoing explanation, which is believed to be new, appears to remove some difficulties which have hitherto perplexed legal biographers. [J. T. G.]

FESTIVUS, AURELIANUS, a freedman of the emperor Aurelian, wrote a history of the emperor Firmus, in which he detailed at great length all the silly and extravagant doings of the latter. (Vopisc. Firm. 6.)

FESTUS, a favourite freedman and remembrancer (τῆς βασιλείας μνηστὴς προστάτης) of Caracalla, by whom he was buried in the Troad, with all the ceremonies observed at the obsequies of Patroclus. According to Herodian, a report was current that he had been poisoned by the Emperor, who, being seized with the fancy of imitating Achilles, and being at a loss for a dead friend whose fate he might mourn, after the fashion of the hero, had recourse to this method of supplying the deficiency. Festus, the chamberlain of Caracalla, must have been a different personage, since he is represented by Dion Cassius as alive under Maximinus, and as taking an active part in the proceedings for setting up Elagabalus. (Herodian. iv. 14; Dion Cass. lxxviii. 33.) [W. R.]

FESTUS, ANICIUS, was entrusted by Maximinus with the command of Asia, after the disgrace of Asper. Festus had been, on former occasions, passed over by Severus in the allotment of provinces. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 22.) [W. R.]

FESTUS, PESCENNIUS, a senator, put to death without trial by the emperor Severus, A. D. 196—7, after his victory over Albinus. (Spartian. Severus, 13; comp. Dion Cass. lxxv. 8; Herodian. iii. p. 115.) An historian of this name is mentioned by Lactantius (Instit. i. 21), in speaking of the human sacrifices practised at Carthage. Lactantius calls the history of Festus Satura, i. e. a miscellany. [W. B. D.]

FESTUS, SEXT. POMPEIUS, a lexicographer of uncertain date. He certainly lived after Martial, whom he quoted (s. v. Vespas), and before Macrobius, who refers to him more than once (Sat. iii. 3, 5, comp. 8.). From his remarks upon the word supparus we conclude that he must have belonged to an epoch when the ceremonies of the Christian religion were familiar to ordinary readers, but Saxe has no authority for fixing him down to the close of the fourth century (Onomast. A. D. 398). The name of Festus is attached to a dictionary or glossary of remarkable Latin words and phrases, which is divided into twenty books, and commonly bears the title Sexti Pompeii Festi de Verborum Significatione. This is a compilation of the highest value, containing a rich treasure of learning upon many obscure points, connected with antiquities, mythology, and grammar; but before we can make use of it with safety it is necessary that we should understand the history of the work, and be made acquainted with the various constituents of which it is composed.

M. Verrius Flaccus, a celebrated grammarian, in the reign of Augustus [FLACCUS VERRIUS], was the author of a very voluminous treatise, De Significatione Verborum. This was compressed into a much smaller compass by Festus, who made a few alterations (e. g. s. v. monstrum) and criticisms (e. g. Pictor Zeuxis) of his own, inserted numerous extracts from other writings of Verrius, such as the De Obscuris

Catonis; De Plauti Calculis; De Jure Sacro et Augurali, and others; but altogether omitted those words which had fallen into disuse (intermortua et sepulta), intending to make these the subject of a separate volume Priscorum Verborum cum Exemplis (see s. v. porriciam). Finally, towards the end of the eighth century, Paul, son of Warnefrid, better known as Paulus Diaconus, from having officiated as a deacon of the church at Aquileia, abridged the abridgment of Festus, dedicating his production to Charlemagne, after that prince had dethroned Desiderius, the last king of the Lombards, whom Paul had served as chancellor.

The original work of Verrius Flaccus has altogether perished with the exception of one or two inconsiderable fragments. Of the abstract by Festus one imperfect MS. only has come down to us. It was brought, we are told, from Illyria, and fell into the hands of Pomponius Laetus, a celebrated scholar of the fifteenth century, who for some reason now unknown kept possession of a few leaves when he transferred the remainder to a certain Manilius Rallus, in whose hands they were seen in 1485 by Politian, who copied the whole together with the pages retained by Pomponius Laetus. This MS. of Rallus found its way eventually into the Farnese library at Parma, whence it was conveyed, in 1736, to Naples, where it still exists. The portion which remained in the custody of Laetus was repeatedly transcribed, but it is known that the archetype was lost before 1581, when Ursinus published his edition. The original codex written upon parchment, probably in the eleventh or twelfth century, appears to have consisted, when entire, of 128 leaves, or 256 pages, each page containing two columns; but at the period when it was first examined by the learned, fifty-eight leaves at the beginning were wanting, comprehending all the letters before M; three gaps, extending in all to ten leaves, occurred in different places, and the last leaf had been torn off, so that only fifty-nine leaves were left, of which eighteen were separated from the rest by Laetus and have disappeared, while forty-one are still found in the Farnese MS. In addition to the deficiencies described above, and to the ravages made by dirt, damp, and vermin, the volume had suffered severely from fire, so that while in each page the inside column was in tolerable preservation, only a few words of the outside column were legible, and in some instances the whole were destroyed. These blanks have been ingeniously filled up by Scaliger and Ursinus, partly from conjecture and partly from the corresponding paragraphs of Paulus, whose performance appears in a complete form in many MSS. This epitomizer, however, notwithstanding his boast that he had passed over what was superfluous and illustrated what was obscure, was evidently ill qualified for his task; for whenever we have an opportunity of comparing him with Festus we perceive that he omitted much that was important, that he slavishly copied clerical blunders, and that when any expression appeared perplexing to his imperfect scholarship he quietly dropped it altogether. He added a little, but very little, of his own, as, for example, the allusion to his namesake, the apostle (s. v. barbari), and a few observations under secus, sacrima, signare, posimerium, porcas, &c.

It is evident from what has been said that the book, as commonly exhibited, consists of four distinct parts:—

1. The fragments of Festus contained in the Farnese MS. now deposited in the Royal library at Naples.

2. The fragments of Festus retained by Pomponius Laetus, the archetype of which, although lost before the end of the sixteenth century, had previously been frequently transcribed.

These two sets of fragments, as far as they go, are probably a tolerably correct though meagre representation of the commentaries of Verrius Flaccus.

3. The epitome of Paulus Diaconus, consisting of inaccurate excerpts from Festus, a mere shadow of a shade, but even these imperfect outlines are very precious.

4. The interpolations of Scaliger and Ursinus, foisted in for the purpose of filling up the blanks in the outside columns of the MS. of Festus. These are of course almost worthless, since they must be regarded merely as specimens of ingenuity.

Although it is manifest how much the four parts differ from each other in value, yet all are in most editions mixed up into one discordant whole, so that it is impossible, without much labour and research, to analyse the mass and resolve it into its elements. Hence we not unfrequently find in the essays of even distinguished scholars quotations professedly from Festus, which upon examination turn out to be the barbarous blunders of Paulus, or even simply the lucubrations of Ursinus. We have now, however, been happily relieved from all such embarrassments by the labours of Müller, whose admirable edition is described more particularly below.

The principle upon which the words are classified is at first sight by no means obvious or intelligible. The arrangement is so far alphabetical that all words commencing with the same letter are placed together. But the words ranked under each letter are, as it were, divided into two parts. In the first part the words are grouped, according not only to the initial, but also to the second and even the third and fourth letters; the groups, however, succeed each other not as in an ordinary dictionary but irregularly. Thus we find at the beginning of R, not the words in Ra, but those in Ru, next those in Ro, next those in Ru, next those in Ru, next those in Re and Ri mixed, next those in Ra, and again Re and Ri mixed. In the second part regard is paid to the initial letter alone without reference to those which follow it, but the words placed together have in most instances some bond of connection. Thus in the second part of P we find the series Palatialis, Portenta, Postularia, Pestifera, Peremptalia, Pullus, all of which belong to sacred rites, and especially to auspices. Again, Propius, Sobrinus, Possessio, Praefectura, Parret, Postum, Patrocenia, Posticam lineam, terms relating to civil law; Pompina, Papiria, Pupinnia, Pupillia, names of tribes, and so on. The same word is frequently explained both in the first and in the second part, and sometimes the two explanations are at variance; thus, Reus, Ritus, Rustica Vindicta, occur in both the first and second parts of R, while the remarks on Obsidium, Obsidionem, in the first part of O are inconsistent with what is said upon the same words in the second part. The same word is never repeated twice in the first part, but this sometimes happens in the second, when it falls to be interpreted under two heads, as in the case of Præbia. The first part in some letters is headed by a few words altogether out of their order, which seem placed in a conspi-caous position on account of their importance or from some superstitious feeling. Thus M is ushered in by Magmos Ludos, Mellom, Matrem Matulam, while the first fifteen articles in P are almost all derived from the most ancient memorials of the Latin tongue. These facts, taken in combination with the authorities quoted here and there, would lead us to infer that the words in the first part of each letter were taken directly from the De Significatis Verborum of Verrius, while those in the second constitute a sort of supplement, collected by Festus from the other writings of the same author. We might also surmise, from the singular order, or rather want of order, discernible in the first part, that Verrius wrote down his observations upon certain sets of words upon separate sheets, and that these sheets were bound up without regard to any circumstance except the initial letter. An elaborate discussion upon these points will be found in the preface to the edition of Müller.

The edition published at Milan, by Zarotus, on the 3rd of August, 1471, and inscribed, Seext. Pompeius Festus de Verborum Significatione, that of Joannes de Colonia and Joannes Manthen de Gherresen, 4to. Venet. 1784, a very ancient impression, perhaps older than either of the above, and probably printed at Rome by G. Lauer, together with several others, merely reprints of the preceding, and all belonging to the fifteenth century, present us with nothing except Paulus Diaconus. A volume appeared at Milan, in 1510, containing Nonius Marcellus, Festus, Paulus, and Varro. This work was commenced by Jo. Bapt. Pius, who revised the Nonius, and was carried on by a certain Conagna, who was acquainted with both portions of the MS. of Festus, which he incorporated with Paulus, thus giving rise to that confusion which afterwards prevailed so extensively. The above grammarians were reprinted, in the same form, at Paris in 1511 and 1519, at Venice by Aldus Manutius, in 1513, and very frequently afterwards, in different parts of Europe. More valuable than any of those already mentioned is the edition of Antonius Augustinus, archbishop of Tarragona, 8vo. Venet. 1559–1560, in which we find not only a correct collation of the Farnese MS., but a separation of Festus from Paulus. Augustinus was closely followed by Joseph Scaliger, 8vo. 1565, who displayed great skill in his conjectural emendations and supplements, and by Fulvius Ursinus, Rom. 1581, who again collated and gave a faithful representation of the Farnese MS., and, following out the labours of Scaliger, filled up the blanks. The edition of Dacier "In eum Delphini," Paris, 1681, has been often reprinted, but possesses no particular value. Lindenmann, in his Corpus Grammaticorum Latinorum, vol. ii. Lips. 1832, has placed Paulus and Festus completely apart from each other, has revised the text of each with great care, and added a large body of notes, original and selected; but far superior to all others is the edition of K. O. Müller, Lips. 4to. 1839, in which we find,—

1. A preface, with a critical account of the MSS. of Festus and Paulus, their history, and a most ingenious and laborious investigation of the plan followed in the arrangement of the words.

2. The text of Paulus in its best form, from the most trustworthy MSS.

3. The text of Festus, from the Farnese MS., carefully collated, in 1833, expressly for this edition, by Arndts. The fragments are printed exactly as they occur in the MS., in double columns, and placed face to face with the corresponding portions of Paulus, so as to admit of easy comparison. The most plausible of the conjectural supplements by Scaliger and Ursinus are inserted in a different type.

4. The text of the Pomponian sheets, printed also in double columns, the contents of each page having been determined by accurate calculation.

5. A collection of the most useful commentaries.

FESTUS, PO'RCIUS, succeeded Antonius Felix as procurator of Judaea in A. D. 62, and vigorously repressed the robbers and assassins (sicarii), by whom the province was infested. It was he who bore testimony to the innocence of St. Paul, when he defended himself before him in the same year. Festus died not long after his appointment as procurator, and was succeeded by ALBINUS. (Joseph. Ant. x. 8. §§ 9—11. 9, § 1, Bell. Jud. ii. 14. § 1; Acts, xxiv. 27, xxv. xxvi.) [E. E.]

FESTUS, VALE'RIUS, legatus in Africa, A. D. 69, and an active, though secret, partisan of Vespasian in his war with Vitellius. He was one of the supplementary consuls for the year A. D. 71. (Tac. Hist. ii. 98; Fasti.) [W. B. D.]

FIDENAS, a surname of the Sergia and Servilia Gentes, derived from Fidenas, a town about five miles from Rome, and which frequently occurs in the early history of the republic. The first Sergius, who bore this surname, was L. Sergius, who is said to have obtained it because he was elected consul in the year (B. C. 437) after the revolt of Fidenas; but as Fidenas was a Roman colony, he may have been a native of the town. This surname was used by his descendants as their family name. [See below.]

The first member of the Servilia gens who received this surname was Q. Servilius Priscus, who took Fidenas in his dictatorship, B. C. 435; and it continued to be used by his descendants as an agnomen, in addition to their regular family name of Priscus. [PRISCUS.]

1. L. SERGIUS C. F. C. N. FIDENAS, held the consulship twice, and the consular tribunate three times; but nothing of importance is recorded of him. He was consul for the first time in B. C. 487 (Liv. iv. 17; Diod. xii. 43); consular tribune for the first time in 433 (Liv. iv. 25; Diod. xii. 58); consul for the second time in 429 (Liv. iv. 30; Diod. xii. 73); consular tribune for the second time in 424 (Liv. iv. 35; Diod. xii. 82); and consular tribune for the third time in 418. (Liv. iv. 45; Diod. xiii. 2.)

2. M'. SERGIUS L. F. L. N. FIDENAS, consular tribune in B. C. 404 (Liv. iv. 61; Diod. xiv. 19), and again in B. C. 402 (Liv. v. 8, &c.; Diod. xiv. 38). His bad conduct in the latter year, in which he allowed himself to be defeated by the enemy, and his punishment, in consequence, by the people, are related under ESQUILINUS, No. 4.

3. L. SERGIUS M'. F. L. N. FIDENAS, son of No. 2, consular tribune in B. C. 397. (Liv. v. 16; Diod. xiv. 85.)

4. C. SERGIUS FIDENAS, consular tribune three times, first in B. C. 387 (Liv. vi. 5), a second time in B. C. 385 (Liv. vi. 11), and a third time in B. C. 380. (Liv. vi. 27.)

FIDES, the personification of fidelity or faithfulness (Cic. de Off. iii. 29). Numa is said to have built a temple to Fides publica, on the Capitol (Dionys. ii. 75), and another was built there in the consulship of M. Aemilius Scaurus, B. C. 115 (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 23, 31; iii. 18; de Leg. ii. 8, 11). She was represented as a matron wearing a wreath of olive or laurel leaves, and carrying in her hand corn ears, or a basket with fruit. (Rasche, Lex Num. ii. 1, p. 107.) [L. S.]

FIDICULANIUS, FALCULA. [FALCULA.] FIDIUS, an ancient form of filius, occurs in the connection of Dius Fidius, or Medius fidius, that is, me Dius (Διός) filius, or the son of Zeus, that is, Hercules. Hence the expression medius fidius is equivalent to me Hercules, scil. juvet. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 21; Plin. Epist. iv. 3.) Sometimes Fidius is used alone in the sense of the son of Zeus, or Hercules. (Ov. Fast. vi. 213; comp. Varro, de L. v. 66; Plaut. Asin. i. 1. 8; Varro, ap. Non. viii. 93.) Some of the ancients connected fidius with fides. (Festus s. v. medius.) [L. S.]

FIGULUS, MARCIUS. 1. C. MARCIUS C. F. Q. N. FIGULUS, consul in A. C. 162. During the comitia for his election the leader of the centuria prerogativa died, and the haruspices declared the election void. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, however, the consul who presided at the comitia, maintained their validity, and Figulus departed to his province, Cisalpine Gaul. But afterwards Gracchus wrote to the senate that he had himself committed an error in taking the auspices, and Figulus resigned the consulship. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 4, de Divin. ii. 35, ad Q. Frat. ii. 2; Val. Max. i. 1. § 3; Plut. Marcell. 5; Jul. Obsequ. 74; Fast. Cap.) Figulus was again consul in B. C. 156. His province was the war with the Dalmatae in Illyricum. At first he allowed his camp to be forced by the Dalmatae, but afterwards, in a winter campaign, he successfully took their smaller towns, and finally their capital, Delminium. (Polyb. xxiii. 24; Appian, Illyr. 11; Liv. Epit. xlvii.; Florus, iv. 12.)

2. C. MARCIUS FIGULUS, the son of the preceding, a jurist of great reputation, was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship. (Val. Max. ix. 3. § 2.)

3. C. MARCIUS C. F. C. N. FIGULUS, consul in B. C. 64. In the debate on the sentence of Catiline's accomplices he declared for capital punishment (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21), and approved of Cicero's measures generally (Philipp. ii. 11.). In his consulship the senate abolished several illegal collegia, as prejudicial to the freedom of the comitia and to the public peace. (Ascon. in Pison. p. 7, ed. Orelli.) His tomb was of unusual costliness (Cic. de Leg. ii. 25). [W. B. D.]

FIGULUS, P. NIGIDIUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of high reputation, who flourished about sixty years B. C. He was so celebrated on account of his knowledge, that Gellius does not hesitate to pronounce him, next to Varro, the most learned of the Romans. Mathematical and physical investigations appear to have occupied a large share of his attention; and such was his fame as an astrologer, that it was generally believed, in later times at least, that he had predicted in the most unambiguous terms the future greatness of Octavianus on hearing the announcement of his birth; and in the Eusebian Chronicle he is styled "Pythagoricus et Magnus." He, moreover, possessed considerable influence in political affairs during the last struggles of the republic; was one of the senators selected by Cicero to take down the depositions and examinations of the witnesses who gave evidence with regard to Catiline's conspiracy, B. C. 63; was praetor in B. C. 59; took an active part in the civil war on the side of Pompey; was compelled in consequence by Caesar to live abroad, and died in exile B. C. 44. The letter of consolation addressed to him by Cicero (ad Fam. iv. 13), which contains a very warm tribute to his learning and worth, is still extant.

A. Gellius, who entertained the strongest admiration for the talents and acquirements of Figulus, says that his works were little studied, and were of no practical value, in consequence of the subtlety and obscurity by which they were characterised; but the quotations adduced by him (xix. 14) as specimens scarcely bear out the charge, when we consider the nature of the subject. The names of the following pieces have been preserved: De Sphaera Barbarica et Graecanica, De Animalibus, De Extis, De Auguriis, De Ventis, Commentarii Grammatici in at least twenty-four books. The fragments which have survived have been carefully collected and illustrated by Janus Rutgersius in his Variae Lectiones, iii. 16. (Cic. Tim. i., pro Sull. 14, ad Att. ii. 2, vii. 24, ad Fam. iv. 13; Lucan, i. 640; Suet. Octav. 94; Dion Cass. xlv. 1; Gell. iv. 9, x. 11, xi. 11, xiii. 10, 25, xix. 14; Hieron. in Chron. Euseb. OL clxxiv.; Augustin, de Civ. Dei, v. 3; Brucker, Hist. Phil. vol. ii. p. 24; Burigny, Mém. de l'Académ. Inscrip., vol. xxix. p. 190.) [W. R.]

FIMBRIA. 1. C. FLAVIUS FIMBRIA, a homo novus, who, according to Cicero, rose to the highest honours in the republic through his own merit and talent. In B. C. 105 he was a candidate for the consulship, and the people gave him the preference to his competitor, Q. Lutatius Catulus; and accordingly, Fimbria was the colleague of C. Marius in his second consulship, B. C. 104. Fimbria must have acquired his popularity about that time, for we learn from Cicero (pro Planc. 21), that previously he had been an unsuccessful candidate for the tribuneship. What province he obtained after his consulship is unknown, but he seems to have been guilty of extortion during his administration, for M. Gratidius brought an action of repetundae against him, and was supported by the evidence of M. Aemilius Scaurus; but Fimbria was nevertheless acquitted. During the revolt of Saturninus, in B. C. 100, Fimbria, with other consulars, took up arms to defend the public good. Cicero describes him as a clever jurist; as an orator he had considerable power, but was bitter and vehement in speaking. Cicero, in his boyhood, read the speeches of Fimbria; but they soon fell into oblivion, for, at a later time, Cicero says that they were scarcely to be found any where. (Cic. pro Planc. 5, in Verr. v. 70, Brut. 34, 45, pro Font. 7, pro Rab. perd. 7, de Off. iii. 19, de Orat. ii. 22; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 78; Val. Max. vii. 2. § 4, viii. 5. § 2; J. Obsequ. 103, where he is erroneously called L. Flaccus.)

2. C. FLAVIUS FIMBRIA, probably a son of No. 1, was one of the most violent partizans of Marius and Cinna during the civil war with Sulla. Cicero (pro Sext. Rosc. 12) calls him a homo audacissimus et insatissimus. During the funeral ceremonies of C. Marius, in B. C. 86, C. Fimbria caused an attempt to be made on the life of Q. Mucius Scaevola, and, as the latter escaped with a severe wound, Fimbria made preparations to bring an accusation against him before the people. When asked what he had to say against so excellent a man, he replied, nothing, except that he had not allowed the deadly weapon to penetrate far enough into his body. After the death of C. Marius, in B. C. 86, Cinna assumed L. Valerius Flaccus as his colleague in the consulship, in the place of Marius, and sent him into Asia to oppose Sulla and bring the war against Mithridates to a close; but as Valerius Flaccus was inexperienced in military affairs, Fimbria accompanied him as his legate or commander of the horse (not as quaestor, as Strabo, xiii. p. 596, states). Flaccus drew upon himself the hatred of the soldiers by his avarice and cruelty, and Fimbria took advantage of it in endeavouring to win the favour of the army. While staying at Byzantium, Fimbria became involved in a quarrel with the quaestor of Valerius Flaccus, and the latter decided the dispute in favour of the quaestor, for which he was assailed by Fimbria in insulting terms. Fimbria was deprived of his office in consequence, and Val. Flaccus sailed to Chalcedon. Fimbria, who remained at Byzantium, created a mutiny among the soldiers who were left there. Flaccus returned to Byzantium, but was obliged to quit the place, and took to flight. Fimbria pursued him to Chalcedon, and thence to Nicomedeia, where he killed him, in A. C. 85. He forthwith undertook the command of the army. He gained several not unimportant victories over the generals of Mithridates, and when the king himself took to flight, Fimbria followed him to Pergamus, and chased him from thence to Ptolemaea. Here he might have made the king his prisoner, if Lucullus, who had the command of the fleet, had condescended to co-operate with the usurper, and not allowed the king to escape. Having thus got rid of one enemy, Fimbria began a most cruel war against the Asiatics who had fought in the ranks of Mithridates, or declared in favour of Sulla. Among the places of the latter class was Ilium, which was treacherously taken, and wantonly and cruelly destroyed. He raged in Asia, without restraint, like an insane person, and succeeded in subduing a great part of the country. But in A. C. 84, Sulla crossed over from Greece into Asia, and, after having concluded peace with Mithridates, he attacked Fimbria in his camp near the town of Thyateira. As Fimbria was unable to make his men fight against Sulla, he tried to get rid of his enemy by assassination, and, as this attempt failed, he endeavoured to negotiate; but when Sulla refused, and demanded absolute submission, Fimbria fled from his camp to Pergamus, and having retired into a temple of Aesculapius, he tried to kill himself with his own sword; but as the wound did not cause his death, he commanded one of his slaves to give him the final blow. Such was the miserable end of a short career, which had begun with treachery. Cicero (Brut. 66) describes his public speaking just as we might expect of a man of his temperament: it was of a furious and most vehement kind, and like the raving of a madman. (Liv. Epit. 82; Plut. Sull. 2, 23, 25; Lucull. 3; Appian, Mithrid. 51—60; Veil. Pat. ii. 24; Dion Cass. Fragm. Peiresc. 127—130, Reimar.; Aur. Vict. de Vir. iii. 70; Oros. vi. 2; Val. Max. ix. 11. § 2; Frontin. Strat. iii. 17. § 5; J. Obsequ. 116.)

3. FLAVIUS FIMBRIA, a brother of No. 2, was legate of C. Norbanus, in the war against Sulla, B. C. 82. He and other officers of the party of Carbo were invited to a banquet by Albinovanus, and then treacherously murdered. (Appian, B. C. i. 91.) [L. S.]

FIRMANUS, GA'VIUS. [GAVIUS.]

FIRMANUS, TARU'TIUS, a mathematician and astrologer, contemporary with M. Varro and Cicero, and an intimate friend of them both. At Varro's request Firmanus took the horoscope of Romulus, and from the circumstances of the life and death of the founder determined the era of Rome. According to the scheme of Firmanus, Romulus was born on the 23d day of September, in the 2d year of the 2d Olympiad=B. C. 771, and Rome was founded on the 9th of April, between the second and third hour of the day. (Plut. Rom. 12; Cic. de Divin. ii. 47.) Plutarch does not say in what year Firmanus placed the foundation of Rome, but the day is earlier than the Palilia (April 21st), the usual point from which the years of Rome are reckoned. The name, Firmanus, denotes a native of Firmum, in Picenum, the modern town of Fermo, in the Marca d' Ancona, but Tarutius is an Etruscan appellation (Plut. Rom. 5, Quaest. Rom. 35; Licinius Macer, ap. Macrob. Saturn. i. 10; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, vi. 7), and from his Etruscan ancestors he may have inherited his taste for mathematical studies. [W. B. D.]

FIRMIANUS SYMPOSIUS, CAE'LIUS, (also written Symphosius, or Simposius, not to mention various evident corruptions,) is the name prefixed in MSS. to a series of a hundred insipid riddles, each comprised in three hexameter lines, collected, as we are told in the prologue, for the purpose of promoting the festivities of the Saturnalia. To the same author apparently belong two short odes; one entitled De Fortuna, in fifteen Choriambic Tetrameters, ascribed in some copies to an Asclepias or Aesclepiadus, a mistake which arose from confounding the poet with the metre which he employed; the other, De Livore, in twenty-five Hendecasyllabics, attributed occasionally to a Vomanus or an Euphorbus, while both pieces are frequently included among the Catalecta of Virgil. We know nothing regarding the personal history of this writer, nor the period when he flourished; but from certain peculiarities of expression it has been conjectured that he was an African. His diction and versification, although by no means models of purity and correctness, are far removed from barbarism, and the enigmas contain allusions to various usages which had ceased to prevail long before the downfall of the empire. The only reference, however, in any ancient writer to these compositions is to be found in Aldhelm, who died at the beginning of the eighth century.

The words with which the prologue commences, "Haec quoque Symposius de carmine lusi incepto, Sic tu, Sexte, doces, sic te deliro magistro," which point distinctly to some former efforts, have been made the basis of an extravagant conjecture by Heumann. Assuming that the reading as it now stands is faulty, he proposes, as an emendation, "Hoc quoque Symposium lusi de carmine inepto. Sic me Siccā docet, Siccā deliro magistro," and endeavours to prove that the true title of the work is Symposium, that no such person as Syn-

posius ever existed, and that the real author of these trifles is no less a personage than the Latin father Caelius Firmianus Lactantius, the pupil of Arnobius, who taught at Sicca; the author, as we learn from Jerome, of a Symposium. This hypothesis, although supported by much learning, is so wild as scarcely to deserve confutation. It will be sufficient to remark that all MSS. agree in representing Symposium (or something like it) as a proper name,—that there are no grounds for supposing the Symposium of Lactantius to have been of a light or trivial character, but that we are rather led to conclude that it was a grave dialogue or disquisition, resembling in plan the Symposia of Xenophon, of Plato, and of Plutarch, or the Saturnalia of Macrobius.

The Aenigmata were first printed at Paris, 8vo. 1533, along with the Sayings of the Seven Wise Men of Greece: the most elaborate edition is that of Heumann, Hannov., 8vo. 1722, which was followed by that of Heynatz, Francof. ad Viad., 8vo. 1775; the most useful is that contained in the Poet. Lat. Min. of Wernsdorf, vol. vi. part ii. p. 474, with very complete prolegomena (p. 410). The Odes are given in the same collection, vol. iii. pp. 386, 389. See also vol. v. part iii. p. 1464, and vol. iv. part ii. p. 853. [W. R.]

FIRMICUS MATERNUS, JULIUS, or perhaps VI'LLIUS. We possess a treatise, which bears the title Julii Firmici Materni Junioris Siculi V. C. Matheseos Libri VIII., the writer of which, as we gather from his own statement (lib. iv. præf.), during a portion of his life, practised as a forensic pleader, but abandoned the profession in disgust. The production named above is a formal introduction to judicial astrology, according to the discipline of the Egyptians and Babylonians, as expounded by the most renowned masters, among whom we find enumerated Ptolemy, Necepsus, Abraham, and Orpheus. The first book is chiefly occupied with a defence of the study; the second, third, and fourth contain the definitions and maxims of the science, while in the remainder the powers and natal influences (apotelesmata) of the heavenly bodies in their various aspects and combinations are fully developed, the horoscopes of Oedipus, Paris, Homer, Plato, Archimedes, and various other remarkable individuals, being examined, as examples of the propositions enunciated.

It would appear that the task was commenced towards the close of the reign of Constantine the Great, for a solar eclipse, which happened in the consulship of Optatus and Paullinus, A. D. 334, is spoken of (lib. i. l.) as a recent event. It seems probable, however, that the whole was not published at once; for while each book is formally addressed to Manutius Lollianus, the title of proconsul is added to his name in the dedication to the last four only. If this Lollianus be the Fl. Lollianus who appears in the Fasti along with Fl. Arbutio, in the year 355, the conclusion of the work might be referred to an epoch somewhat later than this date.

Although we can trace in several passages a correspondence with the Astronomica of Manilius, we are led to suppose that Firmicus was ignorant of the existence of that poem; for his expressions on two occasions (lib. ii. Præf. viii. 2) imply his belief that scarcely any Roman writers had touched upon these themes except Cicero and Caesar, the translators of Aratus, and Fronto, who had followed the Anticiccia of Hipparchus, but had erred in presupposing a degree of knowledge on the part of his readers that they were little likely to possess. In the Libri Matheseos we find references to other pieces previously composed by the author upon similar topics, especially to a dissertation De Domino Genituræ et Chronocratonæ, and De Fine Vitæ; the former addressed to a friend, Murinus (iv. 14, vii. 6.), while he promises to publish "twelve books" as a supplement to his present undertaking (v. 1), together with an explanation of the Myriogenesis (viii. Præf.), and a translation of Necepsus upon health and disease (viii. 3). Of these not one has been preserved.

Firmicus Maternus was first printed at Venice, fol. 1497, by Bivilacqua, from a MS. brought to Italy by Pescennius Franciscus Niger from Constantinople; again by Aldus, fol. 1499, in a volume containing also Manilius, the Phænomena of Aratus, in Greek, with the translations by Cicero, Caesar Germanicus, and Avienus, the Greek commentaries of Theon on the same work, the Sphere of Proclus, in Greek, and the Latin version by Linacer; a collection reprinted four years afterwards under the inspection of Mazalis (fol. Rheg. Ling. 1503). The last edition noticed by bibliographers is that corrected by Pruckner, fol. Basil. 1551, and published along with the Quadrupartitum, the Centiloquium, and the Inerrantium Stellarum Significationes, translated from the Greek of Cl. Ptolemaeus; the Astronomica of Manilius; and sundry tracts by Arabian and Oriental astrologers. (Sidon. Apollin. Carm. xzii. Præf.)

In the year 1562 Matthias Flaccius published at Strasburg, from a Minden MS., now lost, a tract bearing the title Julius Firmicus Maternus V. C. de Errone Profanarum Religionum ad Constantium et Constantem Augustos. No ancient authority makes any mention of this piece, nor does it contain any allusions from which we might draw an inference with regard to the personal history of the composer. The supposition, at one time generally admitted, that he was the same person with the astrologer spoken of above, rests upon no proof whatever except the identity of name, while it is rendered highly improbable by several considerations, and is much shaken by a chronological argument. For, as we have already seen, the Matheseos Libri were certainly not commenced until after A. D. 334, and in all likelihood not finished for a considerable period; it being evident, moreover, from the spirit which they breathe, that the writer was not a Christian; while, on the other hand, the attack upon the heathen gods must have been drawn up before A. D. 350, since in that year Constantine, one of the emperors, to whom it is inscribed, was slain.

The object of the essay is not so much to enlarge upon the evidences of the true faith as to demonstrate the falsehood of the different forms of pagan belief, to trace the steps by which men fell away from the service of the true God, first by personifying the powers of nature, and then by proceeding to raise mere men to the rank of divinities. In this portion of the argument the theory of Euhemerus [EUPHEMERUS], which ever since the days of Ennius had exercised great influence over the Roman mind, is followed out, and the discussion concludes with an exhortation to the heathen to abandon such a system of worship, and with an appeal to the emperors, urging them to take the sternest measures for the extirpation of idleness.

The Editio Princeps, as we have remarked above, was printed at Strasburg in 1562; that of Wower, 8vo, Hamburg, 1603, was long held in high estimation, but the best and most recent is that of Münster, 8vo, Havniae, 1826. See also the volume of the Dutch Variorum Classics in 8vo, which contains Minucius Felix, Lug. Bat. 1709, and the Bibl. Patr. of Galland, vol. v. p. 23. [W. R.]

FIRMIUS CATUS. [CATUS.]

M. FIRMIUS, one of the "minusculi tyranni" who sprung up during the reign of Aurelian. According to Vopiscus, he was a native of Seleucia, the friend and ally of Zenobia, and appears to have followed the profession of a merchant, carrying on a most extensive and lucrative trade. When Zenobia took up arms against the Romans, Firmus, in order to make a diversion in her favour, seized upon Alexandria; but the rebellion was promptly crushed by the vigour and good fortune of the emperor. The Augustan historian has chronicled a number of particulars with regard to the personal appearance, bodily strength, athletic and convivial exploits, wealth and magnificence of this petty usurper, some of which are curious in an antiquarian point of view. We are expressly told that he issued a coinage, and a medal is contained in the Pembroke collection bearing the legend which some writers suppose to belong to him. (Vopisc. Firm.; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 496.) [W. R.]

ATT. M. ΦΙΡΜΙΟΣ ΕΤΤΚ

FIRMUS, PLOTIUS, a contemporary and faithful friend of the emperor Otho. He had risen from the station of a common soldier to the offices of praepositus vigilibus and praefectus praetorii. During an insurrection of the soldiers he exerted himself in suppressing the revolt, by addressing each maniple separately, and causing large sums of money to be distributed among them. During the last struggle of Otho, Plotius Firmus implored him not to abandon his faithful army, and exhorted him to resume his courage. (Tac. Hist. i. 46, 82. ii. 46, 49.) [L. S.]

FISTUS, P. CURTIATIVS, with the agnomen TRIGEMINUS, consul B. C. 453, in which year the city was visited with a great pestilence (Liv. iii. 32; Fasti Capit.); and one of the first de-cadivante in B. C. 451. (Liv. iii. 33; Dionys. x. 34.)

FLACCINATOR, M. FOSLIUS. 1. One of the consular tribunes in B. C. 433, in which year, notwithstanding the opposition of the plebeian tribunes, the consular tribunes were all patricians. (Liv. iv. 25; Diod. xii. 58, where he is called Falsinus.)

2. Master of the equites to the dictator C. Maenius, for the first time in B. C. 320, according to the Fasti, but according to Livy in B. C. 312 (ix. 26). Both the dictator and Flaccinator resigned on being accused of illegal association against the republic; and both were tried before the consuls and honorably acquitted. Flaccinator was consul in B. C. 318 (Liv. ix. 20), and master of the equites, according to the Fasti, a second time to C. Maenius B. C. 314, but according to Livy (ix. 28) to the dictator C. Poetelius. The cause and circumstances of his trial will be better understood by referring to MAENIUS. [W. B. D.]

and M. Avianus. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 35, 79.) Both father and sons seem to have been engaged in the farming of the public taxes. In B. C. 52, Cicero recommended Caius, the son, to T. Titius, one of Pompey's legates, who had the management of the corn-market, in accordance with the law which had conferred the superintendence of it upon Pompey (ad Fam. xiii. 75), and, in B. C. 47, Cicero recommends both sons to A. Allienus, the proconsul of Sicily (ad Fam. xiii. 79).

FLACCUS, CALPURNIUS, a rhetorician who was living in the reign of Hadrian, and whose fifty-one declamations frequently accompany those of Quintilian. They were first published by Pitheous, Lutet. 1580. 8vo.; and subsequently have been edited with Quintilian by Gronovius, Schulting, Almeloveen, &c. Pliny (Ep. v. 2.) writes to Flaccus, who, in some editions, is called Calpurnius Flaccus. [W. B. D.]

FLACCUS, FULVIUS. 1. M. FULVIUS, Q. F. M. N. FLACCUS, was consul with App. Claudius Caudex, in B. C. 264, the year in which the first Punic war broke out. In his consulship the first gladiatorial games were exhibited at Rome, in the forum boarium. (Vell. Pat. i. 12; Gell. xvii. 21; Val. Max. ii. 4. § 7; Eutrop. ii. 10; Oros. iv. 7, who erroneously calls the colleague of App. Claudius Caudex, Q. Fabius.)

2. Q. FULVIUS M. F. Q. N. FLACCUS, a son of No. 1, was consul in B. C. 237. He and his colleague, L. Cornelius Lentulus, fought against the Ligurians in Italy, and triumphed over them. In B. C. 224 he was consul a second time. The war in the north of Italy was still going on, and Flaccus and his colleague were the first Roman generals that led their armies across the river Po. The Gauls and Insularians were reduced to submission in that campaign. In B. C. 215, after having been twice consul, Q. Fulvius Flaccus obtained the city praetorship, a circumstance which Livy thinks worth being recorded. The year before his praetorship, 216, he had been elected pontifex in the place of Q. Aelius Paetus, who had fallen in the battle of Cannae. In his praetorship the senate placed twenty-four ships at his command, to protect the coast in the neighbourhood of the city, and soon after the senate decreed that he should raise 5000 foot and 400 horse, and cause this legion to be carried to Sardinia as soon as possible, and that he should appoint whomsoever he pleased as its commander, until Q. Mucius, who was severely ill, recovered. Flaccus accordingly appointed T. Manlius Torquatus commander of the legion. In B. C. 214 he was the only one among his colleagues that was re-elected to the praetorship, and a senatus consultum ordained, that he, extra ordinem, should have the city for his province, and that he should have the command there during the absence of the consuls. In B. C. 213 he was appointed magister equitum to the dictator, C. Claudius Centho, and the year after was raised to the consulship for the third time, together with App. Claudius Pulcher. In this year he was also a candidate for the office of pontifex maximus, which, however, he did not obtain. During his third consulship Campania was his province; and he accordingly went thither with his army, took up his position at Beneventum, and thence made an unexpected attack upon the camp of Hanno in the neighbourhood. After some very extraordinary but unsuccessful attempts to take the camp, which was pitched upon an almost inaccessible eminence, Flaccus proposed to withdraw until the next day, but the undaunted courage of his soldiers, and their indignation at his proposal, obliged him to continue his attack. Having been joined by his colleague, App. Claudius Pulcher, the enemy's camp was taken by assault. A great massacre then took place, in which upwards of 6000 Carthaginians are said to have been killed, and more than 7000 were taken prisoners, with all that the camp contained. The two consuls then returned to Beneventum, where they sold the booty, and distributed the proceeds among those who had distinguished themselves during the attack upon Hanno's camp. Hanno, who had not been in the camp at the time when it was taken, found it necessary to withdraw into the country of the Bruttians.

Hereupon the two consuls marched against Capua, which was now besieged with the greatest vigour. In the next year, when Cn. Fulvius Centumalus and P. Sulpicius Galba were consuls, the imperium of Fulvius Flaccus and App. Claudius was prolonged: they retained their army, and were ordered not to leave Capua till it was taken. As, however, Hannibal in the meantime marched against Rome, the senate called Fulvius Flaccus back to protect the city, and for this purpose he received the same power as the actual consuls. But after Hannibal's sudden retreat, Flaccus returned to Capua, and continued the siege with the utmost exertion. The inhabitants of Capua were reduced to the last extremity, and resolved to surrender; but before the gates were opened the most distinguished persons put an end to their lives. The fearful catastrophe of this once flourishing town, the cruel punishment of the Campanians, the execution of all the surviving senators, and the other arrangements, such as could be dictated only by the most implacable hatred and hostility, must be set down to the account of Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Towards the end of the year he had to return to Rome, where he conducted, as dictator, the consular elections. He himself received Capua as his province for another year, but his two legions were reduced to one. In 209 he was invested with the consulship for the fourth time, and received Lucania and Bruttium as his province: the Hirpinians, Lucanians, and Volcentians submitted to him, and were mildly treated. For the year following his imperium was again prolonged, with Capua for his province and one legion at his command. In 207 he commanded two legions at Bruttium. This is the last record we have of him in history. He was a very fortunate and successful general during the latter period of the second Punic war, but his memory is branded with the cruelty with which he treated Capua after its fall. (Liv. xxiii. 21—34, xxiv. 9, xxv. 2, &c., 13, &c., 20, xxvi. 1, &c., 8, &c., 22, 28, xxvii. 6, &c., 11, 15, 22, 36; Eutrop. iii. 1, &c.; Zonar. viii. 18, &c.; Polyb. ii. 31; Oros. iv. 13, &c.; Appian, Annal. 37, 40, &c.; Val. Max. ii. 3, § 3, 8, § 4, iii. 2. Ext. § 1, 8, § 1, v. 2 § 1; Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 33.)

3. Cn. FULVIUS M. F. Q. N. FLACCUS, a son of No. 1, and a brother of No. 2, was praetor in the third consulship of his brother B.C. 212, and had Apulia for his province. In the neighbourhood of Herdonea he was defeated by Hannibal, and was the first that took to flight with about 200 horsemen. The rest of his army was cut to pieces, for out of 22,000 men only 2000 escaped.

C. Sempronius Blaesus afterwards charged him before the people with having lost his army through his own want of caution and prudence. Flaccus at first endeavoured to throw the fault upon the soldiers, but further discussion and investigation proved that he had behaved cowardly. He then tried to obtain the assistance of his brother, who was then in the height of his glory and engaged in the siege of Capua. But nothing availed; and, as he had to expect the severest punishment from a trial, he went to Tarquinii into voluntary exile. (Liv. xxv. 3, 21, xxvi. 2, 3.) According to Valerius Maximus (ii. 8, § 3, comp. viii. 4, § 3), he refused the honour of a triumph; but this must be a mistake, at least we do not know on what occasion it could have happened.

4. C. FULVIUS M. F. Q. N. FLACCUS, a son of No. 1, and a brother of No. 2 and 3, served as legate under his brother Quintus during the siege of Capua. In B.C. 209 he was ordered to conduct a detachment of troops into Etruria, and bring back to Rome the legions which had been stationed there. (Liv. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 8.)

5. Q. FULVIUS Q. F. M. N. FLACCUS, one of the four sons of Q. Fulvius Flaccus No. 2. In B.C. 185 he was aedilis curulis designatus; and as the city praetor, C. Decimus, had just died, he offered himself as a candidate for his place, but without success, notwithstanding his great exertions, and it was not till B.C. 182, that he received the office of praetor, with Hispania Citerior as his province. On his arrival there, he expelled the Celtiberians, who were in possession of the town of Urbicua, which he took, and soon after he defeated the Celtiberians in a great battle, in which 23,000 of them are said to have been slain and 4000 taken prisoners. After the reduction of the town of Contrebia he gained a second great victory over the Celtiberians, whereupon the greater part of them submitted to the Romans. At the end of the year of his praetorship, when he was returning from his province, he was allowed to take with him to Rome those soldiers who had most distinguished themselves in the great battles he had gained, and public thanksgivings were decreed at Rome for his successful campaign. But when he set out for Italy, the Celtiberians, who probably thought that he was going to carry out some hostile scheme against them, attacked him in a narrow defile. Notwithstanding his disadvantageous position, he again gained a complete victory, the merit of which was chiefly owing to his cavalry. The Celtiberians, after having lost no less than 17,000 of their men, took to flight. Fulvius Flaccus vowed games in honour of Jupiter, and to build a temple to Fortuna equestris, and then returned to Italy. He celebrated his victories with a triumph in B.C. 180, and was elected consul for the year following, together with his brother, L. Manlius Acidinus Fulvianus (this name arose from his being adopted into the family of Manlius Acidinus). The games in honour of Jupiter were sanctioned by the senate and celebrated. He carried on a war against the Ligurians, who were defeated, and whose camp was taken. On his return to Rome, he celebrated a second triumph on the same day on which the year before he had triumphed over the Celtiberians. In B.C. 174 he was made censor, with A. Postumius Albinus. In his censorship, his own brother, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, was ejected from the senate, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus now set about building the temple which he had vowed in Spain, and which was to be more magnificent than any other at Rome. For this purpose he took down half the roof of the temple of Juno Lacinia, in Bruttium, in order to use the marble slabs to form the roof of his new structure. The Brutians suffered the sacrilege from fear; but when the ship containing the marble arrived at Rome, the manner in which the ornament had been obtained became known. The consuls summoned him before the senate, which not only disapproved of his conduct, but ordered the marble slabs to be sent back, and expiatory sacrifices to be offered to Juno. The commands of the senate were obeyed, but as there was no architect in Bruttium able to restore the marble slabs to their place, they were deposited in the area of the temple, and there they remained. After his censorship Q. Fulvius Flaccus became a member of the college of pontiffs; but he began to show symptoms of mental derangement, which was looked upon by the people as a just punishment for the sacrilege he had committed against the temple of Juno. While in this condition, he received intelligence that of his two sons who were serving in Illyricum, one had died, and the other was dangerously ill. This appears to have upset his mind completely, and he hung himself in his own bed-chamber, B.C. 173. (Liv. xxxix. 39, 56, xl. 1, 16, 30, &c., 35-44, 53, 59, xli. 27, xlii. 3, 28; Vell. Pat. i. 10, ii. 8; Appian, Hisp. 42; Val. Max. i. 1. § 20, ii. 5. § 7; Cic. in Verr. i. 41.)

6. M. FULVIUS Q. F. M. N. FLACCUS, a brother of No. 5, served as legate of his brother Quintus in Spain against the Celtiberians, B.C. 182. (Liv. xl. 30.)

7. M. FULVIUS M. F. Q. N. FLACCUS, a son of No. 6, and a friend of the Gracchi, was consul in A.C. 125, and was sent to the assistance of the Massilians, whose territory was invaded by the Sallevians; and he was the first that subdued the transalpine Ligurians, over whom he celebrated a triumph. After the death of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, in A.C. 129, he, Carbo, and C. Sempronius Gracchus had been appointed triumvirs agro dividendo. He was a warm supporter of all that C. Gracchus did, especially of his agrarian law; but he seems to have been wanting in that dignified and quiet, but steady conduct, which characterises the pure and virtuous career of C. Gracchus, who was more injured in public opinion than benefited by his friendship with M. Fulvius Flaccus; for among other charges which were brought against him, it was said that he endeavoured to excite the Italian allies, by bringing forward in his consulship a bill to grant them the Roman franchise. In A.C. 122, he accompanied C. Gracchus into Africa to establish a colony at Carthage, for the senate was anxious to get rid of them, and in their absence to make energetic preparations against them. But both returned to Rome very soon. During the night previous to the murder of C. Gracchus, Flaccus kept a mob ready to fight against the senatorial party, and spent the night in drinking and feasting with his friends. At day-break he went with his armed band to seize the Aventine hill. C. Gracchus also joined them, though refusing to use violence, and prevailed upon Flaccus to send his younger son to the forum to offer the hand for reconciliation to the senatorial party. Opimius refused, and demanded that his father and Gracchus should surrender before any negotiations were commenced. Flaccus again sent his son; but Opimius, anxious to begin the fight, arrested the boy, put him into prison, and advanced against the band of Flaccus, which was soon dispersed. Flaccus and his elder son took refuge in a public bath, where they were soon discovered and put to death, B.C. 121. It cannot be said that M. Fulvius Flaccus had any bad motive in joining the party of the Gracchi, for all the charges that were brought against him at the time were not established by evidence; but he was of a bolder and more determined character than C. Gracchus. Cicero mentions him among the orators of the time, but states that he did not rise above mediocrity, although his orations were still extant in the time of Cicero. A daughter of his, Fulvia, was married to P. Lentulus, by whom she became the mother of Lentulus Sura. Cicero (pro Dom. 43) calls him the father-in-law of a brother of Q. Catulus, whence we may infer that he had a second daughter. A third daughter was married to L. Caesar, consul in B.C. 91; so that M. Fulvius Flaccus was the grandfather of L. Caesar, who was consul in A.C. 64. (Liv. Epit. 59, 61; Appian, B. C. i. 18, &c.; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 18, C. Gracch. 10-16; Vell. Pat. ii. 6; Cic. Brut. 28, de Orat. ii. 70, in Cat. i. 2, 12, iv. 6; Schol. Gronov. ad Catil. p. 413; Cic. pro Dom. 38, Phil. viii. 4; Val. Max. v. 3. § 2, vi. 3. § 1, ix. 5. § 1; comp. Meyer, Frag. Orat. Rom. p. 219, 2d edit.)

8. M. FULVIUS FLACCUS was one of the Decemviri Agro Samniti Appuloque metiendo dividendo, who were appointed in B.C. 201. He was married to Sulpicia, a daughter of Paterculus. (Liv. xxxi. 4; Solin. 7.)

9. Q. FULVIUS FLACCUS was praetor in Sardinia in B.C. 187; and after having been thrice a candidate for the consulship, he obtained it at length in A.C. 180, in the place of his step-father, C. Piso, who had died, and was said to have been poisoned by his wife Quarta Hostilia, in order to make room for her son. (Liv. xxxviii. 42, xl. 37.)

10. M. FULVIUS FLACCUS, one of the triumvirs who were appointed to conduct the colonies to Pollentia and Pisaurum, in B.C. 184. (Liv. xxxix. 44.)

11. SER. FULVIUS FLACCUS, was consul in B.C. 135, and subdued the Vardaeans in Illyricum. Cicero calls him a literary and eloquent man. He was on one occasion accused of incest, and was defended by C. Curio. (Liv. Epit. 56; Appian, Illyr. 10; Cic. Brut. 21, 32, de Invent. i. 43; Schol. Bob. in Clod. p. 330, ed. Orelli.)

12. C. FULVIUS FLACCUS was consul in B.C. 134. An unsuccessful war had then been carried on for some time against the revolted slaves under Ennus in Sicily; and he and his colleague undertook the command, though apparently with little success. (Liv. Epit. 56; Oros. v. 6.) [L. S.]

FLACCUS, GRANIUS, as we learn from Paulus (Dig. 60. tit. 16. s. 144) wrote a book, De Jure Papiriano, which was a collection of the laws of the ancient kings of Rome, made by Papirius [PAPIRIUS]. Granus Flaccus was a contemporary of Julius Caesar, and Censorinus (De Die Nat. 3) cites his work De Indigitamentis, which was dedicated to Caesar. The Indigitamenta treated of were probably invocations used in certain sacred rites. (Macrob. Sat. i. 17), and, according to some etymologists, the word is derived from indus, the old form for in, and citare, signifying to invoke. (Duker, de Vet. Jct. Latin. p. 156.) It is not unlikely that Paulus and Censorinus refer to the same work of Granius, under different names, for the religious laws of the kings doubtless remained longest in use; and Papirius, who was himself a pontiff, is said by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (iii. 36) to have collected the sacred laws after the expulsion of the kings. Religious ceremonies, in the early period of Roman history, may well be supposed to have constituted a large portion of the technical law, and to have been connected with the principal transactions of life.

Servius (ad Aen. xii. 836) cites a lex Papiria, and Macrobius (Sat. iii. 11) cites a passage of the Jus Papirianum, which, from the Latinity, may reasonably be ascribed to Granius Flaccus. The passage points out the distinction between temple furniture and temple ornaments, and shows that to the former class belongs the consecrated table ("mensa, in qua epulae, libationesque, et stipes reponuntur") which is used as an altar ("in templo aras usum obtinet"). P. P. Justi, with much probability (Specim. Observ. Crit. c. 11, Vindob. 1765), attributes to Flaccus (Granius, not the grammarian Verrius Flaccus,) a religious fragment which the ordinary text of Servius (ad Aen. xii. 233) ascribes to an unknown Elasus. Other fragments of Granius are preserved by Festus (s. v. Riace), Macrobius (Sat. i. 18), Arnobius (Adv. Gentes, iii. p. 69, 72, ed. Elmenhorst), and Priscian (Ars Gram. viii. p. 793, ed. Putsch).

Granius Flaccus is not to be confounded with Granius Licinianus, who is cited by Servius (ad Aen. i. 732), and Macrobius (Sat. i. 16). (Ludov. Carrio, Emendat. i. 4; Maianus, ad XXX Ictorum Frag. Comment. vol. ii. p. 129—141; Dirksen, Bruchstücke, &c. p. 61.) [J. T. G.]

FLACCUS, HORDEON'US, was consular legate of the army of Upper Germany at the time of Nero's death (A. D. 68). He was despised by his army, for he was old, a cripple, without firmness, and without influence. When his soldiers renounced allegiance to Galba (Jan. 1. 69 A. D.), he had not the courage to oppose them, though he did not share in their treason. He was left in command of the left bank of the Rhine by Vitellius, when the latter marched to Italy; but he delayed the march of the forces which Vitellius sent for from the Germanies, partly through fear of the insurrection of the Batavians, which soon after broke out, and partly because in his heart he favoured Vespasian. He even requested Civilis to assist in retaining the legions, by pretending to raise a rebellion among the Batavians; which Civilis did, not in pretence, but in earnest. [CIVILIS.] Flaccus took no notice of the first movements of the Batavians, but their success soon compelled him to make at least a show of opposition, and he sent against them his legate, Mummius Lupercus, who was defeated. By the proofs he gave of his unwillingness or inability to put down the insurrection, and by receiving a letter from Vespasian, he exasperated his soldiers, who compelled him to give up the command to VOCULA. Shortly afterwards, in a fresh mutiny during the absence of Vocola, he was accused of treachery by HERENN'US GALLUS, and, as it seems, was bound by the soldiers, but he was released again by Vocola. He still however retained sufficient influence to persuade the army to take the oath to Vespasian, when the news arrived of the battle of Cremona. But the soldiers were still mutinous; and on the arrival of two fresh legions, they demanded a donative out of some money which they knew had been sent by Vespasian. Hordeonius yielded to the demand: the money was spent in feasting and drinking; the soldiers, thus excited, recalled to mind their old quarrel with Hordeonius, and, in the middle of the night, they dragged him from his bed and killed him. (Tac. Hist. i. 9, 52, 54, 56, ii. 57, 97, iv. 13, 18, 19, 24, 25, 27, 31, 36, 55, v. 26; Plut. Galba, 10, 18, 22.) [P. S.]

FLACCUS, MUNATIUS, one of the conspirators against Q. Cassius Longinus, praetor of Hispania Ulterior, B. C. 48. Munatius Flaccus commenced the attack upon Cassius Longinus by killing one of the lictors and wounding the legate, Q. Cassius. Like all the persons involved in that conspiracy, Flaccus was not a Roman, but an Italian. (Hirt. Bell. Alex. 52.) [L. S.]

FLACCUS, NORBA'NUS. 1. C. NORBANUS FLACCUS. In B. C. 42 he and Decidius Saxa were sent by Octavian and Antony with eight legions into Macedonia, and thence they proceeded to Philippi to operate against Brutus and Cassius. They encamped in the neighbourhood of Philippi, and occupied a position which prevented the republicans advancing any further. By a stratagem of Brutus and Cassius, Norbanus was led to quit his position, but he discovered his mistake in time to recover his former position. The republicans advancing by another and longer road, Norbanus withdrew with his army towards Amphipolis, and the republicans, without pursuing Norbanus, encamped near Philippi. When Antony arrived, he was glad to find that Amphipolis was secured, and having strengthened its garrison under Norbanus, he proceeded to Philippi. In B. C. 38, C. Norbanus Flaccus was consul with App. Claudius Pulcher. The C. Norbanus Flaccus, who was consul B. C. 24 with Octavian, was probably a son of the one here spoken of. (Appian, B. C. iv. 87, 103, &c., 106, &c.; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 43, xlvii. 35, xlix. 23, liii. 28; Plut. Brut. 38.)

2. C. NORBANUS FLACCUS, was consul in A. D. 15, the birth year of Vitellius. (Tac. Ann. i. 54; Suet. Viti. 3.) [L. S.]

FLACCUS, PERSIUS. [PERSIUS.]

FLACCUS, POMPONIUS. 1. L. POMPONIUS FLACCUS, was consul in A. D. 17, and in A. D. 51 he was legate in Upper Germany, and fought successfully against the Chatti, for which he was honoured with the ensigns of a triumph. Tacitus says that his fame as a general was not very great, and that it was eclipsed by his renown as a poet. (Tac. Ann. ii. 41, xii. 27, 28.)

2. POMPONIUS FLACCUS, was appointed in A. D. 19 by Tiberius to undertake the administration of Moesia, and to operate against king Rhascupolis, who had killed Cotys, his brother and colleague in the kingdom. Velleius (ii. 129) gives him very high praise; saying that he was a vir natus ad omnia quae recte facienda sunt, simplicique virtute merens semper, non captans gloriam. He was, however, a friend of Tiberius, with whom, on one occasion, he spent one whole night and two days in uninterrupted drinking. (Suet. Tib. 42.) He died in A. D. 34, as praepositor of Syria, where he had been for many years. (Tac. Ann. ii. 32, vi. 27.) Velleius calls him a consular, whence some writers are of opinion that he is the same as L. Pomponius Flaccus, but this opinion is irreconcilable with chronology. (Comp. Or. ex Pont. iv. 3. 75; Masson, Vit. Ovid. ad ann. 769.) [L. S.]

FLACCUS, SICULUS, an author of whom some fragments are preserved in the collection of Agrimensores. [FRONTINUS.] He was an agrimensor by profession, and probably lived shortly after the reign of Nerva. (Fabric. Bibl. Lat. vol. iii. p. 512, ed. Ernesti.) Of the particulars of his life nothing certain is known, and there is no proof that, as Barthius supposed, he was a Christian. In some manuscripts he is named Saeculus Flaccus, but this variation seems to be merely a corrupt spelling.

He wrote a treatise entitled De Conditionibus Agrorum, of which the commencement, perhaps curtailed and interpolated, is preserved in the collection of Agrimensores. It displays considerable legal knowledge, and contains much interesting information. It treats of the distinctions between coloniae, municipia, and praefecturae, between ager occupatorius and ager arcifinus, &c.; and of the distinctions in the mode of limitatio corresponding to distinctions in the condition of the land.

It is confined to land in Italy. Goesius thinks that the author also wrote on land out of Italy, and that the fragment we possess ought to be entitled De Conditionibus Agrorum Italiae. From the two parts of the work of Siculus Flaccus, and from some similar work of Frontinus, he supposes that the treatise De Coloniae (Rei Agrariae Auctoritas), p. 102, Goes., was chiefly compiled, since that compilation cites a Liber Conditionum Italiae, and is ascribed in some manuscripts to the hybrid Julius Frontinus Siculus.

Some fragments of the same, or of a very similar work, have found their way, probably by an accidental transposition of leaves, into the so-called Liber Simplicis (pp. 76, 86, 87, Goes.), which is supposed by modern critics to be a compilation of Aggeus Urbicus.

A similar transposition has happened in another instance. A treatise De Controversiis Agrorum, not unlike (although inferior to) the treatise of Frontinus on the same subject, was first published by Blume in the Rheinisches Museum für Jurisprudenz, vol. v. pp. 142—170. In this treatise, in the midst of the Controversia de Fine, is a long passage of Siculus Flaccus, interpolated from the fragment De Conditionibus Agrorum (from ergo ut dixi, p. 4, to cuae saepe necessariae, p. 9, Goes.). The whole treatise in which this interpolation occurs was attributed by Rudorff to Siculus Flaccus; but Blume, in conformity with the statement of the Codex Aroerianus, assigns it to Hyginus.

The fragment De Conditionibus Agrorum is followed (p. 26, Goes.) by two lists of different kinds of agri and limites, entitled respectively Nomina

The remains of Siculus Flaccus may be found in the collections of the Agrimensores by Turnebus (4to. Paris, 1554), Rigaltius (4to. Lutet. 1614), Goesius (4to. Amst. 1674), and C. Giraud (8vo. Paris, 1843). A separate edition of the fragment De Conditionibus Agrorum was published by J. C. Schwarzius (4to. Coburg, 1711). [J. T. G.]

FLACCUS, STATILIUS (Στατίλλιος Φλάκκος), the author of some epigrams in the Greek Anthology, of whom we know nothing, except what his name implies, that he was a Roman. There are eight epigrams under his name, and also one with the superscription Τυλλίου Φλάκκου, and three inscribed simply, Φλάκκου. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 262; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 238, vol. xiii. p. 955; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 495.) [P. S.]

FLACCUS, L. TARQUITIUS, was magister equitum to the dictator, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, in B. C. 458. Although he belonged to a patrician gens, he was very poor, but was a distinguished warrior. (Liv. iii. 27; Dionys. x. 24.) [L. S.]

FLACCUS, TIBULUS, a writer of mimes, whose age and history are both unknown. A trochaic tetrameter verse from a mimus entitled Melaene, is the only relic of his poems. It is cited under the word "Capularem," by Fulgentius. (Expusit. ant. Serm. p. 564, Nonii Mercer; Bothe, Poet. Scen. Lat. vol. v. p. 273.) [W. B. D.]

2. L. VALERIUS M. F. L. N. FLACCUS, was consul in B. C. 261, with T. Otacilius Crassus, and carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians with little success. (Polyb. i. 20.)

3. P. VALERIUS L. F. M. N. FLACCUS, son of No. 2, was consul in B. C. 227, the year in which the number of praetors was raised to four. (Gell. iv. 3; Liv. Epit. 20.)

4. P. VALERIUS FLACCUS, was sent in B. C. 218, with Q. Baebius Tamphilus, as ambassador to Spain to remonstrate with Hannibal for attacking Saguntum, and thence proceeded to Carthage to announce the intention of the Romans, if Hannibal should not be checked in his proceedings. In B. C. 215 he commanded as legate a detachment of troops, under the consul, M. Claudius Marcellus, at Nola, and distinguished himself in the battle fought there against Hannibal. Shortly after we find him commanding a Roman squadron of 25 sail off the coast of Calabria, where he discovered the embassy which Hannibal sent to Philip of Macedonia, and got possession of letters and documents containing the terms of the treaty between Hannibal and the king. His fleet was increased in consequence, and he was ordered not only to protect the coast of Italy, but also to watch the proceedings of Macedonia. During the siege of Capua, when Hannibal marched towards Rome, Flaccus gave the prudent advice not to withdraw all the troops from Capua, and his opinion was adopted. (Liv. xxi. 6, xxiii. 16, 34, 38, xxvi. 8; Cic. Philipp. v. 10.)

5. VALERIUS FLACCUS, served as tribune of the soldiers under the consul Q. Fulvius Flaccus, in B. C. 212, and distinguished himself by his bravery and boldness during the attack on the camp of Hanno near Beneventum (Liv. xxv. 14).

6. C. VALERIUS P. F. L. N. FLACCUS, was inaugurated as flamen Dialis, in B. C. 209, against his own will, by the pontifex maximus, P. Licinius. He was a young man of a wanton and dissolute character, and for this reason shunned by his own relatives; but after his appointment to the priesthood, his conduct altered so much for the better, and his watchfulness and care in the performance of his duties were so great, that he was admitted into the senate. In B. C. 199 he was created curule aedile; but being flamen Dialis, he could not take the official oath, and his brother, L. Valerius Flaccus (No. 7), who was then praetor designatus, took it for him. (Liv. xxvii. 8, xxxi. 50, xxxii. 7.)

7. L. VALERIUS P. F. L. N. FLACCUS, a brother of No. 6, was curule aedile in B. C. 201, and in the year following he was elected praetor, and received Sicily as his province. In B. C. 195 he was made pontifex, in the place of M. Cornelius Cethegus. In the same year he was invested with the consulship, together with M. Porcius Cato, and received Italy for his province. During the summer he carried on the war against the Boians, and defeated them; 8000 of them were slain, and the rest dispersed in their villages. Flaccus afterwards spent his time on the banks of the Po, at Placentia and Cremona, being occupied in restoring what had been destroyed by war. He remained in the north of Italy also in the year B. C. 194, as proconsul, and in the neighbourhood of Milan he fought with great success against the Gauls, Insubrians, and Boians, who had crossed the Po under their chief, Dorulacus: 10,000 enemies are said to have been killed. In B. C. 191, although a consular, he served as legate under the consul, M. Atilius Glabrio, in the war against the Aetolians and Macedonians. With 2000 picked foot soldiers, he was ordered to occupy Rhoduntia and Tichius. The Macedonians, by a mistake, approached his camp too closely, and, on discovering the enemy, they took to flight in the greatest disorder. Flaccus pursued them, and made great havoc among them. In B. C. 184 he was the colleague of M. Porcius Cato in the censorship, and in the same year he was made princeps senatus. He died as pontifex in B. C. 180, and was succeeded by Q. Fabius Labeo. (Liv. xxxi. 4, 49, 50, xxxii. 1, xxxiii. 42, 43, xxxiv. 21, 46, xxxv. 17, 19, xxxix. 40, &c., 52, xl. 42; Polyb. xx. 9, &c.; Plut. Cat. Maj. 12; Nep. Cat. 2; Oros. iv. 20.)

8. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, a son of No. 4, one of the triumvirs appointed to conduct 6000 families as colonists to Placentia and Cremona, in B. C. 190, those places having become almost deserted by the late war. (Liv. xxxvii. 46.)

10. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, was flamen Martialis, and received the consulship in B. C. 131, with P. Licinius Crassus, then pontifex maximus. Flaccus wished to undertake the command in the war against Aristonicus in Asia, but his colleague fined him for deserting the sacra entrusted to his care. The people, before whom the question was brought for decision, cancelled the fine, but compelled the flamen Flaccus to obey the pontiff Crassus. (Cic. Phil. xi. 8.) He may possibly be the same as the one whose quaestor, M. Aemilius Scaurus, wanted to bring an accusation against him (Cic. Diria, in Caec. 19), though it is uncertain whether Scaurus was quaestor in the praetorship or consulship of Flaccus.

11. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, probably a son of No. 10, and the father of L. Valerius Flaccus, whom Cicero defended. [See No. 15.] When he was curule aedile, the tribune, Decianus, brought an accusation against him. In B. C. 100 he was the colleague of C. Marius, in his sixth consulship. During the disturbances of L. Appuleius Saturninus, the consuls were ordered by the senate to avail themselves of the assistance of the tribunes and praetors, for the purpose of maintaining the dignity of the republic. In consequence of this, Valerius Flaccus put to death Saturninus, Glauca, and others of the revolutionary party. Four years after these occurrences, B. C. 97, he was censor with M. Antonius, the orator. In B. C. 86, when Marius had died, in his seventh consulship, L. Valerius Flaccus was chosen by Cinna as his colleague, in the place of Marius, and received the commission to go into Asia, to resist Sulla, and to bring the war against Mithridates to a close. He was accompanied on this expedition by C. Flavius Fimbria. Flaccus was avaricious, and very cruel in his punishments, whence he was so unpopular with the soldiers, that many of them deserted to Sulla, and the rest were kept together only by the influence of Fimbria, who, taking advantage of the state of affairs, played the part of an indulgent commander, and won the favour of the soldiers. While yet at Byzantium, Fimbria had a quarrel with the quaestor, and the consul, Flaccus, being chosen as arbiter, decided in favour of the quaestor. Fimbria was so indignant, that he threatened to return to Rome, whereupon Flaccus dismissed him from his service. While the latter was sailing to Chalcedon, Fimbria, who had remained at Byzantium, created a mutiny among the soldiers; Flaccus, on being informed of it, hastily returned to chastise the offender, but was compelled to take to flight. He reached Nicomedeia, and shut the gates against his pursuer, but Fimbria had him dragged forth, and murdered him: his head was thrown into the sea, and his body was left unburied. Most authorities place the murder of Flaccus in the year of his consulship, B. C. 86, but Velleius (ii. 23, 24) places it a year later. At the beginning of his consulship, Flaccus had carried a law, by which it was decreed that debts should be cancelled, and only a quadrans be paid to the creditors, and his violent death was regarded as a just punishment for his iniquitous law. (Liv. Epit. 82; Appian, Mithrid. 51, &c., Bell. Civ. i. 75; Plut. Sull. 33; Oros. vi. 2; Cic. pro Flacc. 23, 25, 32, pro Rabir. perd. 7, 10, in Cat. i. 2, Brut. 62; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 5; Dion Cass. Fragm. Peir. No. 127, p. 51, ed. Reimar.) It was probably this Valerius Flaccus who levied the legions which were called, after him, Valerianae, and which are mentioned in the war of Lucullus against Mithridates. (Liv. Epit. 98; Dion Cass. xxxv. 14, 15, 16, xxxvi. 29; Sall. Hist. v.)

12. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS. When Sulla entered Rome, after the defeat of his enemies, he ordered the senate to appoint an interrex: the choice fell upon L. Valerius Flaccus, who immediately brought forward and carried a law that Sulla should be invested with the supreme power (the dictatorship) for an indefinite number of years, and that all the arrangements he had previously made should be sanctioned, and binding as laws. Sulla, on entering upon the dictatorship, made Flaccus his magister equitum. (Plut. Sulla, 33; Appian, B. C. i. 97, &c.; Cic. de Leg. Agr. iii. 2, ad Att. viii. 3; Schol. Gronov. ad Rosciam. p. 435, ed. Orelli.)

13. C. VALERIUS FLACCUS was praetor urbanus in B. C. 98, and, on the authority of the senate, he brought a bill before the people that Calliphana, of Vedia, should receive the Roman franchise. [CALLIPHANA.] In B. C. 93 he was consul, with M. Herennius, and afterwards he succeeded T. Didius as proconsul in Spain. As the Celtiberians, who had been most cruelly treated by his predecessors, revolted in the town of Belgida, and burnt all their senators in the senate-house, because they refused to join the people, Flaccus took possession of the town by surprise, and put to death all those who had taken part in burning the senate-house. (Cic. pro Balb. 24; Schol. Bob. ad Cic. p. Flacc. p. 233, ed. Orelli; Appian, Hispan. 100.)

14. C. VALERIUS FLACCUS is called imperator and proprietor of Gaul in B. C. 83, in the consulship of L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Norbanus. (Cic. pro Quint. 7.) He may possibly be the same as No. 13.

15. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, a son of No. 11, served in Cilicia as tribune of the soldiers, under P. Servilius, in B. C. 78, and afterwards as quaestor, under M. Calpurnius Piso, in Spain. (Cic. pro Flacc. 3.) He was praetor in B. C. 63, the year of Cicero's consulship, who through his assistance got possession of the documents which the Allobrogian ambassadors had received from the accomplices of Catiline. In the year after his praetorship he had the administration of Asia, in which he was succeeded by Q. Cicero. (Cic. pro Flacc. 13, 14, 21, 48.) In B. C. 59 he was accused by D. Laelius of having been guilty of extortion in his province of Asia; but Flaccus, although he was undoubtedly guilty, was defended by Cicero (in the oration pro Flacco, which is still extant) and Q. Hortensius, and was acquitted. (Comp. Cic. in Cat. iii. 2, 6; ad Att. i. 19, ii. 25, in Pison. 23; the oration pro Flacco; pro Planc. 11; Schol. Bob. p. Flacc. p. 228; Sallust, Cat. 45.)

17. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, a son of No. 15. When Cicero defended his father, Lucius was yet a little boy, and the orator introduced him into the court, for the purpose of exciting the pity of the judges. In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Flaccus fought on the side of the latter, and was killed in the battle of Dyrrhachium, B. C. 48. (Cic. pro Flacc. 36, Orat. 38; Caes. B. C. iii. 53.)

18. L. VALERIUS FLACCUS, a flamen of Mars, a contemporary of Cicero, whose brother Quintus had heard him give an account of a marvellous occurrence. (Cic. de Divin. i. 46; Varro, de L. L. vi. 21.) That he cannot be the same as the one mentioned, No. 10, is evident from the dates. Eckhel (Diatr. Num. vol. v. p. 333) believes that he is the same as the Flaccus whom Cicero defended; but the latter is described by Cicero as praetor, whereas our L. Valerius Flaccus is expressly called Flaccus, the flamen of Mars, both by Cicero and Varro.

19. P. VALERIUS FLACCUS, the accuser of Carbo. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 21.) [L. S.]

There are several coins of the Valeria gens belonging to the family of the Flacci. Of these, three specimens are given below. The first has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse

Victory in a biga, with C. VA. C. F. FLAC. The second has on the obverse the head of Victory, and on the reverse the military standard of an eagle, between two other military standards, with C. VAL. FLA. IMPERAT. EX. S. C. This C. Valerius Flaccus may be the same as No. 14, whom Cicero calls Imperator. The third coin has on the obverse the head of Victory, and on the reverse Mars standing between an apex (Dict. of Ant. &c.) and an ear of corn, with L. VALERII FLACCI. The apex shows that this L. Flaccus was a flamen, and he may therefore have been either the L. Flaccus consul in B. C. 131 [No. 10], who was a flamen of Mars, or the L. Flaccus, a contemporary of Cicero [No. 18], who was also a flamen of Mars. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 333.)

FLACCUS, C. VALE'RIUS. All that is known or that can be conjectured with plausibility in regard to this writer may be comprehended in a very few words. From the expressions of his friend Martial (i. 62, 77), we learn that he was a native of Padua; from the exordium of his piece, we infer that it was addressed to Vespasian, and published while Titus was achieving the subjugation of Judea; from a notice in Quintilian, Dodwell has drawn the conclusion that he must have died about A. D. 88. The lines (v. 5),

"Phoebe, mone, si Cymaeae mihi conscia vatis Stat casta cortina domo," whatever may be their import, are not in themselves sufficient to prove, as Pius and Heinsius imagine, that he was a member of the sacred college of the Quindecimviri; and the words Setinus Balbus, affixed to his name in certain MSS., are much too doubtful in their origin and signification to serve as the basis of any hypothesis, even if we were certain that they applied to the poet himself, and not to some commentator on the text, or to some individual who may at one time have possessed the codex which formed the archetype of a family.

The only work of Flaccus now extant is an unfinished heroic poem in eight books, on the Argonautic expedition, in which he follows the general plan and arrangement of Apollonius Rhodius, whose performance he in some passages literally translates, while in others he contracts or expands his original, introduces new characters, and on the whole devotes a larger portion of the action to the adventures of the voyage before the arrival of the heroes at the dominions of Aëtes. The eighth book terminates abruptly, at the point where Medea is urging Jason to make her the companion of his homeward journey. The death of Abayrtus, and the return of the Greeks, must have occupied at least three or four books more, but whether these have been lost, or whether the author died before the completion of his task, we cannot tell.

The Argonautica is one of those productions which are much praised and little read. A kind but vague expression of regret upon the part of Quintilian (x. 1), "Multum in Valerio Flacco nuper amissimus," has induced many of the older critics to ascribe to Flaccus almost every conceivable merit; and, even in modern times, Wagner has not hesitated to rank him next to Virgil among the epic bards of Rome. But it is difficult to discover any thing in his lays beyond decent mediocrity. We may accord to him the praise of moderate talents, improved by industry and learning, but we shall seek in vain for originality, or the higher attributes of genius. He never startles us by any gross offence against taste, but he never warms us by a brilliant thought, or charms us by a lofty flight of fancy. His diction is for the most part pure, although strange words occasionally intrude themselves, and common words are sometimes employed in an uncommon sense; his general style is free from affectation, although there is a constant tendency to harsh conciseness, which frequently renders the meaning obscure; his versification is polished and harmonious, but the rhythm is not judiciously varied; his descriptions are lively and vigorous, but his similes too often far-fetched and unnatural. He has attained to somewhat of the outward form, but to nothing of the inward spirit, of his great model, the Aeneid.

Valerius Flaccus seems to have been altogether unknown in the middle ages, and to have been first brought to light by Poggio Brocciolini, who, while attending the council of Constance in 1416, discovered in the monastery of St. Gall [see ASCONIUS] a MS. containing the first three books, and a portion of the fourth. The Editio Princeps was printed very incorrectly, from a good MS., at Bologna, by Ugo Rugerius and Dominus Bertochus, fol. 1472; the second edition, which is much more rare than the first, at Florence, by Sanctus Jacobus de Ripoli, 4to, without date, but about 1431. The text was gradually improved by the collation of various MSS. in the editions of Jo. Bapt. Pius, Bonon. fol. 1519; of Lud. Carrio, Antv. 8vo. 1565—1566; of Nicolaus Heinsius, Amst. 12mo. 1680; and above all in that of Petrus Burmannus, Leid. 4to., 1724, which must be regarded as the most complete which has yet appeared; although those of Harles, Altenb. 8vo. 1761; of Wagner, Gotting. 8vo. 1805; and of Lemaire, Paris, 8vo. 1824, are more convenient for ordinary purposes. The eighth book was published separately, with critical notes and dissertations on some verses supposed to be spurious, by A. Weichert, Misn. 8vo. 1818.

We have metrical translations,—into English by Nicholas Whyte, 1565, under the title "The story of Jason, how he gotte the golden flece, and how he did begyle Media; out of Laten into Engliche;"—into French by A. Dureau de Lamalle, Paris, 1811;—into Italian by M. A. Pindemonte, Verona, 1776;—and into German by C. F. Wunderlich, Erfurt, 1805.

FLACCUS, VER'RIUS, a freedman by birth, and a distinguished grammarian, in the latter part of the first century A. C. His reputation as a teacher of grammar, or rather philology, procured him the favour of Augustus, who took him into his household, and entrusted him with the education of his grandsons, Caius and Lucius Caesar. Flaccus lodged in a part of the palace which contained the Atrium Catilinae. This was his lecture-room, where he was allowed to continue his instructions to his former scholars, but not to admit any new pupils, after he became preceptor of the young Caesars. If we receive Ernesti's correction of Suetonius (Octav. 86), it was the pure and perspicuous Latinity of Verrius, not Veranius, Flaccus, which Augustus contrasted with the harsh and obsolete diction of Anniius Cimber. Flaccus received a yearly salary of more than 800*l*. He died at an advanced age, in the reign of Tiberius.

At the lower end of the market-place at Praeneste was a statue of Verrius Flaccus, fronting the Hemicycleum, on the inner curve of which, so as to be visible to all persons in the forum (Vitr. v. 1), were set up marble tablets, inscribed with the Fasti Verriani. These should be distinguished from the Fasti Praenestini. The latter, like the similar Fasti of Aricium, Tibur, Tusculum, &c. were the town-records. But the Fasti of Flaccus were a calendar of the days and vacations of public business—diēs fasti, nefasti, and interdiēs—of religious festivals, triumphs, &c., especially including such as were peculiar to the family of the Caesars. In 1770 the foundations of the Hemicycleum of Praeneste were discovered, and among the ruins were found portions of an ancient calendar, which proved to be fragments of the Fasti Verriani. Further portions were recovered in subsequent excavations, and Foggini, an Italian antiquary, reconstructed from them the entire months of January, March, April, and December, and a small portion of February was afterwards annexed. (Franc. Foggini, Fastorum Ann. Roman. Reliquiae, &c. Rom. 1779, fol.; and Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Fasti.) They are also given at the end of Wolf's edition of Suetonius, 8vo. Lips. 1802, and in Orelli's Inscriptiones Latinae, vol. ii. p. 379.

Flaccus was an antiquary, an historian, a philologist, and perhaps a poet; at least Priscian (viii. p. 792) ascribes to him an hexameter line, "Blauditusque labor molli curabitur arte." It is seldom possible to assign to their proper heads the fragments of his numerous writings. But the following works may be attributed to him:—An historical collection or compendium, entitled Rerum Memoriarum Dignarum, of which A. Gellius (iv. 5) cites the first book for the story of the Etruscan armipices, who gave perfidious counsel to Rome (Niebuhr, Hist. Rome, vol. i. p. 543); a History of the Etruscans—Rerum Etruscorum—(Intpp. ad Aen. x. 183, 198, ed. Mai; compare also Serr. ad Aen. vii. 53, viii. 203, xi. 143); a treatise, De Orthographia (Suet. Ill. Gramm. 17). This work drew upon Flaccus the anger of a rival teacher of philology, Scribonius Aphrodisius, who wrote a reply, and mixed up with the controversy reflections on the learning and character of Flac-

ous. Flaccus was also the author of a work entitled Saturæ, or Saturnalia (Macrob. Saturn. i. 4, 8), and of another, De Obiculis Catonis, on the archaisms used by Cato the Censor: the second book of which is cited by A. Gellius (xvii. 6). Besides the preceding references, Flaccus is quoted by Gellius (v. 17, 18), who refers to the fourth book, De Significatu Verborum, of Flaccus, while discussing the difference between history and annals (see also xvi. 14, xviii. 7), and by Macrobius (Saturn. i. 10, 12, 16). Flaccus is cited by Pliny in his Emendat. (H. N. 1), or summary of the materials of his Historia Naturalis, generally (Lib. i. iii. vii. viii. xiv. xv. xviii. xxix. xxxiii. xxxiv. xxxv.), and specially, but without distinguishing the particular work of Flaccus which he consulted (H. N. vii. 53, a. 54, mortis repentinae; viii. 6, elephantos in circo; ix. 23, a. 39, prolestatos murmurant tergore verberatos; xvii. 7, a. 11, far P. Rom. victus; xxviii. 2. § 4, Deorum evocatio; xxxiii. 3. § 19, Tarquinius Prisci aurea tunica; 16, 7. § 36, Jocis facies minio illita). Flaccus is also referred to by Lactantius (Instit. i. 20), by Arnobius (adv. Gent. i. 59), and by Isidorus (Orig. xiv. 2. § 33). But the work which more than any other embodies the fragments of an author, whose loss to classical antiquity is probably second only to that of Varro, is the treatise, De Verborum Significatione, of Festus. Festus abridged a work of the same kind, and with probably a similar title, by Verrius Flaccus, from which also some of the extracts in Gellius and Macrobius, and the citations in the later grammarians, Priscianus, Diomedes, Charisius, and Velius Longus, are probably taken. Of this work of Flaccus, a full account is given under FESTUS. (Sueton. Ill. Gramm. 17; K. O. Müller, Præfatio ad Pompeium Festum, Lipsæ. 1839.) [W. B. D.]

FLACCUS, VESCVLARIUS, a Roman eques in the confidence of the emperor Tiberius, to whom he betrayed Scribonius Libo in A. D. 16. [DABNEY, No. 10.] It is uncertain whether the Vesicularius condemned by Tiberius in A. D. 32 be the same person, some MSS. reading Atticus, others Flaccus, as the cognomen. (Tac. Ann. ii. 28, vi. 10.) [W. B. D.]

FLACILLA, or FLACCILLA, AE'LIA (in Greg. Nysa. Παδριλλα, in Chron. Alex. Φαδριλλα), first wife of Theodosius the Great. Several moderns infer from an obscure passage in Themistius (Orat. xvi. De Saturnino), that she was the daughter of Antonius, who was consul A. D. 382, but this is very doubtful. She appears to have been born in Spain (Claudian, Lous Sereas, vs. 69), and to have had a sister, the mother of Nebridius, who was married after A. D. 388 to Salvina, daughter of Gildo, the Moor. (Hieron. Epist. ad Salvina. vol. iv. p. 663, ed. Benedict.) Flaccilla had at least three children by Theodosius,—namely, Arcadius, born about A. D. 377, Honorius, born A. D. 384, both afterwards emperors; and Pulcheria, who was apparently born before 379, as Claudian (Lous Sereas. 113, 136) intimates that Theodosius had more than one child when raised to the throne. This Pulcheria died before her mother, and Gregory Nysæus composed a consolatory discourse upon the occasion. Some have supposed that she had another child, Gratian, but without reason. (Ambros. De Obitu Theodosii. Oratio, where see note of the Benedictine editors.) Flaccilla herself died A. D. 385, at a place called Scoteumin, in Thrace, and

Gregory Nysæus, composed a funeral discourse for her. All writers conspire to praise Flaccilla for her piety, and charity, and orthodoxy, and she has been canonized in the Greek Church. (Greg. Nysa. Orat. Funeb. pro Flaccilla; Theodoret. Hist. Eccl. v. 19; Themist. De Human. Theodos. Imp.; Sosom. Hist. Eccles. vii. 6; Chron. Alex. v. Paschal. p. 563, ed. Bonn.; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. v. pp. 143, 192, 252.) [J. C. M.]

COIN OF FLACCILLA.

FLAMEN, Q. CLAUDIUS, prætor B. C. 209, the eleventh year of the second Punic war. His province was the Salentine district and Tarentum, and he succeeded M. Marcellus in the command of two legions, forming the third division of the Roman army, then in the field against Hannibal. (Liv. xxvii. 21, 22.) He was prætor a. c. 207, and his command was prolonged through the next year. (xxviii. 43, xxviii. 10.) In 207, while Flamen was in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, his outposts brought in two Numidians, the bearers of letters from Hasdrubal at Placentia to Hannibal at Metapontum. Flamen wrung from them the secret of their being entrusted with letters and then despatched the Numidians, strongly guarded, with the letters unopened to the consul, Claudius Nero. [Næro.] The discovery of the letters saved Rome; for they were sent to apprise Hannibal of his brother's presence in Italy, and to arrange the junction of their armies. [W. B. D.]

FLAMINIA GENS, plebeian. During the first five centuries of Rome no mention is made of any member of the Flaminia Gens. The name is evidently a derivative from flamen, and seems to have originally denoted a servant of a flamen. (Paul. Diac. s. vv. Flaminium Camillus, Flaminium Lactor.) In former times the Flaminii were believed to be only a family of the Quintia gens; but this opinion arose from a confusion of the Flaminii with the Flaminini, the latter of whom belonged to the ancient patrician Quintia gens. The only family names of the Flaminia gens that we know are CHILO and FLAMMA. There is no evidence for the cognomen Nepos, which Orelli (Onom. Tull. ii. p. 254) gives to the Flaminii who fell in the battle at lake Trasimene. [L. S.]

FLAMINI'NUS, a family-name of the patrician Quintia gens. 1. K. QUINTIUS FLAMINI'NUS, was one of the duumviri, who, in B. C. 216, were ordered to contract for the building of the temple of Concordia, which had been vowed two years before by the prætor, L. Manlius. (Liv. xxii. 33.)

3. L. QUINTIUS FLAMINI'NUS, a brother of the great T. Quintius Flamininus, was curule ædile in B. C. 200, and the year after was invested with the city prætorship. When his brother Titus, in B. C. 198, undertook the war against Philip of Macedonia, Lucius received the command of the Roman fleet, and had to protect the coasts of Italy. He first sailed to Corcyra, and having met his fleet near the island of Zama, and received it from his predecessor, L. Apustius, he slowly proceeded to Malea, and thence to Peiræus, to join the ships which had been stationed there for the protection of Athens. Soon after he was joined by the allied fleets of Attalus and the Rhodians, and the combined fleets now undertook the siege of Eretria, which was occupied by a Macedonian garrison. Its inhabitants dreaded the Romans as much as the Macedonians, and were uncertain what to do; but Lucius took the place at night by assault. The citizens surrendered, and the conquerors' booty consisted chiefly of works of art which had adorned the town. Carystus immediately after surrendered to him without a blow. Having thus, in the space of a few days, gained possession of the two principal towns of Euboea, Flamininus sailed towards Cenchræe, the port of Corinth, where he made preparations for besieging Corinth. By the command of his brother Titus, Lucius and his naval allies sent ambassadors to the Achæans to win them over to their side. Most of them were persuaded to take up the cause of the Romans, and sent their troops to join Lucius in the siege of Corinth. Lucius had in the mean time taken Cenchræe, and was already engaged in the siege of Corinth. A fierce battle had been fought, in which Lucius and his Romans were beaten. When his forces were strengthened by the arrival of the Achæans, they equalled in number those of the enemy, and he continued his operations with better hopes of success. But the defence made by the Corinthian garrison was desperate, for there were among the besieged a great number of Italians, who in the war with Hannibal had deserted from the service of the Romans. Hence Lucius at length despaired of success; he gave up the siege, and returned to his fleet, with which he sailed to Corcyra, while Attalus went to Peirææus. As his brother's imperium was prolonged for another year, Lucius also retained the command of the fleet in A.C. 197. He accompanied his brother to the congress with the tyrant Nabis at Argos. Just before the battle of Cynoscephalæ, Lucius, who was informed of the intention of the Acarnanians to join the Romans, sailed to Leucas, the chief place of the Acarnanians, and began to blockade it for the purpose of trying their intention. But the inhabitants resisted, and the town was taken by storm. The inhabitants were resolved to defend themselves to the last, and a great massacre took place; but when the news of the battle of Cynoscephalæ arrived, all the tribes of Acarnania submitted to the Romans. In A.C. 195, when T. Flamininus marched against Nabis, Lucius went out with 40 sail to join him in his operations: he took several maritime towns, some of which were conquered by force, while others submitted voluntarily, and he then proceeded to Gythium, the great arsenal of Sparta. When Titus began besieging the same place by land, Gorgopæ, the commander of the garrison, treacherously surrendered the town to the Romans.

In A.C. 193, L. Flamininus sued for the consulship, and, as the remembrance of his exploits in Greece and of his subsequent triumph was yet fresh, he was elected for the year 192, together with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. He received Gaul as his province, and was ordered to hold the comitia. While on his march into his province, he fell in with the Ligurians in the neighbourhood of Pisa, and gained a great battle: 9000 enemies fell, and the rest fled to their camp, which was then besieged. In the night following, however, the Ligurians made their escape, and the next morning the deserted camp fell into the hands of the Romans. Lucius then advanced into the country of the Boians, of which he ravaged the parts through which he passed. Towards the end of the year he went to Rome to conduct the elections for the next year, and when this was done, he returned to the country of the Boians, who submitted to him without taking up arms. Upon his return to Rome, he levied a large army, at the command of the senate, that the new consuls, immediately after entering upon their office, might have forces ready to set out against Antiochus. In A.C. 191 he was appointed legate to the consul M'. Acilius Glabrio, who had to conduct the war in Greece. In A.C. 184, M. Porcius Cato, who was then censor, ejected L. Quintius Flamininus from the senate, and then delivered a most severe speech against him for crimes which he had committed seven years before in his consulship. Among the various charges he brought against Lucius, there is one which exhibits him in a truly diabolical light. It seems that he had become acquainted in Greece with the vice of paederastia, and when in his consulship he went to the north of Italy, he took with him his favourite youth, a young Carthaginian, of the name of Philippus. This youth had often complained that Flamininus had never afforded him an opportunity of seeing a gladiatorial exhibition. Once while Flamininus and his favourite were feasting and drinking in their tent, there came a noble Boian, who, with his children, took refuge in the consul's camp. He was introduced into the tent, and stated through an interpreter what he had to say. Before he had finished Flamininus asked his favourite whether he would not like to see a Gaul die, and scarcely had the youth answered in the affirmative, when Flamininus struck the Boian's head with his sword, and when the man endeavoured to escape, imploring the assistance of the bystanders, the consul ran his sword through his body and killed him for the amusement of the contemptible youth. Valerius Antias related a similar and equally horrible crime of this Flamininus. He died in A.C. 170, holding at the time a priestly office. 4. T. QUINTIUS FLAMININUS. As he is said to have been about thirty-three years old in A.C. 196, he must have been born about A.C. 230. (Liv. xxxiii. 33.) He is called by Aurelius Victor (De Vir. Illust. 51) a son of C. Flamininus, who fell in the battle on Lake Trasimenus; but this statement arises from a confusion of the Flaminia gens with the family of the Flaminii. [FLAMINIA GENS.] He was the brother of L. Quintius Flamininus [No. 3], and is first mentioned in history in A.C. 201, when he was appointed one of the ten commissioners to measure and distribute the public land in Samnium and Apulia among the veterans who had fought under P. Scipio in Africa, against the Carthaginians, and the year after he was one of the triumvirs appointed to complete the number of colonists at Venusia, which had been greatly reduced during the Hannibalian war. In A.C. 199 he was quaestor, and towards the expiration of his office he sued for the consulship. He was opposed by two tribunes, who maintained that he ought first to go through the offices of ædile and prætor, before aiming at the consulship; but as he had reached the legitimate age, the senate declared that he was entitled to offer himself as a candidate. The tribunes yielded, and T. Quintius Flamininus was elected consul for B. C. 198, together with Sex. Aelius Paetus. When the two consuls drew lots for their provinces, T. Flamininus obtained Macedonia. According to a resolution of the senate, he levied an army of 3000 foot and 300 horse, as a supplement for the army engaged against Philip of Macedonia, and he selected such men as had already distinguished themselves in Spain and Africa. Some prodigies detained him for a short time in Rome, as the gods had to be propitiated by a supplication; but he then hastened without delay to his province, instead of spending the first months of his consulship at Rome, as had been the custom with his predecessors. He sailed from Brundisium to Coreyra, where he left his troops to follow him, for he himself sailed to Epeirus, and thence hastened to the Roman camp. After having dismissed his predecessor, he waited a few days, till the troops from Coreyra arrived in the camp; he then held a council, to deliberate by what route he should invade Macedonia. He there showed at once that he was animated by a bold and heroic spirit: he did not despair of what appeared impossible to every one else, for he resolved to storm the pass of Antigoneia, which was occupied by the enemy, instead of going a round-about way. He trusted, however, in this undertaking to the assistance of the Roman party in Epeirus, which was headed by Charops; and he further hoped to pave his way into Greece, where he wished to detach one state after another from the cause of Macedonia, and thus to crush Philip more effectually. For forty days he faced the enemy, without a favourable opportunity of attacking the enemy being offered. Philip had from the first conceived the hope of concluding a favourable treaty with the Romans, and, through the mediation of the Epeirota, he began to negotiate, but Flamininus demanded first of all the liberation of Greece and Thessaly. This bold demand of the young hero, before he had gained an inch of ground, was equivalent to a call upon the Greeks to throw off the yoke of Macedonia. An event, however, soon occurred which enabled Flamininus to rise from his inactivity: there was a path across the mountains, by which the pass of Antigoneia could be evaded, as at Thermopylae, and this path was either unknown to Philip, or neglected by him, because he did not fear any danger from that quarter. Charops informed Flamininus of the existence of the path, and sent a man well acquainted with it as his guide. The consul then sent 4300 men, accompanied by the guide, across the mountain, and in a few days they arrived in the rear of the Macedonians. The latter, being thus pressed on both sides, made a short resistance, and then fled in great consternation towards Thessaly: 2000 men were lost, and their camp fell into the hands of the Romans. Epeirus immediately submitted to Flamininus, and was mildly treated, for his ambition was to appear every where as the deliverer from the Macedonians.

The consul and his army now marched through the passes into Thessaly. Here Philip, in order to leave nothing for the enemy to take, had ravaged the country and destroyed the towns. Flamininus laid siege to Phaloria, the first Thessalian town to which he came, and, after a brave resistance of its garrison, it was taken by storm, and reduced to a heap of ashes, as a warning to the other Greeks. But this severity did not produce the desired effect, nor did it facilitate his progress, for the principal towns were strongly garrisoned, and the Macedonian army was encamped in Tempe, whence the king could easily send succours to his allies. Flamininus next besieged Charax, on the Peneius, but in spite of his most extraordinary exertions, and even partial success, the heroic defence of its inhabitants thwarted all his attempts, and in the end he was obliged to raise the siege. He fearfully ravaged the country, and marched into Phocis, where several places and maritime towns, which enabled him to communicate with the fleet under the command of his brother Lucius, opened their gates to him; but Elateia, the principal place, which was strongly fortified, offered a brave resistance, and for a time checked his progress. While he was yet engaged there, his brother Lucius, at his request, contrived to draw the Achaean league into an alliance with the Romans, which was effected the more easily, as Aristænetus, then strategus of the Achæans, was well disposed towards Rome. Megalopolis, however, Dyme, and Argos, remained faithful to Macedonia.

After capturing Elateia, Flamininus took up his winter-quarters in Phocis and Locris; but he had not been there long when an insurrection broke out at Opus, in which the Macedonian garrison was compelled to withdraw to the acropolis. Some of the citizens called in the assistance of the Aetolians, and others that of the Romans. The former came, but the gates were not opened till Flamininus arrived, and took possession of the town. This seems to have been the first cause of the ill feeling of the Aetolians towards the Romans. The Macedonian garrison remained in the acropolis, and Flamininus for the present abstained from besieging them, as king Philip had just made proposals of peace. Flamininus accepted the proposals, but only with the view of employing them as a means of satisfying his own ambition; for as he did not yet know whether he was to be left in his province for another year, his object was to give matters such a turn as to have it in his own power to decide upon war or peace. A congress was held at the Malean gulf, in the neighbourhood of Nicaea, which lasted for three days. Flamininus and his allies, among whom the Aetolians distinguished themselves by their invectives against Philip, who was present, drew up a long list of demands, and the conditions of a peace: the principal demand, however, was, that Philip should withdraw his garrisons from all the towns of Greece. The allies of the Romans were of opinion that the negotiations should be broken off at once, unless Philip would consent to this fundamental condition; but the consul, whose object it was to defer giving any decision, acted with very great diplomatic skill. At last a truce of two months was concluded, during which ambassadors of both parties were sent to Rome. The condition, however, on which Philip was permitted to send his ambassadors was, the evacuation of the towns in Phocis and Locris which were still in his possession. When the ambassadors arrived at Rome, those of Flamininus and his allies acted according to the dictates of the consul: they declared that Greece could not possibly be free, so long as Demetrias, Chalcis, and Corinth were occupied by Macedonian garrisons, and that, unless Philip withdrew his garrisons, the war ought to be continued, and that it would now be an easy matter to compel the king to submit to the terms of the Romans. When Philip's ambassadors were asked whether their king was willing to give up the three fortresses just mentioned, they replied that they had no instructions to answer that question. The senate then dismissed them, and told them that if their sovereign wanted to negotiate further, he must apply to Flamininus, to whom the senate gave full power to act as he thought proper, and whose imperium was now prolonged for an indefinite period. Flamininus, after having thus gained his end, declared to Philip, that if any further negotiations were to be carried on, he must first of all withdraw his garrisons from the Greek towns. The king, on hearing this, resolved to venture any thing rather than yield to such a demand, although his army was in an incomparably inferior condition to that of the Romans. Philip immediately took steps to form an alliance with Nabis, the tyrant of Sparta. When every thing was prepared, and Nabis had treacherously put himself in possession of Argos, he invited Flamininus to a conference at Argos, where a treaty between Flamininus and Sparta was concluded without any difficulty, for the Romans demanded only auxiliaries, and the cessation of hostilities against the Achaeans. Nabis remained in the possession of Argos, but no clause respecting it was inserted in the treaty. When Flamininus had received the auxiliaries of Nabis, he marched against Corinth, hoping that the commander of its garrison, Philocles, a friend of Nabis, would follow the tyrant's example, but in vain. Flamininus then went into Boeotia, which he compelled to renounce the alliance with Philip, and to join the Romans. Most of the Boeotian men, however, capable of bearing arms, were serving in the Macedonian army, and afterwards fought against the Romans. The Acarnanians were the only allies of Macedonia that remained faithful.

In the spring of B. C. 197, Flamininus left his winter-quarters to enter upon his second campaign against Philip. His army, which was already strengthened by the Achaeans and other auxiliaries, was increased at Thermopylae by a considerable number of Aetolians. He advanced slowly into Phthiotia. Philip, at the head of his army, which was about equal in numbers to that of his opponent, advanced more rapidly towards the south, and was determined to seize the first favourable opportunity for fighting a decisive battle. After a skirmish between the Roman and Macedonian cavalry, near Pherae, in which the Romans gained the upper hand, both belligerents moved towards Pharsalus and Scotussa. A battle ensued near a range of hills called Cynoscephalae (Dog's heads), in which the fate of Macedonia was decided in a few hours: 8000 Macedonians were killed in their flight, and 5000 were taken prisoners, while Flamininus lost only 700 men. The result of this battle was, that the towns of Thessaly surrendered to the Romans, and Philip sued for peace. The Aetolians, who had been of great service during the battle, now showed their arrogance and pretensions in a manner which wounded the pride of Flamininus:

they boasted that he had to thank them for his victory, and their vaunting was believed by many Greeks. Flamininus in return treated them with haughtiness and contempt, and, without consulting them, he granted to Philip a truce of fifteen days, and permission to begin negotiations for peace, while the Aetolians desired nothing short of the entire destruction of the Macedonian empire. They even went so far as to say that Flamininus was bribed by the king. The consequence was, that they derived less advantages from the victory at Cynoscephalae than they had in reality deserved, and Philip only profited by the disunion thus existing between the Romans and their allies. Flamininus felt inclined to conclude peace with Philip, for his own ambition was satisfied, and Antiochus of Syria was threatening to come over to Europe and assist Philip against the Romans. When, therefore, Philip, at a meeting which he had with Flamininus, declared himself willing to conclude peace on the terms proposed before the opening of the campaign, and to submit all further points to the Roman senate, Flamininus at once concluded a truce for several months, and embassies from both parties were sent to Rome.

After the battle of Cynoscephalae Flamininus had generously restored to freedom all the Boeotians that had served in Philip's army and were taken prisoners. But, instead of thanking him for it, they acted as if they owed their delivery to Philip, and even insulted the Romans by conferring the office of boeotarchus upon the man who had been their commander in the Macedonian army. The Roman party at Thebes, however, soon after secretly caused his assassination, with the knowledge of Flamininus. When this became known, the people conceived a burning hatred of the Romans, whose army was stationed in and about Elateia in Phocia. All the Romans who had to travel through Boeotia, were murdered and their bodies left unburied on the roads. The number of persons who thus lost their lives, is said to have amounted to 500. After Flamininus had in vain demanded reparation for these crimes, he began ravaging Boeotia, and blockaded Coroneia and Acraephia, near which places most of the bodies of the murdered Romans had been found. This frightened the Boeotians, and they now sent envoys to Flamininus, who, however, refused to admit them into his presence; but the mediation of the Achaeans prevailed upon him to treat the Boeotians leniently. He accordingly made peace with them, on condition of their delivering up to him the guilty persons, and paying thirty talents as a reparation, instead of 100 which he had demanded before.

In the spring of B. C. 196, and shortly after the peace with Boeotia, ten Roman commissioners arrived in Greece to arrange, conjointly with Flamininus, the affairs of the country; they also brought with them the terms on which a definite peace was to be concluded with Philip. He had to give up all the Greek towns in Europe and Asia which he had possessed and still possessed. The Aetolians again exerted themselves to excite suspicions among the Greeks as to the sincerity of the Romans in their dealings with them. Flamininus, however, insisted upon immediate compliance with the terms of the peace, and Corinth was at once given over to the Achaeans. In this summer the Isthmian games were celebrated at Corinth, and thousands of people from all parts of Greece flocked thither. Flaminius accompanied by the ten commissioners entered the assembly, and, at his command, a herald, in the name of the Roman senate, proclaimed the freedom and independence of Greece. The joy and enthusiasm at this unexpected declaration was beyond all description: the throngs of people that crowded around Flaminius to catch a sight of their liberator or touch his garment were so enormous, that even his life was endangered.

When the festive days were over, Flaminius and the ten commissioners set about settling the affairs of Greece, especially of those districts and towns which had till then been occupied by the Macedonians. Thessaly was divided into four separate states, — Magnesia, Perrhaebia, Dolopia, and Thesprotia: the Aetolians received back Ambracia, Phocis, and Locris; they claimed more, but they were referred to the Roman senate, and the senate again referred them to Flaminius, so that they were obliged to acquiesce in his decision. The Achaeans received all the Macedonian possessions in Peloponnesus, and, as a particular favour towards Athens, Flaminius extended her dominions also.

The peace thus established in Greece by the victory over Macedonia did not last long, for the alliance of the Romans with Nabis was as disagreeable to the Romans as it was disgraceful, and in the spring of a. c. 195 Flaminius was invested with full power by the Roman senate to act towards Nabis as he might think proper. He forthwith convoked a meeting of the Greeks at Corinth. All were delighted at the hope of getting rid of this monster of a tyrant, and it was only the Aetolians who again gave vent to their hostile feelings towards the Romans. But the war against Nabis was decreed, and after receiving reinforcements from the Achaeans, Philip, Eumenes of Pergamus, and the Rhodians, Flaminius marched to Argos, the Laedaeonian garrison of which was commanded by Pythagoras, the brother-in-law of Nabis. As the people of Argos, being kept down by the strong garrison, did not rise in a body against their oppressors, Flaminius resolved to leave Argos and march into Laconia. Nabis, although his army was inferior to that of his opponents, made preparations for a most vigorous defence. Two battles were fought under the walls of Sparta, in which Nabis was beaten; but Flaminius abstained from besieging the tyrant in his own capital; he ravaged the country and endeavoured to cut off the supplies. With the assistance of his brother Lucius he took the populous and strongly fortified town of Gythium. The unexpected fall of this place convinced Nabis that he could not hold out much longer, and he sued for peace. Flaminius, who feared lest a successor should be sent into his province, was not disinclined to come to some arrangement with Nabis. His allies, on the other hand, urged the necessity of exterminating his tyranny completely; but the Romans looked at the state of things in a different light, and probably thought Nabis an useful check upon the Achaeans; Flaminius, therefore, without openly opposing his allies, brought them round to his views by various considerations. But the terms on which peace was offered to Nabis were rejected, and Flaminius now advanced against Sparta and tried to take the place by assault; and, as he was on the point of making a second attempt, in which Sparta would probably have fallen into his hands, Nabis again began to negotiate for peace, and was glad to obtain it on the terms he had before rejected. The Argives, who had heard of the probable reduction of Sparta, had expelled their Spartan garrison. Flaminius now went to Argos, attended the celebration of the Nemean games, and proclaimed the freedom of Argos, which was made over to the Achaeans.

In the winter following Flaminius exerted himself, as he had done hitherto, in restoring the internal peace and welfare of Greece, for there can be no doubt that he loved the Greeks, and it was his noble ambition to be their benefactor, and wherever his actions appear at variance with this object, he was under the influence of the policy of his country. The wisdom of several of his arrangements is attested by their long duration. In order to refute the malignant insinuations of the Aetolians, Flaminius prevailed upon the Roman senate to withdraw the Roman garrisons from Acrocorinth, Chalcia, Demetrias, and the other Greek towns, before his departure from the country. When the affairs of Greece were thus satisfactorily settled, he convoked, in the spring of a. c. 194, an assembly of the Greeks at Corinth, to take leave of his beloved people. He parted from them like a father from his children, exhorting them to use their freedom wisely, and to remain faithful to Rome. Before he left he performed another act of humanity which history ought not to pass over. During the Hannibalian war a number of Romans had been taken prisoners, and, as the republic refused to ransom them, they were sold as slaves, and many of them had been bought by the Greeks. Flaminius now prevailed on the Roman senate to grant him a sum of money for the purpose of purchasing the liberty of those men. On his return to Rome, he celebrated a magnificent triumph which lasted for three days.

Soon after the Romans had quitted Greece, Antiochus of Syria, and Nabis of Sparta, were instigated by the Aetolians to take up arms against Rome. Nabis did not require much persuasion. He besieged Gythium, which was occupied by the Achaeans. The Roman senate, which was informed of every thing that was going on in Greece, sent a fleet under C. Atilius, a. c. 192, and an embassy, headed by Flaminius, who had more influence there than any one else, and who was to exercise it, partly to keep up the good understanding with the allies of Rome, and partly to make new friends. He arrived in Greece before Atilius, and advised the Greeks not to undertake any thing before the arrival of the Roman fleet. But as the danger which threatened Gythium required quick action, the war against Nabis was decreed. The tyrant was reduced to the last extremity, and Philopoemen had it in his power to decide his downfall by one more blow, but it was prevented by Flaminius, partly from the same political motives which had before induced him to spare Nabis, and partly because his ambition was wounded by the dislike with which the Greeks had regarded and still regarded the peace which he had concluded with Nabis. Flaminius was invested with full power; and he might have destroyed the evil at once at its root, but he preferred carrying out the scheme of the Roman policy: Philopoemen was checked in his progress, and obliged to conclude a truce with Nabis. Antiochus was now making serious preparations to cross over into Greece; and Flaminius, by various favourable promises, induced Philip of Macedonia to join the Romans in the impending war. The intrigues of the Aetolians, on the other hand, alienated several important places from the cause of Rome. The arrival of Antiochus in Greece increased their number. Flaminius attended the congress at Aegium, at which Syrian and Aetolian deputies likewise appeared. The Aetolians, as usual, indulged in bitter invectives against the Romans, and in personal attacks on Flaminius, and they demanded that the Achaeans should remain neutral; but Flaminius, now joined by Philopoemen, opposed this advice, and the Achaeans themselves, who had too much to win or to lose, could not have looked with indifference at what was going on. Most of the allies remained faithful to Rome; and, at the request of Flaminius, troops were immediately sent to Peiraeus and Chalcis to suppress the Syrian party in those places. In the mean time, the war with Antiochus ended in Europe, in the battle of Thermopylae, B. C. 191. Flaminius still remained in Greece, in the capacity of ambassador plenipotentiary, and exercising a sort of protectorate over Greece.

After the departure of Antiochus, the consul, Acilius Glabrio, wanted to chastise Chalcis for the homage it had paid to the foreign invader, but Flaminius interfered: he soothed the anger of the consul, and saved the place. The war against the Aetolians now commenced; and there again Flaminius used his influence in protecting the weaker party, although it is more than doubtful whether, on that occasion, he acted from a pure feeling of humanity or from ostentation. While the consul was besieging Naupactus, Flaminius came from Peloponnesus into the Roman camp; and as soon as the Aetolians saw him, they implored his protection. He shed tears of compassion, and induced the consul to raise the siege. Anxious not to share his protectorate in Greece with any one else, he directed the consul's attention to the increasing power of Macedonia. About this time insurrections broke out in several parts of Peloponnesus; and Flaminius agreed with the strategus of the Achaeans to march against Sparta: he himself accompanied the Achaeans into Laconia. But Philopoemen succeeded in restoring peace without any severe measures. The Messenians refused to join the Achaean league; and when the strategus advanced with an army against Messene, Flaminius, who was then staying at Chalcis, hastened into Messenia, whither he was invited by the people. He again acted as mediator; he made the Messenians join the Achaeans, but left them the means of defying their decrees. At the same time, he obliged the Achaeans to give up to Rome the island of Zacynthus, which they had purchased, saying, that it was best for the Achaean state to be compact, and limited to Peloponnesus. This opinion was true enough, but the Romans took care to sow the seeds of discord in Peloponnesus, or at least to keep them alive where they existed.

In B. C. 190 Flaminius returned to Rome, and was appointed censor for the year following with M. Claudius Marcellus. In B. C. 183 he was sent as ambassador to Prusias of Bithynia, who, afraid of what he had done to offend the Romans, offered to deliver up Hannibal, who had taken refuge with him. But Hannibal prevented the treachery by taking poison. The fact of Flaminius allowing himself to be made an accomplice in this attempt upon Hannibal is a stain on his character, and was severely censured by many of his contemporaries. He seems to have died either during or shortly before B. C. 174, for in that year his son celebrated funeral games in his honour. 5. C. QUINTIUS FLAMINIUS, praetor peregrinus in B. C. 177. (Liv. xli. 12.)

6. T. QUINTIUS FLAMINIUS, a son of No. 4, exhibited, in B. C. 174, splendid gladiatorial games, and feasted the people for four days, in honour of his father, who had died shortly before. In B. C. 167, he was one of the three ambassadors who led back the Thracian hostages, which Cotta, the Thracian king, had offered to ransom. In the same year he was elected augur, in the place of C. Claudius, who had died. (Liv. xli. 43, xlv. 42, 44.)

7. T. QUINTIUS FLAMINIUS was consul in B. C. 160, with M. Acilius Balbus. Cicero places his dialogue "Cato," or "De Senectute," in this year, when Cato was 84 years old. In the consulship of T. Flaminius a temple of Pietas was erected, on the spot of a prison in which a daughter had given a remarkable example of piety towards her mother. The same site was subsequently occupied by the theatre of Marcellus. (Cic. de Senect. 5, ad Att. xii. 5; Plin. H.N. vii. 36.)

8. T. QUINTIUS FLAMINIUS was consul in B. C. 123, with Q. Metellus Balearicus. Cicero, who had seen and heard him in his early youth, says that he spoke Latin with elegance, but that he was an illiterate man. In his consulship Carthage became a Roman colony; though Livy and Plutarch place this restoration of Carthage in the year following, that is, in the second tribuneship of C. Gracchus. (Cic. Brut. 28, 74, pro Dom. 53; Eutrop. iv. 20; Oros. v. 12.) [L. S.]

FLAMINIUS. 1. C. FLAMINIUS, according to the Capitoline fasti, the son of one C. Flaminius, who is otherwise unknown, was tribune of the people in B. C. 232; and, notwithstanding the most violent opposition of the senate and the optimates, he carried an agrarian law, ordaining that the ager Gallicus Picenus, which had recently been conquered, should be distributed veritim among all the plebeians. According to Cicero (de Senect. 4) the tribuneship of Flaminius and his agrarian law belong to the consulship of Sp. Carvilius and Q. Fabius Maximus, i. e. B. C. 228, or four years later than the time stated by Polybius. (ii. 21.) But Cicero's statement is improbable, for we know that in B. C. 227 C. Flaminius was praetor; and the aristocratic party, which he had irreconcilably offended by his agrarian law, would surely never have suffered him to be elected praetor the very year after his tribuneship. Cicero therefore is either mistaken, or we must have recourse to the supposition that Flaminius brought forward his bill in 232, and that it was not carried till four years later; but even this supposition does not remove the difficulties. There is an anecdote relating to the proceedings about his agrarian law which is worthy of remark, as it shows that, although Flaminius may have been rather violent and sanguine, he was yet of a very amiable disposition. The senatorial party not only abused him in every possible way, but threatened to declare him a public enemy, and to march an army against him, if he continued agitating the people; but he persevered. On one occasion, however, while he was haranguing the people, his father called him from the rostra, begging him to desist, and the son yielded to his father. (Val. Max. v. 4. § 5.) In B. C. 227, the year in which, for the first time, four praetors were appointed, C. Flaminius was one of them, and received Sicily for his province. He performed the duties of his administration to the greatest satisfaction of the provincials; and upwards of thirty years later, when his son was curule aedile, the Sicilians attested their gratitude towards him by sending an ample supply of corn to Rome. (Liv. xxxiii. 42.)

In B. C. 225, the war with the Cisalpine Gauls broke out, of which, in the opinion of Polybius (l. c.), the agrarian law of Flaminius was the cause and origin; for the Gauls in the north of Italy, he says, had become convinced that it was the object of the Romans to expel them from their seats, or to annihilate them. In the third year of this war, B. C. 223, C. Flaminius was consul with P. Furius Philus, and both consuls marched to the north of Italy. No sooner had they set out than the aristocratic party at Rome devised a means for depriving Flaminius of his office: they declared that the consular election was not valid on account of some fault in the auspices; and a letter was forthwith sent to the camp of the consuls, with orders to return to Rome. But as all preparations had been made for a great battle against the Insubrians on the Addua, the letter was left unopened until the battle was gained. Furius obeyed the command of the senate; but C. Flaminius, elated by his victory, continued the campaign. When he afterwards returned to Rome, the senate called him to account for his disobedience; but the people granted him a triumph for his victory; and after its celebration, he laid down his office, either because the time had expired, or, as Plutarch (Marcell. 4) says, being compelled by the people to abdicate.

It seems to have been in A. C. 221 that C. Flaminius was magister equitum to the dictator M. Minucius Rufus; but both were obliged to resign immediately after their appointment, on account of the squeaking of a mouse, which had been heard immediately after the election. (Plut. Marcell. 5; Val. Max. i. 1. § 5, who erroneously calls the dictator Fabius Maximus.) The year after this event, 220, Flaminius and L. Aemilius Papus were invested with the censorship, which is renowned in history for two great works, which were executed by Flaminius, and bore his name, viz. the Claudia Flaminia and the Via Flaminia, a road which ran from Rome through Etruria and Umbria, as far as Ariminum. From a strange story in Plutarch (Quaest. Rom. 63), we may perhaps infer that Flaminius raised the money required for these undertakings by the sale of newly-conquered lands.

forward a bill to prevent Roman senators from engaging in mercantile pursuits; and C. Flaminius, although himself a member of the senate, supported the bill. The optimates, who had before hated him, now abominated him; but his popularity with the people increased in the same proportion, in consequence of which he was elected consul a second time for B. C. 217, with Cn. Carvilius Geminus. Now it is said, that instead of undergoing the solemn installation in the Capitol, Flaminius, with his reinforcements, set out forthwith to Ariminum, to undertake the command of the army of his predecessor, Tib. Sempronius Longus, and there entered upon his office in the usual form, with vows and sacrifices. This act was, of course, interpreted by his enemies as a contempt for religious observances; in addition to which they said he ought to have remained at Rome for the purpose of celebrating the feriae Latinae. But there are two reasons, either of which would be sufficient to justify his conduct: in the first place, he had reason to fear, that, unless he set out at once, his enemies would act as they had done in his first consulship; and in the second place, he may have seen that no time was to be lost, for as it was it seems that Hannibal, who surely would not have waited for the Latin holidays, had already commenced his march towards Etruria, before Flaminius undertook the command of the army of his predecessor, so that no time was to be lost. Our accounts, however, of the movements of Hannibal and Flaminius differ. According to Zonaras (viii. 25), Flaminius had reached Ariminum, when Hannibal began his march, whereas Livy (xxii. 2) makes Flaminius proceed from Ariminum to Arretium, before Hannibal had begun to move; and Polybius (iii. 77) says that Flaminius marched from Rome directly to Arretium, and makes no mention of his going to Ariminum. But however this may be, Hannibal had advanced further south than Flaminius, who was at Arretium, and thence set out in pursuit of the enemy, perhaps more rashly than wisely. On the border of lake Trasimenus Hannibal compelled him to fight the fatal battle, on the 23d of June, 217, in which he perished, with the greater part of his army. (Ov. Fast. vi. 765, &c.) This catastrophe of a man like Flaminius was easily accounted for by his hypocritical enemies: he had at all times disregarded the warnings of religion, and he had broken up from Arretium, they said, although the signs had been against him. That Livy judges unfavourably of Flaminius cannot be a matter of surprise, on account of the spirit which runs through his whole history; but from Polybius we might have expected a more impartial judgment. There is, however, little doubt that Polybius was biased by his friend Scipio, who abhorred Flaminius, and probably saw in him only a precursor of the Gracchi. (Liv. xxi. 57, 15, 63, xxii. 1, &c.; Polyb. ii. 32, &c., iii. 75, 77, &c., 80, &c.; Dionys. ii. 26; Solin. 11; Oros. iv. 13; Flor. ii. 4; Sil. 2. C. FLAMINIUS, a son of No. 1, was quaestor of P. Scipio Africanus the Elder in Spain, B.C. 210. Fourteen years later, B.C. 196, he was curule aedile, and distributed among the people a large quantity of grain at a low price, which was furnished to him by the Sicilians as a mark of gratitude and distinction towards his father and himself. In B.C. 193 he was elected praetor, and obtained Hispania Citerior as his province. He took a fresh army with him, and was ordered by the senate to send the veterans back from Spain; he was further authorised to raise soldiers in Spain, and Valerius Antias even related that he went to Sicily to enlist troops, and that on his way back he was thrown by a storm on the coast of Africa. Whether this is true or not cannot be ascertained; but when he had properly reinforced himself, he carried on a successful war in Spain: he besieged and took the wealthy and fortified town of Litabrum, and made Corribilo, a Spanish chief, his prisoner. In B.C. 185 he obtained the consulship, together with M. Aemilius Lepidus, in opposition to whom he defended, at the beginning of the year, M. Fulvius; for the senate assigned the Ligurians as the province of the two consuls, and Lepidus, dissatisfied, wanted to have the province, of which M. Fulvius had had the administration for the last two years. At last, however, C. Flaminius and Aemilius Lepidus marched into their province against the Ligurians, and Flaminius, after having gained several battles against the Trinitates, a Ligurian tribe, reduced them to submission, and deprived them of their arms. Hereupon he proceeded against the Apuani, another Ligurian tribe, who had invaded the territories of Pisa and Bononia. They also were subdued, and peace was thus restored in the north of Italy. But to prevent his troops from remaining idle in their camp, he made them construct a road from Bononia to Arretium, while his colleague made another from Placentia to Ariminum, to join the Flaminian road. Strabo (v. p. 217), who confounds C. Flaminius, the father, with his son, states that the latter made the Flaminian road from Rome to Ariminum, and Lepidus from thence to Bononia and Aquileia. But it is highly improbable that the road was continued to Aquileia, before this place became a Latin colony, i.e. before B.C. 181, on which occasion C. Flaminius was one of the triumvirs who conducted the colony thither. (Liv. xxvi. 47, 49, xxxiii. 42, xxxiv. 54, &c., xxxv. 2, 22, xxxviii. 42, &c., xxxix. 2, 55, xl. 34; Oros. iv. 20; Zonar. ix. 21; Val. Max. vi. 6. § 3.)

3. C. FLAMINIUS, was praetor in B.C. 66, the year in which Cicero was invested with the same office. Some years before C. Flaminius had been curule aedile, and Cicero had defended D. Matrinus before the tribunal of C. Flaminius. (Cic. pro Cluent. 45, 53.)

4. C. FLAMINIUS, a man of Arretium, whither he had probably gone with the colonists whom Sulla had established there. He is mentioned as one of the accomplices of Catiline. (Sallust, Cat. 28 and 36, where in one MS. he bears the cognomen Flamma.) [L. S.]

FLAMMA, prefect of the Caesarian fleet in C. Curio's expedition to Africa, B.C. 47. On the news of the defeat on the Bagrada (Caes. B. C. ii. 42), Flamma fled from the camp at Utica with his division of the fleet without attempting to aid the fugitives from Curio's army. (Appian, B. C. ii. 46.) [W. B. D.]

FLAMMA, ANTONIUS, was banished at the beginning of Vespasian's reign, A. D. 71, for extortion and cruelty in his government of Cyrene under Nero. (Tac. Hist. iv. 45.) [W. B. D.]

FLAMMA, CALPURNIUS, a tribune of the soldiers, who, in the first Punic war, with 300 men, extricated a Roman consular army on its march to Camarina, in Sicily, from a defile similar to the Furcae Caudinae. After the legions were rescued, the body of Flamma was found under a heap of dead, and although covered with wounds, none of them were mortal, and he survived and served the republic afterwards. The act is often mentioned by Roman writers, but there is great discrepancy as to its author. Cato (op. Geld. iii. 7) calls him Q. Caedicius; Claudius Quadrigrinus (ab.) Laberius or Valerius; but Frontinus (Strateg. iv. 5.) says most named him Calpurnius Flamma. (Liv. Epit. xvii, xxii. 60; Plin. H. N. xxii. 6; Oros. iv. 8; Florus, ii. 2; Aur. Vict. de Vir. iii. xxxix; Senec. Epist. 82.) [W. B. D.]

FLAMMA, T. FLAMINIUS, a debtor of L. Tullius Montanus, who had become surety for him to L. Munatius Plancus. The brother-in-law of Montanus had written to Cicero to beg Plancus to grant indulgence or delay (ad Att. xii. 52), and Cicero frequently requests Atticus (xii. 52; xiv. 16, 17; xv. 2) to bring Flamma to a settlement. Writing to his freedman Tiro, Cicero hints at stronger measures, and desires him to get part of the debt by the first day of January, B.C. 44. Flamma may have been a freedman of the Flaminia gens. [W. B. D.]

FLAMMA, L. VOLU'MNIUS, with the agnomen VIOLENS, was consul with App. Claudius Caecus for the first time B.C. 307. He was sent with a consular army against the Sallentines, an Apulian or Japygian people, who dwelt in the heel of Italy, and whom the progress of the Samnite war had now drawn within the enmity of Rome. According to Livy (ix. 42), Flamma was prosperous in the field, took several towns by storm, and made himself very popular with the soldiers by his liberal distribution of the booty. These successes are, however, very problematical; since the name of Flamma does not appear in the Fasti Triumphales, and one of the annalists, Piso, omitted this consulship altogether (Liv. ix. 44). But there is no reason to doubt that Flamma was consul with App. Claudius in B.C. 296. It was the most critical period of the second Samnite war. Flamma was at first stationed on the frontiers of Samnium, but on the appearance of a Samnite army in the heart of Etruria, he was ordered to the relief of his colleague. Claudius at first resented, but on the representation of his principal officers, finally accepted the aid of Flamma. There was, however, no harmony between them; and as soon as their joint armies had repelled the enemy, Flamma returned by forced marches into Campania. The Samnites had plundered the Falernian plain, and were returning with their spoils and captives, when Flamma intercepted them on the banks of the Liris, and rendered their expedition fruitless. For the relief thus afforded to Rome a thanksgiving was ordered in the name of the consul. Flamma presided at the next consular comitia, and at his recommendation the people chose Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus consul for the ensuing year. Flamma retained his own command as proconsul for the same period, the senate and the people both concurring in is re-appointment. Flamma, with the second and fourth legions, invaded Samnium; but there is great likelihood in Niebuhr's conjecture (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 379), that he was again called into Etruria, where the brunt of the war was, and that he took part in the battle of Sentinum, A. C. 295. He married Virginia, daughter of A. Virginiana, who consecrated a chapel and altar to Plebeian Chastity. [VIRGINIA.] (Liv. x. 15, &c.) [W. B. D.]

FLA'VIA CONSTANTIA. [CONSTANTIA.]
FLA'VIA CONSTANTINA. [CONSTANTINA.]

FLA'VIA GENS, plebeian. Members of it are mentioned in Roman history only during the last three centuries before the Christian era. It seems to have been of Sabine origin, and may have been connected with the Flavii that occur at Reate in the first century after Christ, and to whom the emperor Vespasian belonged. But the name Flavius occurs also in other countries of Italy, as Etruria and Lucania. During the later period of the Roman empire, the name Flavius descended from one emperor to another, Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, being the first in the series. The cognomens that occur in the Flavia gens during the republic are FIMBRIA, GALLUS, LUCANUS, and PUSILLUS.

FLA'VIA TITIANA. [TITIANA.]

FLAVIANUS. This name, of comparatively rare occurrence in the early imperial period, became more common in the later period of the empire, after the accession to the throne of the Flavian house in the person of Constantius Chlorus, father of Constantine the Great, and the assumption of the name Flavius by the successive dynasties that occupied the Byzantine throne. A considerable number of officers of high rank during and between the reigns of Constantine the Great and Valentinian III. are enumerated in the Prosopographia subjoined to the edition of the Codex Theodosianus by Gothofredus (vol. vi. part ii. pp. 54, 55, ed. Leipzig, 1736-45). The following persons of the name require distinct notice:—

1. T. AMPIUS FLAVIANUS, consular legate or governor of Pannonia during the civil wars which followed the death of Galba, A. D. 69, at which time he was old and wealthy, and reluctant to take part in the contest; and when the legions of his province (the Thirteenth and the Seventh or Gallian legions) embraced the party of Vespasian, he fled into Italy. He returned, however, into Pannonia, and joined the party of Vespasian at the instigation of Cornelius Fuscus, procurator of the province, who was anxious to obtain for the insurgents the influence which the rank of Flavianus would give. His previous reluctance and a connection by marriage with Vitellius had however rendered the soldiers mistrustful, and they suspected that his return to the province had some treacherous object. He appears to have accompanied the Pannonian legions on their march into Italy; and during the siege or blockade of Verona, a false alarm having caused the smothered suspicions of the soldiery to break out, a tumultuous body of them demanded his death. His abject entreaties for life they interpreted as the mark of conscious treachery; but he was rescued by the intervention of Antonius Primus, the most influential general of the troops of Vespasian, and was sent off in custody the same evening to meet Vespasian, but before he reached him received letters from him relieving him from all danger of punishment. (Tac. Hist. ii. 86, iii. 4, 10.)

2. FLAVIANUS, one of the praefects of the praetorium under Alexander Severus. He was appointed to the office on the accession of Alexander, in conjunction with Chrestus (A. D. 222). They were both men of military and administrative ability; but the appointment of Ulpian nominally as their colleague, but really as their superior, having led to conspiracies on the part of the praetorian soldiers against Ulpian, Flavian and Chrestus were deposed and executed, and Ulpian made sole praefect. The year of their death is not ascertained, but it was not long before that of Ulpian himself, which took place at latest A. D. 228. (Dion Cass. lxxx. 2; Zosim. i. 11; Zonar. xii. 15.)

3. ULPUS FLAVIANUS, consular of the provinces of Aemilia and Liguria, in Italy, under Constantine the Great, A. D. 323. (Cod. Theod. 11. tit. 16. a. 2; Gothofred. Prosop. Cod. Theod.)

4. Proconsul of Africa, apparently under Constantius, son of Constantine the Great, A. D. 357-61. It is probable that this is the proconsul Flavian, to whom some of the rhetorical exercises of the sophist Himerius are addressed; though Fabricius supposes the Flavian of Himerius to be No. 7. (Cod. Theod. 8. tit. 5. a. 10, 11. tit. 36. a. 14, 15. tit. 1. a. 1; Gothofred. Prosop. Cod. Theod.; Himerius, ap. Phot. Bibl. Cod. 165, 243, pp. 108, 376, ed. Bekker; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 87.)

5. Vicarius of Africa, under Gratian, A. D. 377. He was one of those commissioned to inquire into the malpractices of Count Romanus and his confederates; and Ammianus Marcellinus records the uprightness of his conduct in the business. It is probable that he is the Flavian mentioned by Augustin as an adherent of the sect of the Donatists, by whom, however, he was excommunicated, because, in the discharge of his office, he had punished some criminals capitally. An inscription, belonging to a statue at Rome, "Virius Nicomachus, Consularis Siciliae, Vicarius Africae, Quaestor intra Palatium; Praef. Praetor iterum et Coa.," is by Gothofredus referred to this Flavian, but we rather refer it to No. 6. Gothofredus also regards this Flavian as the person mentioned by Himerius; but the mention of his administration of Africa equally well suits No. 4, to whom the title dvōtratos determines the reference. (Amm. Marc. xxviii. 6; Augustin. ad Emeritum, Epist. 164 (or 87, ed. Paris, 1836); Cod. Theod. 16. tit. 6. a. 2; Gothofred. Prosop. Cod. Theod.)

6. Praetorian praefect of Italy and Illyricum A. D. 382-3. He was the intimate friend of Q. Aurelius Symmachus, many of whose letters (nearly the whole of the second book) are addressed to him. Symmachus continually addresses him as his "brother Flavian," which moderns (we know not for what reason) understand as expressive of close intimacy, but not of actual relationship. Gothofredus appears to distinguish between this Flavian and one who was praetorian praefect in 391 and 392; but we concur with Tillemont in identifying the two. Tillemont also (and we think justly) refers to this Flavian the inscription given above [No. 5], in which his second praefecture and consulship are recorded. He was, like Symmachus, a zealous pagan, and a supporter of the usurper Eugenius, from whom he and Arbogastes the Frank solicited and obtained the restoration of the Altar of Victory at Milan. It is probable that he was the person mentioned by Paulinus of Milan, as having threatened that, if they were successful in the war with Theodosius, they would turn the church of Milan into a stable. The text of Paulinus has, in the notice of this incident, the name Fabianus, which is probably a corruption of Flavianus. He was eminent for his political sagacity, and his skill in the pagan methods of divination, in the exercise of which he assured Eugenius of victory; and when Theodosius had falsified his predictions, by forcing the passage of the Alps, he, according to Rufinus, "judged himself worthy of death," rather for his mistake as a soothsayer than his crime as a rebel. Eugenius had appointed him consul (A. D. 394), though his name does not appear in the Fasti; and Tillemont infers from the passage in Rufinus that he commanded the troops defeated by Theodosius in the Alps, and that he chose to die on the field rather than survive his defeat; but this inference is scarcely authorized. It is more likely that, as Gothofredus gathers from the letters of Symmachus, he survived the war, and that his life was spared, though he was deprived of his praefecture and his property. It is difficult, however, to distinguish from each other the Flaviani mentioned by Symmachus, whose letters are very obscure; and possibly this Flavian has been confounded with No. 7. (Symmach. Epist. passim; Sossom. Hist. Ecc. vii. 22; Rufin. Hist. Ecc. ii. 33; Paulin. Mediol. Vita Ambros. c. 26, 31, in Galland. Bibl. Patr. vol. ix.; Cod. Theod. 1. tit. 1. s. 2; 3. tit. 1. s. 6; 7. tit. 18. s. 8; 9. tit. 28. s. 2; and tit. 40. s. 13; 10. tit. 10. s. 20; 11. tit. 39. s. 11; 16. tit. 7. s. 4, 5; Gothofred. Prosp. Cod. Theod.; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. v.)

7. Proconsul of Asia, A. D. 383, one of the Flaviani of Symmachus, and apparently the son of No. 6. Either he or his father was praefect of the city (Rome) A. D. 399, and was sent by Honorius (A. D. 414) into Africa to hear the complaints of the Provincials, and examine how far they were well-founded. Fabricius regards this proconsul of Asia as the Flavian of Himerius; but see Nos. 4 and 5. (Cod. Theod. 12. tit. 6. s. 18; Gothofred and Tillemont, as above.)

An inscription in Gruter, clxx. 5, speaks of "Vir illustris Flavianus" as the founder of a secretarium for the senate, which was destroyed by fire, and restored in the time of Honorius and Theodosius II. The inscription possibly refers to No. 6, or No. 7.

8. Praefect of the praetorium under Valentinian III., A. D. 431 and 432. (Cod. Theod. 10. tit. 1. s. 36; 6. tit. 23. s. 3; Gothofred. Prosp. Cod. Theod.) [J. C. M.]

FLAVIANUS, an advocatus fisci in the time of Justinian, by whom he was nominated one of the general judges (κοινὸν πάντων δικασταί), who were appointed in lieu of the special judges, formerly attached by a constitution of Zeno to particular tribunals. The names of the general judges so appointed by Justinian in A. D. 539 are Anatolius, Flavianus, Alexander, Stephanus, Menas, a second Alexander, Victor, and Theodorus, of Cyicum. At the same time the following persons were appointed superior judges, with high rank: Plato, Victor (different from the former Victor), Phocas, and Marcellus. To these the administration of justice at Constantinople was confided, in subordination to the emperor's ministers of state (ἀρχαῖοι). Their powers, duties, and emoluments, are prescribed by the 82nd Novell. [J. T. G.]

FLAVIANUS, ecclesiastica. 1. Of ANTIOCH, was born, probably, in that city, and in the earlier part of the fourth century. His parents died when he was young; but he resisted the temptations arising from rank, wealth, and early freedom from parental control, and devoted himself to study and ascetic exercises, not carrying the latter, however, to such excess as to injure his constitution. He was remarkable for the early sedateness of his character, so that Chrysostom doubts if he could ever be said to have been a young man. On the deposition of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, A. D. 329 or 330, or perhaps 331, by the Arian party [EUSTATHIUS, No. 1], Flavian is said to have followed him into exile. But this is somewhat doubtful, from the silence of Chrysostom, and from the fact that, though the bishops who succeeded Eustathius were of Arian or Eusebian sentiments, Flavian did not secede from the communion of the church, as the more zealous supporters of Eustathius did. Yet Flavian was a strenuous supporter of orthodoxy, and his opposition, with that of his coadjutor Diodorus, though they were both yet laymen, compelled the bishop Leontius to prohibit Aëtius, who was preaching his heterodox doctrines at Antioch, under the bishop's protection [AETIUS], from the exercise of the functions of the deaconship to which he had just been raised. The date of this transaction is not fixed; but the episcopate of Leontius commenced in A. D. 348, and lasted about ten years. Whether Flavian and Diodorus were at this time deacons is not clear. Philostorgius states that they were deposed by Leontius for their opposition to him, but does not say from what office. They first introduced the practice of the alternate singing or chanting of the psalms, and the division of the choir into parts, which afterwards became universal in the church.

Flavian was ordained priest by Meletius, who was elected bishop of Antioch, A. D. 361, and held the see, with three intervals of exile, chiefly occasioned by his opposition to Arianism, till A. D. 381. His first expulsion, which was soon after his election, induced Flavian and others to withdraw from the communion of the church, over which Euzoios, an Arian, had been appointed. The seceders still recognised the deposed prelate; and the church formed by them was, during the third and longest banishment of Meletius, under the care of Flavian and Diodorus, both now in the priesthood. Flavian himself did not preach, but he supplied materials to Diodorus and others who did. On the death of Valens, A. D. 378, and the consequent downfall of Arianism, Meletius was restored, and the orthodox party recovered possession of the churches, the Arians, or the more staunch of them, becoming in turn seceders. But the orthodox were divided among themselves; for the older seceders at the deposition of Eustathius had remained sepa-role under their own bishop, and had not united with the second secession under Meletius. Paulinus was, at the death of Valens, the Eustathian bishop, and contested with Meletius the rightful occupation of the see. The orthodox church throughout the Roman empire was divided on the question, the Western and Egyptian churches acknowledging Paulinus, and the Asiatic, and apparently the Greek churches, recognising Meletius. To terminate the schism it was agreed upon oath, by those of the clergy of Antioch who were most likely to be appointed to succeed in the event of a vacancy, that they would decline accepting such appointment, and agree to recognise the survivor of the present claimants. Flavian was one of the parties to this agreement: but many of the Eustathians refused to sanction it; so that when Meletius died, while attending the Council of Constantinople, A. D. 381, Flavian, who was also attending the Council, and was elected to succeed him, with the general approval of the Asiatic churches, felt himself at liberty to accept the appointment.

The imputation of perjury, to which Flavian thus subjected himself, apparently aggravated the schism; and when Paulinus died, A. D. 388 or 389, his party elected Evagrius to succeed him; but on his death after a short episcopate [EVAGRIUS, No. 1], no successor was chosen; and the schism was healed, though not immediately. Flavian managed to conciliate Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, and by his intervention, and that of Chrysostom, now bishop of Constantinople, A. D. 397—403, he was acknowledged by the Roman and other Western churches.

On occasion of the great sedition at Antioch, A. D. 387, Flavian was one of those who interceded with the emperor, Theodosius the Great, for the pardon of the citizens. He set out on this mission in spite of the infirmities of age, the inclemency of the weather, and the illness of his only sister, who was at the point of death; and used such diligence as to reach Constantinople before the authentic tidings of the disturbance. Ecclesiastical writers ascribe the pardon of the citizens very much to his intercession, but Zosimus, in his brief notice of the affair, does not mention him.

Flavian was held in much respect, both during and after his life. Chrysostom, his pupil and friend, speaks of him in the highest terms. Theodore of Mopsuestia was also his pupil. Flavian died, A. D. 404, not long after the deposition of Chrysostom, to which he was much opposed, but which was sanctioned by his successor in the see of Antioch.

Of his writings only some quotations remain; they are apparently from his sermons, and are preserved in the Evangelists of Theodoret. Photius mentions his Letters to the Bishops of Osröene and to a certain Armenian Bishop, respecting the rejection, by a synod over which Flavian presided, of Aclepias, a heretic, who desired to be reconciled to the church; Photius speaks also of a Confession of Faith, and a Letter to the Emperor Theodosius, written by him. 2. OF ANTIOCH. According to Evagrius he was originally a monk of Tilmognon, in Coele-Syria; and, as appears from Theophanes, afterwards became a presbyter and apocrypharist of the church at Antioch. He was promoted to the see of Antioch by the emperor Anastasius I. on the death of Palladius, in the year 496, or 497, or 498, according to calculations or statements of Baronius, Victor Tununensis, and Pagi respectively: the last date, which is also given by Tillemont, is probably correct. The church throughout the whole Byzantine empire was divided by the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies and the dispute as to the authority of the Council of Chalcedon: and the impression that Flavian rejected the authority of that council may perhaps have conduced to his elevation, as the emperor countenanced the Eutychian party in rejecting it. But if Flavian was ever opposed to the council, he gave up his former views after his elevation to the bishopric.

His period of office was a scene of trouble, through the dissensions of the church, aggravated by the personal enmity of Xenaïas or Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis, in Syria, who raised the cry against him of favouring Nestorianism. Flavian endeavoured to refute this charge by anathematizing Nestorius and his doctrine; but Xenaïas, not satisfied, required him to anathematize a number of persons now dead (including Diodorus of Tarsus, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrus, and others), who were suspected, justly or not, of Nestorianism, declaring that if he refused to anathematize them, he must remain subject to the imputation of being a Nestorian himself. Flavian refused for a time to comply; but pressed by the enmity of Xenaïas and his supporters, and anxious to satisfy the emperor, who supported his opponents, he subscribed the Henoticon or Edict of Union of the late emperor Zeno; and having assembled the bishops of his province, he drew up a synodal letter, and sent it to the emperor, owning the authority of the three councils of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus, and silently passing over that of Chalcedon, and pronouncing the required anathemas against the prelates enumerated by Xenaïas. He also sent to the emperor a private assurance of his readiness to comply with his wishes. (A. D. 508 or 509.) Victor Tununensis states that Flavian and Xenaïas presided over a council at Constantinople A. D. 499, when the obnoxious prelates and the Council of Chalcedon itself were anathematized: but his account seems hardly trustworthy.

The enemies of Flavian were not, however, satisfied. They required him distinctly to anathematize the Council of Chalcedon, and all who held the doctrine of the two natures. [EUTYCHES.] This he refused to do, and in a confession of faith which he drew up, supported the authority of the council in the repudiation both of Nestorius and Eutyches, but not in its definition of the true faith. The cry of Nestorianism was again raised against him; and new disturbances were excited; and the Isaurian, and apparently some other Asiatic churches, broke off from communion with Flavian. A synod was held A. D. 510 at Sidon, to condemn the Council of Chal-cedon and depose its leading supporters; but Flavian and Elias of Jerusalem managed to prevent its effecting anything. Flavian still hoped to appease his opponents, and wrote to the emperor, expressing his readiness to acknowledge the first three councils, and pass over that of Chalcedon in silence; but his efforts were in vain; a tumultuous body of monks of the province of Syria Prima assembled at Antioch, and frightened Flavian into pronouncing an open anathema against the Council of Chalcedon, and against Theodore of Mopsuestia and the other bishops whom Xenaias had already obliged him to condemn. The citizens were not equally compliant; they rose against the monks, and killed many of them: and the confusion was renewed by the monks of Coele-Syria, who embraced the side of Flavian, and hastened to Antioch to defend him. These disturbances, or some transactions connected with the Council of Sidon, gave the emperor a ground or pretext for deposing Flavian (A. D. 511) and putting Severus in his place. Victor Tununensis places the deposition of Flavian as early as the consulship of Cethegus, A. D. 504. Flavian was banished to Petra in Arabia, where he died. His death is assigned by Tillemont, on the authority of Joannes Moschus, to A. D. 518. In Vitalian's rebellion (A. D. 513 or 514) his restoration to his see was one of the demands of that rebel. [ANASTASIUS.] Flavian is (at least was) honoured in the Greek Church as a confessor, and was recognised as such by the Romish Church, after long opposition. (Evang. Hist. Eccl. iii. 23, 30, 31, 32; Theophan. Chronog. pp. 220—247, ed. Bonn; Marcellin. Chron. (Paul. et Musc. Cass.); Vict. Tun. Chron. (ab Anast. Aug. Cos. ad Cetheg. Cos.); Baron. Annal. Eccles. ad Ann. 496 et 512; Pagi, Critice in Baron.; Tillemont, Mém. vol. xvi. p. 675, &c.)

3. OF CONSTANTINOPLE. He was chosen successor to Proclus, bishop of Constantinople, who died anno 439 Alex. era, or 446 A. D. At the time of his election he was a presbyter and keeper of the sacred vessels in the great church at Constantinople. Chrysaphius, the eunuch, a friend and supporter of the monk Eutyches [EUTYCHES], was at this time an influential person at court; and he having a dislike to Flavian, managed to set the emperor Theodosius II. against him, from the very commencement of his episcopate. Dioscorus, who had just ascended the episcopal chair of Alexandria, and was persecuting the kinamen of his predecessor, Cyril [CYRILLUS], was also irritated against Flavian, who had befriended the persecuted parties. Flavian was indeed befriended by Pulcheria, the emperor's sister; but her aid was more than counterbalanced by the enmity of the empress Eudocia [EUDOCIA AUGUSTA], who was influenced by Chrysaphius, and was, moreover, irritated by Flavian's defeating a plan to remove Pulcheria altogether from the state and the court by having her ordained a deaconess. Flavian was not, however, daunted. He assembled a synod of forty bishops, and deposed Eutyches from his office of archimandrite or abbot, and excommunicated him, on the ground of his heretical opinions. [EUTYCHES.] This bold step irritated the opponents of Flavian, and they prevailed on the emperor to summon a synod at Constantinople to try Flavian on a charge of falsifying the acts of the synod at which Eutyches was condemned. Flavian was acquitted, but his enemies persuaded Theodosius to summon a general council at Ephesus. At this council, over which Dioscorus presided, and which is known in history as the Council of Robbers (ἡ ληστική), Flavian and the other members of the synod which had condemned Eutyches were present, but were not allowed to vote, since their conduct was called in question. Their friends were overborne in an irregular manner, Eutyches was restored, and Flavian not only deposed and sentenced to banishment, but so roughly beaten and kicked by the Egyptian and other attendants of Dioscorus, that he died three days afterwards (A. D. 449). This violence probably tended to the reaction which took place in the mind of the emperor. Pulcheria regained her ascendancy; the body of Flavian was, by her order, honourably conveyed to Constantinople, and buried in the Church of the Holy Apostles. Pope Leo the Great honoured him as a confessor, and the Council of Chalcedon as a martyr; and since the time of Baronius he has been commemorated in the Martyrology of the Romish Church. A letter of Flavian to Pope Leo was published by Cotelerus (Monum. Eccles. Græc. vol. i. p. 50); and a confession of his faith presented to the emperor Theodosius, and some other pieces, are given with the acts of the Council of Chalcedon in the Concilia of Labbe and Harduin; and are also inserted in the Concilia of Mansi, vol. viii. p. 833. (Evang. Hist. Eccl. i. 8, 9, 10; Theophanes, Chronog. pp. 150—158, ed. Bonn; Marcellin. Chron. (Prolog. et Astr. Cass.); Vict. Tun. Chron. (Callip. et Ardab. Cass. Post. et Zen. Cass.); Synod. Vetus, apud Fabric; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 290, and vol. xii. pp. 393, 394, and 672; Tillemont, Mém. vol. xv. pp. 446, &c.) [J. C. M.]

FLAVIUS. 1. M. FLAVIUS, a Roman, who in B. C. 328, during the funeral solemnity of his mother, distributed meat (victratio) among the people. It was said that this gift was made as much to honour his mother as to show his gratitude towards the people for having acquitted him some time before, when he had been accused by the aediles of adultery. The people evinced their gratitude in return by electing him at the next comitia tribune of the people, although he was absent at the time, and others had offered themselves as candidates. In B. C. 323 he was invested with the same office a second time, and brought forward a rogation to chastise the Tuscans for having incited the Veliternians and Privernatans to make war against Rome. But the Tuscans came to Rome and averted the punishment by their prayers and entreaties. (Liv. viii. 22, 27; Val. Max. ix. 10. § 1.)

2. FLAVIUS, a Lucanian, who lived during the second Punic war, and for a time was at the head of the Roman party among the Lucanians. But in B. C. 213 he suddenly turned traitor; and not satisfied with going over to the enemy himself, and making his countrymen follow his example, he resolved to deliver the Roman general, with whom he was connected by hospitality, into the hands of the Carthaginians. He accordingly had an interview with Mago, who commanded the Punic forces in Bruttium, and promised to deliver up to him the proconsul Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, on condition that the Lucanians should be free, and retain their own constitution. A place was then fixed upon where Mago might lay in ambush with an armed force, and whither Flavian promised to had the proconsul. Flavius now went to Gracchus, and promising to bring about a reconciliation between him and those who had recently deserted the cause of the Romans, he prevailed upon him to accompany him to the spot where Mago was concealed. When he arrived there Mago rushed forth from his ambush, and Flavius immediately went over to the Carthaginians. A fierce contest then ensued, near a place called Campi Veteres, in which Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was killed. (Liv. xxv. 16; Appian, Annib. 35; Val. Max. v. l. Ext. § 6.)

3. Q. FLAVIUS, an angur who, according to Valerius Maximus (viii. l. § 7), was accused before the people by the aedile, C. Valerius, perhaps the same who was curule aedile in B.C. 199. (Liv. xxxi. 50, xxxii. 50.) When fourteen tribes had already voted against Flavius, and the latter again asserted his innocence, Valerius declared that he did not care whether the man was guilty or innocent provided he secured his punishment; and the people, indignant at such conduct, acquitted Flavius.

4. Q. FLAVIUS, of Tarquinii, in Etruria, was the murderer of the slave Panurgus (previous to A.C. 77), who belonged to C. Fannius Chaereas, and was to be trained as an actor, according to a contract entered into between Fannius Chaereas and Q. Roscius, the celebrated comedian. (Cic. pro Rosc. Com. 11.)

5. L. FLAVIUS, a Roman eques, who gave his evidence against Verres in B.C. 70. He probably lived in Sicily, and was engaged in mercantile pursuits. (Cic. in Verr. i. 5, v. 59.) He appears to be the same as the L. Flavius who is mentioned as the procurator, that is, the agent or steward of C. Matrimius in Sicily. (Cic. in Verr. v. 7.)

6. C. FLAVIUS, a brother of L. Flavius [No. 5], and likewise a Roman eques, was recommended by Cicero, in B.C. 46, to M. Acilius, praetor of Sicily, as an intimate friend of C. Calpurnius Piso, the late son-in-law of Cicero. (Ad Fam. xiii. 31.) In some editions of Cicero's oration for Plancius (c. 42), we read the name of C. Flavius; but Gersoni and Wunder have shown that this is only an incorrect reading for C. (Alfius) Flavius.

7. L. FLAVIUS was tribune of the people in B.C. 60; and on the suggestion of Pompey, he brought forward an agrarian law, which was chiefly intended to benefit the veterans of Pompey, who at the same time very warmly supported the law. It was owing to the favour of Pompey, which he thus acquired, that in B.C. 59 he was elected praetor for the year following. His friendship with Cicero seems likewise to have arisen from his connection with Pompey; and Cicero strongly recommended him to his brother Quintus, who was journeying in Asia, where some bequest had been left to Flavius. Pompey had entrusted to his care young Tigranes of Armenia, but P. Clodius afterwards got possession of him, and Flavius tried in vain to recover the young prince. Cicero expressly mentions that Flavius was also a friend of Caesar, and hence it is not improbable that he may be the same as the Flavius whom Caesar, in B.C. 49, entrusted with one legion and the province of Sicily. (Cic. ad Att. i. 18, 19, ii. l. x. 1; ad Q. Frat. i. 3; Accon. in Cic. Mithr. p. 47, ed. Orelli; Dion Ann. xxxvii. 50, xxxviii. 50.)

8. C. FLAVIUS, a friend of M. Junius Brutus, whom he accompanied to Philippi in the capacity of praefectus fabrum. Flavius fell in the battle of Philippi, and Brutus lamented over his death. (C. Nep. Att. 8; Cic. ad Att. xii. 17; Pseudo-Brut. ad Cic. i. 6, 17; Plut. Brut. 51.)

9. C. FLAVIUS, a Roman eques of Asta, a Roman colony in Spain. He and other equites who had before belonged to the party of Pompey, went over to Caesar in B.C. 46. (Bell. Hispan. 26.) Whether he is the same as the C. Flavius who is mentioned among the enemies of Caesar Octavianus, and was put to death in B.C. 40, after the taking of Perusia, is uncertain. (Appian, B. C. v. 49.) [L. S.]

CN. FLAVIUS, the son of a freedman, who is called by Livy Cneius, by Gellius and Pliny Annius, was born in humble circumstances, but became secretary to App. Claudius Caecus [CLAUDIUS, No. 10], and, in consequence of this connection, together with his own shrewdness and eloquence, attained distinguished honours in the commonwealth. He is celebrated in the annals of Roman law for having been the first to divulge certain technicalities of procedure, which previously had been kept secret as the exclusive patrimony of the pontiffs and the patricians. The relative share which the pontiffs, as such, and the patricians, who were not pontiffs, possessed in the administration and interpretation of early Roman law, cannot now be accurately determined. Among the portions of law which were kept in the knowledge of a few, were the greater part of the actus legitimi and the actiones legis. These appear to have included the whole of legal practice, the actus legitimi ordinarily designating the technicalities of private legal transactions, and the actiones legis the ceremonies of judicial procedure, although this distinction is not always observed. To the hidden law of practice belonged the rules of the Kalendar (Fasti), and the greater part of the Formulae. The rules of the Kalendar determined what legal acts were to be done, and what omitted, on particular days. The Formulae related chiefly to technical pleading, or, in other words, to that part of forensic practice which determined the mode of stating a claim and making a defence; but there were also formulae for acts not connected with litigation, as mancipatio, sponsio, adoptio, and formulae of this latter kind cannot be supposed to have been so little known to the people at large as forms of pleading, whether oral or written, may have been. Flavius made himself master of the rules of the Kalendar and the formulae, either by stealing a book in which they had been laid down and reduced to order by App. Claudius (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 2. § 7), or by frequently consulting those who were able to give advice upon the subject, by noting down their answers, and by applying his sagacious intellect to discover the system from which such detached answers proceeded. Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 1) says that Flavius pursued the latter course, at the recommendation of App. Claudius (ejus hortatu exceperat eos dies, consultando assiduus sagaci ingenio). He thus picked the brains of the jurists he consulted (ab ipsis cautis jurisconsultis eorum sapientiam compilavit, Cic. pro Mur. 11). The expressions of some writers who mention the publication of Flavius seem to confine his discoveries to the rules of the Kalendar; but there are other passages which make it likely that he published other rules connected with the legis actiones, especially the formulae of pleading. (Compare Liv. ix. 46; Macrobian. Sat. i. 15; Cic. de Fin. iv. 27, ad Att. vi. 1, de Orat. i. 41.) The collection of legal rules thus published by Flavius was called the Jus Flavianum; and, next to the Jus Civile Papirianum, it was the earliest private work in Roman law. The patrician jurists were grieved and indignant when they saw that their advice and intervention were rendered unnecessary by this publication. In order to regain their lost powers, they framed new rules relating to the legis actiones, and, in order to keep the new rules secret, invented a cypher (notae) to preserve them in. (Cic. pro Mur. 11, where by notae some commentators understand, not a secret notation or cypher, but the new formulæ invented by the jurists). These new rules in another century underwent the same fate with their predecessors, for in the year A. C. 200 they were made known to the people at large by Sex. Aelius Catus, in a publication termed Jus Aelianum. Flavius was not content with divulging the legal mysteries through the medium of a book, but, according to Livy, he exposed the Fasti to view on a whitened tablet in the Forum. (Fastos circa Forum in albo proposuit, ix. 46.) It is not unlikely, from a comparison of the narrative of Livy with the accounts of other writers, that the latter exposure took place after he had been promoted to the office of curule aedile, in consequence of the popularity he had acquired by the previous publication of his book. The first fruits of his popularity were his appointments to the offices of triumvir nocturnus and triumvir coloniae deducendae; and, in order to qualify himself for the acceptance of such honours, he ceased to practise his former business of scribe. He was afterwards made a senator by App. Claudius, in spite of his ignominious birth, and was elected curule aedile in the year B. C. 303. His election was carried by the farrensis factio, which had been created and had gained strength during the censorship of App. Claudius, and now became a distinct party in the state, in opposition to those who called themselves the fautores bonorum. From Licinius Macer, quoted by Livy, it would appear that he had been previously tribune, whereas Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 1) states that the tribunate of the plebs was conferred upon him in addition to the aedileship. The circumstance of his election so disgusted the greater part of the senate and the nobles, that they laid aside their golden rings and other ornaments (phaleræ). Flavius met the contemptuous treatment of the nobles with equal hauteur. He consecrated the Temple of Concordia, on which occasion the Pontifex Maximus, Cornelius Barbatius, was obliged by the populace to take a leading part in the ceremony, notwithstanding his previous declaration that none but a consul or an imperator ought, according to ancient custom, to dedicate a temple. When Flavius went to visit his colleague, who was unwell, a party of young nobles, who were present, refused to rise on his entrance, whereupon he sent for his curule chair, and, from his seat of rank, looked down with triumph upon his jealous enemies. (Liv. ix. 46; Gell. vi. 9.) Valerius Maximus (ix. 3) says that he was made praetor. (Puchta, Curus der Institutionen, vol. i. p. 677.) [J. T. G.]

FLAVIUS, a brother of Arminius, chief of the Cherusians. In the summer of A. D. 16, the Romans and the Cherusians were drawn up on the opposite banks of the Weser (Visurgis), when Arminius, prince of the Cherusians, stepped forth from a group of chieftains, and demanded to speak with his brother, a distinguished officer in the Roman army. Flavius had lost an eye in the service of Rome. The brothers, after their followers had fallen back, conversed across the stream. On learning the cause of his brother's disfigurement, Arminius asked what had been its compensation. Flavius replied, increased pay, and the usual rewards of valour. Arminius derided his chains and chaplet, as the gear of a slave; and now began between them an angry colloquy, which, but for the stream between, would have passed into blows. (Tac. Ann. ii. 9.) A descendant of Flavius, named Italicus, became in A. D. 47 chieftain of the Cherusians. (Ibid. xi. 16.) [W. B. D.]

FLAVIUS DEXTER, a Spaniard, the son of Pacian. He was praetorian praefect, and a devoted advocate of Christianity. He was a contemporary of St. Jerom, who dedicated to him his book De Viris Illustribus. He was said, according to Jerom, to have written a book entitled Onasimoda Historia, but Jerom had not seen it. This book had been long considered as lost; when, in the end of the sixteenth century, a rumour was spread of its discovery, and a work under that title was published, first at Saragossa, A. D. 1619, and has been since repeatedly reprinted, but it is now generally regarded as a forgery. (Hieron. De Viris Illust., Praef. and c. 132, apud Fabric. *Bibl. FLAVUS, C. ALFIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 59. During Cicero's consulship Flavius seconded him in his measures against Catiline (Cic. pro Planc. 42), but in his tribunate he was a zealous supporter of all Caesar's acts and laws. (Cic. pro Sext. 53; Schol. Bob. in Sertian. p. 304, in Vatinian. p. 324, ed. Orelli.) This seems to have cost Flavius the aedileship. He was, however, praetor, B. C. 54, after at least one repulse. Flavius afterwards appears as quaestor, or special commissioner, at the trial of A. Gabinius (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 1. § 7), and at that of Cn. Plancius (Cic. pro Planc. 17). Cicero always speaks of Flavius as an honest and well-meaning, but mistaken man. [W. B. D.]

FLAVUS, A'LFIVS, a rhetorician who flourished in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. His reputation attracted to his school the elder Seneca [SENECA], then recently come to Rome from Corduba. Flavius himself was a pupil of Cestius Pius [CESTIUS], whom he eclipsed both in practice and fame as a teacher of rhetoric. He was respected at Rome as a youthful prodigy, and lectured before he had assumed the dress of manhood. His master, Cestius, said that his talents were too precious to be permanent; and Seneca (Controv. i.

p. 78. Bip.) remarks that Flavius always owed his recess in part to something beside his eloquence.
At first his youth attracted wonder; afterwards his ease and carelessness. Yet he long retained a sumptuous school of hearers, although his talents were latterly spoiled by self-indulgence. Flavius united poetry and history or natural philosophy (Plin. N. H. ix. 8. § 25, and Elench. ix.
xii. xiv. xv.) to rhetoric. (Senec. Controv.
i. vii. x. xiv; Schott, de Clar. op. Senec. Rhet. i.
p. 374.) [W.B.D.]

plebs in a. c. 44, and deposed from his office by C. Julius Caesar, because, in concert with C. Epidian Marullus, one of his colleagues in the tribunate, he had removed the crowns from the statues of the dictator, and imprisoned a person who had saluted Caesar as "king." After expelling him from the senate, Caesar was urgent with the father of Flavius to disinherit him. But the elder Caesetius replied, that he would rather be deprived of his three sons than brand one of them with infamy.
At the next consular comitia, many votes were given for Flavius, who, by his bold bearing towards the dictator, had become highly popular at Rome.
73, 90; Dion Cass. xlv. 9, 10, xlvii. 49; Plut.
Cas. 61, Anton. 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 68; Liv.
Epi. cvi.; Cic. Philipp. xiii. 15; Val. Max.
v. 7, § 2.) [W. B. D.]

FLAVUS, C. DECI'MIUS, a tribune of the soldiers, a. c. 209. He rescued M. Claudius Marcellus from defeat by repulsing a charge of Hannibal's elephants. (Liv. xxvii. 14.) Flavius was praetor urbanus, a. c. 184, and died in his year of office. (Liv. xxxix. 32, 38, 39.) [W. B. D.]

FLAVUS, LARTIUS. 1. SP. LARTIUS FLA-VUS, consul a. c. 506. Dionysius (v. 36) says that nothing was recorded of this consulship, and Livy omits it altogether. Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 536) considers the consulship of Lartius Flavius and his colleague T. Herminius Aspinus to have been inserted to fill up the gap of a year. Lartius Flavius belongs to the heroic period of Roman history. His name is generally coupled with that of Herminius (Dionys.
v. 22, 23, 24, 36; Liv. ii. 10, 11), and in the original lays they were the two warriors who stood brave Horatius Cocles in his defence of the bridge.
[Cicero.] Mr. Macaulay (Lays of Anc. Rome, "Horatius," et. 30) preserves this feature of the story, and adopts Niebuhr's reason for it (Hist.
Rome, i. p. 542), that one represented the tribe of the Ramnes, and the other that of the Titienses.
It is worth notice, however, that at the battle of the Lake Regillus, where all the heroes meet together for the last time, the name of Herminius appears, but not that of Lartius. (Dionys. v. 3, 4; Liv. ii. 19, &c.) Lartius Flavius was consul a second time in a. c. 490 (Dionys. vii. 68); warrior of the city (v. 75, viii. 64); one of the five envoys sent to the Volscian camp when Coriolanus besieged Rome (viii. 72); and interrex for holding the consular comitia a. c. 480 (viii. 90), in which year he counselled war with Veii (ib. 91).

2. T. LARTIUS FLAVUS, brother of No. 1, consul a. c. 501, and again a. c. 498. In this second consulship he took the town of Fidene. (Dionys.

v. 50, 59, 60; Liv. ii. 21.) His deference to the senate is contrasted by Dionysius with the military arrogance of the Roman generals of his own age.
In a. c. 498, ten years after the expulsion of the Tarquins, the curiae found it necessary to create a new magistracy, the dictatorship, limited indeed to six months, but within that period more absolute than the ancient monarchy, since there was no appeal from its authority. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Dictator.) T. Lartius Flavius was the first dictator (Dionys. v. 71; Liv. ii. 18): he received the im-perium from his colleague, appointed his master of the equites, held a census of the citizens, adjusted the differences of Rome with the Latins, and after presiding at the next consular comitia, laid down his office long before its term had expired. (Dionys.
v. 76, 77.) According to one account (id. vi. 1; comp. Liv. ii. 8), Lartius Flavius dedicated the temple of Saturn, or the Capitol on the Capitoline hill. He was one of the envoys sent by the senate,
a. c. 493, to treat with the plebs in their secession to the Sacred Hill (Dionys. vi. 81), and in the same year he served as legatus to the consul, Postumus Cominius, at the siege of Corioli. (Id. 92; Plut. Coriolan. 8.) In a tumult of the plebs, arising from the pressure of debt, a. c. 494, Lartius recommended conciliatory measures (Liv. ii. 29), and this agrees with the character of him by Dionysius (ii. cc.) as a mild and just man. [W. B. D.]

FLAVUS or FLA'VIUS, SU'BRIUS, tribune in the Praetorian guards, and most active agent in the conspiracy against Nero, a. d. 66, which, from its most distinguished member, was called Piao's conspiracy. Flavius proposed to kill Nero while singing on the stage, or amidst the flames of his palace. He was said to have intended to make away with Piso also, and to offer the empire to Seneca, the philosopher, since such a choice would justify the conspirators, and it would be to little purpose to get rid of a piper, if a player—for Piso, too, had appeared on the stage—were to succeed him. The plot was detected. Flavius was betrayed by an accomplice and arrested, and, after some attempts at excuse, gloried in the charge. He was beheaded, and died with firmness. Dion Cassius calls him Σούβριος Φλάβιος, and in some MSS. of Tacitus the name is written Flavus. (Tac. Ann. xv.
49, 50, 58, 67; Dion Cass. lxiii. 24.) [W. B. D.]

FLAVUS, SULPICI'US, a companion of the emperor Claudius I., who assisted the imperial student in the composition of his historical works.
(Suet. Claud. 4, 41.) [CLAUDIUS, I.] [W.B.D.]
FLAVUS TRICPTINUS, LUCRETUS.
[TRICPTINUS.]

FLAVUS, VIRGINIUS, a rhetorician, who lived in the first century A. D., and was one of the preceptors of A. PERSIUS FLACCUS, the poet.
(Suet. Persii Vita; Burmann, Præfat. ad Cic.
Horensium, ed. Schütz. p. xiv.) [W. B. D.]

FLORA, the Roman goddess of flowers and spring. The writers, whose object it was to bring the Roman religion into contempt, relate that Flora had been, like Acca Laurentia, a courtesan, who accumulated a large property, and bequeathed it to the Roman people, in return for which she was honoured with the annual festival of the Floralia. (Lactant. i. 20.) But her worship was established at Rome in the very earliest times, for a temple is said to have been vowed to her by king

Tatius (Varro, de L. L. v. 74), and Numa appointed a flamen to her. The resemblance between the names Flora and Chloris led the later Romans to identify the two divinities. Her temple at Rome was situated near the Circus Maximus (Tac. Ann. ii. 49), and her festival was celebrated from the 28th of April till the first of May, with extravagant merriment and lasciviousness. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Floralia.) [L. S.]

FLORENTINUS, a jurist, who is named by Lampadius (Alexand. 68.) as one of the council of the emperor Severus Alexander; and, though this authority would otherwise be entitled to little weight, it is supported by a rescript of the emperor Alexander to A. Florentinus, which is preserved in Cod. 3. tit. 28. a. 8. He wrote Institutiones in 12 books; and his work, which was composed with much elegance, acuteness, and learning, was not neglected by the compilers of Justinian's Institutes. This is the only work by which he is known; and there are 43 pure extracts from it preserved in the Corpus Juris. These have been separately commented upon by M. Schmalz, in a dissertation entitled Florentini Institutionum Fragmenta Comment. illustrata, 8vo. Regiom. 1801. The other dissertations upon Florentinus and his remains bear the following titles:—A. F. Rivinus, Florentini Jurisprudentiae Testamentariae Reliquiae in Instit. imp. Justin. repertae et Notis illustratae, 4to. Vitemb. 1752; Chr. G. Jaspis, De Florentino ejusque elegantia Doctrina, 4to. Chemnic. 1753; C. F. Walchius, De Philosophia Florentini, 4to. Jena. 1754, et in Opuscula, vol. i. p. 337–346; Jos. Th. Mathews, De Florentino Ido, ejusque sex libris prioribus Institutionum, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1801. Like the more celebrated writer of Institutes, Gaius, he is not cited by any subsequent jurist, or, at least, no such citation has reached us. [J. T. G.]

FLORENTINUS, the author of a panegyric in thirty-nine hexameters, on the glories of the Vandal king Thrasimund and the splendour of Carthage under his sway, must have flourished about the close of the fifth century. These verses, which are expressed in harsh and almost barbarous phraseology, present nothing except a cumbrous tissue of coarse flattery. [FELIX FLAVIUS; LUXORIUS.] (Antholog. Lat. vi. 85, ed. Burmann, or n. 290, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

FLORENTINUS, a Byzantine writer of uncertain age, but who lived in or before the tenth century of the Christian era, is said to be the author of the Geoponica, which are generally ascribed to BASSUS CASSIANUS. [W. P.]

FLORENTIUS, praetorian prefect of Gaul in the reign of Constantius II., by the unscrupulous tyranny of his financial administration, excited the indignation of Julian, who refused to ratify his ordinances. When the embarrassing order arrived for the legions to march to the east [JULIANUS], Florentius, that he might escape the responsibility of compliance or disobedience, remained obstinately at Vienna, busily engaged, as he pretended, in the discharge of official duties; but upon receiving intelligence of the open revolt of the troops and their choice of an Augustus, he immediately repaired to the court of Constantius, that he might both display his own fidelity, and at the same time magnify the guilt of the rebel prince. In recompense of this devotion, he was forthwith nominated consul for A. D. 361, and appointed praetorian prefect of Illyricum, in the room of Anatolius, recently deceased; but on the death of his patron in the same year (361), he fled, along with his colleague Taurus, from the wrath of the new emperor, during the whole of whose reign he remained in close concealment, having, while absent, been impeached and capitally condemned. Julian is said to have generously refused to be informed of the place where his former enemy had sought shelter. (Julian, Epist. 15; Amm. Marc. xvi. 12, 14, xvii. 3, 2, xx. 4, 2, 8, 20, xxi. 6, 5, xxii. 3, 6, 7, 5; Zosim. iii. 10.) [W. R.]

FLORIANUS, M. ANNIUS, the brother, by a different father, of the emperor Tacitus, upon whose decease he at once assumed the supreme power, as if it had been a lawful inheritance. This boldness was to a certain extent successful, for his authority, although not formally acknowledged, was tolerated by the senate and the armies of the west. The legions in Syria, however, were not so submissive, but invested their own general, Probus, with the purple, and proclaimed him Augustus. A civil war ensued [PROBUS], which was abruptly terminated by the death of Florianus, who perished at Tarsus, either by the swords of his soldiers or by his own hands, after he had enjoyed the imperial dignity for about two months, from April to June or July, A. D. 276. (Zonar. xii. 29; Zosim. i. 64; Aur. Vict. Caes. 36, 37, Epit. 36; Entrop. ix. 10; Vopisc. Florian.) [W. R.]

COIN OF FLORINUS.

FLORUS, ANNAEUS(?). We possess a summary of Roman history, divided into four books, extending from the foundation of the city to the establishment of the empire under Augustus (A. D. 20), entitled Rerum Romanarum Libri IV., or Epitome de Gestis Romanorum, and composed, as we learn from the prooemium, in the reign of Trajan or of Hadrian. This compendium, which must by no means be regarded as an abridgment of Livy, but as a compilation from various authorities, presents within a very moderate compass a striking view of all the leading events comprehended by the above limits. A few mistakes in chronology and geography have been detected here and there; but the narrative is, for the most part, philosophic in arrangement and accurate in detail, although it has too much the air of a panegyric upon the Roman people. The style is by no means worthy of commendation. The general tone is far too poetical and declamatory, while the sentiments frequently assume the form of tumid conceits expressed in violent metaphors.

With regard to the author all is doubt and uncertainty. In many MSS. he is designated as L. Annaeus Florus, in others as L. Julius Florus, in others as L. Annaeus Seneca, and in one, perhaps the oldest of all, simply as L. Annaeus. Hence some critics have sought to identify him with Julius Florus Secundus, whose eloquence is praised by Quintilian (x. 13); Vossius and Salmasius, with a greater show of probability, recognize him as the poet Florus (see below), the composer of certain verses to Hadrian, preserved by Spartianus, while Vinetius and Schottus believe him to be no other than Seneca, the preceptor of Nero, resting their opinion chiefly upon a passage in Lactantius (Inst. vii. 15), where we are told that the philosopher in question divided the history of Rome into a succession of ages,—infancy under Romulus, boyhood under the kings immediately following, youth from the sway of Tarquin to the downfall of the Carthaginian power, manly vigour up to the commencement of the civil war, which undermined its strength, until, as if in second childhood, it was forced to submit to the control of a single ruler;—a fancy which has been adopted by the author of the Epitome, who, however, arranges the epochs differently, and might evidently have borrowed the general idea. Moreover, if we were to adopt this last hypothesis, we should be compelled arbitrarily to reject the prooimium as spurious. Finally, Tise imagines that he can detect the work of two hands,—one a writer of the purest epoch, whom he supposes to have been the Julius Florus twice addressed by Horace (Ep. i. 3. ii. 2), the other an unknown and inferior interpolator, belonging to the decline of literature. To the former, according to this theory, all that is praiseworthy, both in matter and manner, must be ascribed, while to the share of the latter fall all the blunders, both in facts and taste, which disfigure the production as it now exists. But all these opinions rest upon nothing but mere conjectures. It would be a waste of time to discuss the native country and personal history of a person whose very name we cannot ascertain with certainty, and therefore we shall refrain from examining the arguments by which scholars have sought to demonstrate that he was an Italian, or a Gaul, or a Spaniard.

What is usually esteemed the Editio Princeps of Florus was printed at the Sorbonne about 1471, in 4to., by Gering, Friburg, and Crantz, under the inspection of Gaguinus, with the title "Lucii Annaei Flori de tota Hystoria Titii Livii Epitoma;" but two others, without date and without the name of place or printer, one in Gothic and one in Roman characters, are believed by many bibliographers to be entitled to take precedence. In addition to these, at least six impressions were published before the close of the fifteenth century, revised by the elder Beroaldus, Antonius Sabellius, Thannerus, and Barynthus (or Barynus). Since that period numberless editions have appeared; but those who desire to study the gradual progress of the text, which, as might be expected in a work which was extensively employed in the middle ages as a school-book, is found in most MSS. under a very corrupt form, will be able to trace its gradual development in the labours of the following scholars:—Jo. Camer., 4to. Vienn. Pannon. 1518, 2d Basil. 1532, accompanied by elaborate historical notes; El. Vinetus, 4to. Pictav. 1553. 1563. Paris, 1576; J. Stadius, 8vo. Antv. 1567. 1584. 1594; Gruterus, 8vo. Heidel. 1597; Gruterus and Salmasius, Heidel. 8vo. 1609; Freinshemius, 8vo. Argentorat. 1632. 1636. 1655; Graevius, 8vo. Top. ad Rhen. 1680, with numerous illustrations from coins and ancient monuments; Dukerus, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1722. 1744. Lips. 1832. This last text is considered as the standard, since it exhibits a very pure text and a copious selection of the best commentaries. We may also consult with advantage the recent editions by Titze, 8vo. Prag. 1819, and Seebode, 8vo. Lips. 1821.

The work has been frequently translated into almost all European languages. [W. R.]

FLORUS, ANNAEUS, the author of three sportive Trochaic dimeters addressed to Hadrian, which, with the emperor's reply in the same strain, have been preserved by Spartianus (Had. 16). We cannot doubt that he is the same person with the Annaeus (Cod. Neap. Annii) Florus twice quoted by Charisius (pp. 38, 113) as an authority for the ablative poematis—"Annaeus Florus ad divum Hadrianum poematis delector." (Anthol. Lat. ii. 97, ed. Burmann, or n. 212, ed. Meyer.)

A series of eight short epigrams in trochaic tetrameters catalectic are found in many MSS. under the name of Florus, or, as in the Codex Thuanus, Floridus, to which Salmasius (ad Spart. Had. 16) added a ninth, in five hexameters, ascribing the whole to Florus the historian, who was at one time believed by Wernsdorf to be the author not only of these and of the lines to Hadrian, but of the well-known Perigilium Veneris also—an opinion which, however, he afterwards retracted. (Anthol. Lat. i. 17. 20. iii. 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 265, 291, ed. Burmann, or n. 213—221, ed. Meyer; Wernsdorf, Poet. Lat. Min. vol. iii. p. 425, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 854.)

A curious fragment has been recently published from a Brussels MS. headed "PANNII FLORI (a corruption probably of P. ANNII) Virgilius Orator an Poeta, Incipit." The introduction only, which is in the form of a dialogue supposed to have been held about A. D. 101, has been preserved, and from this we learn that the author was a native of Africa, that he had repaired, when still almost a boy, to Rome, and had become a competitor, at the Ludi Capitolini celebrated by Domitian (A. D. 90 apparently), for the poetical prize, which had been awarded to him by the applauding shouts of the audience, but unfairly withheld by the emperor. We are farther informed that, disgusted by this disappointment, he had refused to return to his country and his kindred, had become a wanderer upon the earth, visiting in succession Sicily, Crete, Rhodes, and Egypt,—that he then returned to Italy, crossed the Alps into Gaul, proceeded onwards to the Pyrenees, finding at last repose in the city of Tarragona, and contentment in the peaceful occupation of superintending the instruction of youth. Ritschl endeavours to identify this personage with Florus the poet under Hadrian; but there seems little to support this view except the name and the fact that there is no chronological difficulty. (Rheinisches Museum, for 1841, p. 302, &c.) [W. R.]

FLORUS, C. AQUILLIUS, M. F. C. N., consul B. C. 259, the sixth year of the first Punic war. The province assigned to Florus was Sicily, where he watched the movements of Hamilcar during the autumn and winter months, and remained in the island as proconsul until late in the summer of B. C. 258. He was employed in that year in blockading Mytiastrium, a strong hill-fort, which, after a stubborn resistance and severe loss to the Romans, submitted at length to the united legions of Florus and his successor in the consulship, A. Atilius Calatinus [CALATINUS]. Florus triumphed "De Poeneis" on the 5th of October, 258. (Liv.

FLORUS, L. AQUI'LLIUS, a triumvir of the mint under Augustus, whose name occurs on several coins, which are figured below. The obverse of the first represents the head of Augustus, and the reverse a flower. The second and third refer to the conquest of Armenia and the recovery of the Roman standards from the Parthians in B. C. 20. The obverse of the second has on it a helmeted head of a female, and the reverse Armenia as a suppliant, kneeling down with outstretched hands, with the legend CAESAR DIVI F. ARMÆ. CAPT.

The obverse of the third has a head of the sun, and the reverse a Parthian on his knees, presenting a standard, with the legend CAESAR AVGVSTVS SION. RMÆ. The obverse of the fourth coin is the same as the second; the reverse, from the elephants, seems to refer to the same conquests in the East. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 142, 143, vol. vi. pp. 94—99.)

FLORUS, DOMITIUS, who had been ejected from the senate through the influence of Plautianus, was restored in the reign of Macrinus, and created tribune of the people. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 22.)

FLORUS, GESSIUS, a native of Clazomenae, succeeded Albinus as procurator of Judaea, A. D. 64—65. He owed his appointment to the influence of his wife Cleopatra with the empress Poppea. The government of Albinus had been oppressive, but the conduct of Florus caused the Jews to regard it with comparative regret. Without pity or shame, equally crafty and cruel, Florus was a systematic plunderer of his province. No gains were too petty, no extortion was too enormous for him. His ravages extended to whole districts, as well as to particular cities and persons: exile was preferable to his government; and the banditti who infested Judaea purchased impunity by sharing their booty with the procurator. Josephus (Antiq. xviii. 1, § 6, xx. 11, § 1, B. J. ii. 14), whom Tacitus confirms (Hist. v. 10), expressly attributes the last war of the Jews with Rome to Florus, and says that he purposely kindled the rebellion in order to cover the enormities of his government. At Caesarea, where in A. D. 65—66, in the second year of Florus' administration, the insurrection broke out, the Jewish citizens bribed him with eight talents, to secure them ingress into their own synagogue. Florus took the money, and immediately quitted Caesarea, abandoning the Jews to the insults and fury of the Greek population. Jewish deputies sent from Caesarea to Sebaste, to claim their purchased protection, were thrown into prison by Florus. He abstained from nothing which even the worst of his predecessors had respected. At one time he demanded 17 talents from the temple-treasury in "Caesar's name;" and twice within a few days he excited a tumult, and ordered a massacre at Jerusalem, in which 3600 persons perished, merely to afford him, amidst the confusion, an opportunity of plundering the Temple. The attempt failed, but on this occasion he publicly scourged and impaled Roman citizens of equestrian rank, but Jewish birth, although Berenice, of the Ammonaeen race, and sister of Agrippa II. [BERENICE, 2; AGRIPPA HERODES, 2], stood barefooted and in mourning beside his tribunal, supplicating for her countrymen. At the feast of the Passover, April, A. D. 65, three millions of Jews petitioned Cestius Gallus [GALLUS], the proconsul of Syria, against the tyranny of Festus. But the only redress they obtained was a faint promise of milder treatment, while Florus stood at the proconsul's side, deriding the suppliants, and on his departure ostentatiously escorted him from Jerusalem to Antioch. Hatred to Florus, rather than to Rome, rendered all Agrippa's efforts in A. D. 66, to prevent the rebellion of the Jews ineffectual, and, after it broke out, all parties represented Florus as its principal cause. It is doubtful whether Florus perished in the insurrection or escaped. His death is recorded by Suetonius (Vespas. 4; Oros. vii. 9), but not implied by Josephus (Vita. 6). (Tacit., Joseph. II. cc., and Antiq. xiv. 9, § 2, xx. 9, § 5, B. J. ii. 15, § 1, ib. 16, § 1; Sulpic. Sev. Sacr. Hist. ii. 43; Eusebius, Chronicon. lxxvi.) He is sometimes called Festus and Cestius Florus. [W. B. D.]

FLORUS, JULIUS, addressed by Horace in two epistles (i. 3, ii. 2), was, as we learn from the poet, attached to the suite of Claudius Tiberius Nero, when that prince was despatched by Augustus to place Tigranes upon the throne of Armenia. He was, moreover, according to Porphyron, the author of satires, or rather, it would seem, the editor of extracts from the satirical works of Ennius, Lucilius, and Varro. It is not improbable that he is the Florus, mentioned as a pupil of M. Porcius Latro by Seneca (Controv. iv. 25), who quotes a passage from one of his pieces, apparently a declamation, entitled Flaminianus. We may perhaps identify both with the Julius Florus whom Quintilian (x. 3, § 13) places in the foremost rank among the orators of Gaul, since he eventually practised his profession in that country (quoniam ibi demum eam (sc. eloquentiam) exercuit), and it is not impossible that all three are one and the same with Julius Florus who in the eighth year of Tiberius headed an insurrection among the Treviri. (Tac. Ann. iii. 40, 42). See Weichert, Poet. Lat. Bibl. p. 365, &c.

FLORUS, JULIUS SECUNDUS, a distinguished orator, the contemporary and dear friend of Quintilian. Julius Florus, named above as famed for his eloquence in Gaul, was the paternal uncle of Julius Florus Secundus. (Quintil. x. 1, § 13; Senec. Controv. iv. 25.) [W. R.]

FOCA or PHOCAS, a Latin grammarian, author of a dull, foolish life of Virgil in hexameter verse, of which one hundred and nineteen lines and a half have been preserved in two fragments, together with a short Sapphic ode, by way of exordium, on the progress of history, addressed to the Muse Clío. The title of the piece, as found in MSS., is Vita Virgilii a Foca Grammatico Urbis Romae Formibus edita, or with the complimentary addition Grammatico Urbis Romae perspicacissimo et doctissimo, from which we may conjecture that he was one of the public salaried teachers who gave lectures at Rome under the later emperors, while his name indicates that he was a Greek by extraction at least, if indeed we are not to understand that Rome here denotes New Rome or Constantinople. We know nothing regarding the history of Foca, nor the precise period when he flourished, except that he lived before Priscian and Cosiodorus, by both of whom he is quoted. In addition to the life of Virgil, we have three couplets, In Aeneidem Virgilii, and two tracts in prose, one De Aspiratione, and the other Ars de Nomine et Verbo, with a preface in elegiac verse.

The metrical productions of this writer will be found in the Aethiol. Lat. ii. 175, 185, 186, 256, ed. Burmann, or No. 286—289, ed. Meyer; the prose treatises in Putschius, Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui, p. 1687 and p. 1722. See also Wunderer, Poet. Latini Min., vol. iii. pp. 347, 418. [W. R.]

FOCAS, emperor. [PHOCAS.]

FONTA'NUS, a Roman poet of the Augustan age, who sang the loves of the nymphs and satyrs. (Ox. ex Poet. iv. 16. 35.) [W. R.]

FORTEIA, one of the vestal virgins in A. C. 69, daughter of C. Fonteus [No. 4], and sister of M. Fonteus [No. 5], at whose trial she was produced by Cicero, to move the compassion of the judges in behalf of her brother. (Cic. pro Font. 17.) [W. B. D.]

FORTEIA GENS came originally from Tusculum (Cic. pro Font. 14), of which municipium it was one of the most distinguished families. The Fontei were plebeian (Cic. pro Dom. 44), and bore the cognomens AGRIPPA, BALBUS (omitted under BALBUS, but given under FORTEIUS), and CAETRO. The cognomen CRASSUS (Frontin. Strateg. i. 5. § 12, iv. 5. § 8) is an error of the MSS., since there were no Fontei Crassi. The first member of this gens, whose name appears on the consular Fasti, is C. Fonteus Capito, one of the consules suffecti in A. C. 33. [W. B. D.]

There are several coins of this gens; but Capito is the only cognomen which occurs upon them: those which have no cognomen upon them are given below. The obverse of the first represents a double-faced head, which is supposed by Vaillant and others to be the head of Janus, and to indicate that the race was descended from Fontus, who, we learn from Arnobius (adv. Gentes, iii. 29), was regarded as the son of Janus; but, as Janus is always represented in later times with a beard.

Eckhel (vol. v. p. 214, &c.) maintains that the two heads refer to the Dioscuri, who were worshipped at Tusculum with especial honours, and who may be regarded as the Dii Penates of the gens. The heads of the Dioscuri also occur on other coins of the Fontei gens, as we see in the second specimen figured below. The head on the obverse of the third coin, with a thunderbolt beneath it, is probably that of Apollo Veiovis; the reverse represents a winged boy riding on a goat, with the two caps of the Dioscuri suspended above him, and a thyrsus below.

FORTEIUS. 1. T. FORTEIUS, legatus of P. Cornelius Scipio, in Spain, A. C. 212. (Liv. xxv. 32.) After the defeat and death of P. and Cn. Scipio, Fonteus, as prefect of the camp, would have succeeded to the temporary command at least of the legions. But the soldiers, deeming him unequal to conduct a defeated army in the midst of a hostile country, chose instead an inferior officer, L. Marcus, for their leader. (Liv. xxv. 34, 38.) Fonteus, however, seems to have been second in command (xxvi. 17); and if he were the same with T. Fonteus mentioned by Frontinus (Strateg. i. 5. § 12, iv. 5. § 8), he was a brave, if not an able, officer.

3. M. FORTEIUS, praetor of Sardinia, A. C. 167. (Liv. xlv. 44.)

4. C. FORTEIUS, legatus of the praetor Cn. Servilius Caepio, with whom he was slain in a popular tumult at Asculum in Picenum, on the breaking out of the Mariic or Social War, A. C. 90. (Cic. pro Font. 14; Liv. Epit. 72; Vell. Pat. ii. 15; Appian, B. C. i. 38; Oros. v. 18.) He was the father of Fonteia (Cic. pro Font. 17), and of No. 5.

5. M. FORTEIUS, son of the preceding. The praenomens of both these Fontei are very doubtful. (Orelli, Onom. Tull. s. v. Fonteus.) Cicero enumerates the offices borne by M. or M'. Fonteus in the following order. He was a triumvir, but whether for apportioning land, conducting a colony, or of the public treasury, is unknown. He was quaestor between B. C. 86—83. In B. C. 83 he was legatus, with the title of Pro-quaestor in Further Spain, and afterwards legatus in Macedonia, when he repressed the incursions of the Thracian tribes into the Roman province. The date of his praetorship is uncertain, but he governed, as his praetorian province, Narbonnese Gaul, between B. C. 76—73, since he remained three years in his government, and in 75 sent provisions, military stores, and recruits to Metellus Pius and Cn. Pompey, who were then occupied with the Sertorian war in Spain. His exactions for this purpose formed one of the charges brought against him by the provincials. He returned to Rome in B. C. 73—2, but he was not prosecuted for extortion and misgovernment until B. C. 69. M. Platorius was the conductor, M. Fabius subceptor of the prosecution. With few exceptions, the principal inhabitants of Narbonne appeared at Rome as witnesses against Fonteius, but the most distinguished among them was Induciomarus, a chief of the Allobroges. The trial was in many respects important; but our knowledge of the cause, as well as of the history of M. Fonteius himself, is limited to the partial and fragmentary speech of his advocate, Cicero. The prosecution was an experiment of the new law—Lex Aurelia de Judiciis—which had been passed at the close of B. C. 70, and which took away the judicia from the senate alone, and enacted that the judices be chosen equally from the senators, the equites, and the tribuni aerarii. It was also the year of Cicero's aedileship, and the prosecutor of Verres now came forward to defend a humbler but a similar criminal. Fonteius procured from every province which he had governed witnesses to his official character — from Spain and Macedonia, from Narbo Martius and Marseille, from the camp of Pompey, and from the companies of revenue-farmers and merchants whom he had protected or connived at during his administration. He was charged, as far as we can infer from Cicero's speech (Pro Fonteio), with defrauding his creditors while quaestor; with imposing an exorbitant tax on the wines of Narbonne; and with selling exemptions from the repair of the roads of the province, so that both were the roads impassable, and those who could not afford to buy exemptions were burdened with the duty of the exempted. Cicero denies the charge of fraud, but of the complaints respecting the wine-tax and the roads, he says that they were grave, if true; and that they were true, and that Fonteius was really guilty, are probable from the vague declamation in which his advocate indulges throughout his defence. Whether Fonteius were acquitted is not known; but, as he would have been fined or exiled if pronounced guilty, and as we read of his purchasing, after his trial, a sumptuous house—the domus Rabiriana (Cic. ad Att. i. 6.), at Naples, B. C. 68, it is more probable that the sentence of the judices was favorable. (Cic. pro Font.; Julius Victor, in Font. Fragm.; Drumann, Geogr. Rom. vol. v. pp. 329—334, by whom an analysis of Cicero's speech is given. The fragments we possess belong to the second speech for the defence. Each party spoke twice, and Cicero each time in reply. (Cic. pro Font. 13.) Quintilian (vi. 3 § 51) cites pro Font. 3. § 7, as an example of enigmatic allusion.)

6. P. FONTEIUS, a youth of obscure family, whom P. Clodius Pulcher [CLAUDIUS, No. 40.] chose for his adopted father, when, in order to qualify himself for the tribunate of the plebs, he passed at the end of B. C. 60, from the patrician house of the Claudii to the plebeian Fonteii. The whole proceeding was illegal and absurd. Fonteius was married and had three children, therefore there was no plea for adoption; he was scarcely twenty years old, while Clodius was thirty-five; the rogation was hurried through, and the auspices were slighted. After the ceremony was completed, the first paternal act of Fonteius was to emancipate his adopted son. (Cic. pro Dom. 13, Harusp. Respons. 27.)

FONTEIUS MAGNUS, a pleader of causes, and probably a native of Bithynia, who was one of the accusers of Rufus Varenus for extortion while proconsul of Bithynia. Pliny the younger defended Varenus, and Fonteius spoke in reply to him. (Plin. Ep. v. 20, vii. 6.) [W. B. D.]

FONTINALIS, an agnomen of A. Aternius, consul in B. C. 454. [ATERNIUS]

FONTUS, a Roman divinity, and believed to be a son of Janus. He had an altar on the Janiculum, which derived its name from his father, and on which Numa was believed to be buried. He was a brother of Voltumnus. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 22; Arnob. iii. 29.) The name of this divinity is connected with fons, a well; and he was the personification of the flowing waters. On the 13th of October the Romans celebrated the festival of the wells, called Fontinalia, at which the wells were adorned with garlands, and flowers thrown into them. (Varro, de L. L. vi. 22; Festus, s. v. Fontinalia.) [L. S.]

FORNAX, a Roman goddess, who is said to have been worshipped that she might ripen the corn, and prevent its being burnt in baking in the oven. (Fornax.) Her festival, the Fornacalia, was announced by the curio maximus. (Ov. Fast. ii. 525, &c.; Festus, s. v. Fornacalia.) Hartung (die Relig. d. Röm. vol. ii. p. 107) considers her to be identical with Vesta. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Fornacalia.) [L. S.]

FORTUNA, the goddess of chance or good luck, was worshipped both in Greece and Italy, and more particularly at Rome, where she was considered as the steady goddess of good luck, success, and every kind of prosperity. The great confidence which the Romans placed in her is expressed in the story related by Plutarch (de Fortitud. Rom. 4), that on entering Rome she put off her wings and shoes, and threw away the globe, as she intended to take up her permanent abode among the Romans. Her worship is traced to the reign of Ancus Martius and Servius Tullius, and the latter is said to have built two temples to her, the one in the forum boarium, and the other on the banks of the Tiber. (Plut. l. c. 5, 10; Dionys. iv. 27; Liv. x. 46; Ov. Fast. vi. 570.) The Romans mention her with a variety of surnames and epithets, as publica, privata, muliebris (said to have originated at the time when Coriolanus was prevented by the entreaties of the women from destroying Rome, Plut. l. c.), regina, conservatrix, primigenia, civilis, &c. Fortuna Virginensis was worshipped by newly-married women, who dedicated their maiden garments and girdle in her temple. (Arnob. ii. 67; Augustin. de Civ. Dei, iv. 11.) Ovid (Fast. iv.

143) tells us that Fortuna Virilis was worshipped by women, who prayed to her that she might preserve their charms, and thus enable them to please their husbands. Her surnames, in general, express either particular kinds of good luck or the persons or classes of persons to whom she granted it. Her worship was of great importance also at Antium and Praeneste, where her sortes or oracles were very celebrated. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Oracula; Hartung, die Relig. d. Röm. vol. ii. p. 233, &c. Comp. TVCHZ.) [L. S.]

FORTUNATI'ANUS, ATTILIUS, a Latin grammarian, author of a treatise (Ars) upon prosody, and the metres of Horace, which will be found in the collection of Putschius. The work is extremely defective and in great confusion, the different parts being in many places jumbled together in defiance of all order or arrangement. Fortunatianus cannot be later than the fifth century, since he is quoted by Cassiodorus, and his diction, as exhibited in an epistle dedicatory addressed to a young senator (p. 2685, ed. Putsch.), is very pure and graceful. [W. R.]

FORTUNATI'ANUS, CURIUS or CHIRIUS, a Roman lawyer, flourished about the middle of the fifth century after Christ, a short time before Cassiodorus, by whom he is quoted. He drew up a compendium of technical rhetoric, by way of question and answer, in three books, compiled from the chief ancient authorities both Greek and Latin, under the title Curii Fortunatiani Compendii Artis Rhetoricae Scholasticae Libri tres, a production which at one period was held in high esteem as a manual, from being at once comprehensive and concise.

This writer must not be confounded with the Curius Fortunatianus who, as we are told by Capitolinus (Max. et Balb. 4), composed a history of the reign of Maximus and Balbinus, nor with Fortunatianus, an African, bishop of Aquileia, mentioned by St. Jerome (de Viris Ill. 97) as a commentator on the Gospels.

The Editio Princeps of the Arts Rhetoricae was printed at Venice, fol. 1523, in a volume containing Rufinianus and other authors upon the same subject; a second edition, revised by P. Nannius, appeared at Louvain, 8vo. 1550; a third, by Erythraeus, at Strasburg, 8vo. 1568. The piece will be found also in the "Rhetores Latini Antiqui," of Pélou, Paris, 4to. 1599, p. 38—78. [W. R.]

FUSLIA GENS, patrician, of which only one family name, FLACCINATOR, appears in history. The family was early extinct. [W. B. D.]

FRANGO. [FANGO.]

FRONTINUS, SEX. JULIUS, of whose origin and early career we know nothing, first appears in history under Vespasian, at the beginning of A. D. 70, as praetor urbanus, an office which he speedily resigned in order to make way for Domitian, and it is probable that he was one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 74. In the course of the following year he succeeded Cerealis as governor of Britain, where he distinguished himself by the conquest of the Silures, and maintained the Roman power unbroken until superseded by Agricola in A. D. 78. In the third consulship of Nerva (A. D. 97) Frontinus was nominated curator agrorum, an appointment never conferred, as he himself informs us, except upon the leading men of the state (de Ag. 1; comp. 102); he also enjoyed the high dignity of augur, and his death must have happened about A. D. 106, since his seat in the college was bestowed upon the younger Pliny soon after that period. From an epigram in Martial we might conclude that he was twice elevated to the consulship; but since his name does not appear in the Fasti, we are unable to determine the dates, although, as stated above, we may infer that this honour was bestowed upon him, for the first time at least, before his journey to Britain, since the generals despatched to command that province were generally consulars.

Two works undoubtedly by this author are still extant:—1. Strategematon Libri IV. or, if we observe the distinction drawn by the author, Strategematon Libri III. and Strategicon Liber unus, forming a sort of treatise on the art of war, developed in a collection of the sayings and doings of the most renowned leaders of antiquity. The anecdotes in the first book relate to the various contingencies which may precede a battle, those in the second to the battle itself and its results, those in the third to the forming and raising of sieges, while those in the fourth, or the Strategica, comprehend various topics connected with the internal discipline of an army and the duties of the commander. This compilation, which presents no particular attractions in style, and seems to have been formed without any very critical investigation of the authorities from which some of the stories are derived, must have been published about A. D. 84, soon after the return of Frontinus from Britain, for we find Domitian named more than once with the title of Germanicus, together with frequent allusions to the German war, but no notice whatsoever of the Dacian or other subsequent campaigns.

II. De Aquaeductibus Urbis Romae Libri II., a treatise, composed, as we have already pointed out, after the year 97. The language is plain and unpretending, while the matter forms a valuable contribution to the history of architecture.

We learn from the preface to the Strategemata, that Frontinus had previously written an essay De Scientia Militari, and Aelian speaks of a disquisition on the tactics employed in the age of Homer, both of which are lost.

The Editio Princeps of the Strategemata was printed by Euch. Silher, 4to. Rom. 1487. The best editions are that of F. Oudendorp, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1731, reprinted, with additions and corrections, by Con. Oudendorp, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1779, and that of Schwebel, 8vo. Lips. 1772.

There is an early translation into our own language dedicated to Henry VIII., entitled "The Strategema, Sleyghtes, and Policies of Warre, gathered together by S. Julius Frontinus, and translated into English by Rycharde Morysine," 8vo. Lond. 1539; and another by M. D. A. B. D. 12mo. Lond. 1686, to which is added "a new collection of the most noted stratagems and brave exploits of modern generals; with a short account of the weapons offensive and defensive, and engines commonly used in war." There are also translations into German by Schöffler, fol. Meyntz, 1582, by Motschidler, 8vo. Wittenberg, 1540; by Tacius, fol. Ingolst. 1542, including Vegetius, reprinted fol. Frank. 1578; and by Kind, 8vo. Leips. 1750, along with Polyænus: into French by Remy Rousseau, about 1514; by Wolkir, fol. Paris, 1536, along with Vegetius; by Perrot, 4to. Paris, 1664; and anonymous, 8vo. Paris, 1772: into Italian by Fr. Lucio Durantino, 8vo. Vineg.

1537; by Coim. de Trino, 8vo. Venet. 1541; by Alov. de Tortia, 8vo. Venet. 1543; by Ant. Gandino, 4to. Venet. 1574: into Spanish by Didac. Guillen. de Avila, 4to. Salamanca, 1516; a list which forcibly indicates the interest excited by such topics in the sixteenth century.

The Editio Princeps of the De Aquaeductibus, in folio, is without date, but is known to have been printed at Rome, by Herolt, about 1490. The best edition is that of Polenus, 4to. Patav. 1722, to which we may add the translation by Rondelet, 4to. Paris, 1820.

The collected works were edited with the notes of the earlier commentators, by Keuchen, 8vo. Amst. 1661.

The Strategemata will be found in the various collections of the "Veteres de Re Militari Scriptores," of which the most complete is that published by Scriverius, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1607.

The De Aquaeductibus is included in the "Thesaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum" of Grævius, where it is accompanied by the voluminous dissertations of Fabretti.

(Tac. Hist. iv. 38, Agric. 17; Plin. Epist. iv. 8; x. 8; Mart. Epigr. x. 4, 8, but we cannot be certain that he alludes to our Frontinus; Aelian, Tact. 1; Veget. ii. 3.) [W. R.]

In the collection of the Agrimensores or Rei Agrariæ Auctores are preserved some treatises usually ascribed to Sex. Julius Frontinus. The collection consists of fragments connected with the art of measuring land and ascertaining boundaries. It was put together without skill, pages of different works being mixed up together, and the writings of one author being sometimes attributed to another. For an account of the collection we must refer to Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 634—644), and to Blume (Rheinisches Museum für Jurisprudenz, vol. vii. p. 173—248). 1. In the edition of this collection by Goesius (Amst. 1674) there is a fragment (p. 28—37) attributed to Frontinus, which gives an account of measures of length and geometric forms. In Goesius it is erroneously headed, De Agrorum Qualitate—a title which properly belongs to the following fragment. The writer states that, after having been diverted from his studies, by entering on a military life, his attention was again turned to the measurement of distances (as the height of mountains and the breadth of rivers), from the connection of the subject with his profession. Mention is made in this fragment of the Dacian victory, by which is probably meant the conquest of Dacia under Trajan, in A. D. 104. This fragment is wrongly attributed to Frontinus. Although some of the circumstances of the author's history seem to fit Hyginus (compare Hygin. De Limit. Const. p. 209, ed. Goes.), it is more likely that the author was Balbus, who wrote a treatise, De Asse, which is inserted in the collections of Ant Justinian Law. In the principal manuscript (codex Arcerianus) of the Agrimensores, the fragment is entitled Balbi Liber ad Celsum.

2. In p. 38—39, Goes. is an interesting fragment of Frontinus De Agrorum Qualitate, in which are explained the distinctions between ager assignatus, ager mensura comprehensus, and ager urcinius. These are the three principal distinctions as to quality, but there is also an explanation of other terms, as ager subsecivus, ager extraculus (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. app. I.). Professor C. Giraud, in his Rei Agrariæ Scriptorum no- biliores Reliquiae, Paris, 1843, p. 7, n. 2, doubts whether the fragment De Agrorum Qualitate is properly attributed to Frontinus, and seems inclined to refer it to Balbus. In support of this doubt he cites the Prolegomena of Polenus, p. 16, prefixed to the edition by Polenus of Frontinus. De Aqueduct. 4to. Patav. 1722. It should be observed that the fragment to which these doubts apply is not (as Giraud seems to suppose) the fragment De Agrorum Qualitate (p. 38, Goes., p. 12, Giraud), but the fragment which we have already treated of in the preceding paragraph, addressed to Celsus, and wrongly headed in Goesius, p. 28.

3. Next follows (p. 39) the fragment headed De Controversiis, which consists of short and mutilated extracts from the beginnings of chapters in the work of Frontinus on the same subject. The Controversiæ Agrorum, which were fifteen in number, were disputes connected with land, most of which were decided not jure ordinario, but by agrimensores, who gave judgment according to the rules of their art. In other cases, or, perhaps, in earlier times tres arbitri, appointed under a law of the Twelve Tables, or a single arbiter, appointed under the Lex Mamilia (Cic. de Leg. i. 21), pronounced a decision, after having received a report from agrimensores. Some account of these controversies may be found in Walter, Geack der Röm. Rechts. p. 784—8, ed. 1840. In natural arrangement, the treatise De Controversiis follows the treatise De Qualitate, because upon the quality of the land depend the rules for deciding disputes. The fragments De Controversiis are followed by commentaries (p. 44—89, Goes.) bearing the names of Aggenus Urbicus and Simplicius. The former seems to have been a Christian, who lived about the middle of the fifth century, and the so-called Liber Simplicii owes its name to the absurd mistake of some hasty reader, who met with the following remark at the end of the first part of the commentary of Aggenus:—"Satis, ut puto, dilucide genera controversiarum exposui: nam et simplicius curare conditiones earum existimavi, quo facilius ad intellectum pertinerent."—(p. 62, 63, Goes.) The Liber Simplicii, then, as some of the manuscripts import, is probably a work of Aggenus, and, from some expressions which it contains, seems to have been delivered orally as a lecture. A portion of it, never before published, was given to the world by Blume, in Rhein. Museum für Jurispr. vol. v. p. 369—73. These commentaries upon Frontinus are exceedingly confused and ill-written, the author having been a mere compiler, without any practical knowledge of the subject he was writing upon. Their chief value consists in the original passages of Frontinus and Hyginus which they preserve, for Hyginus, like Frontinus, wrote a treatise De Controversiis (which was first published by Blume, in Rhein. Museum für Jurispr. vol. vii. 138—172), and Aggenus, in making up his commentary on Frontinus, plagiarises the text of Hyginus. It is exceedingly difficult to determine precisely all the passages which belong textually to Frontinus in the commentary of Aggenus. The chief clue is the superiority of sense and diction in the original writer; and there can be no doubt that the epithet præstantissimus applied to such a monster as Domitian (p. 68, Goes.), must have proceeded from a contemporary of the emperor. The Liber Simplicii contains remarks on the status and transcendents of Controversiæ, which probably belong to Frontinus;

but it also contains a long passage (p. 87—89, Goes.), which does not relate to the subject of Contrauersas, and may have been introduced by an accidental transposition of leaves from a treatise De Conditionibus Agrorum of Siculus Flaccus. Walter (Gesch. des Röm. Rechts, p. 784, n. 64) attempts to restore to order the confused commentary of Aggenus. The Liber Diagraphus, in Goesius, p. 90 bears the following title, "Aggeni Urbici in Julium Frontinum Commentariorum liber secundus, qui Diagraphus dicitur." It consists of a set of plates or drawings, which seem intended to illustrate the writings of Frontinus De Limitibus and De Contrauersis.

4. Next follows (p. 102—147, Goes.) a treatise, De Colonis, which has been generally published under the name of Frontinus, but it is doubtful whether any part of it really belongs to our author. It is compiled from various sources, as the Commentarius Claudii Casarii, the Liber Balbi, the Mapa Albenensis, and contains much curious information, topographical and historical. That, in its present state, it cannot have been compiled by Frontinus is evident from the mention which it makes of later emperors, as Antoninus and Commodus. Some notes on this work by Andreas Scottus were printed by P. Burmann in his edition of Velleius Paterculus, p. 632—640. (Lug. Bat. 1719.) The chaotic fragment, called in Goesius, p. 128, Julii Frontini Siculi Præfatio, is quite out of place, and resembles the end of the first part of the Commentary of Aggenus Urbicus (p. 64, Goes.). The name Siculus joined to Frontinus appears to have been given from an ignorant confusion of Frontinus with Siculus Flaccus. In consequence of works having been wrongly attributed to Frontinus, which clearly could not have been written by the author of the treatises on Stratagema and on Aqueducts, some scholars, following Polenus, have supposed the existence of two writers of the same name, and have maintained that the writer on Stratagema and the Frontinus, of whom we possess some genuine remains in the collection of Agrimensores, were different persons. (Fabric. Biblioth. Lat. vol. iii. p. 311, ed. Ernesti.)

5. In Goesius, p. 215—219, is a fragment given without the name of any author, under the title Fragmentum Agrarium de Limitibus. In one manuscript it is ascribed to Hyginus, and in another to Julius Frontinus Siculus. Niebuhr attributes it to Frontinus. (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 623. n. 2, and p. 626. n. 22.)

For detailed information relating to the Agrimensores generally, and to the difficult subjects treated of by Frontinus, the reader is referred (in addition to the authors already cited) to Böcking's Institutiones, vol. i. p. 325—331; Rudorff, in Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. x. p. 344—437; the Memoirs of Zeiss, in Zeitsch. für die Alterth. Wissensch. Darmstadt, 1840; Schoell, Histoire de la Littérature Romaine, vol. ii. p. 454, vol. iii. p. 227; Giraud, Recherches sur le Droit de Propriété, vol. i. p. 97; Duran de la Malle, Economie Politique des Romains, vol. i. pp. 66, 179.

The fragments of Frontinus connected with the Res Agrarias are appended to Sichert's edition of the Codes Theodosianus, as it appears in the Brevisium Aniani, fol. Basil. 1528. They are given in the complete editions of the works of Frontinus, by P. Scriver, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1607, and R. Keutsch. 8vo. Amst. 1661. They are also contained

1. De Agrorum Conditionibus, &c., apud Turnebum. 4to. Paris. 1555. 2. Auctores Finium Regundorum cum Nic. Rigaltii Obsev. 4to. Lutet. 1614. 3. Rei Agrariæ Auctores, cura Wilh. Goessii. 4to. Amst. 1674. Some of the remains are to be found in C. Giraud's Rei Agrariæ Scriptorum nobiliores Reliquiæ, Paris, 1843. The fragment De Contrauersis, with the commentaries of Aggenus Urbicus, and of the Pseudo-Simplicius, were edited by Blume in the Rhein. Museum für Jurisp. vol. v. p. 329—384. Niebuhr considers the fragments of Frontinus as the only work among the Agrimensores which can be counted a part of classical literature, or which was composed with any real legal knowledge. This opinion comes with authority from the great historian who, in his investigations concerning the Agrarian institutions, made frequent use of the Agrimensores, and was thence led on to a critical examination of the entire circuit of Roman history. In compliance with the recommendation of Niebuhr (to whom the writings of the Agrimensores had always a peculiar charm), several scholars of eminence have recently devoted their attention to this obscure subject, and a new edition of the whole collection has been undertaken by Blume, Lachmann, and Rudorff, the appearance of which is anxiously desired. [J. T. G.]

FRONTO, M. AUFIDIUS, was the grandson of Cornelius Fronto, the orator, by his only daughter, who married Aufidius Victorinus. Aufidius Fronto was consul A. D. 199, and in 217 was nominated governor of Africa, but at the solicitation of the provincials was removed by Maximinus to Asia. This appointment also was cancelled by the emperor, who offered the usual pecuniary compensation, which was refused. A monument discovered at Pesaro, erected by this individual in memory of his son, bears the following inscription:—M. AUFIDIO FRONTO NI PRONPOTI M. CORNELII FRONTO NIS ORATORIS CONSULIS MAGISTRI IMPERATORUM LUCI ET ANTONINI NEPOTIS AUFIDI VICTORINI PRÆFECTI URBI BIS CONSULIS FRONTO CONSUL FILIO DULCISIMO. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 23; Orelli, Inscript. n. 1176.) [W. R.]

FRONTO, CA TIUS, a contemporary of Vespasian, who defended Bassus, and afterwards Varenus. He seems to have been an orator of some eminence at the time. (Plin. Epist. iv. 9, vi. 13.) Niebuhr, in his life of Corn. Fronto (p. 37) is inclined to believe that he is the same as the Fronto spoken of by Juvenal, and who owned the house of the poet Horace. [L. S.]

FRONTO, M. CORNELIUS, who is generally styled The Orator by the writers of the third and fourth centuries, and whom his contemporaries regarded as inferior in eloquence only to Cicero himself, was by descent an Italian, but a native of Cirta, a Roman colony in Numidia, where, during the dictatorship of Cæsar, a large body of the followers of P. Sittius had received allotments of land. He was in all probability born under Domitian, and in early life devoted but little attention to literature, since, although a pupil of Dionysius, surnamed the suble (δ αὐτρός), and of Athenodotus, he had scarcely commenced the study of the ancient authors at the age of twenty-two. Upon repairing, however, to Rome, in the reign of Hadrian, he soon attained to such celebrity as a pleader and a teacher of rhetoric, that not only were his instructions and society eagerly sought by youths of the highest rank, but he attracted the attention of the court, and gradually assumed much the same position as that occupied by the younger Pliny in the time of Trajan. To his charge was committed the child, M. Annii Verus, known in history as the emperor M. Aurelius; subsequently he was selected as the preceptor of L. Commodus, who, when he assumed the purple, took the name of L. Verus, and he discharged his duties towards both pupils so much to the satisfaction of all concerned, that he was admitted into the senate, was nominated consul for the months of July and August A. D. 143, and five years afterwards was appointed proconsul of Asia, a distinction which he declined, on the plea of infirm health. Nor were his rewards confined to mere unsubstantial honours. From the gains of a lucrative profession, and the liberality of his royal patrons, he amassed considerable wealth, became proprietor of the celebrated gardens of Maecenas, acquired villas in different parts of Italy, and expended a large sum upon the erection of splendid baths. It is true that he speaks of himself as poor, but this must be regarded as the mock humility of one who compared his own ample means with the overgrown fortunes of the great nobility. In old age he was severely afflicted with gout, and during the frequent attacks of the malady his house was the resort of the most eminent men of the metropolis, who were in the habit of assembling round his couch, and listening with delight to his conversation. So great was his fame as a speaker, that a sect of rhetoricians arose who were denominated Frontoniani. Following the example of their founder, they scrupulously avoided the poetical diction and pompous exaggeration of the Greek school; and while they made it their aim to adhere in all things to the severe simplicity of nature, bestowed especial care on the purity of their language, rejecting all words and expressions not stamped with the authority of the most approved ancient models.

Fronto, whose disposition, as far as we can judge from his correspondence, must have been singularly gentle and amiable, was throughout life regarded with the warmest esteem by his imperial disciples, and the letters of Marcus in particular, who sought permission from the senate to raise a statue to his master, breathe a spirit of the strongest affection. Of his parents and ancestors we know nothing whatsoever, for the story that he was descended by the mother's side from Plutarch is a mere modern fabrication; but we read of a brother with whom he lived on the most cordial terms, and who rose to high office under Antoninus Pius. By his wife, Gratia or Cratia, who died when he was far advanced in life, he had an only daughter, who married Aufidius Victorinus, by whom she had three sons, one of whom was M. Aufidius Fronto, consul A. D. 199, the individual who erected a monument at Pesaro, the inscription on which is given in the article below. The precise date of Fronto's death is not recorded, but the latest of his epistles belongs to the year A. D. 166.

Up to a recent period no work of Fronto was known to be in existence, with the exception of a corrupt and worthless tract entitled De Differentiis Vocaturum, and a few very short fragments scattered over the pages of Aulus Gellius and other Latin grammarians. But about the year 1814 Angelo Mai found that the sheets of a palimpsest, in the Ambrosian library, which had formerly belonged to the famous monastery of St. Columba at Bobbio, containing a translation of a portion of the acts of the first council of Chalcedon, had been made up from ancient MSS. of Symmachus, of an old commentator on Cicero, of Pliny the younger, and especially of Fronto; and that the original writing was still partially legible. In this manner a considerable number of letters which had passed between the orator, Antoninus Pius, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, and various friends, together with some short essays, were recovered and published at Milan in 1815, in a disordered and mutilated condition indeed, as was to be expected under the circumstances of the case [see CICERO, p. 728]; but still sufficiently perfect to convey a very clear idea of the nature and value of the pieces when entire. But the discovery did not end here, for upon the removal of Mai to Rome, he detected in the Vatican another portion of the acts of the same council of Chalcedon; also a palimpsest, breaking off very nearly at the point where the codex mentioned above commenced, evidently written at the same period by the same hand, and proved to have been once the property of the same monastery, thus unquestionably forming the first part or volume of that very MS. of which the Ambrosian library possessed the second, and in part consisting of leaves of parchment which had, in the first instance, exhibited the epistles of Fronto. From this source upwards of a hundred new letters were obtained, and these too in better order than the first. An improved edition, containing these important additions and alterations, appeared at Rome in 1823.

The announcement that a lost treasure, such as the works of Fronto were supposed to be, had been regained, excited intense interest among scholars; but their anticipations were miserably disappointed. The compositions in question are so inconceivably tame and rapid in style, and relate to matters so trivial (we may almost say childish), that it would be impossible to point out any production of classical antiquity, of equal extent, from which so little that is agreeable or instructive can be gleaned. We find a series of short communications pleasing indeed, in so far as they show the kindly connection which subsisted throughout life between an amiable preceptor and his imperial pupils, but relating almost exclusively to the most ordinary domestic occurrences, totally destitute of attraction either in form or substance.

I. Epistolarum ad Marcum Caesarem Libri V., addressed to M. Aurelius before his accession, comprising in all 122 letters, of which 65 are from the Caesar to Fronto, 54 from Fronto to the Caesar, two in Greek from Fronto to Domitia Calvilla, mother of the Caesar, one (a fragment) in Greek to some unknown personage, and one piece in Greek which must be considered rather in the light of an essay in imitation of Lysias and Plato than as a letter, properly speaking. The fifth book consists of mere notes, 59 in number, many of them not exceeding one or two lines, such as, "To my Lord,—If you love me at all, sleep during these nights, that you may come into the senate with a good colour, and read with energy." Reply: "To my Master,—I shall never love you enough. I will sleep."

II. Epistolarum ad Antoninum Imperatorem Libri II., addressed to M. Aurelius, now emperor, comprising in all eighteen letters, eight from the emperor to Fronto, ten from Fronto to the emperor.

III. Epistolae ad Verum. Two letters to Verus, de person addressed being probably M. Aurelius, who, at the period of his adoption, was known as M. Annus Verus. [M. AURELIUS.]

IV. Epistolarum ad Verum Imperatorem Liber, comprising in all thirteen letters, six from Verus to Fronto, seven from Fronto to Verus.

V. De Ballo Partico, a short fragment of a history of this disastrous campaign, drawn up at the earnest request of Verus.

VI. De Feriis Alsacensibus. Four epistles, two from M. Aurelius, now emperor, to Fronto; two from Fronto to M. Aurelius, containing some allusions to certain festivities at Alsium.

VII. De Nepote Amisso. A short note of condolence from M. Aurelius to Fronto on the loss of a grandson, the child of his daughter and Aufidius Victorinus, with a reply at some length by Fronto.

VIII. Arion. Apparently a brief rhetorical exercise upon this legend.

IX. De Eloquentia. A fragment addressed to M. Caesar.

X. De Oratoriis, in two letters, addressed "Antonino Augusto."

XI. Epistolae ad Antoninum Pium, comprising in all nine letters, one from Pius to Fronto, four from Fronto to Pius, one from Fronto to M. Caesar, one from M. Caesar to Fronto; together with two of which the addressees are doubtful.

XII. Epistolarum ad Amicos Libri II., comprising in all thirty-seven letters, the whole written by Fronto, with the exception of one from Appian the historian, which, as well as the reply of Fronto, is in Greek.

XIII. Principia Historiae. A mutilated fragment.

XIV. Laudes Fumi et Pulveris, and XV. Laudes Nigmentiae. Two dull scraps of paradoxical pleasantry, on the former of which at least the author seems to have prided himself (De Feriis Als. 3.)

XVI. Fragmenta, collected from various sources.

XVII. De Differentiis Vocabulorum.

Allusions are contained in the above and in the Latin grammarians to several works by Fronto, of which no trace remains. A catalogue of these, as well as of the works erroneously ascribed to Fronto, will be found in the edition of Niebuhr noticed below.

The Editio Princeps of the newly found remains was printed at Milan in two volumes, 8vo. 1815; and was reprinted verbatim at Frankfurt in 1816; and with important improvements and commentaries by Niebuhr, Ph. Batmann, and Heindorf, 8vo. Berl. 1816. Of the Roman edition of 1828 we have spoken above; the new pieces that appeared in that edition were republished (Cellia, 1832,) as a supplemental volume to the Milan, Frankfurt, and Berlin editions. A translation of the latter, by Amund Casan, with the Latin text "en regard" appeared at Paris, 2 vols. 8vo., 1830.

The De Differentiis Vocabulorum was first printed in the "Grammatici Illustres XII." fol.

Paris, 1516; and will be found in the "Auctores Linguae Latinae" of Dionysius Gothofredus, 4to. Genev. 1595, 1602, 1622; and in the "Grammaticae Latinae Auctores Antiqui" of Putschius, 4to. Hanov. 1605, p. 2191.

The ancient authorities with regard to Fronto have been carefully collected in the dissertations prefixed to the editions by Mai and Niebuhr. In the Roman edition of 1823 is given for the first time a distinct account of the palimpsests of Milan and the Vatican.

FRONTO, of EMISA, the uncle of Longinus, taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote many orations, in the reign of Alexander Severus. There are two epigrams by him on points of grammar in the Greek Anthology. (Suid. s. v. Ἐπὶ τῶν ἑρμηνείων; Brunck, Analect. vol. ii. p. 347; Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. iii. p. 56, vol. xiii. p. 938.) [L. S.]

FRONTO, JULIUS, is mentioned as the praefectus vigilum at the accession of Galba, A. D. 68, who deprived him of this office. He was probably restored to his office by Otho, when the latter obtained the supreme power, A. D. 69, for we find him serving as tribune in Otho's army in the campaign against Caecina, the general of Vitellius. His brother, Julius Gratus, was praefect of the camp in Caecina's army, and Galba's soldiers, suspecting that Julius Fronto meditated treachery, put him in chains. His brother Gratus met with the same treatment from Caecina's soldiers, and for the same reason. (Tac. Hist. i. 20, ii. 26.)

FRONTO, OCTAVIUS, a contemporary of the emperor Tiberius, had once been invested with the praetorship, and in A. D. 16 spoke in the senate against the great luxury then prevailing. (Tac. Ann. ii. 33.) [L. S.]

FRONTO, PAPIRIUS, a jurist, who probably lived about the time of Antoninus Pius, or rather earlier, for he is cited by Marcianus (who lived under Antoninus and several succeeding emperors), as if he were an elder contemporary: "Peculium nascitur, crescit, decrescit, moritur, et ideo eleganter Papirius Fronto dicebat, peculium simile esse homini." (Dig. 15. tit. 1. a. 40. pr.) He published Responsa (Dig. 14. tit. 2. a. 4. § 2. fin.); and a third book of this work is cited by Callistratus. (Dig. 50. tit. 16. a. 220. § 1.) In Dig. 30. a. 114. § 7, an opinion in which Fronto agrees with Scaevola is approved of by Marcianus. It is not likely that the Decreta Frontiana upon which Aristo wrote, or on which Aristo was cited (Dig. 29. tit. 2. a. ult.), had any connection with the jurist Fronto; nor are there sufficient grounds for the identification of the jurist, or the establishment of his relationship, with any of the Frontones who are known to have lived about the age of the Antonines. (Mansueti, ad XXX. Idorum Frag. Com. vol. ii. p. 256—263.) [J. T. G.]

FRONTO, VIBIUS, served as commander of the cavalry under Pomponius Flaccus in B. C. 19, and conquered king Vonones on the river Parnus. (Tac. Ann. ii. 68.) [L. S.]

FRUGI, a surname of L. Calpurnius Piso, consul in B. C. 133, and also borne by some of his descendants. [Piso.]

FUFIA GENS, plebeian, has been frequently confounded, both in MSS. and by the earlier scholars, with a Fusia gens, which did not exist, at least during the latter period of the republic, and is only the ancient form of the name of the Furia gens. The Fufii do not occur in history until the seventh century of the city; and their only cognomens are CALENUS and GRAMINUS, the former of which is probably derived from the town of Cales in Campania. It is not improbable that the whole Fufia gens originally came from Campania. [L. S.]

FUFICIUS FANGO. [FANGO.]

FUFIDIUS. 1. L. FUFIDIUS, a pleader of causes in some repute at Rome, about B. C. 115—105. M. Aemilius Scaurus the elder addressed to him an autobiography in three books. (Cic. Brut. 30; Plin. H. N. xxiii. 1. s. 6.)

2. FUFIDIUS, proprætor of Baetica in the first year of the Sertorian war. Sertorius defeated him in A. C. 83 or 82. (Sall. Fragm. i. 15, 52, ed. Gerlach, vol. i.) In the speech which Sallust ascribes to M. Aemilius Lepidus against Sulla, Fufidius is called "a base slave-girl, the dishonour of the honours" which Sulla conferred on him. (Fragm. xv. p. 218.) In Florus (iii. 21) Fufidius, who admonished Sulla, during the proscription, "to spare some that he might have some to rule," was probably Fufidius, and in Plutarch (Sull. 31, comp. id. Sert. 25, 27), for Aufidius, a flatterer of Sulla, to whom somewhat similar advice is attributed, should be read, according to Sintenis, the last editor of Plutarch, Fufidius.

3. FUFIDIUS, a Roman Eque, whom L. Piso, when proconsul of Macedonia, assigned to his creditors at Apollonia. (Cic. in Pison. 35.) According to Cicero, this assignment was the more shameful, because these very Apollonians had procured by a bribe of 200 talents to Piso remission or delay of their own debts. Cicero (ad Att. xi. 13.) speaks of co-heirs of Fufidius, and of a Fufidian estate (ib. 14 and 15); and a farm was purchased by one Fufidius for Q. Cicero. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. iii. 1.) But in the absence of their prænomena it is impossible to identify these Fufidii.

4. Q. FUFIDIUS, was a native of Arpinum, and of equestrian rank at Rome. He was one of three commissioners sent, A. D. 46, by the municipality of Arpinum to collect their rents in Cisalpine Gaul. [FAUCIUS.] Fufidius married a daughter of M. Caesius, and was tribune of a legion stationed in Cilicia during Cicero's proconsulship. Cicero recommends Fufidius to M. Brutus. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 11.)

A wealthy man of this name is mentioned by Horace. (Sat. i. 2. 12.) [W. B. D.]

FUFIDIUS, a jurist, who probably lived between the time of Vespasian and Hadrian. We do not subscribe to the conjecture of Maianus, who believes that he may have been the same person with the L. Fufidius Pollio, who was consul in A. D. 166. He was not later than Africanus, and appears not to have been earlier than Attilianus, a contemporary of Proculus, for, in Dig. 34. tit. 2. s. 5, Africanus seems to quote an opinion of Attilianus from the second book of Questiones of Fufidius. Zimmern, however, must have understood this passage differently, for he draws from it the inference that Fufidius was earlier than Attilianus. In Dig. 40. tit. 2. s. 25, Gaius quotes an opinion of Fufidius (for such is the true reading, not Aufidius, as some editions read, following Ha-laender in his departure from the Florentine manuscript of the Pandects). To the opinion of Fufidius Gaius opposes that of Nerva, the son, and adopts the latter. Hence Nerva, the son, is thought by Zimmern to have written after Fufidius, but the inference is not conclusive, for the question on which Nerva differed from Fufidius may have been disputed in the schools, and the opinion subsequently selected by Fufidius may have been controverted by Nerva before Fufidius wrote. In the passage in question, which relates to manumissions, Fufidius speaks of a causa probationis, and therefore Maianus concludes that he wrote after the date of the Lex Aelia Sentia, which was passed in the beginning of the reign of Augustus. (Compare Gaius, i. 18, 38, 39, 40.) In the Institutes of Gaius (ii. 154), occurs the ambiguous expression, "Quamquam apud Fufidium Sabino placet." Under Ferox [FEROX] we have endeavoured to explain the meaning of this expression. It seems to imply that a work passing under the name of Fufidius, contains an opinion of Sabinus, but it does not enable us to determine whether the work exhibited Fufidius as commenting upon or citing Sabinus, or whether it was an original treatise of Fufidius, with notes by Sabinus. In Dig. 42. tit. 5. s. 29, Fufidius is quoted by Paulus on a nice question:—When a man in whose honour a public statue has been erected becomes insolvent, does the ownership of the statue pass under a sale of his goods for the benefit of his creditors?

Cujas (Obeere. l. 9) claims the honour of having been the first to rescue the name of this jurist from obscurity, and is inclined to identify him with the L. Fufidius mentioned above [No. 1], but this L. Fufidius was certainly earlier than our jurist. (Maianus, ad XXXI Idorum Frag. Comment. vol. ii. p. 273—287.) [J. T. G.]

FUFITIUS, an architect, was the first Roman writer on architecture. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 14, where, however, the reading of the name is very doubtful: see Schneider's note.) [P. S.]

FUFIUS, a Roman modeller, whose name is known by a statue in burnt clay, discovered near Perugia, in 1773. It is two feet high, representing a household god, covered with a dog-skin, and has on its base the inscription, C. FUFIUS FINXIT. (Winckelmann, Briefe üb. d. neuest. Herkul. entdeck. § 29, Fea's note.) [P. S.]

FUFIUS. 1. C. and M. FUFIUS, two Roman equites mentioned by Cicero (pro Flacc. 20); but otherwise unknown.

2. Q. FUFIUS, an intimate friend of Cicero, who recommended him in A. C. 50 to C. Mummius. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 3.)

3. L. FUFIUS, a Roman orator, who was an elder contemporary of Cicero. About B. C. 98 he accused M'. Aquilius of extortion, which he had committed in his consulship in Sicily B. C. 101. On that occasion L. Fufius evinced great zeal and industry; but the accused, who was defended by M. Antonius, was acquitted. The oratory of Fufius seems to have been of a very vehement and passionate character, and the man himself of a very quarrelsome nature; and this he retained even in his advanced age, when he had nearly lost his voice. (Cic. de Orat. i. 39, ii. 22, iii. 13; de Off. ii. 14; Brut. 62.)

4. M. FUFIUS, a friend of Milo, who was accompanied by him at the time when he murdered P. Clodius. (Ascon. in Cic. Milom. p. 38. ed. Orelli.)

5. Q. FUFIUS, a Roman eque, mentioned by Cicero (Phil. ii. 16), but otherwise unknown. [L. S.]

FULCINIUS, a name which is borne by several persons in Roman history, belonging to different periods as well as places, so that we cannot say whether they belonged to one gens or family or not.

1. C. FULCINIUS. When, in B. C. 438, the Fidenates had revolted against Rome, and joined Lars Tolumnius of Veii, the Romans sent C. Fulcinius and three others as ambassadors to inquire into the cause of the revolt. But the Fidenates, on the advice of Tolumnius, put the Roman ambassadors to death; and the Romans afterwards honoured the ambassadors with statues on the Rostra. (Liv. iv. 17; Cic. Phil. ix. 2.)

2. M. FULCINIUS, of Tarquinii, in Etruria, a man of high respectability, who carried on a considerable banking business at Rome. He had a son of the same name, who died young; and a freedman of his likewise bore the name of M. Fulcinius. (Cic. pro Cæc. 4, 6.)

3. L. FULCINIUS, C. F., brought the charge of murder against M. Sausenius in B. C. 52. (Ascon. in Milon. p. 54.) The name of one L. Fulcinius occurs on Macedonian coins; but as he is called questor, it is impossible to identify him with any of the Fulcinii that are known to us. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 221.) [L. S.]

FULCINIUS PRISCUS, a jurist of whom little is known. In Dig. 25. tit. 2. a. 3. § 4, his opinion is cited by Paulus along with that of Proculus and that of Mela. In Dig. 25. tit. 2. a. 6, he is cited by Paulus along with Atilianus. In Dig. 39. tit. 6. s. 43, he is cited by Neratius. From Dig. 31. a. 49. § 2, it may be inferred that he was not earlier than Labeo; and it may be conjectured, with probability, that he was a contemporary of Proculus. Guil. Grotius (De Fitis Juris. ii. 5. § 5), places his date between the reign of Tiberius and that of Trajan. He is cited by Gaius, Pomponius, and Ulpian. Though he lived before Hadrian, he appears to have written upon the praetor's edict, the form of which had already acquired permanence, for in Dig. 11. tit. 7. a. 23, Dig. 13. tit. 1. § 13, Dig. 42. tit. 4. a. 7, his opinion is cited by authors writing upon the edict. [J. T. G.]

FULCINIUS TRIO. [TRIO.]

FULGENTIUS, FABIVS PLACIADAES (not PLACIADES), a Latin grammarian of uncertain date, probably not earlier than the sixth century after Christ. His barbarous and inflated style yields strong indications of African origin, but he must by no means be confounded with Fulgentius, who was bishop of Ruspe about the year A. D. 508, nor with Fulgentius Ferrandus, a pupil of that prelate. Three works which bear evident marks of the same hand are ascribed to Fabius Placidas Fulgentius.

I. Mythologiarum Libri III. ad Catum Presbyterum. A collection of the most remarkable tales connected with the history and exploits of gods and heroes. A few incidents derived from sources now no longer accessible may be gathered here and there from this generally worthless compilation; but the attempts to rationalise the legends are characterised by the wildest extravagance, while the Greek etymologies of proper names are perfect portents of folly or ignorance.

II. Expositio Sermonum Antiquorum cum Testimoniis ad Chalcidicum Grammaticum. A glossary, as the name imports, of obsolete words and phrases. It is very short, and almost entirely without value, for many of the passages which profess to be quotations from ancient authorities are ascribed to writers and works which no one ever heard of, and are universally regarded as impudent fabrications.

III. Libro de Expositione Virgilianae Continentiae ad Chalcidicum Grammaticum, a title which means, an explanation of what is contained in Virgil, that is to say, of the esoteric truths allegorically conveyed in the Virgilian poems. The absurdity of this piece is so glaring, that, had it been composed in a different age, we should have at once pronounced it to be a tedious and exaggerated burlesque. To take a single example. The Aeneid is supposed to shadow forth the career of man, as he passes upwards through the weakness of infancy and the waywardness of youth to wisdom and happiness. Now we are told that Anchises died and was buried at Drepanum. But δρεπανος or δρεπανος is quasi δριμυταδος: δριμυς means harsh, ταῖς means a boy, therefore the interment of Anchises by his son covertly expresses that the harshness of youth casts aside paternal restraint.

The Editio Princeps of the Mythologiae was published at Milan, with the commentaries of Bapt. Pius, in 1487, or according to other bibliographical authorities, in 1498. The best edition of the collected works of Fulgentius is included in the "Mythographi Latini" of Muncker, Auct. 1681, 8vo., reprinted, with large additions, by Van Staveren, Lug. Bat. 1742, 4to. The Expositio Sermonum is generally appended to Nonius Marcellus. [MARCELLUS, NONIUS.] [W. R.]

FULLO, a cognomen of the Apustia Gens at Rome. [APUSTIA GENS.] It was probably derived from the occupation of one of the Apustii, a cleaner of woollen cloths.

1. L. APUSTIUS, L. F. C. N. FULLO, consul in B. C. 226. There prevailed at Rome in his consulship a panic of Gaulish invasion. The Sibylline books foretold that the Gauls and Greeks should possess the city. At once to fulfil and avert the prophecy, the pontiffs directed a Gaulish man and woman and a Greek man and woman to be buried alive in the ox-market at Rome. The whole of Fullo's consulship was employed in preparations for a Gaulish war and a general levy of the Italian people. (Polyb. ii. 22; Liv. Epit. xx., xxii. 17; Plut. Marcell. 3; Oros. iv. 13; Zonar. viii. p. 403. c.; Plin. H. N. iii. 20.)

2. L. APUSTIUS FULLO, son probably of the preceding. He was aedile of the plebs in B. C. 202, when the plebeian games in the Flaminian Circus were thrice repeated. Fullo was Praetor Urbanus in B. C. 196, and afterwards commissioner under a plebiscite of Q. Aelius Tubero, for establishing a Latin colony in the district of Thurii, B. C. 194. (Liv. xxxi. 4, xxxiii. 24, 26, xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 9.) [W. B. D.]

FULLONIUS SATURNINUS. [SATURNINUS.]

FULVIA. 1. A Roman lady of rank, but of loose morality. She lived on terms of intimacy with Q. Curius, an accomplice of the Catilinarian conspiracy, who told her of the scheme that was afoot. As Curius had not the means of satisfying her extravagant demands upon him, she took vengeance by divulging his secret: she communicated it, among others also, to Cicero, and thus became the means of suppressing the conspiracy. (Sall. Cat. 23, 26, 28.)

2. A daughter of M. Fulvius Bambalio of Tuscum, by Sempronia, a grand-daughter of Tudi-tanus. She was first married to P. Clodius, by whom she had a daughter, Claudia, afterwards the wife of Caesar Octavianus. When Clodius was murdered, and his body was carried to Rome, and there exposed in the atrium of his house, Fulvia, with great lamentations, showed her husband's wounds to the multitude that came to see the body; and she thus inflamed their desire of taking vengeance on the murderer. She afterwards married C. Scribonius Curio; and after his fall in Africa, in B. C. 49, she lived for some years as a widow, until about B. C. 44, she married M. Antony, by whom she became the mother of two sons. Up to the time of her marrying Antony, she had been a woman of most dissolute conduct, but henceforth she clung to Antony with the most passionate attachment, and her only ambition was to see her husband occupy the first place in the republic, at whatever cost that position might be purchased. When Antony was declared a public enemy, she addressed the most humble entreaties to the senate, praying that they might alter their resolution. Her brutal conduct during the fearful proscriptions of B. C. 43 is well known; she gazed with delight upon the heads of Cicero and Rufus, the victims of her husband. In those same days of terror a number of wealthy Roman ladies were ordered to deliver up their treasures to the triumvirs, whereupon they called upon the female relatives of the triumvirs, and petitioned them to interfere with the triumvirs, and endeavour to mitigate the order. When the ladies came to the house of Fulvia, they were treated most haughtily and ignominiously. In B. C. 40, while Antony was revelling with Cleopatra in all the luxuries of the East, and Octavianus was rewarding his soldiers with lands in Italy, Fulvia, stimulated partly by jealousy and the desire of drawing Antony back to Italy, and partly by her hostility towards Octavianus, resolved upon raising a commotion in Italy. She induced L. Antonius, her husband's brother, to come forwards as the protector of those who were oppressed and reduced to poverty by the colonies of Octavianus. He was soon joined by others, who were more sincere than himself. He took his post at Praeneste whither he was followed by Fulvia, who pretended that the lives of her children were threatened by Lepidus. She afterwards followed L. Antonius to Perugia, and endeavoured to rouse the inhabitants of the north of Italy to assist him, while he was besieged at Perugia by Octavianus. When Perugia fell into the hands of Octavianus, by the treachery of L. Antonius, Fulvia was permitted to escape, and went to Brundisium, where she embarked for Greece. Her husband, who had in the meantime been informed of the war of Perugia and its result, was on his way to Italy. He met Fulvia at Athens, and censured her severely for having caused the disturbance. It is said that, from grief at his rough treatment, she was taken ill, and in this state he left her at Sicyon while he went to Brundisium. Her feelings were so deeply wounded by her husband's conduct, that she took no care of herself, and soon after died at Sicyon, B. C. 40. The news of her death came very opportunely for the triumvirs, who now formed a reconciliation, which was cemented by Antony marrying the noble-minded Octavia. (Plut. Anton. 9, &c.; Appian, B. C. iii. 51, iv. 29, 32, v. 14, 19, 21, 33, 43, 50, 52, 55, 59, 62; Dion. Cass. xlv. 56, xlvii. 8, &c.; xlviii. 3—28;

FULVIA PLAUTILLA. [PLAUTILLA.]

FULVIA GENS (of which the older term was Foulvio), plebeian, but one of the most illustrious Roman gentes. According to Cicero (pro Planc. 8, comp. Phil. iii. 6) and Pliny (H. N. vii. 44), this gens had come to Rome from Tusculum, although some members must have remained in their native place, since Fulvii occur at Tusculum as late as the time of Cicero. The gens Fulvia was believed to have received its sacra from Hercules after he had accomplished his twelve labours. The cognomina which occur in this gens in the time of the republic are BAMBALIO, CENTUMALUS, CURVUS (omitted under CURVUS, but given under FULVIUS), FLACCUR, GILLO, NACCA, NOBILOR, PARTINUS, and VRATIS, or NERATIS. The annexed coin, belonging to this gens, bears on the obverse a head of Pallas, with ROMA, and on the reverse Victory in a biga, with CN. FOVL. M. CAL. Q. MXT., that is, Cn. Fulvius, M. Calidius, Q. Metellus. [L. S.]

FULVIANUS, L. MA'NIUS ACIDI'NUS. [ACIDIUS, No. 2.]

FULVIUS. 1. L. FULVIUS CURIUS, was consul in B. C. 322, with Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus. He is the first Fulvius that we meet with in the history of Rome, and is said to have been consul at Tusculum in the year in which that town revolted against Rome; and on going over to the Romans to have been invested there with the same office, and to have triumphed over his own countrymen. He and his colleague were further said, in some annals, to have conquered the Samnites, and to have triumphed over them. In B. C. 313 he was magister equitum to the dictator, L. Aemilius, whom he accompanied to besiege Satulica. (Plin. H. N. vii. 44; Liv. viii. 38, ix. 21.)

2. M. FULVIUS CURIUS PARTINUS, consul in B. C. 305, in the place of T. Minucius, who had fallen in the war against the Samnites. According to some annalists, M. Fulvius took the town of Bovianum, and celebrated a triumph over the Samnites. (Liv. ix. 44.)

3. C. FULVIUS CURVUS, one of the plebeian aediles in B. C. 298. (Liv. x. 23.)

4. A. FULVIUS, the son of a Roman, and an accomplice of the Catilinarian conspiracy; but when he was on his way to Catiline, his father, who was informed of his son's design, overtook him, and ordered him to be put to death. (Sall. Cat. 39; Dion. Cass. xxxvii. 36; Val. Max. v. 8 § 5.) [L. S.]

FULVIUS, praefectus urbi in A. D. 222, was torn to pieces, along with Aurelius Eubulus [EUBULUS], by the soldiers and people, in the massacre which followed the death of Elagabalus, and was succeeded in office by the notorious Eutychianus Comazon. He is perhaps the same person with the consular, Fulvius Diogenianus [DIOGENIANUS], whose rash exclamation, on hearing the letter addressed by Macrinus to the senate, has been commemorated by Dion Cassius. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 36, lxxix. 21.) [W. R.]

FULVIUS ASPRIA'NUS, an historian, who detailed at great length the doings of the emperor Carinus. (Vopisc. Carin. 16.)

FULVUS, the name of a family of the Aurelii, under the empire, from which the emperor Antoninus was descended, whose name was originally T. Aelius Fulvus. (See the genealogical table in Vol. I. pp. 210, 211.)

FUNDA'NIA, the daughter of C. Fundanius [No. 2], and wife of M. Terentius Varro. [VARRO]. Fundania had purchased an estate, and Varro composed his three books, De Re Rustica, as a manual for her instruction in the management of it. The first of these books, entitled De Agricultura, is dedicated to her. (Varr. R. R. i. 1.) [W. B. D.]

FUNDA'NIA GENS, plebeian, first came into notice in the middle of the third century B. C.; but though one of its members obtained the consulship (B. C. 243), the Fundanii never attained much importance in the state. FUNDULUS is the only cognomen that occurs in this gens. [W. B. D.]

It is uncertain to whom the two following coins of this gens, both of which bear the name C. Fundanias, are to be referred. The first has on the obverse the head of Jupiter, and on the reverse Victory placing a crown upon a trophy, with a captive kneeling by the side: the second has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Jupiter in a quadriga, the horses of which are driven by a person sitting upon one of them; the Q at the top indicates that the coin was a Quinaunce.

FUNDA'NIUS. 1. M. FUNDANIUS, one of the tribunes of the plebs in B. C. 195. In conjunction with another tribune, L. Valerius, Fundanius proposed the abolition of the Oppian sumptuary law, which laid some restrictions on the dress and manners of the Roman women. Valerius and Fundanius were opposed by two members of their own collegium, M. Brutus and T. Brutus, and by one of the consuls of the year, M. Porcius Cato. But the matrons supported the proposed abrogation so strenuously and pertinaciously, that the law was rescinded. (See vol. i. p. 638; Liv. xxiv. 1.)

2. C. FUNDANIUS was the father of Fundania, the wife of M. Terentius Varro. Fundanius is one of the speakers in Varro's first dialogue, De Re Rustica; and from the speech there assigned him, he seems to have been a scholar, and acquainted with at least the statistics of agriculture. His account of the increasing luxury of the Roman country-houses may be compared with that of

Seneca. (Ep. 86.) Fundanius was cited also by Varro in one of his philological treatises. (Varr. R. R. i. 2. § 13, Frag. p. 349, ed. Bipont.)

3. M. FUNDANIUS, defended by Cicero, B. C. 65. The scanty fragments of the "Oratio pro M. Fundanio" do not enable us to understand either the nature of the charge or the result of the trial. (Cic. Fragm. ed. Orelli. p. 445.) Q. Cicero (de Petit. Cons. 5) says that Fundanius possessed great interest in the comitia and would be very serviceable to M. Cicero at his approaching consular election. Cicero held up to ridicule one of the witnesses for the prosecution on this trial, who could not enunciate properly the first letter in the name Fundanius. (Quintil. Instit. i. 4. § 14.) While proconsul of Asia Minor, B. C. 69, Q. Cicero favoured one C. Fundanius in his demands on the property of Octavius Naso; and as it is doubtful whether the nomen of this Fundanius were Marcus or Caius, it is not unlikely that Naso's creditor and the defendant, B. C. 65, were the same person. (Cic. ad Q. Frat. i. 3. § 10.)

4. C. FUNDANIUS, perhaps a son of No. 2, is spoken of by Cicero (ad Q. Fr. i. 2. § 3) as a friend of his. He may be the same as the C. Fundanius, a Roman eque, who, in the Spanish war, B. C. 45, deserted Cn. Pompeius the Younger, and came over to Caesar a few days previous to the capture of Ategua (Tebala Veja or Tegua) in Baetica by the Caesarians, on the 19th of February in that year. (Bell. Hisp. 11.)

5. C. FUNDANIUS, a writer of comedies in the age of Augustus. Horace (Sat. i. 10. 41, 42) praises his management of the slaves and intrigantes of the comic drama. He puts into the mouth of Fundanius (Sat. ii. 8. 19) a description of the rich but vulgar supper of Nasidienus, that is, of Salvidienus Rufus. (Suet. Octav. 66; Vet. Schol. ad Hor. Sat. i. 10. 41.) [W. B. D.]

FUNDULUS. 1. C. FUNDANIUS C. F. N. FUNDULUS was one of the plebeian aediles in B. C. 246. He united with his colleague, Ti. Sempronius Gracchus, in the impeachment of Claudia, one of the daughters of App. Claudius Caecus. [CLAUDIA, 1.] After encountering a strenuous opposition from the numerous members and connections of the Claudian gens, the aediles at length imposed a heavy fine on Claudia; and they employed the money in building on the Aventine hill a temple to Liberty. (Liv. xxiv. 16.) Fundanius was consul in B. C. 243, and was sent into Sicily to oppose Hamilcar Barca, who then occupied the town of Eryx. The Carthaginian commander sent to the Roman camp to demand a truce for the interment of the slain. Fundanius replied that Hamilcar should rather propose a truce for the living, and rejected his demand. But afterwards, when Fundanius made a similar proposal, Hamilcar at once granted it, observing that he warred not with the dead. (Gell. x. 6; Diod. Fragm. Vatican. p. 53.) The scholiast on Cicero's speech against Clodius and Curio, gives, however, a different version of the history of Fundanius. He impeached, not Claudia, the daughter, but P. Claudius Pulcher, the son of Appius Caecus, for his impiety in giving battle contrary to the auspices, and for his defeat at Drepana. [CLAUDIUS No. 13.] When the centuries were preparing to vote, a thunder-storm interrupted the proceedings. Other tribunes then interposed, and prohibited the same impeachment being brought forward by the same accusers twice in one year. Fundanius and his colleague, Junius Pullus, therefore changed the form of their action, and then succeeded. This account would make the tribuneship of Fundanius to fall earlier than the common story implies; since Claudia was not impeached until after her brother's death. (Schol. Bob. in Cic. p. 357. ed. Orelli.)

2. M. FUNDANIUS FUNDULUS, one of the plebeian aediles in B.C. 213. With his colleague, L. Villius Tappulus, he accused before the tribes, and procured the banishment of, certain Roman matrons, on a charge of disorderly life. (Liv. xxv. 2.) [W. B. D.]

FUNISULA'NUS, a person mentioned by Cicero in A.C. 51, and again in A.C. 49. He owed Cicero a considerable sum of money, and was not reckoned rich. (Cic. ad Att. v. 4, x. 15.)

FURFANIUS POSTUMUS. [POSTUMUS.]

FURIAE. [EUMENIDES.]

FURINA, or FURRINA, an ancient Roman divinity, who had a sacred grove at Rome. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 18.) Her worship seems to have become extinct at an early time, for Varro (de L. L. vi. 19) states that in his day her name was almost forgotten. An annual festival (Furinalia or Furinales feriae) had been celebrated in honour of her, and a flamen (flamen Furinalis) conducted her worship. (Varro de L. L. v. 84, vii. 45.) She had also a temple in the neighbourhood of Satricum. (Cic. ad Q. Frat. iii. 1.) [L. S.]

FURIA GENES, patrician. This was a very ancient gens, and in early times its name was written Fusia, according to the common interchange of the letters r and s (Liv. iii. 4), as in the name Valerius and Valensia. History leaves us in darkness as to the origin of the Furia gens; but, from sepulchral inscriptions found at Tusculum (Gronov. Thesaur. vol. xii. p. 24), we see that the name Furius was very common in that place, and hence it is generally inferred that the Furia gens, like the Fulvia, had come to Rome from Tusculum. As the first member of the gens that occurs in history, Sex. Furius Medullinus, A.C. 488, is only five years later than the treaty of isopolity which Sp. Cassius concluded with the Latins, to whom the Tusculans belonged, the supposition of the Tusculan origin of the Furia gens does not appear at all improbable. The cognomens of this gens are ACULCO, BIBACULUS, BROCCUS, CAMILLUS, CRASSIPES, FUSUS, LUSCUS, MEDULLINUS, PACILUS, PHILUS and PURPUREO. The only cognomens that occur on coins are Broccus, Crassipes, Philus, Purpureo. There are some persons bearing the gentile name Furius, who were plebeians, since they are mentioned as tribunes of the plebs; and those persons either had gone over from the patricians to the plebeians, or they were descended from freedmen of some family of the Furii, as is expressly stated in the case of one of them. [L. S.]

FURIUS. 1. P. FURIUS, one of the tribuni agri dandi who were appointed after the taking of Antium, in B.C. 467. (Liv. iii. 1.)

2. Q. FURIUS was pontifex maximus in B.C. 449: when the plebs returned from its secession to the Aventine, Q. Furius held the comitia at which the first tribunes of the plebs were appointed. (Liv. iii. 54.)

3. L. FURIUS was, according to some annalists, tribune of the plebs in A.C. 307, and prevented the comitia from electing App. Claudius, who was then censor, to the consulship, unless he consented to lay down his censorship, in accordance with the law. (Liv. ix. 42.)

4. M. FURIUS, defended M. Valerius in the senate from the charges which the Macedonian ambassadors brought against him, B.C. 201. (Liv. xxx. 42.) He seems to be the same as the M. Furius who in A.C. 200 served as legate under L. Furius [No. 5] in the war against the Gauls. (Liv. xxxi. 21.)

5. L. FURIUS, was praetor in the Gallic war, which ensued immediately after the close of the Hannibalian war, A.C. 200. He was stationed at Ariminum, and as the Gauls laid siege to Cremona he hastened thither with his army, and fought a great battle, in which the Gauls, after having sustained enormous losses, were routed and put to flight. This victory created great joy at Rome; and, on his return, L. Furius claimed the honour of a triumph, which, after some opposition on the part of the elder senators, was granted to him. (Liv. xxxi. 21, 47—49.)

6. C. FURIUS, was duumvir navalis in B.C. 178, during the war against the Istrians. He had ten ships at his command, to protect the coast as far as Aquileia. In A.C. 170 he served as legate, and was stationed in the island of Issa, with only two ships belonging to the islanders. But as the Roman senate feared lest Gentius, king of the Illyrians, should commence hostilities, eight ships were sent to him from Brundisium. (Liv. xli. 5, xliii. 11.)

7. P. FURIUS, the son of a freedman, was a partisan of Saturninus and Glaucia, and tribune in A.C. 100. After the murder of Saturninus, when the senate wanted to recall Metellus from exile, P. Furius opposed the senate, and refused to listen to the entreaties of the son of Metellus, who implored that tribune's mercy on his knees. After the expiration of his tribuneship, he was accused before the people for his actions during his tribuneship, and the infuriated multitude tore him to pieces in the forum. (Appian, B.C. i. 33; Dion Cass. Fragm. Peiresc. Nos. 105, 109, pp. 43, 45, ed. Reimar.)

8. FURIUS, a navarchus of Heracleia, was, though innocent, put to death by Verres. He had written his defence, from which some passages are quoted by Cicero. (In Verr. v. 43.)

9. NUMERIUS FURIUS, a Roman eques of the time of Cicero, but otherwise unknown. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 23.)

10. P. FURIUS, an accomplice in the Catilinarian conspiracy. He was one of the military colonists to whom Sulla had assigned lands at Faesulae. (Cic. in Cat. iii. 6; Sall. Cat. 50.) [L. S.]

FURIUS, a Roman jurist, who was peculiarly skillful in the ius praediorum (Dict. of Ant. & c. Praes.), for being himself a praedicator, he took a personal interest in the law relating to the subject. It was for this reason that Q. Mucius Scaevola, the augur, though learned himself in every department of the law, used to refer to Furius and Cascellius (who was also a praedicator) the clients who came to consult him on praedictorian law. (Cic. pro Balb. 20; Val. Max. viii. 12, § 1.) This Furius is probably identical with C. CAMILLUS. [See Vol. I. p. 592, b.] [J. T. G.]

FURIUS ANTHIA'NUS. [ANTHIANUS.]

C. FURNIUS. 1. Tribune of the plebs, A.C. 445, who, as one of the tribunitian college, opposed the rogation, which was brought forward in that year for opening the consulship to the plebeians (Dionys. xi. 52.) Livy (iv. 1) mentions the rogation, but not Furnius.

2. Tribune of the plebs B. C. 50 (Cic. ad Att. v. 2, 18), and a friend and correspondent of Cicero. (Ad Fam. x. 25, 26.) Cicero trusted to the exertions of Furnius, while tribune, to obtain for him his recall at the end of his first year as proconsul of Cilicia, and, after his return, a supplicatio or thanksgiving. (Ad Fam. viii. 10, ix. 24, xi. 14.) A clause, however, which Furnius inserted in his plebiscite, making the recall dependent on the Parthians remaining quiet until the month of August, B. C. 50, was unsatisfactory to Cicero, since July was the usual season of their invasions. (Cic. ad Att. vi. 1.) Furnius, as tribune, was opposed to the unreasonable demands of the oligarchical party at Rome, that Caesar should immediately and unconditionally resign his proconsulship of Gaul. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 10.) After the breaking out of the civil war, he was sent by Caesar with letters to Cicero in March, B. C. 49. (Cic. ad Att. ix. 6, 11, vii. 19.) Cicero recommended Furnius to L. Munatius Plancus [PLANCUS], at that time, B. C. 43, proconsul in Transalpine Gaul (ad Fam. x. 1, 3, 4, 6, 8, 11, 12), and he was legatus to Plancus during the first war between Antony and Augustus, and until after the battle of Philippi, B. C. 42. During the war between Antony and the senate, Furnius apprised Cicero of the movements and sentiments of the Roman legions and commanders in Gaul and Spain, but his letters have not been preserved. (Ad Fam. x.) In the Perusine war, B. C. 41-2, Furnius took part with L. Antonia. [AERONRUS, No. 14.] He defended Sentinum in Umbria against Augustus, and shared the sufferings of the "Perusina Fames." Furnius was one of three officers commissioned by L. Antonia to negotiate the surrender of Perugia, and his reception by Augustus was such as to awaken in the Antonian party suspicions of his fidelity. (Appian, B. C. v. 30, 40, 41; Dion Cass. xlviii. 13, 14.) In B. C. 35 he was prefect of Asia Minor, under M. Antony, where he took prisoner Sex. Pompeius, who had fled thither after his defeat by Agrippa, B. C. 36. (Appian, B. C. v. 137-142.) After the battle of Actium, B. C. 31, Furnius, through the mediation of his son C. Furnius, was reconciled to Augustus (Senec. De Benef. ii. 25), and received from him the rank of a consular senator (Dion Cass. lii. 42), and was afterwards appointed one of the supplementary consuls, in A. C. 29, which is the first time the name of Furnius appears on the consular Fasti. He was prefect of Hither Spain in A. C. 21. (Dion Cass. liv. 5; Flor. iv. 12.) Furnius is probably mentioned by the author, De Oratoribus (c. 21) among the speakers whose meagre and obsolete diction rendered their works impossible to read without an inclination to sleep or smile.

3. Son of the preceding, consul B. C. 17. He reconciled Augustus to his father, C. Furnius, who had been up to B. C. 31 a staunch adherent of M. Antonia. (Senec. Benefic. ii. 25.) It is doubtful whether the Furnius put to death by the senate in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 26, for adultery with Claudia Pulchra, be the same person. (Tac. Ann. iv. 52.) [W. B. D.]

FUSCIA'NUS. [TUSCIANUS.]

FUSCUS, ARELLIUS, a rhetorician who flourished at Rome in the latter years of Augustus. He was of equestrian rank, but was degraded from it on account of some remarkable scandal attached to his life. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 12, § 152.) He instructed in rhetoric the poet Ovid (Senec. Controv. x. p. 157. Bip.), the philosopher Fabianus (Id. Controv. proem. ii.), and others. He declaimed more frequently in Greek than in Latin (Suasor. iv. p. 29), and his style of declamation is described by Seneca (Controv. proem. ii. p. 134), as more brilliant than solid, antithetical rather than eloquent. Seneca, however, highly commends his statement (explicatio) of an argument. (Suasor. iv.) His eulogy of Cicero (Suasor. vii. p. 50) is the most interesting specimen of his manner. The Suasoriae and Controversiae both abound in citations from the rhetorical exercises of Fuscus. His rival in teaching and declaiming was Porcius Latro [LATRO], and their styles seem to have been exact opposites. (Comp. Controv. ii. proem. and x. p. 157.) Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 12, § 152) reproaches Fuscus with wearing silver rings. There were two rhetoricians of this name, a father and son, since Seneca generally affixes "pater" to his mention of Arellius Fuscus. The praenomen of one of them was Quintus. [W. B. D.]

FUSCUS, ARI'STIUS, a friend of the poet Horace. (Sat. i. 9. 61, Ep. i. 10.) Acro (ad loc.) calls Fuscus a writer of tragedies; Porphyrio (ib.) of comedies; while other scholiasts describe him as a grammarian. Since the names Viscus and Tuscus are easily convertible into Fuscus, Heinsius (ad Ov. ex Pont. iv. 16. 20) contends that Viscus (Hor. Sat. i. 9. 22) and Tuscus (Ov. l. c.), the author of a poem entitled Phyllis, should be read Fuscus. (See Jahn's Jahrbuch d. Phil. ii. 4, p. 420, for the year 1829.) Horace addressed an ode (Carm. i. 22) and an epistle (Ep. i. 10) to Fuscus Aristius, whom he also introduces elsewhere (Sat. i. 9. 61; 10. 83). [W. B. D.]

FUSCUS, TI. CLAUDIUS SALINATOR, a correspondent of the younger Pliny. (Ep. ix. 36, 40.) Fuscus was of a senatorian family, possessed of great eloquence and learning (Plin. Ep. vi. 11), and remarkable for his simplicity and sobriety of character. (vi. 26.) He was Hadrian's colleague in the consulship of A. D. 118. He married a daughter of Julius Servianus. (Plin. Ep. vi. 26; Dion Cass. lxxix. 17; Westermann, Römisch. Beredsamk. § 84, 35.)

Fuscus, son of the preceding, was put to death in his nineteenth year, with his father-in-law, Servianus, by Hadrian, who charged Fuscus with aspiring to the empire. (Spartian. Hadrian. 23.) Dion Cassius (lxxix. 17) says that Fuscus and Servianus owed their death to imprudently expressing displeasure at Hadrian's choice of L. Commodus Verus for his successor. [W. B. D.]

FUSCUS, CORNELIUS, one of the most active adherents of Vespasian in his contest with Vitellius for the empire A. D. 69. In decision, zeal, and popularity with the soldiers, Tacitus ranks Fuscus second to Antonius Primus alone. [PRIMUS, ANTONIUS.] During Nero's reign, Fuscus lived in retirement on an estate inherited from noble ancestors; but he served under Galba, and was made by him procurator of Pannonia. In the war with Vitellius, the fleet at Ravenna elected Fuscus their leader, and under his command moved along the eastern coast of Italy, in concert with the troops of Vespasian. For his services at this time Vespasian rewarded Fuscus with the insignia and rank of praetor. Under Domitian Fuscus was captain of the body-guard, and gave himself up to the luxurious profusion of the time. Juvenal describes him (iv. 112) as dreaming of battles in his marble house—

Domitian, however, converted his dreams into reality, by sending him against the Dacians, who, under their king Decebalus, had recently defeated a Roman army, and were ravaging the province of Maesia. Fuscus passed the Danube, but suffered himself to be surprised by the Dacians, who destroyed his army, and captured his baggage and standards. Martial wrote an epitaph on Fuscus (Ep. vi. 76), in which he refers to the Dacian campaign. (Tac. Hist. ii. 86, iii. 4, 12, 42, 66, iv. 44; Suet. Domit. 6; Dion Cass. lxxviii. 9; Oros. vii. 10; Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. iii. p. 172; Frankke, Gesch. Trajan's, p. 80.) Pliny (Ep. vii. 9) addressed a letter to Cornelius Fuscus, recommending translation as one of the best methods of attaining a pure, impressive, and copious style. But as his correspondent was preparing himself for the business of the forum, he can scarcely have been the Fuscus of Vespasian's time. He was probably the son. [W. B. D.]

FUSCUS, GELLIVS, wrote some account of the life of Tetricus Junior, and is quoted by Trebellius Pollio. (Tetric. Jun. 25.)

FUSUS, a surname of the two families, MEDULLINUS and PACILUS, of the Furia Gena. Besides these, there are two members of the Furia Gens who occur in the Fasti, without any other surname than that of Fusus, but these probably belonged either to the Medullini or the Pacili, and must not be regarded as forming a separate family. They are:—

1. M. FURIUS FUSUS, consular tribune in B. C. 403. (Fasti Capitol.; Diod. xiv. 35.) Instead of him, Livy (v. 1) gives M. Postumius. This M. Furius Fusus must not be confounded with the great M. Furius Camillus, whose first consular tribunate Livy (l. c.) erroneously places in this year, but which in all probability belongs to B. C. 401. [CAMILLUS, No. 1.]

2. AGRIPPA FURIUS FUSUS, consular tribune in B. C. 391, the year before the taking of Rome by the Gauls. (Liv. v. 32; Fasti Capitol.)

G.

GABAEUS (Γαβαῖος), ruler of the Lesser or Hellespontine Phrygia, is mentioned by Xenophon (Cyrop. ii. 1. § 5) as one of the allies of the Assyrians against Cyrus and (the supposed) Cyaxares II. [CYRUS.] On the defeat of the Assyrians, Gabaeus made the best of his way back to his own country. (Cyrop. iv. 2. § 30.) [E. E.]

GABINIA GENS, plebeian. The name does not occur earlier than the second century B. C. There were no real family names in this gens, but only a few surnames, namely, CAPITO (CIMBER), SIRENNA, which are accordingly given under GABINIUS. [J. T. G.]

GABINIANUS, SEX. JU'LIUS, a celebrated Roman rhetorician, who taught rhetoric in Gaul in the time of Vespasian. All further information concerning him is lost, but we know that he was spoken of by Suetonius, in his work de Clavis

Rhetoribus. (Tac. de Orat. 26; Euseb. Chron. ad Vespas. ann. 8.) [L. S.]

GABINIUS. 1. A. ? GABINIUS, in B. C. 167, was placed by L. Anicius in the command of a garrison at Scodra in Illyricum, after the subjugation of king Gentius. (Liv. xlv. 26.)

2. A. GABINIUS, was tribune of the plebs, in B. C. 139, and introduced the first Lex Tabellaria, which substituted the ballot for open voting (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Tabellariae Leges.) Porcius Latro (De clamat. c. Catilinam, c. 19) mentions a Lex Gabinia, by which clandestine assemblies in the city were punishable with death, but it is not known to what age this law belongs, and even its existence has been doubted. (Heinec. Antiq. Rom. iv. tit. 17. § 47; Dieck, Verzeichn. über das Criminalrecht der Römer, Halle, 1822, pp. 73, 74.)

3. A. ? GABINIUS, was legatus in the Social War, and, in B. C. 89, after a successful campaign against the Marsi and Lucani, lost his life in a blockade of the enemy's camp. (Liv. Epit. 76; Flor. iii. 18. § 13; Oros. v. 18, calls him Caius.)

4. A. GABINIUS, fought at Chaeroneia in the army of Sulla as military tribune, and in the beginning of B. C. 81, was despatched by Sulla to Asia with instructions to Murena to end the war with Mithridates. He was a moderate and honourable man. (Plut. Sull. 16, 17; Appian, Mithr. 66; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 3.)

5. A. GABINIUS, of uncertain parentage, was addicted in youth to expensive pleasures, and gave way to the seductions of dice, wine, and women. His carefully curled hair was fragrant with unguents, and his cheeks were coloured with rouge. He was a proficient in the dance, and his house resounded with music and song. (If we may trust the angry invective of Cicero (pro Sest. 8, 9, post Red. in Sen. 4—8, in Pison. 11, pro Dom. 21, 48), he kept the most vicious company, and led the most impure and profligate life. Having dissipated his fortune by such a course of conduct, he looked to official station as the means of repairing his shattered finances. In B. C. 66 he was made tribune of the plebs, and moved that the command of the war against the pirates should be given to Pompey. The proposed law did not name Pompey, but it plainly pointed to him, and was calculated to make him almost an absolute monarch. Among other provisions, it directed that the people should elect a commander whose imperium should extend over the whole of the Mediterranean, and to a distance of fifty miles inland from its coast,—who should take such sums of money as he might think fit out of the public treasures, and should have a fleet of 200 sail, with unlimited powers of raising soldiers and seamen. This proposition was very pleasing to the people, on account of the scarcity of provisions, which the interruption of commerce by the pirates had occasioned; but it was equally displeasing to the senators, who distrusted the ambition of Pompey. Party-spirit was carried to such a height that serious riots ensued. Gabinius was in danger of his life from an attack of the senators. The senators, in turn, were assailed by the populace, who would perhaps have sacrificed the consul, Calpurnius Piso, to their fury, had not Gabinius effected his rescue, dreading the odium and severe re-action which such a catastrophe would have occasioned. When the day of the comitia for putting the rogatio to the vote arrived, Gabinius made himself remarkable by his answers to the affected reasons of Pompey for declining the proposed command: "You were not born for yourself alone," he told Pompey, "but for your country." Trebellius attempted to stop the proceedings by his veto, whereupon Gabinius proposed that he should be deprived of his tribuneship. It was not until seventeen out of the thirty-five tribes had voted against his continuance in office, that Trebellius withdrew his opposition to the measure of his colleague. (Ascon. in Cic. pro Cornel.) If Gabinius had not carried his law, says Cicero (post Red. in Sen. 31), such were his embarrassments, that he must have turned pirate himself. He may have been privately rewarded by Pompey for his useful services, but the senate baffled him in his favourite project, by successfully opposing, or, at least, delaying, his election as one of the legates of Pompey, whom he hoped to follow into Asia. As Pompey expected to supersede L. Lucullus in the war against Mithridates, Gabinius endeavoured to excite obloquy against the pride and grandeur of Lucullus, by exhibiting in public a plan of his magnificent villa at Tusculum. Yet Gabinius himself afterwards, out of the profits of his office, built in the same neighbourhood so splendid and costly a mansion, that the villa of Lucullus was a mere hut in comparison.

Gabinius was the proposer of a law regulating rates of money made at Rome to the provincials. If more than twelve per cent. were agreed to be paid as annual interest, the law of Gabinius prevented any action at all from being brought on such an agreement. When M. Brutus lent the Scianian a sum of money, at interest of four per cent. monthly, or forty-eight per cent. yearly, and obtained a decree of the senate, dispensing with the law of Gabinius in his case, and directing "ut jus dicere ex ista syngrapha," Cicero held that the decree of the senate did not give such force to the agreement as to render valid the excess of interest above the legal rate. (Ad Att. vi. 2. § 5.)

We read of another Lex Gabinia, by which the senate was directed to give audience to ambassadors from the 1st of February to the 1st of March. By a previous Lex Pupia the senate was prohibited in general terms from assembling on comitial days. Under these laws arose the question whether the senate might be legally assembled on a comitial day, occurring in February, or whether such days were not tacitly excepted from the Lex Gabinia. (Ad Qu. Fr. ii. 13.)

In a. c. 61 Gabinius was praetor, and in B. C. 59 he and L. Piso were chosen consuls for the ensuing year. In the interval between his tribunate and his praetorship he appears to have been engaged in military service in the East, and to have accompanied M. Scaurus to Judea, where, in the contest between the Maccabees, he received a bribe of 300 talents from Aristobulus. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 2, 3, 4.)

The consuls, Gabinius and Piso, had previously been gained over to the party of Clodius, who promised to use his influence in procuring for them lucrative governments. Piso was to get Macedonia, with Greece and Thessaly, and Gabinius was to get Cilicia; but, upon the remonstrance of Gabinius, Cilicia was exchanged for the richer government of Syria, which was erected into a proconsular province, on the ground of the incursions of the Arabs.

I was during the consulship of Gabinius that the exile of Cicero occurred; and the conduct of Gabinius in promoting the views of Clodius produced that extreme resentment in the mind of Cicero, which afterwards found vent on many occasions. The consuls, by an edict, prohibited the senate from wearing mourning for the banished orator, and some of the spoils of Cicero's Tusculan villa were transferred to the neighbouring mansion of Gabinius. However, when Clodius quarrelled with Pompey, Gabinius remained true to his original patron, and thus exposed himself to the violence of Clodius, who broke his fasces, and, by a lex sacrata, dedicated his property to the gods.

It is not easy to trace with chronological accuracy the proceedings of Gabinius in his proconsular government of Syria. When he arrived in Judea, he found the country in a state of agitation. The dispute between the two brothers, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, had been decided in favour of the former. Pompey had given to Hyrcanus the office of high-priest, and had carried away as prisoners Aristobulus, with two of his daughters, and his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus; but Alexander, on his way to Italy, escaped from custody, returned to Judea, and dispossessed Hyrcanus. Gabinius soon compelled Alexander to sue for favour, and effected the restoration of Hyrcanus to the high priesthood. He next made an important change in the constitution of the government of Judea, by dividing the country into five districts, in each of which he created a supreme council. (Joseph. Ant. iv. 10, de Bell. Jud. i. 6.) It was perhaps on account of some of his successes in Judea that Gabinius made application to the senate to be honoured with a supplicatio; but the senate, in order to evince their hostility to him and his patron Pompey, slighted his letter, and rejected his suit—an affront which had never before been offered, under similar circumstances, to any proconsul. (Ad Qu. Fr. ii. 8.) As the refusal of the senate occurred in the early part of the year B. C. 56, Drumann (Gesch. Roms. vol. iii. p. 47, n. 35) thinks that it referred to some successes of Gabinius over the Arabs, previous to his campaigns in Judea.

Gabinius now sought for other enemies, against whom he might profitably turn his arms. Phraates, king of Parthia, had been murdered by his two sons, Orodes and Mithridates, who afterwards contended between themselves for the crown. Mithridates, feeling himself the weaker of the two, by presents and promises engaged Gabinius to undertake his cause, and the Roman general had already crossed the Euphrates with his army, when he was invited to return by the prospect of a richer and an easier prey.

Ptolemy the Piper (Auletes), having offended the Alexandrians by his exactions and pusillanimity, had been driven from his kingdom. While he was absent, soliciting the senate of Rome to assist in his restoration, the Alexandrians made his daughter Berenice queen, and invited Seleucus Cibiosactes to marry her, and share her throne. He accepted the proposal, notwithstanding the opposition of Gabinius, but was shortly afterwards strangled by order of his wife, who thought him a mean-spirited man, and soon grew tired of his society. After the death of Cibiosactes, Archelaus (the son of that Archelaus who had commanded the army of Pontus against Sulla in the Mithridatic war) became ambitious to supply his place. Ar-chelaus pretended to be a son of Mithridates the Great, and had joined the Roman army with the intention of accompanying Gabinius into Parthia. Gabinius opposed the ambitious design of Archelaus, who, nevertheless, made his escape from the Roman army, reached Alexandria, married Berenice, and was declared king. Dion Cassius thinks (xxxix. 57) that Gabinius, wishing to enhance the value of his own services by having a general of some ability to contend against, connived at the escape of Archelaus.

Such was the state of affairs in Egypt when Ptolemy came to Gabinius with commendatory letters from Pompey. Moreover, he promised to pay Gabinius a large sum of money (10,000 talents) if he were restored to his kingdom by the assistance of the proconsul. The enterprise was displeasing to the greater part of the Roman officers, since it was forbidden by a decree of the senate, and by an oracle of the Sibyl; but Gabinius was encouraged in his plan of assisting Auletes by M. Antony, the future triumvir, who commanded the Roman cavalry; and he was supplied with money, arms, and provisions, by Antipater of Idumea, who required the friendship of the Romans to assist him in the subjugation of the Maccabees. M. Antony, who was sent forward with the cavalry to seize the passes of Egypt, was put in possession of Pelusium, the key of the kingdom. Archelaus was killed in action, and Gabinius remained master of Alexandria. He now found the whole of Egypt at his disposal, and resigned the kingdom to Ptolemy, who not only put his daughter Berenice to death, but ordered the execution of the richest of the Alexandrians, that with their spoils he might the better satisfy the engagements he had entered into with Gabinius.

Upon the return of Gabinius to Judea, he found Alexander, the son of Aristobolus, again in arms, and, after defeating him at Tabor, administered the government of the country, in conformity with the counsels of Antipater. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 6.)

Meanwhile a storm had been brewing at Rome, where Gabinius knew that he would have to encounter not only the hostility of the optimates, but all the unpopularity which his personal enemies could excite against him. He had given umbrage to the Romans in Syria, especially to the publicani of the equestrian order, whose profits were diminished by the depredations of the pirates along the Syrian coast, which Gabinius had left unguarded during his expedition to Egypt.

The recall of Gabinius from his province had been decreed in B.C. 55, but he did not depart until his successor, M. Crassus, had actually made his appearance, in A.C. 54. He lingered on the road, and his gold travelled before him, to purchase favour or silence. To cover his disgrace, he gave out that he intended to demand a triumph, and he remained some time without the city gates, but, finding delay useless, on the 28th of September, B.C. 54, he stole into the city by night, to avoid the insults of the populace. For ten days he did not dare to present himself before the senate. When at length he came, and had made the usual report as to the state of the Roman forces, and as to the troops of the enemy, he was about to go away, when he was detained by the consuls, L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and App. Claudius, to answer the accusation of the publicani, who had been in attendance at the doors, and were called in to sustain their charge. He was now attacked on all sides. Cicero, especially, goaded him so sharply, that he was unable to contain himself, and, with a voice almost choked with passion, called Cicero an exile. An émeute succeeded. The senate to a man rose from their seats, pressed round Gabinius, and manifested their indignation as clamorously as the warmest friend of Cicero could desire. (Ad Qu. Fr. iii. 2.)

Three accusations were brought against Gabinius. The first of these was for maiestas, in leaving his province, and making war in favour of Ptolemy Auletes, in defiance of the Sibyl, and the authority of the senate. In this accusation Cicero gave evidence, but, at the instance of Pompey, did not press severely upon Gabinius. Pompey prevailed upon him not to be the prosecutor, but could not, with the most urgent solicitation, induce him to undertake the defence. The prosecutor was L. Lentulus, who was slow and backward. The judges, by a majority of 38 to 32, acquitted Gabinius, on the ground that the words of the Sibyl applied to other times and another king. (Dion Cass. xxxix. 55.) The majority who voted for his acquittal were suspected of corruption, as was Lentulus of prevarication. An inundation of the Tiber, which occurred about this time, was attributed to the anger of the gods at the escape of Gabinius. (Ad Qu. Fr. iii. 7.)

The second prosecution was de repetundis ex lege Julia, for the illegal receipt of 10,000 talents from Ptolemy Auletes. Out of several candidates for the honour of conducting the accusation, M. Cato, the praetor, selected C. Memmius. Cicero now could no longer resist the importunity of Pompey, and undertook the defence, though he felt that the part was sorely derogatory to his self-respect, and to his reputation for consistency; for no one had laboured with greater assiduity that he had, ever since his return from exile, to blacken the character of Gabinius. A fragment from the notes of Cicero's speech for Gabinius has been preserved by Hieronymus (Adv. Rufin., ed. Paris, vol. iv. p. 351), but his advocacy was unsuccessful, notwithstanding the favourable testimony of the Alexandrine deputies and of Pompey, backed by a letter from Caesar. Dion Cassius indeed (xlv. 8) makes Q. Fufius Calenus hint that the success of the prosecution was due to the mode of conducting the defence. Gabinius went into exile, and his goods were sold, to discharge the amount at which the damages were estimated. As the produce of the sale was not sufficient to cover the estimated sum, a suit was instituted, under the same Lex Julia de repetundis, against C. Rabirius Postumus, who was liable to make up the deficiency, if it could be proved that the money illegally received by Gabinius had come to his hands. Thus the cause of C. Rabirius Postumus (who was also defended by Cicero) was a supplementary appendage to the cause of Gabinius. [RABIRIUS POSTUMUS.]

Upon the exile of Gabinius the third accusation dropped, which charged him with ambitus, or illegal canvassing, and was entrusted to P. Sulla, as prosecutor, with the assistance of Caecilius and Memmius.

In B.C. 49 he returned from exile, upon the call of Caesar, but he took no part in direct hostilities against Pompey. After the battle of Pharsalia, he was despatched to Illyricum with the newly levied troops, in order to reinforce Q. Cornificius. Fearing the fleet of the Pompeians, he went by land, and, on his march, was much harassed by the Dalmatians. In the neighbourhood of Salona, after having lost more than 2000 men in an engagement with the natives, he threw himself into the town with the remainder of his forces, and for some time defended himself bravely against M. Octavius, but, in a few months, he was seized with a mortal illness, and died about the end of the year B. C. 43, or the beginning of the following year. (Appian, Illyr. 12 and 27, Bell. Civ. ii. 59; Dion Cass. xlii. 11, 12.)

(A. Rachenstein, Ueber A. Gabinus ein Programm. 8vo. Aarau. 1826; Drumann, Gesch. Roms. vol. iv. pp. 40—62, where all the authorities are collected.)

6. A. GABINIUS SISENNA, the son of No. 5, by his wife Lollia, accompanied his father to Syria, and remained in that province, with a few troops, while his father was engaged in restoring Ptolemy Auletes to the throne of Egypt. When Memmius was exciting the people against his father, he flung himself at the feet of Memmius, who treated him with indignity, and was not softened by his supplicating posture. In classical writers he is never spoken of by any other name than Sisenna. (Val. Max. viii. 1. § 3; Dion Cass. xxxix. 56.)

7. P. GABINIUS CAPITO was praetor in B. C. 89, and afterwards propraetor in Achaia, where he was guilty of extortion, for which, upon his return to Rome, he was accused by L. Piso (whom the Achaean had selected as their patronus), and condemned. (Cic. pro Arch. 5, De in Caecil. 20.) Lactantius (i. 6) mentions him as one of the three deputies who were sent in B. C. 76 to Erythrae to collect Sibylline prophecies.

8. P. GABINIUS CAPITO (perhaps a son of No. 7) was one of the most active of Catiline's accomplices. When questioned by Cicero, who sent for him after the arrest of the Allobrogian deputies, he at first boldly denied having had any communication with them. He was afterwards consigned to the custody of M. Crassus, and executed. He seems to be the same as C. Gabinius Cimber. (Sall. Bell. Cat. 17, 40, 44, 47, 55; Cic. in Cat. iii. 3, 5, 6, iv. 6.) [J. T. G.]

GABIVS BASSUS. [BASSUS.]

GABRIELIUS (Γαβριήλιος), prefect of Byzantium, under the emperor Justinian. The Greek Anthology contains an inscription for his statue, by Leontius (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 103; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iv. p. 74), and one epigram by Gabriel himself. (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 7; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 228.) The astrological writer, Johannes Laurentius Lydus, inscribed three of his books to Gabriel. There are several ecclesiastical writers of this name, but they are of no importance. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 156, 475; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 895-6.) [P. S.]

GADATAS (Γαδάτας), an Assyrian satrap, revolted to Cyrus, according to Xenophon in the Cyropaedea, to revenge himself on the king of Assyria, who had had him made an eunuch because, being a handsome man, one of the royal eunuchs had cast on him an eye of favour. Having found means to betray to Cyrus an important fortress, his province was invaded by the Assyrian king; but Cyrus hastened to his relief, and saved him and his forces at a very critical moment. After this Gadatas, through fear of the Assyrians, left his satrapy and joined the army of Cyrus, to whom he proved of great use, through his knowledge of the country. On the capture of Babylon, the king was slain by Gadatas and Gobryas. (Xen. Cyrop. v. 2. § 28, 3. §§ 8—29, 4. §§ 1—14, 29—40, vii. 5. §§ 24—32.) [E. E.]

GAEA or GE (Γαῖα or Γῆ), the personification of the earth. She appears in the character of a divine being as early as the Homeric poems, for we read in the Iliad (iii. 104) that black sheep were sacrificed to her, and that she was invoked by persons taking oaths. (iii. 278, xv. 36, xix. 259, Od. v. 124.) She is further called, in the Homeric poems, the mother of Erechtheus and Tithyus. (Il. ii. 548, Od. vii. 324, xi. 576; comp. Apollon. Rhod. i. 762, iii. 716.) According to the Theogony of Hesiod (117, 125, &c.), she was the first being that sprang from Chaos, and gave birth to Uranus and Pontus. By Uranus she then became the mother of a series of beings,—Oceanus, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Theia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phoebe, Thetys, Cronos, the Cyclopes, Brontes, Steropes, Arges, Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges. These children of Ge and Uranus were hated by their father, and Ge therefore concealed them in the bosom of the earth; but she made a large iron sickle, gave it to her sons, and requested them to take vengeance upon their father. Cronos undertook the task, and mutilated Uranus. The drops of blood which fell from him upon the earth (Ge), became the seeds of the Erinyes, the Gigantes, and the Melian nymphs. Subsequently Ge became, by Pontus, the mother of Nereus, Thaumachus, Phorcys, Ceto, and Eurybia. (Hes. Theog. 232, &c.; Apollod. i. 1. § 1, &c.) Besides these, however, various other divinities and monsters sprang from her. As Ge was the source from which arose the vapours producing divine inspiration, she herself also was regarded as an oracular divinity, and it is well known that the oracle of Delphi was believed to have at first been in her possession (Aeschyl. Eum. 2; Paus. x. 5. § 3), and at Olympia, too, she had an oracle in early times. (Paus. v. 14. § 8.) That Ge belonged to the Θεοὶ χθονίοι, requires no explanation, and hence she is frequently mentioned where they are invoked. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. vi. 39; Ov. Met. vii. 196.) The surnames and epithets given to Ge have more or less reference to her character as the all-producing and all-nourishing mother (mater omniparans et alma), and hence Servius (ad Aen. iv. 166) classes her together with the divinities presiding over marriage. Her worship appears to have been universal among the Greeks, and she had temples or altars at Athens, Sparta, Delphi, Olympia, Bura, Tegea, Phlyus, and other places. (Thuc. ii. 15; Paus. i. 22. § 3, 24. § 3, 31. § 2, iii. 11. § 8, 12. § 7, v. 14. § 8, vii. 25. § 8, viii. 48. § 6.) We have express statements attesting the existence of statues of Ge in Greece, but none have come down to us. At Patrae she was represented in a sitting attitude, in the temple of Demeter (Paus. vii. 21. § 4), and at Athens, too, there was a statue of her. (i. 24. § 3.) Servius (ad Aen. x. 252) remarks that she was represented with a key.

At Rome the earth was worshipped under the name of Tellus (which is only a variation of Terra). There, too, she was regarded as an infernal divinity

(Σέα γέβια), being mentioned in connection with Dis and the Manes, and when persons invoked them or Tellus they sank their arms downwards, while in invoking Jupiter they raised them to heaven. (Varro, de Re Rust. i. 1. 15; Macrobi. Sat. iii. 9; Liv. viii. 9, x. 29.) The consul P. Sempronius Sophus, in B. C. 304, built a temple to Tellus in consequence of an earthquake which had occurred during the war with the Picentians. This temple stood on the spot which had formerly been occupied by the house of Sp. Cassius, in the street leading to the Carinae. (Flor. i. 19. § 2; Liv. ii. 41; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 1; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6, 14; Dionys. viii. 79.) Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of April, immediately after that of Ceres, and was called Fordicidia or Hordicidia. The sacrifice, consisting of cows, was offered up in the Capitol in the presence of the Vestals. A male divinity, to whom the pontiff prayed on that occasion, was called Tellumo. (Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. ii. p. 84, &c.)

GAEEOCHUS (Γαειόχος), that is, "the holder of the earth," is a common epithet of Poseidon (Hom. Od. xi. 240), and near Therapne, in Laconia, he had a temple under the name of Gaeöchus. (Paus. iii. 20. § 2.) But the name is also given to other divinities to describe them as the protectors and patrons of certain districts, e. g. Artemis Gaeöchus at Thebes. (Soph. Oed. Tyr. 160.) [L. S.]

GAETU'LICUS, a poet of the Greek Anthology, whose epigrams are variously inscribed in the Palatine MS., Γαιτουλίω, Γαιτουλίκω, Γαιτουλίου, Γαιτουλάου, Γαιτουλάου, Γαιτουλίκου, and in the Planudean Anthology, Γετουλίω. The Anthology contains nine pleasing epigrams by him on various subjects (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 166; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 151.) Several scholars have identified him with Cn. Lentulus Gaetulicus, the Roman historical writer and poet, under Tiberius [LENTULUS]. For this there is no authority except the name, and an objection arises from the fact that the Greek epigrams of Gaetulicus are quite free from the licentious character which Martial (i. Praef.; Plin. Epist. v. 3. § 5) and Sionius Apollinaris (Epist. ii. 10, p. 148; Carm. ix. p. 256) agree in attributing to the verses of the Roman poet. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 896; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. pp. 475, 476.) [P. S.]

GAINAS. [ARCADIUS.]

GAIUS. [CAIUS.]

GAIUS. Of the personal history of this famous jurist scarcely any thing is known. Even the spelling of his name has been as fruitful a subject of controversy as the orthography of our own Shakespeare or Shakspeare. Some have chosen to write Caius instead of Gaius, and, in favour of this spelling, quote Quintilian (i. 7. § 28). "Quid? quae scribuntur aliter quam enuntiantur? Nam et Gaius C litera notatur, quae inversa (C) mulierem significat." They understand this passage to mean that the word which is spelt with a C is pronounced with a G; but Quintilian is here speaking of notae, and the true meaning may be, that the word which, when written at length, is written Gaius, and is pronounced as it is written, is yet designated shortly by the nota C, which is different from its initial letter. Caius was undoubtedly the original spelling, used at a time when the letter C, which occupies in the Roman alphabet the place of Gamma in the Greek, had, in some cases, the power of Gamma. Caius was always pronounced Gaius, and was written in Greek Γάιος, while in other words, as Cicero, which was written in Greek Κικέρων, the initial C had a power distinct from Gamma. It was in the beginning of the sixth century of the city that the letter G was introduced into the Roman alphabet, by Spurius Carvilius (Plut. Prob. Rom. 54), and thenceforward the difference of pronunciation began to be indicated by a difference of notation; but in some cases, as Caius and Cneus, the change was slowly introduced. Probably at the time when Gaius lived, and certainly in the time of Justinian, his name was generally spelt, as it was pronounced, with a G, although the initial nota C still continued in use. This appears from inscriptions, and from the best manuscripts. In the Florentine manuscript of the Digest, the praenomen Gaius is always spelt with a G, there being no difference whether the word is used by itself, or as a praenomen, followed by other names. (Dausquius, Orthographia Latini Sermonis Vetus et Nova, vol. ii. p. 70, fol. Paris, 1677; Grotefend, in Ersch and Gruber's Alg. Encyc., under the letter C; Schneider, Elementarlehre der Lateinischen Sprache, i. 1, p. 233.)

In early times the name was trisyllabic, like the Greek Γάιος (Catull. x. 30; Mart. ix. 94, xi. 37; Stat. Sylv. iv. 9, 22), but, in times of less pure Latinity, it was pronounced as a dissyllable. (Auson. Epig. 75.) It had a meaning in ancient Latin, as in modern Tuscan, equivalent to the English Gay, and was connected by etymologists with the Greek γάλο, whence the names Caius and Caia were thought peculiarly appropriate to the marriage ceremony. "Caii dicti a gaudio parentum," says C. Titius Probus in his treatise De Nominibus, &c.

As Gaius is known by no other appellation, some have supposed that he had no other, but was either a freedman or a foreigner. Then as to his birthplace: some have fancied that he was a Greek, because he understood Greek; and some that, like Justinian, he was a native of Illyricum, because Justinian thrice calls him Gaius noster. (Proem. Inst. § 6, Inst. 4. tit. 18. § 5; Const. Omnen. § 1.) Some have thought that Gaius was his gentile or family name, and, relying on the supposed authority of a manuscript of the Breviarium Alaricianum, or Westgothic Lex Romana, have given him the praenomen Titus. The origin of this supposition is probably due to some passages in the Corpus Juris (e. g. Cod. 6. tit. 3. a. 9), where Gaius is employed as a fictitious name, and is found in connection with other fictitious names, as Titus, Titius, Lucius. Others, believing that Gaius was a praenomen, have attributed to him the cognomen Noster, because not only does Justinian in the passages we have cited so call him, but the phrase Gaius Noster is used by Pomponius in Dig. 45. tit. 3. a. 39. It is scarcely necessary to say, that Noster in this form of expression usually refers to that literary intimacy with which we regard a favourite author. Yet, partly because Gaius is called by Justinian Noster, and partly on account of some passages in the mutilated and corrupted Westgothic compendium of the Institutes of Gaius, Vacca and other learned civilians inferred that Gaius was a Christian! Some, not content with Noster, and misled by a false reading in Gellius (ii. 4), have given him the cognomen Basus, thus confounding him with Gaius Basus the grammarian.

To proceed to less futile or more plausible conjectures, some have tried to identify Gaius with Laelius, or Laelius Felix, for both Gaius and Laelius Felix wrote notes on Q. Mucius Scaevola. (Gaius, i. 188; Gell. xv. 27.) In favour of the compound Gaius Laelius Felix are quoted two passages from the Digest, in one of which (Dig. 6. tit. 3. a. 43) Gaius says, "Et nostra quidem aetate Sempias, Alexandrina mulier, ad Divum Hadrianum perducta est cum quinque liberis, quos uno foeta enixa est;" and in the other (Dig. 6. tit. 4. a. 3), Paulus reports, "Sed et Laelius scribit se vidisse in Palatio mulierem liberam, quae ab Alexandria perducta est ut Hadriano ostenderetur, cum quinque liberis, ex quibus quatuor eodem tempore enixa (inquit) dicebatur, quintum post diem quadragesimum." A comparison of these passages is against the identity of Gaius and Laelius, for, not to mention the variation between their accounts, Laelius speaks more circumstantially, as an eye-witness, while Gaius writes as if mentioning a fact which he knew only from rumour. By the phrase nostra aetate, he probably intends to denote that the extraordinary birth took place after he himself was born, but the words may have a wider acceptance, and refer to living memory generally.

It has been guessed that Gaius was closely connected by relationship with Pomponius, for, on the one hand, Pomponius calls Gaius "Gaius noster" (l. c.), and, on the other hand, Gaius calls Pomponius simply Sextus (Gaius, ii. 218), but it is not certain that, in this last-cited passage, Pomponius is meant, and, if he be, Gaius is not singular in alluding to him by his praenomen simply, for Ulpian does the same. (Dig. 29. tit. 5. a. 1. § 27.)

Two passages, which closely agree with fragments attributed in the Digest to the Enchiridion of Pomponius (Dig. 2. tit. 2. a. 2. § 22 and § 24), are cited by Joannes Lydus (De Magistrat. i. 26 and 34), as from the commentary of Gaius on the Twelve Tables. From the contents of these passages, it is not unlikely that something of similar import would be inserted in an introduction to a commentary on the Twelve Tables, and that the agreement between Gaius and Pomponius may have been produced, not by the latter borrowing from the former, but by both borrowing from the same source, namely, M. Junius Gracchanus, who wrote upon the ancient magistracies of Rome. [GRACCHANUS.] But it is also not impossible, that in compiling from the title De Origine Juris (Dig. 1. tit. 2), Lydus may have seen the heading of the first fragment, which is taken from Gaius, and have overlooked the heading of the second, which is taken from Pomponius. Yet it must be admitted that he afterwards (i. 48) cites as from Pomponius another passage taken from the same second fragment. (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 34.) The first fragment from Gaius, and the second from Pomponius, run together in sense, reading as if the former were the preface to the latter; and in this way, with the simple heading "Gaius li<sup>o</sup>. i.<sup>o</sup>," they are introduced by Magister Vacarius* into his ele-

One of the conjectures, which has found numerous supporters, is, that the full designation of Gaius is C. Cassius Longinus, and that he is referred to by his praenomen simply, in order to distinguish him from an elder C. Cassius, the eminent follower of Capito and Masurius Sabinus, and the head of the Cassiani, a sect to which Gaius adheres with strict devotion. C. Cassius is thrice cited in the Digest by his praenomen Gaius, —twice by Javolenus, libro ii. ex Cassio, in Dig. 35. tit. 1. a. 54, and libro xi. ex Cassio, in Dig. 46. tit. 3. § 78,—and once by Julianus, in a passage where Sabinus and Gaius are coupled. (Dig. 24. tit. 3. a. 59.) Where Pomponius uses the expression "Gaius noster" (Dig. 45. tit. 3. a. 39), it is not certain that C. Cassius was not meant, for Pomponius was one of the Cassiani. There is, however, strong reason for supposing that Pomponius refers to our Gaius, inasmuch as the fragment in which the expression occurs is taken from the 22nd book of Pomponius ad Q. Mucium, and we know that Gaius speaks of a similar work of his own, "In his libris, quos ex Q. Mucio fecimus" (ii. 188). Gaius himself always quotes C. Cassius simply as Cassius, not as C. Cassius. Servius (ad Virg. Georg. ii. v. 306, 307) says, "Apud majores omne mercimonium in permutationibus constabat, quod et Gaius Homero confirmat exemplo." Now, we find from Inst. 3. tit. 23. § 2, and from Dig. 18. tit. 1. § 1, that C. Cassius and Proculus quoted Homer (Il. vii. 472—475) to prove that barter was a case of emptio et venditio. But the very same lines are cited by Gaius (iii. 141), and they seem to have been a trite quotation among the earlier jurists of his school, so that it is doubtful whether our jurist or C. Cassius is referred to by Servius, the commentator on Virgil.

It would be useless to mention all the naiseries of those who have written on the age of Gaius. Some divide Gaius Juventius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 42) into two persons, and so make Gaius a disciple of L. Mucius; others perform the same division on Gaius Aulus Oflivius or Gaius Ateius Pacurius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 44), and so make Gaius one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius. But the most common error has consisted in the assignment of too late rather than too early a date; and Hugo's authority (Civilist. Mag. vol. ii. p. 358—378) for some time gave currency to the opinion which had previously been maintained by Raevardus and Conradi, that Gaius was a contemporary of Caracalla, who is designated in the Digest by the name of Antoninus. There are certainly some circumstances difficult to account for, which might naturally have led to this belief. The Institutiones of Gaius were an ordinary text book of instruction before the time when Justinian reformed the legal course appointed for students. Four libri singulares of the same author (1. De Re Usoria, 2. De Tutelis, 3 and 4. De Testamentis et Legatis) were similarly honoured as text books. Such parts of the Institutiones and the Libri Singulares as were thought to be of practical use were taught in the lectures of the professors, while other parts were passed over as antiquated. Why was it that Gaius should be we understand Fountains Abbey, near Ripon, not, as Wenck imagines (p. 46. n. 6), an abbey at Wells, in Somersetshire.

preferred for instruction to Papinian, Paulus, and Ulpian, unless he were a more modern and therefore, for some purposes, a more useful writer than those celebrated jurists? Why also, it has been asked, was Gaius, in preference to names as eminent as his, introduced into the Westgothic Lex Romana? Why were the Institutes of Gaius made to serve as a basis for those of Justinian, if it were not that nothing more applicable to the state of the law then in force were extant? The only answer that can be given to such inquiries is that good elementary works, when they take ground unoccupied before, are not easily dispossessed. Are not Blackstone's Commentaries, and even Coke on Littleton, still in the hands of English law students, notwithstanding the legislative changes which have superseded great parts of their contents? Later compilers content themselves with the path of those who have gone before; and we find in the fragments of an elementary work of Ulpian (the Tituli ex Corpore Ulpiani), who is now known to have been posterior to Gaius, clear proof of the influence which the earlier jurist exercised over the writings of his successor.

A fact which has occasioned much surprise is, that Gaius is not once quoted in the Digest by any other jurist, unless we except the mention of his name in a passage of Pomponius (Dig. 45. tit. 3. § 39), which, as we have seen, may possibly refer to C. Cassius. The only probable explanation of this fact is that Gaius was rather a teacher of law than a practical jurist, whose opinions derived authority from imperial sanction. He was not one of the prudentes quibus permissum est iura condere (Gaius, i. 7). The jurists who were armed with that jus respondendi, which was first bestowed by Augustus, partook of the emperor's prerogative, and their responsa had a force independent of their intrinsic reasonableness, and superior to the best considered opinion of an unprivileged lawyer. Except in the case of a very few writers of the highest eminence in their profession, it would at this day be considered a breach of etiquette to cite the opinion of a modern legal author in an English court. For a privileged Roman jurist to refer to a mere teacher of law, however learned, or to an unauthorised, or rather, unprivileged practitioner, however experienced, would probably have been deemed as unprofessional as for an English barrister to cite in court a clever treatise written by a contemporary below the bar, instead of seeking his authorities in the decisions of judges, and in the dicta of the recognised sages of the law.

That this is the true explanation of the silence of other jurists with respect to Gaius may be inferred from a constitution of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III., despatched from Ravenna to the senate of Rome in A. D. 436. (Cod. Theod. i. tit. 4. s. 3.) By that rescript the same authority is given to the writings of Gaius as to the writings of Papinian, Paulus, Ulpian, and Modestinus. Hence it may be inferred that Gaius was previously in a different and inferior position with respect to authority. All the writings of these five jurists (with the exception, subsequently specified, of the Notae of Paulus and Ulpian on Papinian) are invested with authority, as if to obviate the question as to the date when they were written, for a treatise written by a jurist before he received the jus respondendi probably derived no legal force from the subsequent gift of that privilege to the author.

This constitution proves the great importance that was attached to the citation of a legal writer by name in the work of another jurist, for it proceeds to make the citation of other writers by the five great jurists we have mentioned a test of the authority of the writers cited. If, for example, Gaius any where cites Julianus, the citation is to be taken as proof that Julianus is a writer of authority; and legal force is given, not only to the passage or opinion of Julianus so cited, but to all the legal remains which can be proved to belong to Julianus, and which, upon a collation of manuscripts, present a certain text. The works of Papinian, Paulus, Gaius, Ulpian, and Modestinus (for such is the unchronological order in which these names are mentioned), together with the works of all the other jurists who are cited by any one of them, are made the criteria of legal science. If, in the works of ten jurists, passages can be found in favour of one opinion, and nine jurists only can be cited against the ten, the majority is to prevail. In case of an equality of opposite opinions, the opinion of Papinian is to prevail, if Papinian have expressed any opinion upon the subject. If not, the matter is left to the decision of the judge. There is no pre-eminence conferred on any other of the first-named five jurists over a jurist, as, for example, Julianus, who may have been cited by one of the five. Such appears to be the true interpretation of this celebrated citation-law, upon which the researches of Puchta (Rhein. Mus. für Jurispr. vol. v. p. 141, and vol. vi. p. 87) have thrown important light.

Among the writings of Gaius are no Questiones or Responsa, which were the titles given by other jurists to treatises relating to cases that arose in their own practice. The Liber de Casibus of Gaius did not relate to cases within his own practice, and the cases it treated of were sometimes wholly fictitious. There is a passage in the Digest where Gaius speaks as if he did not himself belong to the authoritative body of those whose opinion he criticises, "Miror unde constare videatur, etc., nam ut apparet, etc." (Dig. 11. tit. 7. s. 9).

Gaius was probably born before Serapius was introduced to Hadrian (actato nostra), and he wrote, or at least completed, his Institutiones in the reign of M. Aurelius. The proof of this is that Antoninus Pius is mentioned by him with the addition Dignus (ii. 195), and that he speaks of the law of cretio, as it stood in the reign of Marcus, before it was altered by a constitution of that emperor. (Compare Gaius, ii. 177 with Ulpian, Frag. xxii. 34.) In like manner, the statements made by Gaius in iii. 23, 24, as to hardships in the law of succession which required the correction of the praetor's edict, could scarcely have been written after the senatus consultum Tertullianum, made in the reign of M. Aurelius and Verus, A. D. 158, and still less after the senatus consultum Orphitianum, made in the reign of Marcus and Commodus, A. D. 178. (Compare Inst. 3. tit. 4. pr., and Capitolinus, in Marco, 11).

Some critics have been so nice as to infer that the beginning of the Institutes of Gaius was written under Antoninus Pius, and the remainder under M. Aurelius. In i. 53. the former emperor is termed Sacratissimus Imperator Antoninus. So, in i. 102, we have "Nunc ex epistola optimi Imperatoris Antonini," and, in ii. 126, "Sed nuper imperator Antoninus significavit rescripto." The "Imperator Antoninus" mentioned in ii. 126 is not Caracalla, although the same rescript is erroneously cited by Justinian (Cod. 6. tit. 28. a. 4) as one of "Magnus Antoninus," which is the peculiar designation of Caracalla. In Nov. 78. c. 5, Justinian falls into an opposite error, in ascribing to Antoninus Pius an act of legislation which belongs to Caracalla. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 9.) It is not until after the middle of the second book of the Institutes of Gaius that Antoninus Pius is called Divus—Hodie ex Divi Pii constitutione, ii. 195. It appears to us that the inference founded on these minutiae, though probable, is not free from doubt. In i. 7, and i. 30, Hadrian is called Divus Hadrianus. In i. 47, we have Hadrianus without the Divus. Again in i. 55, we have Divus Hadrianus, and the same epithet is applied to Hadrian in every other subsequent passage where his name occurs, except in ii. 57. The mention of Antoninus without the epithet Divus in six passages may possibly have no deeper meaning than the similar mention of Hadrianus in i. 47 and ii. 57. It would be rash to assert that we possess the Institutes of Gaius precisely as they proceeded from his hand in the first edition. The very passage in i. 53, where Antoninus appears to be spoken of as a living emperor with the epithet sacratissimus is cited in the Digest (Dig. 1. tit. 6. a. 1), and there we read "ex constitutione Divi Antonini." A comparison of this fragment, as it appears in the Digest, with the same passage as it stands in the text of Gaius, affords an instructive example of those slight interpolations (emblemata) and alterations, in which the compilers employed by Justinian indulged, and by means of which serious obstacles are opposed to the discovery of historical truth by means of minute verbal criticism. The hypothesis that the Institutes of Gaius, up to ii. 161 (where we have for the last time Imperator Antoninus, without Divus), were written in the lifetime of the emperor Pius, is at variance with the probable conjecture of Göschen, who thinks that Gaius, in the forma preceding i. 197, treated of a constitution of Marcus.

There are other indications from which the age of Gaius may be closely inferred. The latest jurist whom he cites is Salvius Julianus, the compiler of the Edictum Perpetuum under Hadrian; and though there are no fewer than 535 extracts from his works in the Digest, he refers only to thirteen constitutions of emperors, and none of the constitutions he refers to can be proved to be later than Antoninus Pius. It would appear from the inscriptions of the fragments a. 8 and a. 9, in Dig. 32. tit. 17, that he wrote a liber singularis ad M. C. Orphitum. This would bring his life to the last years of M. Aurelius; but as there is no mention of these treatises in the Florentine Index, and as treatises on the same subject were written by Paulus, it is not at all unlikely that, in the inscriptions we have mentioned, the name Gaius is put by mistake for Paulus. The Divus Antoninus mentioned by Gaius in the fragments Dig. 35. tit. 1. a. 90, Dig. 32. a. 96, Dig. 36. tit. 1. a. 63. § 1, and Dig. 31. a. 56, is, undoubtedly, not Caracalla, but Antoninus Pius. There is not a single passage in which it can be proved that Gaius refers to Caracalla. From a comparison of Dig. 24. tit. 1. a. 42 with Dig. 24. tit. 1. a. 32. pr., an attempt indeed has been made to identify the Princeps Antoninus mentioned by Gaius in the former passage, with the Antoninus Augustus, Divi Severi filius, mentioned by Ulpian in the latter; but though Caracalla, who is referred to by Ulpian, mitigated the law against donations between husband and wife, it does not follow that Antoninus Pius may not previously have introduced the partial relaxation of which Gaius treats. In the time of Ulpian, there were already several constitutions upon the subject. (Ulpian. Frags. vii. 1.)

We have said that Gaius was a devoted adherent of the school of Sabinus and Cassius. This is now clear beyond dispute from a great number of passages in his Institutes (i. 196, ii. 15, 37, 79, 123, 195, 200, 217, 219—223, 231, 244, iii. 87, 98, 103, 141, 167, 168, 177, 178, iv. 78, 79, 114). It had formerly been supposed by some that he belonged to the opposite school of Proculus—a mistake occasioned chiefly by an erroneous interpretation of Dig. 40. tit. 4. a. 57. Mascovius and others were induced to rank him among the Herciscundi [CAPITO], on account of the phrase "sententia media recte existimantium" (Dig. 41. tit. 1. a. 7. § 7), coupled with a few passages in the Digest (Dig. 17. tit. 1. a. 4, Dig. 22. tit. 1. a. 19), where, notwithstanding his general leaning to Cassius, he seems to follow the opinion of Proculus, or to quote Proculus with approbation.

Gaius was the author of numerous works. The following list is given in the Florentine Index:—

1. Ad Edictum Provinciale, βιβλία 18 [libri 32]. Number of extracts from this work in the Digest, 340. It appears to have been completed in the lifetime of Antoninus Pius. (Dig. 24. tit. 1. a. 42, Dig. 2. tit. 1. a. 11.)

2. Ad Leges [Juliam et Papiam Poppaeam], βιβλία δεκατέσσαρες. (The names added between brackets are the names as they appear in inscriptions of fragments in the Digest.) Number of extracts, 28. Gaius refers to this work in his Institutes (iii. 54). It seems to have been published after the death of Antoninus Pius. (Dig. 31. a. 56.)

3. Ad Edictum Urbicum [praetoris urbeni], τὰ μὲν εὐπεθέστερα βιβλία δέκα. Extracts, 47. The Edicti Interpretatio, which may have designated the work on the Provincial Edict, together with the work on the City Edict, is mentioned by Gaius in his Institutes (i. 188), and was probably written in the reign of Antoninus Pius (Dig. 30. a. 73. § 1). The work on the City Edict was divided into tituli, and the subjects of the books and tituli are occasionally cited in the inscriptions of fragments. Some of the tituli seem to have formed books by themselves (compare the inscriptions of Dig. 7. tit. 7. a. 4, Dig. 10. tit. 4. a. 13, Dig. 38. tit. 2. a. 30); others seem to have comprehended several books. There were at least two books De Testamentis, and three De Legatis (Dig. 28. tit. 5. a. 32 and a. 33, Dig. 30. a. 65, Dig. 30. a. 69, Dig. 30. a. 73).

4. Aureos [Aureorum seu Rerum Quotidianarum], βιβλία ἑπτὰ. Extracts, 26. This work, treating of legal doctrines of general application and utility in every-day life, seems to have formed a compendium of practical law. The name Aureos was probably a subsequent title, not proceeding from the author, but given to the work on account of its value. Though, according to the Index Florentinus, it consisted of seven books, only three are cited in the Digest, whence some have conjectured that the last four books are identical with the In-attitudes of Gaius. The preferable opinion, however, is, that the Res Quotidianae and the Institutiones, though they had much in common, were distinct works. (Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. i. p. 54—77; Hugo, Civilist. Mag. vol. vi. p. 228—264.) Justinian, in his Institutes, made considerable use of this Golden Work (Prooem. Inst. § 6).

5. Δοδεκαβιβλιον (sic, sed qu. Δωδεκαβιβλιον vel Δωδεκαβιβλιον) βιβλία 12. Extracts, 20. This is the work, the beginning of which has been supposed, on account of the citations in Lydia, to resemble part of the Enchiridion of Pomponius, and to have borrowed some of its historical details from Gracchanus.

6. Institutio (Institutionum), βιβλία τέσσαρα. Extracts, 14. An account of this famous work is given below.

7. De Verborum Obligationibus, βιβλία γ. Extracts, 12.

8. De Manumissionibus, βιβλία τρία. Extracts, 5.

9. Fideicommissio [Fideicommissorum], βιβλία δύο. Extracts, 12. This work was published after the death of Antoninus Pius. (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 90, Dig. 32. s. 96, Dig. 36. tit. 1. s. 63. § 5.) A Libri singularis de tacitis Fideicommissis, not mentioned in the Index, is cited, Dig. 34. tit. 9. s. 23.

10. De Casibus, βιβλίον 7. Extracts, 7. We have already explained the purport of this work.

11. Regularior [Regularum], βιβλίον 2. There is but one extract from this work in the Digest (Dig. 1. tit. 7. s. 21), unless there is some error in the Index or in the inscriptions. Gaius appears to have written another treatise in three books on Regulae, or rules of law. (Dig. 50. tit. 17. s. 100; Dig. 47. tit. 10. s. 43.)

12. Dotalicium [Dotaliciorum]. Though this work is mentioned in the Index, there is not a single extract from it in the Digest. It is probably the same with the Libri singularis de Re Usoria, which was one of the four libri singulares of Gaius, that were used for instruction in the law schools. (Const. Omnem, § 1.) Of the other three libri singulares, unless they were extracted from the larger work on the edict, nothing is known.

13. Τροθηκαρίας [Ad formulam hypothecariam], βιβλίον 2. Extracts, 6.

Besides other titles of works, which have been already incidentally mentioned as not inserted in the Florentine Index, we read Gaius, ad Edictum Aedilium Curulium Libri duo, in the inscriptions of eleven fragments, and Gaius, ad Legem Gliciam, in the inscription of Dig. 5. tit. 2. s. 4. Of the Lex Glicia no mention occurs elsewhere, and consequently the genuineness of the inscription has been doubted. (Bynkerschoeck. Obs. ii. 12.)

Great as are the intrinsic merits of Gaius as a jurist, he yet owes some of his celebrity to the recent discovery of his genuine Institutes, in a state so nearly perfect, that the resuscitated treatise forms by far the most complete specimen in existence, of an original un mutilated work, which has survived the wreck of classical Roman jurisprudence.

It was a common practice in the middle ages to wash out the relics of antiquity, in order to economise the parchment on which they were written. When washing alone would not expunge the writing—as often happened in the case of manuscripts written on the once hairy side of the parchment—the characters were further scratched out with a knife. A father of the Church sometimes covered the pages which had before contained the works of some profane dramatist. Not unfrequently the parchment was a second time submitted to the same treatment. The father who had supplanted the dramatist was himself washed and rubbed out in order, peradventure, to give place to some scholastic doctor.

In the library of the Chapter at Verona is a codex formerly numbered xv., but now xiii., containing a manuscript of the Letters of St. Jerome (Hieronymus), written over an older manuscript. Nearly one fourth part of the codex was his rescriptus, and where this was the case, it seems that St. Jerome had also been the second occupant. The manuscript first written on the parchment consisted of 251 pages, and each page of 24 lines. One leaf or two pages, 235 and 236, concerning Prescriptions and Interdicts, had been detached from the rest of the manuscript, and escaped being overlaid by St. Jerome. These two detached pages, together with four other pages detached from some other codex, and containing the fragment of an uncertain author De Jure Fisci, had been found in the library of Verona before the year 1732, by the celebrated Scipio Maffei. He describes them in his Verona Illustrata, Parte Terza, c. 7. p. 464 (8vo. Verona, 1732). In his Historia Teologica (fol. Trento, 1742), the greater part of both fragments was first published, and in plate x. a facsimile was given of part of the writing of the fragment De Interdictis. From the Historia Teologica, part of this facsimile was copied and republished, not very accurately, in the Nouveau Traité de Diplomatie, vol. iii. p. 208. tab. 46 (Paris, 1757). Maffei had observed a correspondence between the fragment De Interdictis and the 15th title of the 4th book of Justinian's Institutes; but, instead of recognizing Gaius, whose text was the basis of Justinian's work, he supposed that the leaf he had found was part of an interpretation or compendium of Justinian's Institutes, made by some later jurist. To Maffei, however, belongs the credit of having first given to the world two pages of the manuscript of the genuine Gaius.

It had not escaped the notice of Maffei that the manuscript of the letters of St. Jerome was a codex rescriptus. This appears by his unpublished remarks in the Catalogue of the Library; but he did not know what the subject of the obliterated writing was, and was not aware of the connection between that manuscript and the detached leaf which had drawn his attention.

The fragment concerning Interdicts, published by Maffei, had not been unobserved by Haubold. He determined to recal it to the memory of German jurists, and prepared an essay for that purpose, which was published at Leipzig in 1816, under the title of Notitia Fragmenti Veronensis de Interdictis, and is to be found in his collected Opuscula, vol. ii. p. 327—346.

By chance, while the essay of Haubold was in preparation, but not yet published, in the year 1816, Niebuhr was despatched to Rome by the king of Prussia, as minister to the Apostolic See. On his way, he spent the greater part of two days in examining the cathedral library of Verona, and made wonderfully good use of his limited time. Beside copying the manuscript of the fragment De Jure Fisci, he copied, fully and accurately, the fragment concerning Interdicts and Prescriptions, and did not hesitate to ascribe the latter fragment to its real author, Gaius. He proceeded to examine

Codex xiii., and by means of the infusion of nutgalls, was able to decipher the 97th leaf of the obliterated writing, which he at once recognised as an important work of a most ancient jurist, whom he at first supposed to be Ulpian. The fruits of his researches he communicated by letter to Savigny, by whom they were printed in the third volume of the Zeitschrift. Savigny added a learned and acute commentary of his own, and put forward the felicitous conjecture, amply verified in the sequel, that the ancient text of codex xiii. contained the genuine Institutes of Gaius, and that the fragment concerning Prescriptions and Interdicts had formerly been a part of that codex.

The fame of this discovery was soon diffused among the jurists of the continent. In May, 1817, the Royal Academy of Berlin despatched to Verona Göschel and Bekker, charged with the task of transcribing the manuscript, and the place of Bekker was shortly afterwards supplied by Bethmann Hollweg. With scrupulous accuracy did Göschel, assisted by Hollweg, fulfil his difficult commission. The original manuscript, in the opinion of the palaeographer Kopp (Savigny's Zeitschrift, vol. iv. p. 475), was anterior to Justinian's legal reforms. The scribe, like the majority of legal writers in our own country at the present day, employed a great variety of contractions, and whole words were often expressed by initial letters. The old order of the leaves was much deranged. There were very few pages where the parchment had not been entirely written over, and, in more than 60 pages, it was his re-scriptus. The new writing was in general directly over the old. In order to prepare the parchment, it had been washed, apparently bleached in the sun, and in some places scraped by a knife. Notwithstanding these difficulties, by far the greater portion of the Institutes of Gaius has been preserved to us. Probably not one tenth of the whole work is wanting. It is true that certain parts of the extant leaves resisted all attempts at deciphering, and that three leaves, namely, the leaf following p. 80, the leaf following p. 126, and the leaf following p. 194, are missing. The argument of the first missing leaf may be collected from the West Gothic Epitome, and the whole contents of the second missing leaf have been luckily preserved in an ancient extract, made by the author of the Collatio Legum Rom. et Mos., but the loss of the third missing leaf is very tantalizing, for it doubtless contained some particulars relative to the old legis actiones, which we are left without any means of supplying. A few of the gaps which are occasioned by the impossibility of deciphering are also very lamentable, for they occur in the most obscure parts of the work,—in parts where the curiosity of the antiquary is raised highest, and all the ingenuity of conjecture possessed by the ablest critics has been unable satisfactorily to fill them up.

The decyphered volume was anxiously looked for. In 1819, the first printed sheet of it appeared, but not until 1821 was the first complete edition of the work brought out by Göschel. Its publication excited an unusual sensation among the jurists of the continent. It was considered to form an era in the study of Roman Law. It was found to elucidate doubts, and clear up difficulties, before regarded as hopeless. By the true explanation it afforded, many an ingeniously constructed theory was demolished. Modern jurists were thus suddenly placed upon a vantage ground, from which they looked down upon their less fortunate predecessors. The authenticity of the discovered Institutes was beyond dispute. This was clear from internal evidence, which would prove a forger to have possessed miraculous knowledge and sagacity. The work was found to agree with the Institutes of Justinian, which were derived from it. It was the manifest source of the Gothic Epitome. It contained all the passages cited from the Institutes of Gaius in the Digest, in the Collatio, by Bœthius (Ad Cic. Topica, iii. §. sub fin.), and by Priscian (Ars Gram. vi. sub fin.).

The Institutes of Gaius are thought to have been the first work of the kind, not a compilation from previous sources. As they became a popular manual at Rome, so are they perhaps to the modern student the best initiation into the Roman law, especially if they are read along with the Institutes of Justinian and the Paraphrasis of Theophilus. They are composed in a clear and terse style, which is well suited to a technical treatise, and does not often fail to satisfy the requisitions of pure Latinity. The author always has a meaning, and seldom expresses his meaning badly. The difficulties which occur in his Institutes usually depend either on our ignorance of collateral facts and legal rules, or upon a train of reasoning which demands attention, or upon distinctions which the intellect cannot comprehend without effort. Gaius is not a learned historian; he seeks not the merit of a critical philologist, and does not push his logic so inconveniently as to assail the latent flaws of established law; but his history, his etymologies, and his logic bear a certain stamp of technical propriety. They are good enough for their purpose of assisting the memory, and facilitating the understanding of legal doctrine. He does not exhibit the details of refined philosophical analysis, and pursue with lucid order the prescriptions of scientific method; but yet the basis of his arrangement will appear, upon examination, to be solid and profound; and the sequence in which his subjects are treated has been found so practically satisfactory, that it has been received, with little alteration and improvement, by the majority of those who have followed in his track. "Omne jus quo utimur, vel ad personas pertinet, vel ad res, vel ad actiones." This celebrated division rests on the notion of a subject, an object, and a copula, connecting the subject with the object. Thinkers had not failed to dwell on the elementary distinction between a man and all that was not himself. They had seen that the relations between a man and the rest of the universe were changed and modified by his own acts and by external events. In the schools of philosophy, these considerations had led to divisions of human knowledge, analogous to the threefold division of law laid down by Gaius. Our author, however, seems to have contented himself with general notions, and not to have formed in his own mind any precise definition of the boundaries between the law relating to persons, the law relating to things and the law relating to actions. The order of his Institutes may be accounted for by some such analysis as the following:—Law treats of rights. Differences of rights result from permanent differences in those who possess rights—the subject of right—persons; and also from differences in that over which rights are exercised—the objects of right—things. Besides the varieties of rights attributable to permanent differences in persons, and natural or conventional differences in things, there are new and altered rights, which arise from external events and from voluntary acts. Of external events, death, which necessitates the devolution of property by succession, is in law of the utmost importance. From the voluntary legal dealings of men, and other changes of the circumstances in which they are placed, result transitory and particular rights of various kinds, with their corresponding obligations. Further, in order to redress any violation of those earlier rights, which alone would have to be considered, if men acted legally, the law establishes secondary rights—remedies for violation of right, and rights of action. The first book of the Institutes of Gaius treats of the distinctions of persons. In this it follows the genius of the Roman law, which owes much of its distinctive character to the great legal differences that originally subsisted between different classes of men. There are systems of jurisprudence in which it might perhaps be better to begin with an average law, not resting on peculiarities of class or status. Rights commonly rest, in modern systems, on an average level, from which the student may rise or sink to those inequalities of surface which depend on anomalous distinctions; but the law of Rome may rather be compared to a country which has its surface disposed in separate platforms or terraces of considerable extent. Gaius first considers men as free (liberi) or slaves (servi); freemen he subdivides into ingenui and libertini; and libertini he distinguishes as they are cives Romani, aut Latini, aut Dediticiorum numero. Here naturally he speaks of manumissions. Next, following a division which crosses the former, he divides personas into those who are sui juris, and those who are alieno juri subjectas. Under the latter head he speaks of the child in potestate parentis, of the wife in manu mariti, of the slave in mancipio domini. Persons who are sui juris are divided into those who are under tutela, those who are under cura, and those who are under neither tutela nor cura. With the second book begins the law, quod ad res pertinet. Some things are divini juris, others humani juris; some, again, are corporales, some incorporales. After explaining these distinctions, Gaius proceeds to the distinction of things into res Mancipi and res nec Mancipi. From the latter distinction (which depends upon technical rules relating to the mode of transferring property), he goes on to investigate the various modes of acquiring and transferring singulas res, as opposed to the acquisition and devolution of property in a lump. He is then naturally led to consider quibus modis per universitatem res nobis acquiruntur, and herein, to treat of hereditas. He treats of testate succession before intestacy, and arranges under the former head, as a kind of appendix, the law of legacies (legata) and fideicommissa; for though these are not proper examples of acquisitio per universitatem, they cannot be conveniently separated from the law of hereditas. The third book begins with the law of intestate succession, and proceeds (iii. 88) to the doctrine of obligationes. There has been great controversy among modern jurists whether the law relating to actions does not begin where obligationes are first introduced to our notice. The great modern maintainer of the proposition that the law of actions commences with obligationes was the late Hugo, who discussed the subject at large in his Civilist. Mag. (vol. iv. p. 1, and vol. v. p. 385), and returned to his favourite proposition in one of his latest essays. (Götting. Gelehrte Anzeigen, 1840, p. 1033—1039.) He has undoubtedly in his favour the express declaration of Theophilus (iii. 14. pr., and iv. 6. init.), but the opposite view (adopted by Vinnius, Thibaut, and others), which ranks obligationes with res, appears to be more in accordance with the form of the Institutes of Gaius. After treating of corporeal things—things which entitle their owner to the name of dominus—Gaius passes easily to obligationes, which are res incorporales, and give name to a kind of ownership distinct from dominium. The word obligatio properly expresses the connection between the person who has a right and the person who owes the corresponding duty; hence, in ordinary language, its meaning has been transferred to denote the duty, whereas in legal phraseology it is often employed to signify the right. It is not unlikely that, from the close relationship between the law of obligationes and the law of actions, and from the ambiguity of the word actio, which may apply to acts unconnected with judicial procedure, Gaius, and other jurists who succeeded him, may have avoided any precise definition of their grand division of law, and have placed obligationes in an intermediate situation, where they might be held to occupy an independent territory, or whence they might be transferred to the territory either of res or of actiones, as convenience might dictate. If we class them with res, we must admit that they require special and separate attention, seeing that they are differently created, transferred, and ended from other res. The summa divisio of obligationes is into two species—obligatio ex contractu, and obligatio ex delicto (iii. 88). In this Gaius differed from the Institutes of Justinian, which, out of the anomalous obligationes that remain, make two other general species, namely, obligationes quasi ex contractu and obligationes quasi ex delicto. Of obligationes ex contractu there are four kinds: re contrahuntur, aut verbis, aut litteris, aut consensu (iii. 89). Of obligationes ex delicto, Gaius also instances four kinds: veluti si quis factum fecerit, bona rapuerit, damnum dederit, injuriam commiserit (iii. 182). With the fourth and last book Gaius begins the law of actions, as connected with judicial procedure. After the general division of actiones into actiones in rem and actiones in personam, he treats of the ancient legis actiones and of formulae, exceptiones, and praescriptiones, and he gives an account of the several kinds of interdicta. With these topics are mingled various rules of law relating to different branches of judicial procedure.

The above is an imperfect sketch of the topics handled in the Institutes of Gaius. As to his mode of handling them, it is to be observed, that he treats rather of the dynamics than of the statics of law,—rather of those events or forces by which classes of rights begin, are modified or terminate, than of those rights and duties which accompany a given stationary legal relation. Thus, in treating of the ius quod ad personas pertinet, when he comes to the patria potestas, it is not his object to explain the mutual rights and duties of parents and children, but to point out the cases and events in which those rights and duties arise or cease.

A new edition of this work was loudly called for when the first edition of 1821 was exhausted, and in 1824 Blume made a fresh collation of codes iii., and the result of his renewed examination was given to the world by Göschel, in the celebrated edition of 1824. An improved reprint of this edition, by Lachmann, was published in 1842, the editor having completed a critical revision, which had been interrupted by the death of Göschel. This third editio Göscheniana is at present the editio optima.

The civilians of the continent have, from the first publication of Gaius, laboured assiduously in interpreting the text, in composing dissertations on the doctrines contained in it, and in conjectural supply of the lacunae, but no edition of the whole work with a good commentary has yet appeared. The commentary of Van Aessen (Ed. 2d. Lug. Bat. 1838) extends only to the first book. Heffter's edition of the fourth book, with commentary (4to. Berlin, 1827), is valuable. Heffter's edition of the entire work, without commentary, was originally intended to form the first part of the Bonn Corp. Jur. Antejus., but all the copies of this edition have been long since exhausted, and its place has been supplied by an edition superintended by Lachmann. In Klenze and Böcking's Gaii et Justiniani Institutiones (4to. Berlin, 1829), the texts of the two elementary works are placed side by side, but Gaius is made to yield to the order adopted by Justinian. Böcking's latest edition of the Institutes of Gaius (12mo. Bonn, 1841) is convenient and useful. The editor in the preface gives a list of dissertations and other publications which illustrate his author. The most valuable of these is the learned and imaginative Heschke's essay, Zur Kritik und Interpretation von Gaius Institutionen, in his Studien des Röm. Rechts (8vo. Breslau, 1830). Further information on the literature connected with Gaius may be found in Haubold's Instit. Jur. Rom. Priv. Lineam. p. 151. n. (oo), p. 505 (8vo. Lips. 1826), and in Mackelley's Lehrbuch des Röm. Rechts, p. 52, n. (b) (12th ed. Gessen, 1842). There is a German translation of the first book, with copious notes of little merit, by Von Brockdorff (8vo. Schle. 1824). There are French translations of the whole work by Boulet (Paris, 1826), Domenget (1843), and Pellat (1844). From the forthcoming volume of notes and commentary, by the last-mentioned eminent professor, much is expected.

In the Lex Romana Wisigothorum, published under Alaric II. in A. D. 506, for the use of the Roman subjects of the Westgothic kingdom, the Institutes of Gaius appear, remodelled in barbarous fashion. They have been worse treated than the Theodosian Code and other legal works introduced into the same collection; for while a barbarous interpretation (acrobasis) was subjoined to the text of the other works, Gaius was found to be so full of antiquated law, that his text, in its original state, would have been unsuitable to the character of the times. Accordingly, it was so altered and mutilated as not to want an interpretation. The Gothic Epitome of Gaius, disfigured and imperfect as it is, is now of little use, since the discovery of the genuine Institutes, except for the purpose of understanding ancient quotations made from it, and of assisting in the restoration of the valuable original. It consists, according to the ordinary division (for the manuscripts vary in this point), of two books, and contains no abstract of the fourth book of the genuine Gaius, concerning actions. It has been ably commented upon by Schulting, who gives a selection from the notes of preceding commentators (Jurisp. Antejus. p. 1—186), and by Meerman (Thesaurus, vol. vii. p. 669—686). It is edited by Haubold in the Berlin Jus. Civ. Antejus. and by Böcking in the Bonn Corp. Jur. Antejus.

The Breviarium, or Lex Rom. Wisig., has been itself the theme of a corrupt abridgment of the second order, in base Italian Latin, interesting, perhaps, to a philological student. Those who are anxious to see to what extent an ancient monument may be defaced and deformed, may consult the Lex Romana Utiensis, at the end of the fourth volume of Canciani's Leges Barbarorum. The following may be taken as a favourable specimen:—"Incipit liber Gaii i. Interpr. Ingenuorum statum unum est. Nam libertorum vero tres genera sunt. Injenui vero sunt, qui de injenuis parentes nascuntur. Liberti sunt, sicut jam diximus, tres genera: hoc est, cive Romanum, et Latine, et Divitici." [J. T. G.]

GALA, a Numidian, father of Masinissa, and king of the Masaeyli. In A. C. 213, when Syphax, king of the Masaeyli, had joined the Roman alliance, Gala, at the instigation of his son, and to counterbalance the additional power which Syphax had thus gained, listened to the overtures of the Carthaginians, and became their ally. Soon after this, while Masinissa was aiding the Carthaginians in Spain, Gala died, and was succeeded, according to the Numidian custom, by his brother Oesalces. (Liv. xxiv. 48, 49, xxix. 29; App. Pun. 10.) [E. E.] GALATEIA (Γαλατεια). 1. A daughter of Nereus and Doria. (Hom. Il. xviii. 46; Hes. Theog. 251.) Respecting the story of her love of Acis, see Acis.

2. A daughter of Eurytus, and the wife of Lamprus, the son of Pandion, at Phaestus in Crete. Her husband, desirous of having a son, ordered her, if she should give birth to a daughter, to kill the infant. Galateia gave birth to a daughter, but, unable to comply with the cruel command of Lamprus, she was induced by dreams and soothsayers to bring up the child in the disguise of a boy, and under the name of Leucippus. When the maiden had thus grown up, Galateia, dreading the discovery of the secret and the anger of her husband, took refuge with her daughter in a temple of Leto, and prayed the goddess to change the girl into a youth. Leto granted the request, and hence the Phaestians offered up sacrifices to Leto Phytia (i. e. the creator), and celebrated a festival called ἐκδόσια, in commemoration of the maiden having put off her female attire. (Anton. Lib. 17.) [L. S.]

GA'LATON (Γαλάτων), a Greek painter, whose picture, representing Homer vomiting, and other poets gathering up what fell from him, is mentioned by Aelian (V. H. xiii. 22), and by a scholiast to Lucian (i. p. 499, ed. Wetstein), who calls the painter Gelato. He probably lived under the earlier Ptolemies, and his picture was no doubt intended to ridicule the Alexandrian epic poets. (Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. ii. p. 193; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 163, n. 3.) [P. S.]

GALA'XIUS (Γαλάξιος), a surname of Apollo in Boeotia, derived from the stream Galaxius. (Procl. ap. Phot. p. 989; Müller, Orchom. p. 42, 2d edit.) [L. S.]

GALBA, the name of a patrician family of the Sulpicia gens.

1. P. SULPICIVS, SER. F. P. N. GALBA MAXIMUS, was elected consul for the year B. C. 211, ab

though he had never before held any curule magistracy. He entered upon his office on the idea of March, and both the consuls of that year had Appulia as their province; but as the senate no longer apprehended much from Hannibal and the Carthaginians, it was decreed that one of the consuls only should remain in Appulia, and that the other should have Macedonia for his province. When lots were drawn as to which was to leave Appulia, P. Sulpicius Galba obtained Macedonia, in the operations against which he succeeded M. Valerius Laevinus. At the close of his consulship his imperium was prolonged for another year, but owing to the boasting report which Laevinus had made of his own achievements, Sulpicius Galba was ordered to disband his army, and retained the command of only one legion and of the socii navales, i. e. of the fleet, and a sum of money was placed at his disposal to supply the wants of his forces. During this year, B. C. 210, Sulpicius Galba naturally could do but little, and all we know is, that he took the island of Aegina, which was plundered and given to the Aetolians, who were allied with the Romans, and that he in vain tried to relieve Echinus, which was besieged by Philip of Macedonia. For the year B. C. 209, his imperium was again prolonged, with Macedonia and Greece as his province. Besides the Aetolians the Romans had contrived to ally themselves also with Attalus against Philip. The Aetolians in the battle of Lamia were assisted by 1000 Romans, whom Galba had sent to them, while he himself was stationed at Naupactus. When Philip appeared at Dyme, on his march against Elis, Galba had landed with fifteen of his ships on the northern coast of Peloponnesus, and his soldiers were ravaging and plundering the country; but Philip's sudden arrival compelled them to return to their station at Naupactus. As Philip, however, was obliged to go back to Macedonia, which was threatened with an invasion by some of the neighbouring barbarians, Galba sailed to Aegina, where he joined the fleet of Attalus, and where both took up their winter-quarters.

In the spring of B. C. 208, Galba and Attalus, with their united fleets, amounting to sixty ships, sailed to Lemnos, and, while Philip exerted all his resources to prepare himself for any emergency, Attalus made an attack upon Peparethus, and then crossed with Galba over to Nicæa. From thence they proceeded to Euboea, to attack the town of Oreus, which was occupied by a Macedonian garrison, but was treacherously delivered up to Galba. Elated by this easy conquest he made also an attempt upon Chalcis; but he soon found that he would have to contend with insurmountable difficulties, and sailed to Cynus, a port-town of Iocria. In the meantime Attalus was driven by Philip out of Phocis, and, on the report that Prusias had invaded his kingdom, he went to Asia. Galba then returned to Aegina, and remained in Greece for several years, without doing any thing worth noticing. The Romans afforded no efficient assistance to the Aetolians, not even after the fall of Hasdrubal, which considerably lessened their care about the safety of Italy. The Aetolians had to act for themselves as well as they could.

In B. C. 204 Galba was recalled from Greece, and succeeded by the proconsul, P. Sempronius. In the year following he was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia, and summoning Cn. Servilius from Sicily. In B. C. 200, the year in which war again broke out, Galba was made consul a second time, and obtained Macedonia as his province. The people at Rome were highly dissatisfied with a fresh war being undertaken, before they had been able to recover from the sufferings of the Carthaginian one; but the senate and Galba carried their plan, and the war against Philip was decreed. Galba was permitted to select from the army which Scipio had brought back from Africa all those that were willing to serve again, but none of those veterans were to be compelled. After having selected his men and his ships, he sailed from Brundisium to the opposite coast. On his arrival he met Athenian ambassadors, who implored his protection against the Macedonians, and he at once sent C. Claudius Centhio with 20 ships and 1000 men to their assistance. But as the autumn was approaching when Galba arrived in his province, he took up his winter-quarters in the neighbourhood of Apollonia. In the spring of B. C. 199, he advanced with his army through the country of the Dassaretii, and all the towns and villages on his road surrendered to him, some few only being taken by force. The Romans, as well as Philip, were ignorant of the movements which each was making, until the outposts of the two armies met by accident, and a skirmish took place between them. The hostile armies then encamped at some distance from each other, and several minor engagements took place, in one of which the Romans sustained considerable loss. Hereupon a regular battle of the cavalry followed, in which the Romans were again beaten, but the Macedonians, who were hasty in their pursuit of the enemy, suddenly found themselves attacked on their flanks, and were put to flight, during which Philip nearly lost his life. These engagements occurred near the passes of Eordea. Immediately after this defeat Philip sent a messenger to Galba to sue for a truce; the Roman deferred his decision till the next day, but in the night following Philip and his army secretly left the camp, without the Romans knowing in what direction the king had gone. After having stayed for a few days longer, Galba marched towards Pluvina, and then encamped on the banks of the river Oosphagus, not far from the place where the king had taken up his post. Here again the Romans spent their time in petty conquests, and nothing decisive was done, and in the autumn Galba went back with his army to Apollonia.

For the year following T. Villius Tappulus was elected consul, with Macedonia as his province, and Galba returned to Rome. In B. C. 197, he and Villius Tappulus were appointed legates to T. Quintus Flamininus in Macedonia, and in the next year, when it was decreed at Rome that ten commissioners should be sent to arrange with Flamininus the affairs between Rome and Macedonia, Galba and Tappulus were ordered to act as two of those commissioners. In B. C. 193, Galba and Tappulus were sent as ambassadors to Antiochus; they first went to Eumenes at Pergamus, as they had been ordered, who urged the Romans to begin the war against Antiochus at once. For a short time Galba was detained at Pergamus by illness, but he was soon restored and went to Ephesus, where, instead of Antiochus, they found Minion, whom the king had deputed with full power. The result of the transactions was the war with Antiochus.

This is the last event recorded of Galba, in whose praise we have very little to say, and whose conduct in Greece, in connection with the Aetolians, greatly contributed to the demoralisation of the Greeks. (Liv. xxv. 41, xxvi. 1, 28, xxvii. 7, 10, 22, 31—33, xxviii. 5—7, xxix. 12, xxx. 24, xxxi. 4—8, 14, 22, 27, 33—40, xxxii. 28, xxxiii. 24, xxxiv. 59, xxxv. 13, 14, 16; Polyb. viii. 3, ix. 6, &c., 42, 141, xvi. 24, xviii. 6, xxiii. 8; Appian, Maced. 2, &c.; Eutrop. iii. 14; Oros. iv. 17.)

2. SER. SULPICIUS GALBA, was elected curule ædile in B. C. 208, and three years later he was one of the ambassadors that were sent to Asia to solicit the friendship of Attalus in the impending war between the Romans and Philip of Macedonia. In 203, he was elected pontiff in the place of Q. Fabius Maximus, and in this capacity he died in A. C. 198. (Liv. xxvii. 21, xxix. 11, xxx. 26, xxiii. 7.)

3. C. SULPICIUS GALBA was elected pontifex in A. C. 201, in the place of T. Manlius Torquatus, but died as early as B. C. 198. (Liv. xxx. 39, xxiii. 7.)

4. SER. SULPICIUS GALBA was curule ædile in A. C. 188, in which year he dedicated twelve gilt shields in the temple of Hercules, out of the fines which he and his colleague had exacted. In the year following he was appointed prætor urbanus, and supported M. Fulvius in his demand of a triumph. In B. C. 185, he was a candidate for the consulship, but without success. (Liv. xxxviii. 35, 42, xxxix. 5, 32.)

5. C. SULPICIUS GALBA was prætor urbanus in A. C. 171. (Liv. xlii. 28, 31.)

6. SER. SULPICIUS, SER. F. GALBA was tribune of the soldiers, and belonged to the second legion in Macedonia, under Aemilius Paullus, to whom he was personally hostile. After the conquest of Perseus, B. C. 167, when Aemilius had returned to Rome, Galba endeavoured to prevent a triumph being conferred upon the former; but he did not succeed, although his efforts created considerable sensation. He was prætor in A. C. 161, and received Spain as his province, where a war was carried on against the Celtiberians. On his arrival there he hastened to the relief of some Roman subjects who were hard pressed by the Lusitanians. Galba succeeded so far as to put the enemy to flight; but as, with his exhausted and undisciplined army, he was incautious in their pursuit, the Lusitanians turned round, and a fierce contest ensued, in which 7000 Romans fell. Galba then collected the remnants of his army and his allies, and took up his winter-quarters at Conistorgia. In the spring of B. C. 150, he again marched into Lusitania, and ravaged the country. The Lusitanians sent an embassy to him, declaring that they repented of having violated the treaty which they had concluded with Atilius, and promised henceforth to observe it faithfully. The mode in which Galba acted on that occasion is one of the most infamous and atrocious acts of treachery and cruelty that occur in history. He received the ambassadors kindly, and lamented that circumstances, especially the poverty of their country, should have induced them to revolt against the Romans. He promised them fertile lands if they would remain faithful allies of Rome. He induced them, for this purpose, to leave their homes, and assemble in three hosts, with their women and children, in the three places which he fixed upon, and in which he himself would inform each host what territory they were to occupy. When they were assembled in the manner he had prescribed, he went to the first body, commanded them to surrender their arms, surrounded them with a ditch, and then sent his armed soldiers into the place, who forthwith massacred them all. In the same manner he treated the second and third hosts. Very few of the Lusitanians escaped from the bloody scene; but among the survivors was Viriathus, destined one day to be the avenger of the wrong done to his countrymen. Appian states that Galba, although he was very wealthy, was extremely niggardly, and that he did not even scruple to lie or perjure himself, provided he could thereby gain pecuniary advantages. In the year following, when he had returned to Rome, the tribune, T. Scribonius Libo, brought a charge against him for the outrage he had committed on the Lusitanians; and Cato, then 85 years old, attacked him most unsparingly in the assembly of the people. Galba, although a man of great oratorical power himself, had nothing to say in his own justification; but bribery, and the fact of his bringing his own children and the orphan child of a relative before the people, and imploring mercy, procured his acquittal. Notwithstanding this occurrence, however, he was afterwards made consul for the year B. C. 144, with L. Aurelius Cotta. The two consuls disputed in the senate as to which of them was to undertake the command against Viriathus in Spain: great dissension prevailed also in the senate; but it was resolved in the end, that neither should be sent to Spain, and that Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilianus, the consul of the year before, should continue to command the army in Spain. He must have survived the year B. C. 138, for in that year he spoke for the publicani. (Cic. Brut. 22.) Cicero speaks of his talent as an orator in terms of high praise, and calls him the first among the Romans whose oratory was what it should be. He seems to have been a man of learning; his oratory had great power, which was increased by his passionate gesticulation during delivery. Cicero found his orations more old-fashioned than those of Laelius and Scipio, and says, that for this reason they were seldom mentioned in his time. (Appian, Hispan. 58, 59, 60; Liv. xlv. 35, 36, Epit. 49; Suet. Galb. 3; Oros. iv. 20; Val. Max. viii. 1. § 2, 7. § 1; Plut. *Cat. 7. SER. SULPICIUS, SER. F. SER. N. GALBA, a son of No. 6, succeeded Calpurnius Piso as prætor in Spain, and was consul in B. C. 108; and in 100, during the disturbances of Appuleius Saturninus, he took up arms to defend the republic against the revolutionists. (Appian, Hispan. 99; J. Obseq. 100; Cic. pro Rab. perd. 7.)

8. C. SULPICIUS, SER. F. GALBA, apparently a son of No. 6, and son-in-law of P. Crassus Mucianus, was quaestor in B. C. 120. During the transactions with Jugurtha he was accused of having been bribed by the Numidian, and was condemned in B. C. 110 by a lex Manilia. Cicero states that C. Sulpicius Galba enjoyed great favour with his contemporaries for his father's sake. His defence against the charge of being bribed by Jugurtha was read by Cicero when yet a boy, and delighted him so much that he learned it by heart. At the time of his condemnation he belonged to the college of pontiffs, and was the first priest that was ever condemned at Rome by a judicium publicum. (Cic. Brut. 26, 33, 34, de Orat. i. 56.)

9. P. (SULPICIUS) GALBA was appointed one of the judges in the case of Verres B. C. 70, but was rejected by Verres. Cicero calls him an honest, but severe judge, and says that he was to enter on some magistracy that same year. He seems to be the same as the Galba who was one of the competitors of Cicero for the consulship. In B. C. 57 he is mentioned as pontifex, and in 49 as augur. Whether he is the same as the Galba who served as legate under Sulla in the war against Mithridates must remain uncertain. (Cic. in Ferr. i. 7, 10, de Petit. Cons. 2, ad Att. i. 1, ix. 9, de Harusp. Resp. 6; Ascon. in Cic. in Tog. cand. p. 82; Appian, Mithrid. 43.)

10. SER. SULPICIUS GALBA, a grandson of No. 6, and great-grandfather of the emperor Galba. He was sent by Caesar at the beginning of his Gallic campaign, in B. C. 58, against the Nantuates, Veragri and Seduni, and defeated them; but he, nevertheless, led his army back into the country of the Allobrogi. In B. C. 54 he was praetor urbanus. In B. C. 49 he was a candidate for the consulship; but, to the annoyance of his friend J. Caesar, he was not elected. He was a friend of Decimus Brutus and Cicero; and in the war of Mutina, of which he himself gives an account in a letter to Cicero still extant (ad Fam. x. 30), he commanded the legio Martia. (Caes. B. G. iii. 1, 6, viii. 50; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 48, xxxix. 5, 65; Cic. ad Fam. vi. 18, xi. 18, Philipp. xiii. 16; Val. Max. vi. 2. § 11.) According to Suetonius (Galba, 3; comp. Appian, B. C. ii. 113), he was one of the conspirators against the life of J. Caesar.

11. SULPICIUS GALBA, a son of No. 10, and grandfather of the emperor Galba, was a man devoted to literary pursuits, and never rose to a higher office in the state than the praetorship. He was the author of an historical work which Suetonius calls multiplex nec incuriosa historia. The nature of this work is unknown. (Suet. Galb. 3.)

12. C. SULPICIUS GALBA, a son of No. 11, and father of the emperor Galba. He was consul in A. D. 22, with D. Haterius Agrippa. He was humpbacked, and an orator of moderate power. He was married to Mummia Achaica, a great granddaughter of Mummus, the destroyer of Corinth. After her death he married Livia Ocellina, a wealthy and beautiful woman. By his former wife he had two sons, Caius and Servius. The former of them is said by Suetonius (Galb. 3) to have made away with himself, because Tiberius would not allow him to enter on his proconsulship; but as it is not known that he ever was consul, it is more probable that Suetonius is mistaken, and that what he relates of the son Caius applies to his father, C. Sulpicius Galba, who, according to Tacitus (Anna. vi. 40), put an end to himself in A. D. 36.

To which of the preceding P. Galbae the following coin belongs is doubtful. It has on the obverse a female head, and on the reverse a cultus, a simulacrum, and a secespita, with P. GALB. ARD. CVM.

GALBA, SER. SULPICIUS, a Roman emperor, who reigned from June, A. D. 68 to January, A. D. 69. He was descended from the family of the Galbae, a branch of the patrician Sulpicia gens, but had no connection with the family of Augustus, which became extinct by the death of Nero. He was a son of Sulpicius Galba [GALBA, No. 12] and Mummia Achaica, and was born in a villa near Terracina, on the 24th of December, B. C. 3. Livia Ocellina, a relative of Livia, the wife of Augustus, and the second wife of Galba's father, adopted young Ser. Sulpicius Galba, who on this account altered his name into L. Livius Ocella, which he bore down to the time of his elevation. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have told him, that one day he would be at the head of the Roman world, from which we must infer that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents. His education appears to have been the same as that of other young nobles of the time, and we know that he paid some attention to the study of the law. He married Lepida, who bore him two sons, but both Lepida and her children died, and Galba never married again, although Agrippina, afterwards the wife of Claudius, did all she could to win his attachment. He was a man of great wealth, and a favourite of Livia, the wife of Augustus, through whose influence he obtained the consulship. She also left him a considerable legacy, of which, however, he was deprived by Tiberius. He was invested with the curule officers before attaining the legitimate age. After his praetorship, in A. D. 20, he had the administration of the province of Aquitania. In A. D. 33 he was raised to the consulship on the recommendation of Livia Drusilla, and after this he distinguished himself in the administration of the province of Gaul, A. D. 39, where he carried on a successful war against the Germans, and restored discipline among the troops. The Germans had invaded Gaul, but after severe losses they were compelled by Galba to return to their own country. On the death of Caligula many of his friends urged him on to take possession of the imperial throne, but he preferred living in a private station, and Claudius, the successor of Caligula, felt so grateful to him for this moderation, that he received him into his suite, and showed him very great kindness and attention. In A. D. 45 and 46, Galba was entrusted with the administration of the province of Africa, which was at the time disturbed by the licentiousness of the Roman soldiers and by the incursions of the neighbouring barbarians. He restored peace, and managed the affairs of the province with great strictness and care, and on his return he was honoured with the ornamenta triumphalia, and with the dignity of three priesthoods; he became a member of the college of the Quindecimviri, of the sodales Titii, and of the Augustales. In the reign of Nero he lived for several years in private retirement, for fear of becoming, like many others, the victim of the tyrant's suspicion, until, in B. C. 61, Nero gave him Hispania Tarraconensis as his province, where he remained for a period of eight years. In maintaining discipline among his troops, his strictness at first bordered upon cruelty, for the severest punishments were inflicted on slight offences, but during the latter period of his administration he became indolent, for fear, it is said, of attracting the attention of Nero, but more probably as a natural consequence of old age. In A. D. 68, when the insurrection of C. Julius Vindex broke out in Gaul, and Vindex called upon the most distinguished men in the other provinces to join him, he also sent messengers to Galba, whom he looked upon as the most eminent among the generals of the time, and whom he had destined in his mind as the successor of Nero. Vindex accordingly exhorted him to vindicate the rights of oppressed humanity. Galba, who was at the same time informed that some officers in Spain had received secret orders from Nero to murder him, resolved at once to take the perilous step, and place himself at the head of the Roman world, although he was already upwards of seventy years old. He assembled his troops, excited their sympathy for those who had been murdered by Nero, and was at once proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. He himself, however, at first professed to act only as the legate of the Roman senate and people. He began to organise his army in Spain, instituted a kind of senate which was to act as his council, and made all preparations for a war against Nero. Some of his soldiers, however, soon began to repent, and as he was engaged in suppressing this spirit among his own men, he received the intelligence of the fall of Vindex, who in despair had put an end to himself. Being thus deprived of his principal supporter, Galba withdrew to Clunia, a small town of his province, and was on the point of following the example of Vindex. But things suddenly took a different turn. Nymphidius Sabinus, prefect of the praetorians at Rome, created an insurrection there, and some of the friends of Galba, by making munificent promises in his name, succeeded in winning the troops for him. Nero was murdered. Galba now took the title of Caesar, and, accompanied by Salvius Otho, the governor of Lusitania, he went to Rome, where ambassadors were arrived from all parts of the empire to do homage to Galba as the lawful sovereign.

Galba by this time seems to have lost the good qualities that distinguished his earlier years: a report of his severity and avarice had preceded him to Rome; and it soon became manifest that the accounts of his avarice were not exaggerated. Instead of doing all he could to win the favour of the soldiers, who had only just become aware of the fact that they had it in their power to dispose of the sovereignty, and that they might depose him just as they had raised him, he made several unpopular changes in the army at Rome, and punished with severity those who opposed his measures. The large donatives which his friends had promised in his name were not given, and various rumours about his niggardly and miserly character were sedulously spread at Rome, and increased the discontent. Some of his arrangements were wise enough; and had he not been the victim of envy, the common foible of old age, and been able to part with some of his treasures, he might have maintained himself on the throne, and the Roman world would probably not have had much reason to complain. In addition to this, he was completely under the sway of three favourites,

T. Vinia, Cornelius Laco, and Icelus; and the arbitrary manner in which he acted under their influence showed that the times were little better than they had been under Nero. His unpopularity with all classes daily increased, and more especially among the soldiers. The first open outbreak of discontent was among the legions of Germany, which sent word to the Praetorians at Rome, that they disliked the emperor created in Spain, and that one should be elected who was approved of by all the legions. Similar outbreaks occurred in Africa. Galba, apparently blind to the real cause of the discontent, and attributing it to his old age and his having no heir, adopted Piso Licinianus, a noble young Roman, who was to be his coadjutor and successor. But even this act only increased his unpopularity; for he presented his adopted son to the senate and the soldiers, without giving to the latter the donatives customary on such occasions. Salvius Otho, who had hoped to be adopted by Galba, and had been strongly recommended by T. Vinia, now secretly formed a conspiracy among the troops. The insurrection broke out six days after the adoption of Piso Licinianus. Galba at first despaired, and did not know what to do, but at last he took courage, and went out to meet the rebels; but as he was carried across the forum in a sedan-chair, a troop of horsemen, who had been waiting for his arrival, rushed forward and cut him down, near the Læna Curtius, where his body was left, until a common soldier, who passed by, cut off his head, and carried it to Otho, who had in the mean time been proclaimed emperor by the praetorians and legions. His remains were afterwards buried by one Argins in his own garden. A statue of his, which the senate erected on the spot where he had been murdered, was afterwards destroyed by Vespasian, who believed that Galba had sent assassins into Judaea to murder him. (*Tac. COIN OF GALBA. The reverse represents a Corona Civica, and is therefore accompanied with the inscription OB C. S., that is, ob civis servatos.

GALE'NE (Γαλήνη), a personification of the calm sea, and perhaps identical with Galateia, one of the Nereides, is called by Hesiod (Theog. 244) a daughter of Nereus and Doris. [L. S.]

GALE'NUS, CLAUDIUS (Κλαύδιος Γαλήνης), commonly called Galen, a very celebrated physician, whose works have had a longer and more extensive influence on the different branches of medical science than those of any other individual either in ancient or modern times.

I. PERSONAL HISTORY OF GALEN.

Little is told us of the personal history of Galen by any ancient author, but this deficiency is abundantly supplied by his own writings, in which are to be found such numerous anecdotes of himself and his contemporaries as to form altogether a tolerably circumstantial account of his life. He was a native of Pergamus in Mysia (Gal. De Simpl. Medic. Temper. ac Facult. x. 2. § 9. vol. xii. p. 272), and it can be proved from various passages in his works that he was born about the autumn of A. D. 130. His father's name was Nicon (Suid. s. v. Γαλῆνος), who was, as Suidas tells us, an architect and geometrician, and whom Galen praises several times, not only for his knowledge of astronomy, grammar, arithmetic, and various other branches of philosophy, but also for his patience, justice, benevolence, and other virtues. (De Dignos. et Cur. An. Morb. c. 8. vol. v. p. 41, &c.; De Prob. et Prav. Alim. Succ. c. i. vol. vi. p. 755, &c.; De Ord. Libr. suor. vol. xix. p. 59.) His mother, on the other hand, was a passionate and scolding woman, who would sometimes even bite her maids, and used to quarrel with her husband "more than Xantippe with Socrates." He received his first instruction from his father, and in his fifteenth year, A. D. 144-5, began to learn logic and to study philosophy under a pupil of Philopator the Stoic, under Caius the Platonist, (or, more probably, one of his pupils,) under a pupil of Aspasius the Peripatetic, and also under an Epicurean. (De Dignos. et Cur. An. Morb. c. 8. vol. v. p. 41.) In his seventeenth year, A. D. 146-7, his father, who had hitherto destined him to be a philosopher, altered his intentions, and, in consequence of a dream, chose for him the profession of Medicine. (De Meth. Med. ix. 4. vol. x. p. 609; Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." ii. 2. vol. xvi. p. 223; De Ord. Libr. suor. vol. xix. p. 59.) No expense was spared in his education, and the names of several of his medical tutors have been preserved. His first tutors were probably Aeschrius (De Simpl. Medic. Temper. ac Facult. xi. 1. § 34. vol. xii. p. 356), Satyrus (Comment. in Hippocr. "Prædict. I." i. 5. vol. xvi. p. 524; De Ord. Libr. suor. vol. xix. p. 57), and Stratoniceus, in his own country (De Atra Bile, c. 4. vol. v. p. 119). In his twentieth year, A. D. 149-50, he lost his father (De Prob. et Prav. Alim. Succ. c. i. vol. vi. p. 756), and it was probably about the same time that he went to Smyrna for the purpose of studying under Pelops the physician, and Albinus the Platonic philosopher, as he says he was still a youth (νεῖσος). (De Anat. Admin. i. 1. vol. ii. p. 217; De Libris Propr. c. ii. vol. xix. p. 16.) He also went to Corinth to attend the lectures of Nemesianus (De Anat. Admin. i. c.), and to Alexandria for those of Heracianus (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6. vol. xvi. 136); and studied under Aelianus Meccius (De Ther. ad Pamph. vol. xiv. p. 298-9), and Iphicranus (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." iii. 34. vol. xvi. p. 484, where the name is corruptly called Ἰφικράνης). It was perhaps at this time that he visited various other countries, of which mention is made in his works, as e.g. Cilicia, Phœnicia, Palestine, Scyros, Crete (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Victu Acut." iii. 8. vol. xv. p. 648), and Cyprus (De Simpl. Medic. Temper. ac Facult. ix. 1. § 2. vol. xii. p. 171). He returned to Pergamus from Alexandria, when he had just entered on his twenty-ninth year, A. D. 158 (De Compos. Medic. sec. Gen. iii. 2. vol. xiii. p. 599), and was immediately appointed by the high-priest of the city physician to the school of gladiators, an office which he filled with great reputation and success. (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Fract." iii.

In his thirty-fourth year, A. D. 163-4, Galen quitted his native country on account of some popular commotions, and went to Rome for the first time. (De Libris Propr. c. i. vol. xix. p. 15.) Here he stayed about four years, and gained such reputation from his skill in anatomy and medicine that he got acquainted with some of the principal persons at Rome, and was to have been recommended to the emperor, but that he declined that honour. (De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 8. vol. xiv. p. 647.) It was during his first visit to Rome that he wrote his work De Hippocratis et Platonis Decretis, the first edition of his work De Anatomicis Administrationibus, and some of his other treatises (De Anat. Admin. i. 1. vol. ii. p. 215); and excited so much envy and ill-will among the physicians there by his constant and successful disputing, lecturing, writing, and practising, that he was actually afraid of being poisoned by them. (De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 623, &c.) A full account of his first visit to Rome*, and of some of his most remarkable cures, is given in the early chapters of his work De Praenotione ad Epigenem, where he mentions that he was at last called, not only παράδοξος ἄνθρωπος, "the wonder-speaker," but also παράδοξος ἔργου, "the wonder-worker." (c. 8. p. 641.) It is often stated that Galen fled from Rome in order to avoid the danger of a very severe pestilence, which had first broken out in the parts about Antioch, A. D. 166, and, after ravaging various parts of the empire, at last reached the capital (see Gresswell's Dissertations, &c., vol. iv. p. 552); but he does not appear to be justly open to this charge, which the whole of his life and character would incline us to disbelieve. He had been for some time wishing to leave Rome as soon as the tumults at Pergamus should be at an end (De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 623), and evaded the proposed introduction to the emperor M. Aurelius for fear lest his return to Asia should be thereby hindered (ibid. pp. 647, 648). This resolution may have been somewhat hastened by the breaking out of the pestilence at Rome, A. D. 167 (De Libr. Propr. c. i. vol. xix. p. 15), and accordingly he left the city privately, and set sail at Brundisium. (De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 9. vol. xiv. p. 648.) He reached his native country in his thirty-eighth year, A. D. 167-8 (De Libr. Propr. c. 2. vol. xix. p. 16), and resumed his ordinary course of life; but had scarcely done so, when there arrived a summons from the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them at Aquileia in Venetia, the chief bulwark of Italy on its north-eastern frontier, whither they had both gone in person to make preparations for the war with the northern tribes (De Libr. Propr. l. c. p. 17, 18; De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 9. vol. xiv. p. 649, 650), and where they intended to pass the winter. He travelled through Thrace and Macedonia, performing part of the journey on foot (De Simplic. Medi-

* Some persons think that Galen's first visit to Rome took place A. D. 161-2, and that therefore he was there twice before his visit A. D. 170; but Galen himself never speaks of this as his third visit, and the writer is inclined to think that all the passages in his works that seem to imply that he was at Rome A. D. 161-2, may be easily reconciled with the other hypothesis.

ana. Temper. ac Facult. ix. 1. § 2. vol. xii. p. 171), and reached Aquileia towards the end of the year 169, shortly before the pestilence broke out in the camp with redoubled violence. (De Libr. Propr. and De Praenot. ad Epig. l. c.) The two emperors, with their court and a few of the soldiers, set off precipitately towards Rome, and while they were on their way Verus died of apoplexy, between Concordia and Altinum in the Venetian territory, in the month of December. (See Greswell's Dissertations, &c., vol. iv. p. 595, 596.) Galen followed M. Aurelius to Rome, and, upon the emperor's return, after the apotheosis of L. Verus, to conduct the war on the Danube, with difficulty obtained permission to be left behind at Rome, alleging that such was the will of Aesculapius. (De Libr. Propr. l. c.) Whether he really had a dream to this effect, which he believed to have come from Aesculapius, or whether he merely invented such a story as an excuse for not sharing in the dangers and hardships of the campaign, it is impossible to determine; it is, however, certain that he more than once mentions his receiving (what he conceived to be) divine communications during sleep, in cases where no self-interested motive can be discovered. The emperor about this time lost his son, Annianus Verus Caesar, and accordingly on his departure from Rome, he committed to the medical care of Galen his son L. Aurelius Commodus, who was then nine years of age, and who afterwards succeeded his father as emperor. (De Libr. Propr. and De Praenot. ad Epig. l. c.) It was probably in the same year, A. D. 170, that Galen, on the death of Demetrius, was commissioned by M. Aurelius to prepare for him the celebrated compound medicine called Theriaca, of which the emperor was accustomed to take a small quantity daily (De Antid. i. 1. vol. xiv. p. 3, &c.); and about thirty years afterwards he was employed to make up the same medicine for the emperor Septimus Severus (ibid. i. 13. p. 63, 65).

How long Galen stayed at Rome is not known, but it was probably for some years, during which time he employed himself, as before, in lecturing, writing, and practising, with great success. He finished during this visit at Rome two of his principal treatises, which he had begun when he was at Rome before, viz. that De Usu Partium Corporis Humani, and that De Hippocratis et Platonis Decretis (De Libr. Propr. c. 2. vol. xix. p. 19, 20); and among other instances which he records of his medical skill, he gives an account of his attending the emperor M. Aurelius (De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 11. vol. xiv. p. 637, &c.), and his two sons, Commodus (ibid. c. 12. p. 661, &c.) and Sextus (ibid. c. 10. p. 651, &c.). Of the events of the rest of his life few particulars are known. On his way back to Pergamus, he visited the island of Lemnos for the second time (having been disappointed on a former occasion), for the purpose of learning the mode of preparing a celebrated medicine called "Terra Lemnia," or "Terra Sigillata;" of which he gives a full account. (De Simplic. Medicis. Temper. ac Facult. ix. 1. § 2. vol. xii. p. 172). It does not appear certain that he visited Rome again, and one of his Arabic biographers expressly says he was there only twice (Anon. Arab. Philosoph. Biblioth. apud Casiri, Biblioth. Arabico-Hisp. Encur. vol. i. p. 253); but it certainly seems more natural to suppose that he was at Rome about the end of the second century, when he was employed to compound Theriaca for the emperor Severus. The place of his death is not mentioned by any Greek author, but Abû-l-faraj states that he died in Sicily. (Hist. Dynast. p. 78.) The age at which he died and the date is also somewhat uncertain. Suidas says he died at the age of seventy, which statement is generally followed, and, as he was born in the autumn of the year 130, places his death in the year 200 or 201. He certainly was alive about the year 199, as he mentions his preparing Theriaca for the emperor Severus about that date, and his work De Antidotis, in which the account is given (i. 13. vol. xiv. p. 65), was probably written in or before that year, when Caracalla was associated with his father in the empire, as Galen speaks of only one emperor as reigning at the time it was composed. If, however, the work De Theriaca ad Pisonem be genuine, which seems to be at least as probable as the contrary supposition (see below, Sect. VII. § 75.), he must have lived some years later; which would agree with the statements of his Arabic biographers, one of whom says he lived more than eighty years (apud Casiri, l. c.), while Abû-l-faraj says that he died at the age of eighty-eight. Some European authorities place his death at about the same age (Ackermann, Hist. Liter., in vol. i. of Kühn's edition of Galen, p. xli.), and John Tzetzes says that he lived under the emperor Caracalla (Chiliad. xlii. hist. 397); so that, upon the whole, there seems to be quite sufficient reason for not implicitly receiving the statement of Suidas.

Galen's personal character, as it appears in his works, places him among the brightest ornaments of the heathen world. Perhaps his chief faults were too high an opinion of his own merits, and too much bitterness and contempt for some of his adversaries,—for each of which failings the circumstances of the times afforded great, if not sufficient, excuse. He was also one of the most learned and accomplished men of his age, as is proved not only by his extant writings, but also by the long list of his works on various branches of philosophy which are now lost. All this may make us the more regret that he was so little brought into contact with Christianity, of which he appears to have known nothing more than might be learned from the popular conversation of the day during a time of persecution: yet in one of his lost works, of which a fragment is quoted by his Arabian biographers (Abû-l-faraj, Casiri, l. c.), he speaks of the Christians in higher terms, and praises their temperance and chastity, their blameless lives, and love of virtue, in which they equalled or surpassed the philosophers of the age. A few absurd errors and fables are connected with his name, which may be seen in Ackermann's Hist. Liter. (pp. xxxix. xlii.), but which, as they are neither so amusing in themselves, nor so interesting in a literary point of view as those which concern Hippocrates, need not be here mentioned. If Galen suffered during his lifetime from the jealousy and misrepresentation of his medical contemporaries, his worth seems to have been soon acknowledged after his death; medals were struck in his honour by his native city, Pergamus (Montfaucon, L'Antiquité Expliquée, &c., vol. iii. p. 1. pl. xv. and Suppl. vol. i. pl. lxxviii.), and in the course of a few centuries he began to be called Σαυδαίος (Simplic. Comment. in Aristot.

"Phys. Auscult." iv. 3. p. 167. ed. Ald.), "Medicorum disertissimus atque doctissimus," (S. Hieron. Comment. in Iona, c. 5. vol. vi. p. 283), and even Sedratos. (Alex. Trall. De Med. v. 4. p. 77. ed. Lutet. Par.)

II. GENERAL HISTORY OF GALEN'S WRITINGS, COMMENTATORS, BIBLIOGRAPHY, &c.

The works that are still extant under the name of Galen, as enumerated by Choulant, in the second edition of his Handbuch der Bücherkunde für die Aellere Medicin, consist of eighty-three treatises acknowledged to be genuine; nineteen whose genuineness has, with more or less reason, been doubted; forty-five undoubtedly spurious; nineteen fragments; and fifteen commentaries on different works of Hippocrates: and more than fifty short pieces and fragments (many or most of which are probably spurious) are enumerated as still lying unpublished in different European libraries. (Ackermann, Hist. Liter. pp. clixvi. &c.) Almost all these treat of some branch of medical science, and many of them were composed at the request of his friends, and without any view to publication. Besides these, however, Galen wrote a great number of works, of which nothing but the titles have been preserved; so that altogether the number of his distinct treatises cannot have been less than five hundred. Some of these are very short, and he frequently repeats whole passages, with hardly any variation, in different works; but still, when the number of his writings is considered, their intrinsic excellence, and the variety of the subjects of which he treated (extending not only to every branch of medical science, but also to ethics, logic, grammar, and other departments of philosophy), he has always been justly ranked among the greatest authors that have ever lived. (See Cardan, De Subtil. lib. xvi. p. 597, ed. 1554. His style is elegant, but diffuse and prolix, and he abounds in allusions and quotations from the ancient Greek poets, philosophers, and historians.

At the time when Galen began to devote himself to the study of medicine, the profession was divided into several sects, which were constantly disputing with each other. The Dogmatici and Empirici had for several centuries been opposed to each other; in the first century B. C. had arisen the sect of the Methodici; and shortly before Galen's own time had been founded those of the Eclectici, Pneumatici, and Episynthetic. Galen himself, "nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri," attached himself exclusively to none of these sects, but chose from the tenets of each what he believed to be good and true, and called those persons staves who designated themselves as followers of Hippocrates, Praxagoras, or any other man. (De Libr. Propr. c. 1. vol. xiv. p. 13.) However, "in his general principles," says Dr. Bostock, "he may be considered as belonging to the Dogmatic sect, for his method was to reduce all his knowledge, as acquired by the observation of facts, to general theoretical principles. These principles he indeed professed to deduce from experience and observation, and we have abundant proofs of his diligence in collecting experience, and his accuracy in making observations; but still, in a certain sense at least, he regards individual facts and the detail of experience as of little value, unconnected with the principles which he laid down as the basis of all medical reasoning. In this fundamental point, therefore, the method pursued by Galen appears to have been directly the reverse of that which we now consider as the correct method of scientific investigation; and yet, such is the force of natural genius, that in most instances he attained the ultimate object in view, although by an indirect path. He was an admirer of Hippocrates, and always speaks of him with the most profound respect, professing to act upon his principles, and to do little more than to expound his doctrines, and support them by new facts and observations. Yet, in reality, we have few writers whose works, both as to substance and manner, are more different from each other than those of Hippocrates and Galen, the simplicity of the former being strongly contrasted with the abstruseness and refinement of the latter." (Hist. of Med.)

After Galen's time we hear but little of the old medical sects, which in fact seem to have been all merged in his followers and imitators. To the compilers among the Greeks and Romans of large medical works, like Aëtius and Oribasius, his writings formed the basis of their labours; while, as soon as they had been translated into Arabic, in the ninth century after Christ, chiefly by Hoin Ben Ishak, they were at once adopted throughout the East as the standard of medical perfection. It was probably in a great measure from the influence exercised even in Europe by the Arabic medical writers during the middle ages that Galen's popularity was derived; for, though his opinions were universally adopted, yet his writings appear to have been but little read, when compared with those of Avicenna and Mesue. Of the value of what was done by the Arabic writers towards the explanation and illustration of Galen's works, it is impossible to judge; as, though numerous translations, commentaries, and abridgements are still extant in different European libraries, none of them have ever been published. If, however, a new and critical edition of Galen's works should ever be undertaken, these ought certainly to be examined, and would probably be found to be of much value; especially as some of his writings (as is specified below), of which the Greek text is lost, are still extant in an Arabic translation. Of the immense number of European writers who have employed themselves in editing, translating, or illustrating Galen's works, a complete list, up to about the middle of the sixteenth century, was made by Conrad Gesner, and prefixed to the edition of Basil, 1561, fol.: of those enumerated by him, and of those who have lived since, perhaps the following may be most deserving of mention:—Jo. Bapt. Opizo, Andr. Lacuna, Ant. Musa Brassarvolus, Aug. Gadaldinus, Conr. Gesner, Hier. Gemusaeus, Jac. Sylvius, Janus Cornarius, Nic. Rheginus, Jo. Bapt. Montanus, John Caius, Jo. Guinterius (Andernaeus), Thomas Linacre, Theod. Goulston, Casp. Hofmann, Ren. Chartier, Alb. Haller, and C. G. Kühn. Galen's works were first published in a Latin translation, Venet. 1490, fol. 2 vols. ap. Philipp. Pintium de Caneto; it is printed in black letter, and is said to be scarce. The next Latin edition that deserves to be noticed is that published by the Junta, Venet. 1541, fol., which was reprinted, with additions and improvements, eight (or nine) times within one hundred years. Of these editions, the most valuable are said to be those of the years 1586 (or 1597), 1600, 1609, and 1626, in five vols., with the works divided by J. Bapt. Montanus into classes, according to their subject-matter, and with the copious Index Rerum of Ant. Musa Brassavolus. Another excellent Latin edition was published by Froben, Basil, 1542, fol., and reprinted in 1549 and 1561. It contains all Galen's works, in eight vols., divided into eight classes, and a ninth vol., consisting of the Indices. The reprint of 1561 is considered the most valuable, on account of Conrad Gesner's Prolegomena. The last Latin edition is that published by Vinc. Valgrisius, Venet. 1562, fol. in five vols., edited by Jo. Bapt. Rasarius. Altogether (according to Choulant), a Latin version of all Galen's works was published once in the fifteenth century, twenty (or twenty-two) times in the sixteenth, and not once since.

The Greek text has been published four times; twice alone, and twice with a Latin translation. The first edition was the Aldine, published Venet. 1525, fol., in five vols., edited by Jo. Bapt. Opizo with great care, though containing numerous errors and omissions, as might be expected in so large a work. It is a handsome book, rather scarce, and much valued; and contains the Greek text, without translation, notes, or indices. The next Greek edition was published in 1538, Basil. ap. Andr. Cratandus, fol., in five vols., edited by L. Camerarius, L. Fuchs, and H. Gemusæus. The text in this edition (which, like the preceding, contains neither Latin translation, notes, nor indices) is improved by the collation of Greek MSS. and the examination of the Latin versions: the only additional work of Galen's published in this edition is a Latin translation of the treatise De Ossibus. It is a handsome book, and frequently to be met with.

A very useful and neat edition, in thirteen vols. fol., was printed at Paris, and bears the date of 1679. It contains the whole of the works of Hippocrates and Galen, mixed up together, and divided into thirteen classes, according to the subject-matter. This vast work was undertaken by René Chartier (Renatus Chartierius), a French physician, who published in 1633 (when he had already passed his sixtieth year) a programme, entitled, Index Operum Galeni quae Latinis duntaxat Typis in Lucem edita sunt, &c., begging the loan of such Greek MSS. as he had not an opportunity of examining in the public libraries of Paris. The first volume appeared in 1639; but Chartier, after impoverishing himself, died in 1654, before the work was completed: the last four volumes were published after his death, at the expense of his son-in-law, and the whole work was at length finished in 1679, forty years after it had been commenced. This edition is in every respect superior to those that had preceded it, and in some points to that which has followed it. It contains a Latin translation, and a few notes, and various readings: the text is divided into chapters, and is much improved by the collation of MSS.; it contains several treatises in Greek and Latin not included in the preceding editions (especially De Humoribus, De Ossibus, De Septimestri Partu, De Fœtibus, De Clysteribus), several others, much enlarged by the insertion of omitted passages (especially De Usu Partium, Definitiones Medicæ, De Comale secundum Hippocratem, De Praenotione), and a large collection of fragments of Galen's lost works, extracted from various Greek and Latin writers.

It is, however, very far from what it might and ought to have been, and its critical merits are very lightly esteemed. M. Villiers published a criticism on this edition, entitled, "Lettre sur l'Édition Grecque et Latine des Oeuvres d'Hippocrate et de Galène," Paris, 1776, 4to.

The latest and most commodious edition is that of C. G. Kühn, who with extraordinary boldness, at the age of sixty-four, and at a time when the old medical authors were more neglected than they are at present, ventured to put forth a specimen and a prospectus of a work so vast, that any one in the prime of life, and strength, and leisure, might well shrink from the undertaking. As this seems to be the most proper place for giving an account of Kühn's collection, it may be stated that he designed to publish no less than a complete edition of all the Greek medical authors whose writings are still extant; a work far too extensive for any single man to have undertaken, and which (as might have been expected) still remains unfinished. Kühn, however, not only found a publisher rich and liberal enough to undertake the risk and expense of such a work, but actually lived to see his collection comprehend the entire works of Galen, Hippocrates, Aretæus, and Dioscorides, in twenty-eight thick 8vo. volumes, consisting each of about eight hundred pages, and of which all but three were edited by himself. But while it is thankfully acknowledged that Kühn did good service to the ancient medical writers by republishing their works in a commodious form, yet at the same time it must be confessed that the real critical merits of his Collection as a whole are very small. In 1818 he published Galen's little work De Optimo Docendi Genere, Lips. 8vo., Greek and Latin, as a specimen of his projected design, and in 1821 the first volume of his works appeared. The edition consists of twenty 8vo. volumes (divided into twenty-two parts), of which the last contains an Index, made by F. W. Assmann, and was published in 1833. The first volume contains Ackermann's Notitia Literaria Galeni, extracted from the fifth volume of the new edition of Fabricius's Bibliotheca Graeca, and somewhat improved and enlarged by Kühn. For the correction of the Greek text little or nothing has been done except in the case of a few particular treatises, and all Chartier's notes and various readings are omitted. Kühn has likewise left out many of the spurious works contained in Chartier's edition, as also the Fragments, and those books which are extant only in Latin; but, on the other hand, he has published for the first time the Greek text of the treatise De Musculorum Dissectione, the Synopsis Librorum de Pulsiu, and the commentary on Hippocrates De Humoribus. Upon the whole, the writings of Galen are still in a very corrupt and unsatisfactory state, and it is universally acknowledged that a new and critical edition is much wanted.

The project of a new edition of Galen's works has been entertained by several persons, particularly by Caspar Hofmann and Theodore Goulstone in the seventeenth century. The latter prepared several of Galen's smaller works for the press, which were published in one volume 4to. Lond. 1640, after his death, by Thom. Gataker. Hofmann made very extensive preparations for his task, and published a copious and valuable commentary on the treatise De Usu Partium. His MS. notes, amounting to twenty-seven volumes in folio, are said to have come into the possession of Dr. Askew; they do not, however, appear in the catalogue of his sale, nor has the writer been able to discover whether they are still in existence; for while the continental physicians universally believe them to be still somewhere in England, no one in this country to whom he has applied knows any thing about them.

Galen's extant works have been classified in various ways. In the old edition of his Bibliotheca Græca, Fabricius enumerated them in alphabetical order, which perhaps for convenience of reference is as useful a mode as any. Ackermann in the new edition of Fabricius has mentioned them, as far as possible, in chronological order; which is much less practically useful than the alphabetical arrangement (inasmuch as the difficulty of finding the account of any particular treatise is very much increased), but which, if it could be ascertained completely and certainly, would be a far more natural and interesting one. In most of the editions of his works, the treatises are arranged in classes according to the subject-matter, which, upon the whole, seems to be the mode most suitable for the present work. The number and contents of the different classes vary (as might be expected) according to the judgment of different editors, and the classification which the writer has adopted does not exactly agree with any of the preceding ones. The treatises in each class will, as far as possible, be arranged chronologically, thus combining, in some degree, the advantage of Ackermann's arrangement; while the number of works contained in each class will not generally be so great as to occasion much inconvenience from their not being enumerated alphabetically. As Kühn's edition of Galen (which is likely to be the one most in use for many years to come) extends to twenty-one volumes, it has been thought useful to mention in which of these each treatise is to be found.

III. WORKS ON ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY.

1. Περί Κράσεως, De Temperamentis, in three books (vol. i. ed. Kühn). For the editions of each separate treatise, and the commentaries that have been published, see Choulant's Handbuch der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, Haller's Bibliotheca, and Ackermann's Historia Litteraria, prefixed to Kühn's edition. The best account of the Arabic, Syriac, Armenian, and Persian translations, will be found in J. G. Wenrich's treatise De Auctorum Græcorum Versionibus et Commentariis Syriacis, Arabicis, &c. Lips. 1842. 8vo. 2. Περί Μελαίνης Χολῆς, De Atra Bile (vol. v.). 3. Περί Δυνάμεων Φυσικῶν, De Facultatibus Naturalibus, in three books (vol. ii.). 4. Περί Ανατομικῶν Ἐγχειρήσεων, De Anatomis Administrationibus (vol. ii.). This is Galen's principal anatomical work, and consisted originally of fifteen books, the subject of each of which is mentioned by himself. (De Libr. Propr. c. 3, vol. xix. p. 24, 25.) The six last books, and about two-thirds of the ninth, which are not extant either in the original Greek or in any Latin translation (as far as the writer is aware), are preserved in an Arabic version, of which there are two copies in the Bodleian library at Oxford (Uri, Catal. MSS. Orient. Bibl. Bodl. p. 135, codd. 567, 570), and apparently in no other European library.

The latter of these MSS. seems to have been copied from the former by Jac. Goliuss, and contains only the six last books; the other contains the whole work. (See London Medical Gazette for 1844, 1845, p. 329.) There were more than one edition of this treatise; the first was written during Galen's first visit to Rome, soon after the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius, about A. D. 164; the last some time before the same emperor's death, A. D. 180. (Galen, De Administr. Anat. i. 1, vol. ii. p. 215, &c.) 5. Περί Ὁστέων τοῖς Εἰσαγομένους, De Ossibus ad Tirones (vol. ii.). The work contains a tolerably accurate account of the bones, though in some parts it appears clearly that he was describing the skeleton of the ape. 6. Περί Φλεβῶν καὶ Ἀρτηριῶν Ἀνατομῆς, De Venarum et Arteriarum Dissectione (vol. ii.). 7. Περί Νεύρων Ἀνατομῆς, De Nervorum Dissectione (vol. ii.). 8. Περί Μυῶν Ἀνατομῆς, De Musculorum Dissectione (vol. xviii. pt. 2.). 9. Περί Μήτρας Ἀνατομῆς, De Uteri Dissectione (vol. ii.). 10. Εἰ κατὰ Φθῶν ἐν Ἀρτηρίᾳ Αἷμα περιέχεται, An in Arterii secundum Naturam Sanguis continetur (vol. iv.). 11. Περί Μυῶν Κινήσεως, De Musculorum Motu (vol. iv.). 12. Περί Σπέρματος, De Semine (vol. iv.). 13. Περί Χρῆλας τῶν ἐν Ἀνθρώπῳ Σώματι Μορίων, De Usu Partium Corporis Humani, in seventeen books (vols. iii. and iv.). This is Galen's principal physiological work, and was probably begun about A. D. 165 (Gal. De Libr. Propr. c. 2, vol. xix. p. 15, 16), and finished after the year 170. (Ibid. p. 20.) It is no less admirable for the deep religious feeling with which it is written, than for the scientific knowledge and acuteness displayed in it; and is altogether a noble work. Theophilus Protospatharius published a sort of abridgment of his work under the title Περί τῆς τοῦ Ἀνθρώπου Κατασκευῆς, De Corporis Humani Fabrica. [THEOPHILUS PROTOSPATARIUS.] 14. Περί Ὁσφρήσεως Ὀργάνων, De Odoratus Instrumento (vol. ii.). 15. Περί Χρῆλας Ἀναπνοῆς, De Usu Respirationis (vol. iv.). 16. Περί Χρῆλας Σφύγγων, De Usu Pulsuum (vol. v.). His other works on the pulse, which treat rather of its use in diagnosis, are mentioned in Class VI. 17. Ὅτι τὰ τῆς Ψυχῆς Ἡθῆ ταις τοῦ Σώματος Κράσεσιν ἔκτεται, Quod Animi Mores Corporis Temperamenta sequuntur (vol. iv.). 18. Περί Κουμμένων Διαπλάσεως, De Foetuum Formatione (vol. iv.). 19. Εἰ Ζῶον τὸ κατὰ Γαστρίος, An Animal vid, quod est in Utero (vol. xix.); generally considered to be spurious. 20. De Anatomia Vitorum (vol. iv. ed. Chart.); spurious. 21. De Compagine Membrorum, sive De Natura Humana (vol. v. ed. Chart.); spurious. 22. De Natura et Ordine cujuslibet Corporis (vol. v. ed. Chart.); spurious. 23. De Motibus Manifestis et Obscuris (vol. v. ed. Chart.), not written by Galen, but compiled from his writings. 24. Περί Χυμῶν, De Humoribus (vol. xix.); spurious.

Though Galen's celebrity is by no means founded entirely on his anatomical and physiological works, yet it was to these branches of medical science that he did most real service, and it is this class of his writings that is most truly valuable. A very interesting and accurate "Cursory Analysis of the Works of Galen, so far as they relate to Anatomy and Physiology," by Dr. Kidd, is inserted in the sixth volume of the "Transactions of the Provincial Medical and Surgical Association" (Lond. 1838), to which we must refer our readers

Galen's familiarity with practical anatomy is attested by numerous passages in his writings. In the examination, for instance, of the blood-vessels of the liver, he directs you to insert a probe into the vena portae, and from thence into any of its several larger ramifications; then gently advancing the probe further and further, to dissect down to it. And thus, he says, you may trace the minutest branches; removing with the knife the intermediate substance, called by Erasistratus the paracystima (De Anatol. Administr. vi. 11, vol. ii. p. 575). Again, he notices what every one has often experienced in dissection, the occasional convenience of dividing the cellular membrane, either by the finger or the handle of the scalpel (ibid. p. 476); and in describing the use of the blow-pipe and various other instruments and contrivances employed in anatomical examinations, he continually introduces you, as it were, into the dissecting room itself (ibid. p. 476, 668, 716). As an instance of the boldness and extent of his experimental anatomy, it may be mentioned, that, after observing that although a ligature on the inguinal or axillary artery causes the pulse to cease in the leg or in the arm, yet the experiment is not seriously injurious to the animal on which it is made, he adds that even the carotid arteries may be tied with impunity. (De Usu Puls. c. 1. vol. v. p. 150.) And the habitual accuracy of his observation is evinced when he corrects the error of those experimentalists, who, omitting to separate the contiguous nerves in tying the carotids, supposed that the consequent loss of voice depended on the compression of those arteries, and not on that of the accompanying nerves. (De Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. ii. 6. vol. v. p. 266; Dr. Kidd's Curry Analysis, &c.)

The question has often been discussed, whether Galen derived his anatomical knowledge from dissecting a human body, or that of some other animal. The writer is not aware of any passage in his writings in which it is distinctly stated that he dissected human bodies; while the numerous passages in which he recommends the dissection of apes, bears, goats, and other animals, would seem indirectly to prove that human bodies were seldom or never used for that purpose. (See particularly De Anat. Administr. iii. 5. vol. ii. 384; De Musc. Dimet. c. 1. vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 930. See also Rufus Ephes. De Corp. Hum. Part. Appellat. i. p. 33; Theophilus, De Corp. Hum. Fabr. v. 11. § 20.) In one passage, however, he mentions, as something extraordinary, that those physicians who attended the emperor M. Aurelius in his wars against the Germans had an opportunity of dissecting the bodies of the barbarians. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iii. 2. vol. viii. p. 604.)

On Galen's opinions respecting the nervous system there is a very complete and interesting thesis by C. V. Daremberg, Paris, 1841, 4to., entitled "Exposition des Connaissances de Galien, sur l'Anatomie, la Physiologie, et la Pathologie du Système Nerveux."

IV. WORKS ON DIETETICS AND HYGIENE.

25. Περὶ Ἀρίστης Κατασκευῆς τοῦ Σώματος ἡμῶν, De Optima Corporis nostri Constitutione (vol. iv.). 26. Περὶ Ἐδεῖας, De Bono Habitu (vol. iv.). 27. Πότερον Ἰατρικῆς, ἢ Γυμναστικῆς ἔστι τὸ Ὑγιεῖν, Utrum Medicinæ sit, vel Gymnasticæ Hygieine (vol. v.). 28. De Attenuante Victus Ratione (vol. vi. ed. Chart.). 29. Ὑγιεῖν, De Sanitate Tuenda (vol. vi.). One of Galen's best works. 30. Περὶ Τροφῶν Δυνάμεως, De Alimentorum Facultatibus (vol. vi.). 31. Περὶ Εἰσχυμῶν καὶ Κακοχυμῶν Τροφῶν, De Probis et Prævis Alimentorum Succis (vol. vi.). 32. Περὶ Πιτυαίνης, De Pituita (vol. vi.). 33. Περὶ τοῦ διὰ Μυκρῆς Σφαλπας Γυμνασίου, De Parvas Pila Exercitio (vol. v.). 34. De Dissolutione Continua, sive De Alimentorum Facultatibus (vol. vi. ed. Chart.).

In Galen's directions respecting both food and the means of preserving health, we find many which are erroneous, and many others which, from the difference of climate and manners, are totally inapplicable to us; but, if allowance be made for these points, most of the rest of his observations will probably be admitted to be very judicious and useful. Like the rest of the ancient medical writers, and in accordance with the habits of his countrymen, he lays great stress on different species of gymnastic exercises, and especially eulogizes hunting, as being an excellent exercise to the body, and an agreeable recreation to the mind. (De Parva Pila, vol. v. c. 1, p. 900.) He particularly recommends the cold bath to persons in the prime of life, and during the summer season. With respect to the regimen of old persons, he says, that as old age is cold and dry, it is to be corrected by diluents and calefacients, such as hot baths of sweet waters, drinking wine, and taking such food as is moistening and calefacient. He strenuously defends the practice of allowing old persons to take wine, and gives a circumstantial account of the Greek and Roman wines best adapted to them. He also approves of their taking three meals in the day (while to other persons he allows only two), and recommends the bath to be used before dinner, which should consist of sea-fish.

Of all kinds of animal food pork was almost universally esteemed by the ancients as the best; and Galen speaks of it in terms of the strongest approbation. He says that the athletes, if for one day presented with the same bulk of any other article of food, immediately experienced a diminution of strength; and that, if the change of diet was persisted in for several days, they fell off in flesh. (De Aliment. Facult. iii. 2. vol. vi. p. 661.)

Many other curious extracts from Galen's works on this subject may be found in Mr. Adams's Commentary on the first book of Paulus Aegineta, from which the preceding remarks have been abridged.

V. WORKS ON PATHOLOGY.

35. Περὶ Ἀνωμαλῶν Δυσκρασιῶν, De Inaequali Intemperie (vol. vii.). 36. Περὶ Δυσκρινίας, De Difficili Respiratione (vol. vii.). 37. Περὶ Πληθύνσεως, De Plenitudine (vol. vii.). 38. Περὶ τῶν παρὰ φύσιν Ὁγκῶν, De Tumoribus præter Naturam (vol. vii.). 39. Περὶ Τρέμων, καὶ Πλασμῶν, καὶ Σπασμῶν, καὶ Πύθων, De Tremore, Palpitatione, Convulsione, et Rigore (vol. vii.). 40. Περὶ τῶν Ὁκῶν τοῦ Νοσήματος Καρπῶν, De Totius Morbi Temporibus (vol. vii.); of doubtful genuineness.

Much pathological matter may be found in various other parts of Galen's writings, and perhaps some of the treatises noticed under the following head might with equal propriety have been classed under the present.

The pathology of Galen, says Dr. Bostock, was much more imperfect than his physiology, for in this department he was left to follow the bent of his speculative genius almost without control. He adopts, as the foundation of his theory, the doctrine of the four elements, and, like Hippocrates, he supposes that the fluids are the primary seat of disease. But in the application of this doctrine he introduces so many minute subdivisions that he may be regarded as the inventor of the theory of the Humorists, which was so generally adopted in the schools of medicine.

VI. WORKS ON DIAGNOSIS AND SEMEIOLOGY.

41. Περὶ τῶν Πεπορθότων Τόπων, De Locis Affectis, in six books (vol. viii.); sometimes quoted by the title Διαγνωστικῆς, Diagnostica. This is preferred by Haller to any of Galen's works, and has always been considered one of the most valuable and elaborate, as it was written when he was mature in judgment and experience. 42. Περὶ Διαφορᾶς Πυρετῶν, De Differentiis Febrium (vol. vii.). 43. Περὶ τῶν ἐν ταῖς Νόσοις Καρῶν, De Morborum Temporibus (vol. vii.). 44. Περὶ τῶν Σφρυγμῶν τοῖς Εἰσαγόμενοις, De Pulsibus ad Tirones (vol. viii.). 45. Περὶ Διαφορᾶς Σφρυγμῶν, De Differentia Pulsuum (vol. viii.). 46. Περὶ Διαγνώσεως Σφρυγμῶν, De Dignoscendis Pulsibus (vol. viii.). 47. Περὶ τῶν ἐν τοῖς Σφρυγμοῖς Αἰτίων, De Causis Pulsuum, (vol. ix.). 48. Περὶ Προγνώσεως Σφρυγμῶν, De Praesagitione ex Pulsibus, (vol. ix.). These last four works are sometimes considered as four parts of one large treatise. 49. Σύνολος περὶ Σφρυγμῶν Ἰδίας Πραγματείας, Synopsis Librorum suorum de Pulsibus (vol. ix.). 50. Περὶ Κρίσεων Ἡμερῶν, De Criticis Diebus (vel Decretoriis) (vol. ix.). 51. Περὶ Κρίσεων, De Crisibus (vol. ix.). 52. De Causis Procatartecis (vol. vii. ed. Chart.). 53. Περὶ Διαφορᾶς Νοσημάτων, De Differentia Morborum (vol. vi.). 54. Περὶ τῶν ἐν τοῖς Νοσήμασι Αἰτίων, De Morborum Causis (vol. vii.). 55. Περὶ Συμπτωμάτων Διαφορᾶς, De Symptomatum Differentia (vol. vii.). 56. Περὶ Αἰτίων Συμπτωμάτων, De Causis Symptomatum, in three books (vol. vii.). This and the three preceding treatises are intimately connected together, and are merely the different parts of one large work, as they are considered in some editions of Galen's writings. 57. Πῶς Δεῖ Ἐξελέγχειν τοὺς Προσποιομένους Νοσέειν, Quomodo sint Deprehendendi Morbum Simulantes (vol. xix.). 58. Περὶ τῆς ἐξ Ἑννικίων Διαγνώσεως, De Dignotione ex Insomniis (vol. vi.). 59. Περὶ τοῦ Προγνώσκειν πρὸς Ἐπιγέννην, De Praenotione ad Erigenem (sive Posthumum) (vol. xiv.). 60. Περὶ Τύπων, De Typis (vol. vii.); of rather doubtful genuineness. 61. Πρὸς τοὺς περὶ Τύπων Γράψαντας, ἢ περὶ Περίστων, Adversus eos qui de Typis scripserunt, vel de Periotis (vol. vii.); of doubtful genuineness. 62. Περὶ Προγνώσεως, De Praenotione (vol. xix.); spurious. 63. Πρόγνῳσις Πειραμένη καὶ Παναλήθης, Praesagitio Experti et omnino Vera (vol. xix.); spurious. 64. Περὶ Κατακλίσεως Προγνώστικῆς ἐκ τῆς Μαθηματικῆς Ἐπιστήμης, Prognostica de Decubitu ex Mathematica Scientia (vol. xix.); spurious. 65. Περὶ Οὐρῶν, De Urinis (vol. xix.); of doubtful genuineness. 66. Περὶ Οὐρῶν ἐν Συντόμῳ, De Urinis Compendium (vol. xix.); spurious. 67. Περὶ Οὐρῶν ἐκ τῶν Ἱπποκράτους καὶ Γαληνοῦ, καὶ ἄλλων τινῶν, De Urinis ex Hippocrate,

Galen, et aliis quibusdam (vol. xix.). 68. Περὶ Σφρυγμῶν πρὸς Ἀντόνιον, De Pulsibus ad Antonium (vol. xix.); spurious. 69. Compendium Pulsuum (vol. viii. ed. Chart.); spurious.

It would be difficult to give anything like an analysis of Galen's mode of discovering the nature of diseases, and of forming his prognosis, in which his skill and success were so great that he ventured to assert that, by the assistance of the Deity, he had never been wrong. (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. I." ii. 20. vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 383.)

One of his chief sources of prognosis was derived from the Critical Days, in which doctrine he reposes such confidence that he affirms, that, by a proper observance of them, the physician may be able to prognosticate the very hour when a fever will terminate. He believed (as did most of the ancient authorities) that the critical days are influenced by the moon. Another very important element in his diagnosis and prognosis was afforded by the Pulse, on which subject, as the works of his predecessors are no longer extant, he may be considered as the first and greatest authority,—we might almost say our sole authority, for all subsequent writers were content to adopt his system without the slightest alteration. According to Galen, the pulse consists of four parts, of a diastole and a systole, with two intervals of rest, one after the diastole before the systole, and the other after the systole before the diastole. He maintained that by practice and attention all these parts can be distinguished (De Dignosc. Puls. iii. 3. vol. viii. p. 902, &c.); but his system is so complicated and subtle that it would be hardly possible to make it intelligible to the reader without going to greater lengths than can here be allowed. A full account of it is given by Mr. Adams in his Commentary on Paulus Aegineta (ii. 12), to which work in this, as in several other instances, the present article is much indebted.

VII. WORKS ON PHARMACY AND MATERIA MEDICA.

70. Περὶ Κράσεως καὶ Δυνάμεως τῶν Ἀπλῶν Φαρμάκων, De Temperamentis et Facultatibus Simplicium Medicamentorum, in eleven books (vols. xi. xii.). Galen recommends his readers to study the third book of his work De Temperamentis, which treats of the temperaments of drugs, before they begin to read this treatise. (Ars Med. c. 37, vol. i. p. 407.) 71. Περὶ Συνθέσεως Φαρμάκων τῶν κατὰ Τόπους, De Compositione Medicamentorum secundum Locos (vols. xii. xiii.). 72. Περὶ Συνθέσεως Φαρμάκων τῶν κατὰ Γέννην, De Compositione Medicamentorum secundum Genera (vol. xiii.). This and the preceding treatise may be considered as two parts of one large work. 73. Περὶ Ἀντιδότων, De Antidotis (vol. xiv.). This is one of Galen's last works, and written in the reign of the emperor Severus, about the year 200. 74. Περὶ Εὐνοπιστῶν, De Remedii facile Parabitilis (vol. xiv.). The third part of this work is undoubtedly spurious. 75. Περὶ τῆς ὀφθαλμικῆς πρὸς Πιῶνα, De Theriaca ad Pisonem (vol. xiv.). This work is quoted as genuine by Aëtius, Paulus Aegineta, and the Arabic physicians; but is considered to be of doubtful authority by some modern critics. This condemnation, however, seems to the writer to rest on insufficient grounds, as, on a cursory examination of the book, he has found nothing to prove that Galen was not the writer; whereas several passages seem to agree exactly with the circumstances of his life; as, for instance, where he speaks of what he had himself seen at Alexandria (c. 8. p. 237.) Compare also the mention of Demetrius (c. 12. p. 261.) with what is said of him (De Antid. i. l. vol. xiv. p. 4.) The work (unless it be a wilful forgery, which is not likely) was certainly written by a contemporary of Galen, and in fact between the years 199—211, as the author mentions (c. 2. p. 217) two emperors as reigning at the time, which can only refer to Severus and Caracalla. Upon the whole, as the work has not been proved to belong to any other author, and as there is both external and internal evidence in its favour, the writer is inclined to think its genuineness at least as probable as its spuriousness; and the question is of some importance, because (as has been mentioned above), if Galen really did write the book, he must have lived some years later than is commonly supposed. 76. Περὶ τῆς Θηριακῆς πρὸς Παμφίλιον, De Teriaca ad Pamphilum (vol. xiv.). This is also considered by some critics to be of doubtful genuineness, but (in the writer's opinion) without sufficient reason, as mention is made in it of Galen's visiting Rome (p. 295.), and of his tutor, Aelianus Meccius (p. 299.). 77. Liber Secretorum ad Montanum (vol. x. ed. Chart.), spurious. 78. De Medicinis Expertis (vol. x. ed. Chart.), spurious. 79. Περὶ Μίτρων καὶ Σταθμῶν Διδασκαλία, De Pondicibus et Mensuris Doctrina (vol. xii.), spurious. 80. Περὶ Ἀντεμελλομένων, De Succocanis (vol. xii.), spurious. 81. De Simplicibus Medicamentis ad Paternianum (vol. xiii. ed. Chart.), spurious. 82. De Plantis (vol. xiii. ed. Chart.), spurious. 83. De Virtute Centaurææ (vol. xiii. ed. Chart.), spurious. 84. De Clysteribus (vol. xiii. ed. Chart.), spurious. 85. De Cathartics (ap. Spuria, in ed. Junt.), spurious.

In Materia Medica Galen's authority was not so high as that of Dioscorides: he placed implicit faith in amulets, and is supposed by Cullen to be the author of the anodyne necklace, which was so long famous in England. In Galen's works, De Compositionibus Medicamentorum secundum Genera and De Compos. Medicamentorum secundum Locos, we have a large collection of compound medicines; and the number of compositions for the same disease, and the number of ingredients in most of the compositions, sufficiently show the great want of discernment in the nature of medicines that was then felt. This want of discernment is also very apparent in Galen himself; for, although he frequently expresses his own opinion, yet certainly it would appear that from his own observation or experience he had not arrived at any nice judgment in the subject of Materia Medica, as these works are almost entirely copied from the writings of Andromachus, Archigenes, Asclepiades Pharmacion, Dioscorides, and a number of other authors who had gone before him. After the time of Galen no change in the plan of the Materia Medica was made by any of the Greek physicians; for, although in Aëtius, Oribasius, and some others, there are large compilations on the subject, yet they are nothing more than compilations, conspicuous for the same imperfections which are so remarkable in the writings of Galen himself. See Cullen's "Treatise of the Materia Medica."

VIII. WORKS ON THERAPEUTICS, INCLUDING SURGERY.

86. Θεραπευτικὴ Μέθοδος, Medendi Methodus, (vol. x.) This is one of Galen's most valuable and celebrated works, and was written when he was advanced in years. 87. Τὰ πρὸς Γλαύκωνα Θεραπευτικά, Ad Glaucōnem de Medendi Methodo (vol. xi.). 88. Περὶ Φλεβοτομίας πρὸς Ἐρασιστράτον, De Venas Sectione, adversus Erasistratum (vol. xi.). 89. Περὶ Φλεβοτομίας πρὸς Ἐρασιστράτου τοὺς ἐν Ῥώμῃ, De Venas Sectione adversus Erasistrateos Romae degentes (vol. xi.). 90. Περὶ Φλεβοτομίας Θεραπευτικὴν Βίβλιον, De Curandi Ratione per Venas Sectionem (vol. xi.). 91. Περὶ Μαρασμοῦ, De Marasmo (vol. vii.). 92. Τῷ Ἐπιληπτικῷ Παύλῳ Ὑποθήκη, Pro Puero Epileptico Consilium (vol. xi.). 93. Περὶ Βέλλων, Ἀντισπασμῶν, Σικκας, Ἐργαζάξεως, καὶ Κατασχεσμῶν, De Hirudinibus, Revulsionē, Cucurbitula, Incisione et Scarificatione (vol. xi.). 94. Περὶ τῶν καθαρῶν Φαρμάκων Ὀνύμκεως, De Purgantium Medicamentorum Facultate (vol. xi.), of doubtful genuineness. 95. Περὶ τῶν Ἐπιδέσμων, De Fasciis (vol. xviii. pt. i.), of very doubtful genuineness. 96. Περὶ Φλεβοτομίας, De Venas Sectione (vol. xix.), spurious. 97. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Νεφροῖς Παθῶν Διαγνώσεις καὶ Θεραπείας, De Renum Affectuum Dignatione et Curatione (vol. xix.), spurious. 98. De Colico Dolorē (vol. x. ed. Chart.), spurious. 99. Introductorius Liber Varias Morborum Curas complectens, spurious. 100. De Cura Icteri (vol. x. ed. Chart.), spurious. 101. Περὶ Μελαγχολίας ἐκ τῶν Γαληνῶν, καὶ Ρούφου, καὶ ἄλλων τινῶν, De Melancholia ex Galeno, Rufo, et aliis quibusdam (vol. xix.). 102. De Oculis (vol. xi. ed. Chart.), spurious. 103. De Gynaceis, i. e. De Passionibus Mulierum (vol. vii. ed. Chart.), spurious. 104. De Cura Lapidis (vol. x. ed. Chart.), spurious. 105. De Dynamidiis (vol. x. ed. Chart.), spurious. 106. Τίνας δεῖ ἐκκαθαίρειν, καὶ ποιοῖς καθαρτηρίοις, καὶ πότε, Quos quibus Cathartics Medicamentis, et quando purgare oporteat (vol. x. ed. Chart.).

To give a complete account of Galen's system of Therapeutics would be in this place impracticable; some remarks on the general principles by which he was guided is all that can be here attempted. He did not depend solely upon experience, like the Empirici, nor on mere theory, but endeavoured judiciously to combine the advantages of both methods. His practice is based on the two fundamental maxims: 1. That disease is something contrary to nature, and is to be overcome by that which is contrary to the disease itself; and 2. That nature is to be preserved by that which has relation with nature. From these two maxims arise two general indications of treatment; the one taken from the affection contrary to nature, which affection requires to be overcome; the other from the strength and natural constitution of the body, which requires to be preserved. As a disease cannot be entirely overcome as long as its cause exists, this is (if possible) to be in the first place removed; the symptoms, in general, not requiring any particular treatment, because they will disappear with the disease on which they depend. The strength of the patient is to be considered before we proceed to the treatment; and when this is much reduced, we shall often be forced to omit the exhibition of a remedy which would otherwise have been required by the nature of the disease. He appears to have been rather bold in the use of the lancet, and (as we have seen above, § 89.) thought it necessary to defend his custom in this respect against the followers of Erasistratus then practising at Rome. In cases of emergency he did not hesitate to perform this operation himself; in general, however, though he had practised surgery at Pergamus, when at Rome he followed the custom of the physicians in that city, and abstained from surgical operations. (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Fract." iii. 21. vol. xviii. pt. ii. p. 567, &c.; De Meth. Med. vi. 6. vol. x. p. 454.) Accordingly, in surgery he has never been considered so high an authority as several of the other old medical writers.

IX. COMMENTARIES ON HIPPOCRATES, &c.

107. "Ὅτι Ἀριστος Ἰατρός καὶ Φιλόσοφος, Quod Optimus Medicus sit quoque Philosophus (vol. i.). This little work, which might at first sight seem rather to belong to the class of philosophical writings, is included in this class, because Galen himself mentions it as one of those which he wrote in defence and explanation of Hippocrates. (De Libr. Propr. c. 6, vol. xix. p. 37.) 108. Περὶ τῶν κατ' Ἱπποκράτην Στοιχείων, De Elementis secundum Hippocratem (vol. i.). 109. Τῶν Ἱπποκράτους Γνωστῶν Ἑξηγήσεις, Hippocratis Dictionum Exotericarum Explicatio (vol. xix.). 110. Περὶ Ἑπταμήνου Βρεφῶν, De Septimestri Partu (vol. v. ed. Chart.). 111. Commentary on De Natura Humani (vol. xv.). 112. On De Salubri Victus Ratione (vol. xv.). 113. On De Aëre, Aquæ, et Locis (vol. vi. ed. Chart.). 114. On De Alimento (vol. xv.). 115. On De Humoribus (vol. xvi.). 116. On the Prognosticon (vol. xviii. pt. ii.). 117. On the first book of the Draedictiones (or Prorrhetica) (vol. xvi.). 118. On the first book De Morbis Popularibus (vol. xvii. pt. i.). 119. On the second book De Morbis Popularibus (vol. xvii. pt. i.). 120. On the third book De Morbis Popularibus (vol. xvii. pt. i.). 121. On the sixth book De Morbis Popularibus (vol. xvii. pta. i. and ii.). 122. On the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, in seven books (vols. xvii. pt. ii., and xviii. pt. i.). 123. Πρὸς Λύκον, Adversus Lycum (vol. xviii. pt. i.). A work in defence of one of the Aphorisms of Hippocrates. (Aphor. i. 14. vol. iii. p. 710.) 124. Πρὸς τὰ Ἀντειρημένα τοῖς Ἱπποκράτους Ἀφορισμοῖς ὑπὸ Ἰουλιανοῦ, Adversus ea quæ a Juliano in Hippocratis Aphorismos dicta sunt (vol. xviii. pt. i.). 125. Commentary on Hippocrates, De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis (vol. xv.). 126. On De Officina Medici (vol. xviii. pt. ii.). 127. On De Fracturis (vol. xviii. pt. ii.). 128. On De Articulis (vol. xviii. pt. i.). 129. Περὶ τοῦ παρ' Ἱπποκράτους Κώματος, De Comate secundum Hippocratem (vol. vii.); of doubtful genuineness. 130. Περὶ τῆς κατὰ τὸν Ἱπποκράτην Διαίτης ἐν τῶν Ὁξέων Νοσημάτων, De Victus Ratione in Morbis Acutis secundum Hippocratem (vol. xix.); of doubtful genuineness.

Few persons have ever been so well qualified to illustrate and explain the writings of Hippocrates as Galen; both from his unfeigned (though not indiscriminate) admiration for his works, and also from the time in which he lived, and from his own intellectual qualities. Accordingly, his Commentaries have always been considered a most valuable assistance in understanding the Hippocratic writings, and in old times served as a treasure of historical, grammatical, and medical criticism, from which succeeding annotators, Greek, Latin, and Arabic, borrowed freely. He wrote several other works relating to Hippocrates, some literary and grammatical, and others medical, which are now lost, and from which much information respecting the Hippocratic collection might have been expected. Those which still remain are chiefly medical, but contain at the same time certain philological details relating to the various readings found in the different MSS., and the explanations of the obscure words and passages given by former commentators. His own critical judgment (as far as we can form an opinion) appears to have been sound and judicious. He professes to preserve the old readings even when more difficult than the more modern, and endeavours to explain them, and never to have recourse to conjecture when he could avoid it (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." i. præf. vol. xvii. pt. i. p. 794, ii. 49, ibid. p. 1005). M. Littré, in the Introduction to his edition of Hippocrates (vol. i. p. 121), considers his chief fault to consist not so much in his prolixity as in his desire to support his own theories by the help of the writings of Hippocrates; thus neglecting, in these works, the theories which do not agree with his own, and unduly exalting those which (like the doctrine of the four humours) form the basis of his own system.

X. PHILOSOPHICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

131. Περὶ Ἀλρέσεων τοῖς Εἰσαγωγικοῖς, De Sectis ad Tyrones, or ad eos qui introducuntur (vol. i.). 132. Πρὸς Θρασύβουλον περὶ Ἀρίστης Ἀλρέσεως, De Optima Secta ad Thrasymbolum (vol. i.). 133. Περὶ Ἀρίστης Διδασκαλίας, De Optima Doctrina (vol. i.). 134. Περὶ τῶν παρὰ τὴν Λέξιν Σωφισμάτων, De Sophismatibus (vel Captationibus) perus Dictionem (vol. xiv.). 135. Προπρεπτικός λόγος ἐπὶ τὰς Τέχνας, Oratio Sæuaria ad Artes (vol. i.). 136. Πρὸς Πατρόφιλον περὶ Συστάσεως Ἰατρικῆς, De Constitutione Artis Medicæ ad Patrophilum (vol. i.). 137. Περὶ τῶν Ἱπποκράτους καὶ Πλάτωνος Δογμάτων, De Hippocratis et Platonis Doctrinis (vol. v.). This is a philosophical and controversial work, directed against Chrysippus, and others of the old philosophers, and containing at the same time much physiological matter. It was begun probably about a. d. 165, and finished about the year 170. 138. Τέχνη Ἰατρικὴ, Artes Medica (vol. i.). It is often called in old editions and MSS. Artes Parva, to distinguish it from Galen's longer work, De Methodo Medendi; and this title is not unfrequently corrupted into Microtechni, Microtegni, Tegne, &c. This is perhaps the most celebrated of all Galen's works, and was commonly used as a text-book in the middle ages. The number of Latin editions and commentaries is very great. 139. Περὶ τῶν Ἰδίων Βιβλίων, De Libris Propriis (vol. xix.). 140. Περὶ τῆς Τάξεως τῶν Ἰδίων Βιβλίων, De Ordine Librorum Propriorum (vol. xix.). 141. Περὶ Διαγνώσεως καὶ Θεραπείας τῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκάστου Ψυχῇ Ἰδίων Παθῶν, De Dignotione et Curatione Propriorum cuiusque Animæ Affectuum (vol. v.). 142. Περὶ Διαγνώσεως καὶ Θεραπείας τῶν ἐν τῇ ἐκάστου Ψυχῇ Ἀμαρτημάτων, De Dignotione et Curatione cuiusque Animæ Peccatorum (vol. v.). 143. Εἰσαγωγή, ἢ Ἰατρὸς, Introductio, seu Medicus (vol. xiv.); of doubtful genuinenea. 144. De Subfiguratione Empirica (vol. ii. ed. Chart.). 145. Περὶ Ἐθῶν, De Consecutionibus (vol. vi. ed. Chart.); of doubtful genuineness. 146. Περὶ Φαρμάκων Ἱστορίας, De Historia Pharmacopæia (vol. xix.). This is Plutarch's work De Philosophorum Decretis, with a few trifling alterations. 147. "Ὅροι ἱατρικῶν, Definitiones Medicæ (vol. xix.); of doubtful genuineness. 148. De Partibus Artis Medicæ (vol. ii. ed. Chart.); of doubtful genuineness. 149. "Ὅτι αἱ Πλούτῳ γινώσκονται, Quod Qualitates Incorporæ sint (vol. xix.); spurious.

No one has ever set before the medical profession a higher standard of perfection than Galen, and few, if any, have more nearly approached it in their own person. He evidently appears from his works to have been a most accomplished and learned man, and one of his short essays (§ 107.) is written to inculcate the necessity of a physician's being acquainted with other branches of knowledge besides merely medicine. Of his numerous philosophical writings the greater part are lost; but his celebrity in logic and metaphysics appears to have been great among the ancients, as he is mentioned in company with Plato and Aristotle by his contemporary, Alexander Aphrodisiensis. (Comment. in Aristot. "Topica," viii. l. p. 262, ed. Venet. 1513.) Alexander is said by the Arabic historians to have been personally acquainted with Galen, and to have nicknamed him Mule's Head, on account of "the strength of his head in argument and disputation." (Casiri, Biblioth. Arabico-Hisp. Ecur. vol. i. p. 243; Abû-l-Faraj, Hist. Dynast. p. 78.) Galen had profoundly studied the logic of the Stoics and of Aristotle: he wrote a Commentary on the whole of the Organon (except perhaps the Topica), and his other works on Logic amounted to about thirty, of which only one short essay remains, viz. De Sophismatibus penes Dictionem, whose genuineness has been considered doubtful. His logical works appear to have been well known to the Arabic authors, and to have been translated into that language; and it is from Averroës that we learn that the fourth figure of a syllogism was ascribed to Galen (Expositio in Porphyrum. "Introductio," vol. i. p. 56, verso, and p. 63, verso, ed. Venet. 1552); a tradition which is found in no Greek writer, but which, in the absence of any contradictory testimony, has been generally followed, and has caused the figure to be called by his name. It is, however, rejected by Averroës, as less natural than the others; and M. Saint Hilaire (De la Logique d'Aristote) considers that it may possibly have been Galen who gave to this form the name of the fourth figure, but that, considered as an annex to the first (of which it is merely a clumsy and inverted form), it had long been known in the Peripatetic School, and was probably received from Aristotle himself.

In Philosophy, as in Medicine, he does not appear to have addicted himself to any particular school, but to have studied the doctrines of each; though neither is he to be called an eclectic in the same sense as were Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus, and others. He was most attached to the Peripatetic School, to which he often accommodates the maxims of the Old Academy. He was far removed from the Neo-Platonists, and with the followers of the New Academy, the Stoics, and the Epicureans he carried on frequent controversies. He did not agree with those advocates of universal scepticism who asserted that no such thing as certainty could be attained in any science, but was content to suspend his judgment on those matters which were not capable of observation, as, for instance, the nature of the human soul, respecting which he confessed he was still in doubt, and had not even been able to attain to a probable opinion. (De Foet. Form. vol. iv. p. 700.) The fullest account of Galen's philosophical opinions is given by Kurt Sprengel in his Beiträge zur Geschichte der Medicin, who thinks he has not hitherto been placed in the rank he deserves to hold: and to this the reader is referred for further particulars.

A list of the fragments, short spurious works, and lost and unpublished writings of Galen, are given in Kühn's edition.

Respecting Galen's personal history, see Phil. Labbei, Elogium Chronologicum Galeni; and, Vita Galeni ex propriis Operibus collecta, Paris, 1660, 8vo.; Ren. Chartier's Life, prefixed to his edition of Galen; Dan. Le Clerc, Hist. de la Médecine; J. A. Fabricii Biblioth. Græca. In the new edition the article was revised and rewritten by J. C. G. Ackermann; and this, with some additions by the editor, is prefixed by Kühn to his edition of Galen. Kurt Sprengel, Geschichte der Arzney-kunde, translated into French by Jourdan.

His writings and opinions are discussed by Jac. Brucker, in his Hist. Crit. Philosoph.; Alb. von Haller, in his Biblioth. Botan., Biblioth. Chirurg., and Biblioth. Medic. Pract.; Le Clerc and Sprengel, in their Histories of Medicine; Sprengel, in his Beiträge zur Geschichte der Medicin.

Some of the most useful works for those who are studying Galen's own writings, are,—Andr. Lacunæ Epitome Galeni, Basil. 1551, fol., and several times reprinted.; Ant. Musa Brassavoli Index in Opera Galeni, forming one of the volumes of the Juntine editions of Galen (a most valuable work, though unnecessarily prolix); Conr. Gesneri Prolegomena to Froben's third edition of Galen's works.

The Commentaries on separate works, or on different classes of his works, are too numerous to be here mentioned. The most complete bibliographical information respecting Galen will be found in Haller's Bibliotheca, Ackermann's Historia Literaria, and Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, and his Biblioth. Medicæ Historica.

Some other physicians that are said to have borne the name of Galen, and who are mentioned by Fabricius (Biblioth. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 166, ed. vet.), seem to be of doubtful authority. [W. A. G.]

GALEOTAE. [GALEUS.]

GALE'RIA FUNDA'NA, the second wife of the emperor Vitellius, by whom he had a daughter and a son, Germanicus, who was almost deaf, and was afterwards killed by Mucianus. The father of Galeria Fundana had been prætor. She appears to have been a woman of a mild and gentle character, for she protected Trachalus, with her husband, against those who had denounced him, and she felt very deeply and keenly the brutal degradation and cruelty of which Vitellius was guilty. (Tac. Hist. ii. 59, 60, 64, iii. 66, iv. 80; Suet. Vit. 6; Dion Cass. lxx. 4.) [L. S.]

GALE'RIA VALE'RIA. [MAXIMIANUS.]

GALE'RIA'NUS, CALPU'RNIVS, was a son of C. Piso, who perished immediately after his adoption to the empire by Galba, in A. D. 69. Galerianus was too young to take part in the contest between Otho, Vitellius, and Vespasian. But his noble birth, his youth, and popularity, awakened the jealousy of Vespasian's prefect, Mucianus. Galerianus was arrested at Rome, conducted by a strong guard forty miles along the Appian road, and put to death by injecting poison into his veins. (Tac. Hist. iv. 11.) [W. B. D.]

GALERIUS TRACHALUS. [TRACHALUS.]
GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS. [MAXIMIANUS.]

GALEUS (Γάλεος), that is, "the lizard," a son of Apollo and Themisto, the daughter of the Hyperborean king Zabius. In pursuance of an oracle of the Dodonean Zeus, Galeus emigrated to Sicily, where he built a sanctuary to his father Apollo. The Galeotae, a family of Sicilian soothsayers, derived their origin from him. (Aelian, V. H. xii. 46; Cic. de Divin. i. 20; Steph. Byz. s. v. γαλεῶται.) The principal seat of the Galeotae was the town of Hybla, which was hence called γαλεῶτις, or, as Thucydides (vi. 62.) writes it, γαλεῶτις. [L. S.]

GALENTHIAS (Γαλῆνθας), or, as Ovid (Met. ix. 306) calls her, Galanthia, was a daughter of Proetus of Thebes and a friend of Alcmena. When the latter was on the point of giving birth to Heracles, and the Moerae and Eileithyia, at the request of Hera, were endeavouring to prevent or delay the birth, Galinthias suddenly rushed in with the false report that Alcmena had given birth to a son. The hostile goddesses were so surprised at this information that they dropped their arms. Thus the charm was broken, and Alcmena was enabled to give birth to Heracles. The deluded goddesses avenged the deception practised upon them by Galinthias by metamorphosing her into a weasel or cat (γαλῆ), and dooming her to lead a joyless life in obscure holes and corners. Hecate, however, took pity upon her, and made her her attendant, and Heracles afterwards erected a sanctuary to her. At Thebes it was customary at the festival of Heracles first to offer sacrifices to Galinthias. (Ov. L. c.; Anton. Lib. 29; Aelian, H. A. xii. 5.) Pausanias (ix. 11. § 2) relates a similar story of Histiora. [L. S.]

GALLA. 1. First wife of Julius Constantius, son of the emperor Constantius Chlorus by his second wife, Theodora. She bore her husband two sons, one of whom Valerius thinks was the Flavius Valerius Constantinus, consul in A. D. 327, but to whom others do not give a name; the younger was Gallus Caesar. [GALLUS, p. 226, b.]

2. The daughter of the emperor Valentinian I., and second wife of Theodosius the Great. According to Zosimus, she accompanied her mother, Justina, and her brother, Valentinian II., when they fled to Theodosius, on the invasion of Italy by the usurper Maximus (A. D. 387). Theodosius met the fugitives at Thessalonica, and Justina artfully placed her weeping daughter before him, to work at once on his compassion and his love. Galla was eminent for beauty, and the emperor was smitten, and requested her in marriage. Justina refused her consent, except on condition of his undertaking to attack Maximus, and restore Valentinian, to which condition he consented, and they were married, probably about the end of A. D. 387. Tillemont, who rejects the account of Zosimus as inconsistent with the piety of Theodosius, places the marriage in A. D. 386, before the flight of Valentinian; but we prefer, with Gibbon, the account of Zosimus. During the absence of Theodosius in Italy, Galla was turned out of the palace at Constantinople by her step-son, the boy Arcadius, or by those who governed in his name. She died in childbirth, A. D. 394, just as Theodosius was setting out to attack Arbogastes and Eugenius, after giving to Theodosius a daughter, Galla Placidia [No. 3], and apparently a son named Gratian. (Ambros. De Obiit. Theodos. Orat. c. 40, and note of the Benedictine editors.) Whether the latter, who certainly died before his father, was the child whose birth occasioned her death, or whether there was a third child, is not clear. Tillemont understands Philostorgius to claim Galla as an Arian; but the passage in Philostorgius (x. 7) appears to refer rather to her mother, Justina. However, the Paschal Chronicle calls her an Arian, and the marked silence of Ambrose with respect to Galla in the passage just referred to makes it not unlikely that she was suspected or known to be not orthodox. (Zosim. iv. 44, 45, 55, 57; Marcellin. Chron.; Chron. Pasch. p. 563, ed. Bonn; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. v.; Gibbon, c. xxvii.)

3. GALLA PLACIDIA, so named in coins and inscriptions; but by historians more commonly called simply PLACIDIA, was the daughter of Theodosius the Great by his second wife Galla [No. 2.]. The date of her birth does not appear: it must have been not earlier than 388, and not later than 393. She was at Rome in A. D. 408, and is accused of being one of the parties to the death of her cousin Serena, Stilicho's widow, who was suspected of corresponding with or favouring Alaric, who was then besieging the city. It appears from this, that Placidia was then old enough to have some influence in public affairs, which consideration would lead us to throw back the date of her birth as far as possible. Gibbon says she was about twenty in 408, which is probably correct. When Alaric took Rome, A. D. 410, Placidia fell into his hands (if indeed she had not been previously in his power), and was detained by him as a hostage, but respectfully treated. After Alaric's death she continued in the power of his brother-in-law and successor, Ataulphus. [ATAULPHUS.] Constantius (afterwards emperor) the Patrician [CONSTANTIUS, III.], on the part of the emperor Honorius, half brother of Placidia, demanded her restoration, having already, as Tillemont thinks, the intention of asking her in marriage. Ataulphus, however, having it also in view to marry her, evaded these demands, and married her (according to Jornandes), at Forum Livii, near Ravenna, but according to the better authority of Olympiodorus and Idatius, at Narbonne, A. D. 414. Idatius states that this matter was regarded by some as the fulfilment of the prophecy of Daniel (ch. xi.) respecting the King of the North and the daughter of the king of the South. Philostorgius considers that another passage of the same prophetic book was fulfilled by the event. Ataulphus treated her with great respect, and endeavoured to make an alliance with Honorius, but was not successful, through the opposition of Constantius. In A. D. 415 Ataulphus was killed at Barcelona, leaving no issue by Placidia, their only child, Theodosia, having died soon after its birth. Ataulphus, with his last breath, charged his brother to restore Placidia to Honorius, but the revolutions of the Visi-Gothic kingdom prevented this being done immediately and it was not until after Placidia had suffered from the wanton insolence of Sigeric or Sigerich, the ephemeral successor of Ataulphus, that she was restored by Valia or Wallia, who succeeded Sigeric. Her restoration took place in A. D. 416; and on the first day (1st January) of the next year (417) she was married, though against her will, to Constantius, by whom she had two children, a daughter, Justa Grata Honoria, and a son, afterwards the emperor Valentinian III. [VALENTINIANUS, III.], born A. D. 419. Constantius was declared Augustus by Honorius, who was, however, somewhat reluctant to take him as colleague in the empire, and Placidia received the title of Augusta; and the infant Valentinian received, through Placidia's influence, the title "Nobilissimus," which was equivalent to his appointment as successor to the throne. Constantius died A. D. 421, about half a year after his elevation. After his death Honorius showed Placidia such regard and affection as gave rise to discreditable surmises respecting them; but after a time their love was exchanged for enmity, their respective friends raised tumults in Ravenna, where the Gothic soldiers supported the widow of their king, and in the end Placidia and her children fled (A. D. 423) to Theodosius II. at Constantinople to seek his aid. It was probably in this flight that she experienced the danger from the sea, and made the vow recorded in an extant inscription on the church of St. John the Evangelist at Ravenna. (Gruzer, p. 1048, No. 1.) It is not likely that Theodosius would have believed her against Honorius, as he had never acknowledged Constantius as Augustus, or Placidia as Augusta; but the death of Honorius and the usurpation of Johannes or John, determined him to take up her cause, which had now become the cause of his family. He therefore authorised Placidia to take or resume the title of Augusta, and the little Valentinian that of Nobilissimus. They were sent back to Italy (A. D. 424), with a powerful army, under Ardarburus, Aspar, and Candidianus. John was taken and put to death; and Valentinian, who had been previously raised to the rank of Caesar, was declared Augustus, or emperor, and left to govern the West, under the tutelage of his mother. Her regency was signalised by her zeal for the church and her intolerance. She banished from the towns Manicheans and other heretics, and astrologers; and excluded Jews and heathens from the bar and from public offices; but her lax government and easy disposition in other matters than those of the church left the empire to be torn by the disputes and rivalry of Aëtius and Boniface [ÆTIUS, BONIFACIUS]; and her over-indulgence for her son tended to make him an abandoned profligate. She died A. D. 450 or 451, at Rome, and was buried at Ravenna. (Zosim. vi. 12; Olympiod. apud Phot. Bibl. cod. 80; Socrat. H. E. vii. 23, 24; Philostorg. H. E. xii. 4, 12, 13, 14; Marcellin., Idatius, Prosper Aquit., Prosper Tiro, Chronica; Procop. de Bell. Vand. i. 3; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. v. vi.; Gibbon, ch. 31, 33, and 35; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 175.) [J. C. M.]

GALLA, A'RRIA. [ARRIA.]

GALLA, SÓSIA, the wife of C. Silius [SILIUS], involved with him in a charge of treason A. D. 24. The pretext for Galla's impeachment was, that during her husband's command in Upper Germany, in A. D. 14, she had sold her influence with him, and shared in his exactions on the provincials. But the real motive was Galla's intimacy with Agrippina, the widow of Germanicus. Galla was sent into banishment. (Tac. Ann. iv. 19, 20.) [W. B. D.]

GALLICANUS, a Roman consul, who, along with Maecenas, rashly slew two soldiers who through curiosity had entered the senate house, and thus gave rise to that bloody strife which raged for many days between the populace and the praetorians during the brief reign of Balbinus and Pupienus, A. D. 238. In the course of these disorders a large portion of the city was destroyed by fire. (Herodian. vii. 27; Capitolin. Maximin. duo, 20, Gordiani tres, 22.) [W. R.]

GALLICANUS, a rhetorician mentioned by Fronto (p. 128, ed. Niebuhr), where, however, A. Mai remarks that the word Gallicanus may be a mere adjective to designate a rhetorician of Gaul, and that Fronto may allude to Favorinus, the Gallic sophist of Arles. Whether Mai is right or not cannot be decided, but the Squilla Gallicanus to whom one of Fronto's letters (Ad Amic. i. 28, p. 207, ed. Niebuhr) is addressed, must, at all events, be a different person. The latter is mentioned in the Fasti as consul, in A. D. 127, in the reign of Hadrian. Whether this M. Squilla Gallicanus, again, is the same as the one who occurs in the Fasti as consul in A. D. 150, is uncertain, as under the latter date the Fasti are incomplete, and have only the name Gallicanus. [L. S.]

GALLICANUS, VULCATIUS, the name prefixed in the collection, entitled Scriptores Historiae Augustae [see CAPITOLINUS], to the life of Avidius Cassius. Not one circumstance connected with this author is known; and Salmasius, following the authority of the Palatine MS. would assign the biography in question to Spartianus. Whoever the compiler may have been, the work itself is a miserable performance, so defective and confused, that several of the leading events connected with the rebellion in the East would be altogether unintelligible did we not possess more accurate and distinct sources of information. For editions, &c. see CAPITOLINUS. [W. R.]

GALLIENA. We are told by Trebellius Pollio that Celsus [CELSUS], one of the numerous pretenders to the purple who sprung up during the reign of Gallienus, was invested with the imperial dignity by Galliena, a cousin (consobrina) of the reigning monarch. A coin described in a MS. of Goltzius, as bearing the inscription LICIN. GALLIENA AVG., and supposed by some to belong to the subject of this article, is considered by the best judges to have been spurious, if it ever existed at all.

But two gold medals, which are admitted to be genuine, have proved a source of extreme embarrassment to numismatologists. One of these presents on the obverse a head, apparently that of Gallienus, encircled with a wreath of corn ears, and the legend GALLIENAE AUGUSTAE; on the reverse Victory in a biga, with the words UBIQUE PAX. The other exhibits precisely the same obverse with the former, on the reverse the emperor, clad in military robes, crowned by Victory, who stands behind, with the words VICTORIA AUG. Of the numerous hypotheses which have been proposed to explain the origin of these pieces, two only are deserving of notice.

1. That of Vaillant, who supposes that they were minted in some of the rebellious provinces, for the purpose of holding up to scorn the effeminacy of Gallienus, whose brows are therefore ornamented with the garland appropriated to females instead of the warrior's laurel.

2. That of Eckhel, who thinks it possible that they may be intended to commemorate some wild freak of Gallienus, who may have thought fit to assume the attributes of the goddess Ceres, just as Nero and Commodus chose to be represented as divinities, the former as Apollo, the latter as Hercules. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 411.) [W. R.]

GALLIENUS, with his full name, P. LICINIUS VALERIANUS EGNATIUS GALLIENUS, Roman emperor A. D. 260-268. When Valerian, upon the death of Aemilianus, was raised to the throne (A. D. 253), he immediately assumed his eldest son Gallienus as an associate in the purple, and employed him, under the care of the experienced Postumus, governor of Gaul, to check the incursions of the barbarian Franks and Alemanni upon the Upper Danube and the Rhine. Could we repose any faith in the testimony of medals and inscriptions, the oft-repeated title of Germanicus, the legends Victoria Germanica, Victoria Augustorum, Restitutor Galliarum, accompanied by representations of the great rivers of the West crouching as suppliants at the feet of the prince, would indicate a long series of glorious achievements. But the records of this epoch, imperfect as they are, tell a very different tale, and prove that these pompous manifestations of triumph were weak frauds, intended to minister to vanity, or to conceal for a moment defeat and dishonour. Our authorities are so imperfect, that it is impossible to describe with distinctness, even in outline, the events which occurred during the reign of Valerian, from his accession in A. D. 253 until his capture by the Persians in A. D. 260, or during the eight following years, while Gallienus alone enjoyed the title of Augustus. It is certain that towards the close of this period the Roman dominion, which for a quarter of a century had sustained a succession of shocks, which seemed to threaten its dissolution, reached its lowest point of weakness. So numerous were the foes by which it was on every side assailed from without, and so completely were its powers of resistance paralysed by the incapacity of its rulers, that it is hard to comprehend how it escaped complete dismemberment, became again united and victorious, and recovered some portion at least of its ancient glory. During this period the Franks ravaged Gaul and Spain, and even sailed over the straits to Africa; the Alemanni devastated unceasingly the provinces of the Upper Danube; the Goths pillaged the cities of Asia on the southern shores of the Euxine, gained possession of Byzantium, and diffused dismay throughout Greece by the capture of Athens; the Sarmatians swept all Dacia, and the fertile valley of Moesia, to the base of Mount Haemus; while Sapor made himself master of Armenia, recovered Mesopotamia, and, passing the Euphrates, pursued his career of victory through Syria, until Antioch yielded to his arms.

Nor were the population and resources of the empire exhausted by the direct ravages of war alone. The ravages of the barbarians were followed by a long protracted famine, which in its turn gave energy to the frightful plague, first imported from the East by the soldiers of Verus, and which having for a time lain dormant now burst forth with terrific violence. At the period when the virulence of the epidemic attained its greatest height, five thousand sick are said to have perished daily at Rome; and, after the scourge had passed away, it was found that the inhabitants of Alexandria were diminished by nearly two thirds.

Paradoxical as the assertion may appear, general anarchy and a complete dissolution of the political fabric were averted mainly by a series of internal rebellions. In every district able officers sprung up, who, disdaining the feeble sceptre of the emperor, asserted and strove to maintain the dignity of independent princes. The armies levied by these usurpers, who are commonly distinguished by the fanciful designation of The Thirty Tyrants [see AUREOLUS], in many cases arrested the progress of the invaders, until the strong arm and vigorous intellect of a Claudius, an Aurelian, and a Probus collected and bound together once more the scattered fragments into one strong and well-compacted whole.

The character of Gallienus himself is one of the most contemptible presented in history. So long as he remained subject to his parent, he maintained a fair and decent reputation, but no sooner was he released from this control than he at once gave way to his natural propensities. The accounts of his father's capture were received with evident pleasure, and not a single effort was made to procure the release of the imprisoned emperor. Sinking at once into indolence, he passed his life in a succession of puerile and profligate indulgences, totally indifferent to the public welfare. At the same time, he was not deficient in talents and accomplishments. He possessed skill and grace as a rhetorician and a poet, several of his bons mots which have been preserved possess considerable neatness and point, he displayed great skill in the art of dress, and was deeply versed in the science of good eating. But, amidst all his follies, we find traces of nobler impulses and of darker passions. When fairly roused by the approach of unavoidable danger, he showed no want of courage and military prudence, all of which were evinced in the victory gained over the Goths in Thrace, and in his campaign against Postumus, although on this last occasion he probably owed much to the experienced valour of his generals Aureolus and Claudius. On the other hand, the latent treachery and cruelty of his temper were manifested in the massacre of the mutinous soldiers at Byzantium, who had surrendered under the express stipulation of an amnesty, and in the curious letter preserved by the Augustan historian, in which Celer Verianus is earnestly enjoined to mutilate, slay, and cut to pieces (lacerare, occidere, comidere) all who had favoured the pretensions of the usurper Ingenuus, old and young, without distinction. (Trebell. Poll. Ingen. inter Trig. Tyrann.) who were devastating Moesia; he returned hastily to Italy upon receiving news of the insurrection of Aureolus, whom he defeated, and shut up in Milan; but, while pressing the siege of that city, he was slain by his own soldiers, in the month of March, A. D. 268, in the fiftieth year of his age, after he had enjoyed the title of Augustus for fifteen years, and reigned alone for upwards of seven. [SALONINUS.]

(Trebell. Poll. Valerian. pater et fil., Gallieni dao; Victor, de Caes. xxxiii. Epit. xxxiii. xxxiii; Eutrop. ix. 7, 8; Zonar. xii. 23, 24; Zosim. i. 30, 37, 40, who speaks in such gentle terms of this prince, that some persons have imagined that his character was wilfully misrepresented by the historians of the age of Constantine, who sought to render the virtues of their own patrons more conspicuous by calumniating their predecessors. With regard to the names of Gallienus, see Eckhel. vol. vii. p. 417.)

COIN OF GALLIENUS.

GALLIENUS, Q. JULIUS. We learn from Victor (Epit. 33) that the emperor Gallienus had, in addition to the Saloninus who was put to death by Postumus, another son also named Saloninus or Salonianus. This is probably the individual commemorated in an inscription (Gruter, clxxv. 5) IMP. Q. JULIO. FILIO. GALLIENI. AVG. ET. SALONINAR. AVG. and who is said by Zonaras to have been put to death at Rome along with his uncle Valerianus. If, however, an unique coin, figured in the Pembroke collection, bearing on the obverse a beardless head surrounded by rays with the legend DIVO. CAES. Q. GALLIENO, and on the reverse a flaming altar with the word CONSECRATIO, can be held as genuine, it would seem to indicate that this Q. Gallienus died young and was deified by his father. (See Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 430, who mentions a second medal which perhaps belongs to the same person.)

M. GALLIO is said to be mentioned in an ancient MS. as the author of the Rhetorica ad Herennium, which is printed among Cicero's works. But the statement is very uncertain; besides which M. Gallio is otherwise altogether unknown. (J. C. Scaliger, de Re Poet. iii. 31, 34; Burmann, in the preface to his edition of the Rhet. ad Herenn. p. xxx.)

GALLIO, JUNIUS, a Roman rhetorician, and a contemporary and friend of M. Annaeus Seneca, the rhetorician, whose son he adopted. He was a senator; and on one occasion he proposed in the senate that the praetorians, after the expiration of their time of service, should receive a distinction otherwise reserved for equites, namely, the right of sitting in the quatuordecim ordines in the theatre. Tiberius, who suspected that this was done merely to win the favour of the soldiers, began to fear him: he first removed him from the senate, and afterwards sent him into exile. Gallio accordingly went to Lesbos; but Tiberius, grudging him the quiet and ease which he was likely to enjoy there, had him conveyed back to Rome, where he was kept in custody in the house of a magistrate. (Tac. Ann. vi. 3; Dion Cass. lvi. 18.) In his early years he had been a friend of Ovid (Ex P. ont. iv. 11), and on one occasion he had defended Bathyllus, one of the favourites of Maecenas. (Senec. Controv. i. 2, 5; Quintil. ix. 2. § 91.) According to Dion Cassius (lxi. 25), he was put to death by the command of Nero. As an orator, he was probably not above the ordinary declaimers of the time, at least the author of the dialogue De Oratoribus (c. 86; comp. Sidon. Apollin. i. 5. § 10) speaks of him with considerable contempt. Besides his declamations, such as the speech for Bathyllus, we know that he published a work on rhetoric, which, however, is lost. (Quintil. iii. 1. § 21; Hieronym. Praefat. lib. viii. in Eusebium.) Whether he is the same Gallio who is mentioned in the Acts (viii. 12) as proconsul of Achaia is uncertain. [L. S.]

GALLIO, L. JUNIUS, a son of the rhetorician M. Annaeus Seneca, and an elder brother of the philosopher Seneca. His original name was M. Annaeus Noratus, but he was adopted by the rhetorician Junius Gallio, whereupon he changed his name into L. Junius Annaeus (or Annaeanus) Gallio. Dion Cassius (lx. 35) mentions a witty but bitter joke of his, which he made in reference to the persons that were put to death in the reign of Claudius. His brother's death intimidated him so much, that he implored the mercy of Nero (Tac. Ann. xv. 73); but according to Hieronymus in the chronicle of Eusebius, who calls him a celebrated rhetorician, he put an end to himself in A. D. 65. He is mentioned by his brother in the preface to the fourth book of the Quaestiones Naturales, and the work de Vita Beata is addressed to him. [L. S.]

GALLIUS. 1. Q. GALLIUS, was a candidate for the praetorship in B. C. 64, and accused of ambitus by M. Calpurnius; but he was defended on that occasion by Cicero in an oration of which only a few fragments have come down to us. He appears to have been acquitted, for he was invested with the city praetorship in B. C. 63, and presided at the trial of C. Cornelius. (Cic. Brut. 80, de Petit. Cons. 5; Acon. in Cic. in tog. cand. p. 88; in Cornel. p. 62, ed. Orelli. See the fragments of Cicero's oration for Gallius in Orelli's edition, vol. iv. part 2, p. 454, &c.; Val. Max. viii. 10. § 3.)

2. M. GALLIUS, a son of No. 1. He is called a praetorian; but the year in which he was invested with the praetorship is uncertain. He belonged to the party of Antony, with whom he was staying in B. C. 43. He seems to be the same as the senator M. Gallius, by whom Tiberius, in his youth, was adopted, and who left him a large legacy, although Tiberius afterwards dropped the name of his adoptive father. (Cic. ad Att. x. 15, xi. 20; Philop. xiii. 12; Suet. Tib. 6.)

3. Q. GALLIUS, a son of No. 1, and a brother of No. 2, was praetor urbanus in B. C. 43, and in that fearful time became one of the many victims that were sacrificed by the triumvirs. During his praetorship he had one day, while engaged on his tribunal, some tablets concealed under his robe; and Octavianus, suspecting that he had arms under his cloak, and that he harboured murderous designs, ordered his centurions and soldiers to seize him. As Q. Gallius denied the charge, Octavianus ordered him to be put to death, though afterwards in his memoirs he endeavoured to conceal the cruelty of which he had thus been guilty. (Suet. Aug. 27.)

Appian (B. C. iii. 93), probably in consequence of the manner in which Octavianus had reported his own conduct, relates the event differently: Gallius, he says, asked Octavianus to give him Africa as his province after the praetorship. But having incurred the suspicion of a design upon the life of the triumvir, he was deprived of his office, and the populace demolished his house. The senate declared him guilty of a capital crime, but Octavianus inflicted no other punishment on him than sending him to his brother Marcus [No. 2], who was then with Antony. Gallius embarked, and was never heard of afterwards.

4. QUINTIUS GALLIUS, so at least his name appears in the best MS., for others read Q. Gallius or Q. Gallus, seems to have been legate of Q. Marcus Philippus, the proconsul of Asia. Two of Cicero's letters (ad Fam. xiii. 43 and 44) are addressed to him.

5. C. GALLIUS, a person otherwise unknown, but who, according to Valerius Maximus (vi. 1. § 13), was caught in the act of adultery by Semonius Musca, and scourged to death. [L. S.]

GALLONIUS. 1. A public crier at Rome, whose wealth and gluttony passed into the proverb "to live like Gallonius." (Cic. pro Quint. 30, de Fin. ii. 38.) He was probably contemporary with the younger Scipio, and was satirised by Lucilius (Cic. de Fin. ii. 8), and by Horace (Sat. ii. 2, 46). The sturgeon (acipenser) was one of the dishes for which Gallonius' table was famous. (Lucil. ap. Cic. l. c.; Hor. l. c.; comp. Plin. H. N. ix. 17. § 60; Macrob. Sat. ii. 12.)

2. A Roman eque, appointed governor of Gades by M. Varro, during the civil war in Spain, b.c. 49. (Caesar, B. C. ii. 18, 20.) [W. B. D.]

GALLUS, AELIUS, an intimate friend of the geographer Strabo, was praefect of Egypt in the reign of Augustus, and some time after Cornelius Gallus, with whom he has often been confounded, had been invested with the same office. His praefecture of Egypt belongs to the years a.c. 24 and 25, and these years have become remarkable in history through a bold expedition into Arabia, in which, however, Aelius Gallus completely failed. Gallus undertook the expedition from Egypt by the command of Augustus, partly with a view to explore the country and its inhabitants, and partly to conclude treaties of friendship with the people, or to subdue them if they should oppose the Romans, for it was believed at the time that Arabia was full of all kinds of treasures. When Aelius Gallus set out with his army, he trusted to the guidance of a Roman called Sylaeus, who deceived and misled him. A long account of this interesting expedition through the desert is given by Strabo (xvi. p. 780, &c.; comp. xvii. pp. 806, 816, 819; and Dion Cass. liii. 29). The burning heat of the sun, the bad water, and the want of every thing necessary to support life, produced a disease among the soldiers which was altogether unknown to the Romans, and destroyed the greater part of the army; so that the Arabs were not only not subdued, but succeeded in driving the Romans even from those parts of the country which they had possessed before. Aelius Gallus spent six months on his march into the country, on account of his treacherous guide, while he effected his retreat in sixty days. It would be extremely interesting to trace this expedition of Aelius Gallus into Arabia, but our knowledge of that country is as yet too scanty to enable us to identify the route as described by Strabo, who derived most of his information about Arabia from his friend Aelius Gallus. (Comp. Strab. ii. p. 118; Plin. H. N. vii. 26; Joseph. Ant. xv. 9. § 3; Galen. vol. ii. p. 455, ed. Basil.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, C. P. AELIUS, a jurist, contemporary with Cicero and Varro, though probably rather older than either, is said by Macrobius (Sat. vi. 8) to have been a most learned man. He was the author of a treatise in at least two books, De Verborum, quae ad Jus Civile pertinent, Significatione. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 264.) In Festus (s. v. Rogatio), the citation should probably be of the 2nd, not the 12th book. From a corruption of the name C. Aelius, his work has been attributed, in some passages where it is cited (Gell. xvi. 5; Macr. Sat. vi. 8), to a Caelius, or Caecilius Gallus. (Ant. Augustin. de Nom. Prop. Pandect. p. 16; Ménage, Amoen. Juris. 22.) Although he is not mentioned by Pomponius, nor named in the Florentine Index, there is one pure extract from him in the Digest (Dig. 50. tit. 16. a. 157), and he is also twice cited in that compilation—by Gaius in Dig. 22. tit. 1. a. 19, and by Paulus, through Julianus, in Dig. 50. tit. 16. a. 77. In the latter extract (if it refers to him, which is doubtful) he is cited by the name Gallus alone, a designation which elsewhere applies to C. Aquilius Gallus. These passages are commented upon by Maiansius, Ad XXX Icorum Frag. Comment. vol. ii. p. 37—47.

Another fragment of Aelius Gallus is preserved by Gellius (xvi. 5), and several may be found in Festus (s. v. Postliminium, Reus, Solutus, Torrens, Municeps, Nerum, Necessarii, Possessio, Reciperatio, Rogatio, Sobrinus, Petrarum, Sacer Mons, Religiosum, Perfugam, Relegati, Remancipationem, Senatus Decretum, Sepulchrum.) These fragments (some of which contain valuable antiquarian information) are collected in Dirksen's Bruchstücke, &c., and are also given, with a commentary, by C. G. E. Heimbach (C. Aelii Galli de Verbor. quae ad jus pertinent Signif., Fragmenta, 8vo. Lips. 1823.)

Two passages in Varro (De L. L. iv. 2, iv. 10) according to the ordinary reading, make express mention of Aelius Gallus; and in another passage (v. 7) it is doubtful whether Aelius Gallus ought not to be read. (Compare Gell. x. 21.) Upon these passages depends the precise determination of the age of Aelius Gallus. The Aelius mentioned in Varro (De L. L. v. 7) is spoken of as an old man. In other passages of Varro, where Aelius is mentioned, without the addition Gallus, the person referred to is L. Aelius Stilo, who is not to be confounded with the jurist. Van Heusde (De L. Aelio Stilone, p. 64, 65, Traj. ad Rhen. 1839) thinks that Stilo rather than Gallus is referred to, even in the passages De L. L. iv. 2, iv. 10. In this opinion he is followed by Lachmann (in Savigny's Zeitsch. vol. xi. p. 116), who asserts that Aelius Gallus is cited by no writer more ancient than Verrius Flaccus. Lachmann attributes to C. Aelius the sentence Impubes libripens esse non potest neque antestari (Priscian, Ars. Gram. p. 792, ed. Putsch), which is assigned by Dirksen to C. Livius Drusus. [Drusus, No. 3.]

Lachmann seems inclined to identify the jurist with the Aelius Gallus who was praefect of Aegypt under Augustus, and is spoken of in the preceding article. This identity had been previously asserted by Bertrandus and Bach, but must be rejected by those who suppose that Varro cites Aelius Gallus the jurist. (Maianus, l. c.; Neuber, Die juristische Klassiker, p. 72—75; Zimmern, H. R. G. vol. i. § 81.) [J. T. G.]

GALLUS, AELIUS, an ancient writer on pharmacy, frequently quoted by Galen. He is probably the person sometimes called simply Aelius (Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 730), sometimes Gallus (ibid. iii. 1, iv. 8, vol. xii. p. 625, 784), and sometimes by both names (De Antid. ii. 1, vol. xiv. p. 114). In one passage (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vi. 6, vol. xii. p. 585) Τάλας Αἰλίος is apparently a mistake for Γάλλος Αἰλίος. He is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacian (apud Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 730), and Andromachus (apud Gal. ibid. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 625), and must have lived in the first century after Christ, as he is said to have prepared an antidote for one of the emperors, which was also used by Charma, who lived in the reign of Nero, A. D. 54—68. (Gal. De Antid. ii. 1, vol. xiv. p. 114.) Haller (Biblioth. Medic. Pract. and Biblioth. Botan.) supposes that there were two physicians of the name of Aelius Gallus; but this conjecture, in the writer's opinion, is not proved to be correct, nor does it seem to be required.

Besides this Gallus, there is another physician of the name, M. GALLUS, whose name sometimes said to have had the cognomen ASCLEPIADES; but this appears to be a mistake, as, in the only passage where he is mentioned (Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. viii. 4, vol. xii. p. 179), instead of Γάλλου Μάρκου τοῦ Ἀσκληπιάδου, we should probably read Γάλλου Μάρκου τοῦ Ἀσκληπιάδεω, i. e. the follower of Asclepiades of Bithynia. [W. A. G.]

GALLUS, ANICIUS. 1. L. ANICIUS, L. M. N. GALLUS, was praetor in B. C. 168, and conducted the war against Gentius, king of the Illyrians, who had formed an alliance with Perseus of Macedonia against the Romans. L. Anicius Gallus was stationed at Apollonia, and on hearing what was going on in Illyricum, he resolved to join App. Claudius, who was encamped on the banks of the river Genusus, to co-operate with him against the Illyrians; but as he was soon after informed that Illyrian pirates had been sent out to ravage the coasts of Dyrrhachium and Apollonia, Anicius Gallus sailed out with the Roman fleet stationed at Apollonia, took some of the enemy's ships, and compelled the rest to return to Illyricum. He then hastened to join App. Claudius, to relieve the Bassaniæ, who were besieged by Gentius. The news of the arrival of Anicius Gallus frightened the king so much, that he raised the siege, and withdrew to his strongly-fortified capital of Scodra, and a great part of his army surrendered to the Romans. The clemency of the Roman praetor led the towns to follow the example of the soldiers, and Gallus thus advanced towards Scodra. Gentius left the place to meet his enemy in the open field; but the courage thus displayed did not last, for he was soon put to flight, and upwards of 200 men being killed in hurrying back through the gates, the king, terrified in the highest degree, immediately sent the noblest Illyrians as ambassadors to Anicius Gallus to beg for a truce of three days, that he might have time to consider what was to be done. This request was granted. Gentius hoped in the meantime to receive reinforcements from his brother Caravantius, but being disappointed, he himself came into the Roman camp, and surrendered in a most humble manner. Anicius Gallus now entered Scodra, where he first of all liberated the Roman prisoners, and sent Perperna, one of them, to Rome, with the intelligence of the complete reduction of Gentius. The whole campaign had not lasted more than thirty days. The Roman senate decreed public thanksgivings for three days, and Anicius Gallus, on his return to Rome, celebrated a triumph over Gentius. In B. C. 155 he was one of the ambassadors sent to call Prusias to account for his conduct towards Attalus. (Liv. xlv. 17, 30, 31, xlv. 3, 26, 43; Polyb. xxx. 13, xxxii. 21, xxxiii. 6; Appian, Illyr. 9.)

2. L. ANICIUS, L. F. L. N. GALLUS, was consul in B. C. 160, the year in which the Adelphi of Terence was brought out at the funeral games of M. Aemilius Paulus. (Didascal. ad Terent. Adelphi; Fasti.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, A'NNIUS, a Roman general under the emperor Otho in his expedition against the troops of Vitellius, in A. D. 69. He was sent out by Otho to occupy the banks of the Po; and when Caecina laid siege to Placentia, Annius Gallus hastened with a detachment of his army to the relief of the place. When Otho assembled his council, to decide upon the mode of acting, Eallus advised him to defer engaging in any decisive battle. After the defeat of Otho's army in the battle of Bedriacum, Annius Gallus pacified the enraged Othonians. In the reign of Vespasian he was sent to Germany against Civilis. (Tac. Hist. i. 87, ii. 11, 23, 33, 44, iv. 68, v. 19; Plut. Otho 5, 8, 13.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, ANTI'PATER, a Roman historian, who lived about the time of the so-called Thirty Tyrants, and is censured by Trebellius Pollio (Claud. b) for his servile flattery towards Aureolus; but no further particulars are known, and his work is lost, with the exception of a few words quoted by Trebellius Pollio (l. c.). [L. S.]

GALLUS, C. AQUILLIUS, one of the most distinguished of the early Roman jurists—those “veteres”—who flourished before the time of the empire. Born of an ancient and noble plebeian family, he applied himself to the study of the law, under the auspices of Q. Mucius P. f. Scaevola, the pontifex maximus, who was the greatest jurist of the day. Of all the pupils of Q. Mucius, he attained the greatest authority among the people, to whom, without regard to his own ease, he was always accessible, and ready to give advice. For deep and sound learning, perhaps some of his fellow-pupils, as Lucilius Balbus, Papirius, and C. Juventius, may have had equal or greater reputation among the members of their own profession; but they did not, like Gallus, exercise much influence on the progress of their art. He was an eques and senator. At the end of the year B. C. 67 he was elected praetor along with Cicero, and, in the discharge of his office, greatly signalled himself by legal reforms, of which we shall presently take notice. During his praetorship he presided in quaestiones de ambitu, while the jurisdiction in caes de pecuniis repetundis was assigned to his colleague. (Cic. pro Cluent. 54.) He never aspired to the consulship, for he was prudent and unambitious, or rather, his ambition was satis-

sed by the judicial sovereignty which he exercised. Moreover, he dreaded the additional toils of an office to which he felt his declining health unequal. (Ad Att. i. 1.) Of the details of his private life little is known. Pliny (H. N. vii. 1) says, epigrammatically, that he was even more distinguished for the magnificent mansion which he possessed upon the Viminal Hill than for his knowledge of the Civil Law. It was in this mansion, the most superb in all Rome (P. Victor, De Urb. Rom. Region. v.), that his intimate friend, Q. Scapula, suddenly expired while at supper with Gallus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 53.) In a letter addressed to Servius Sulpicius, in B. C. 46 (ad Fam. iv. 6), Cicero speaks of a Gallus, a friend and relative of Servius (vester Gallus), who lost a promising son, and bore his loss with equanimity; but though Gallus Aquilius, the jurist, was the friend and legal preceptor of Servius, it is doubtful from the context whether he is the person referred to. In the Topica, a treatise which was published in B. C. 44, Gallus is spoken of in the past tense, as no longer living. (Top. 12.)

We can only briefly review the professional career of Gallus. Taught, himself, by the great Mucius Scaevola, he could boast of being in turn the principal instructor of Servius Sulpicius, who had previously learned the elements of law from Lucilius Balbus, and combined the excellencies of both his masters; for if Balbus were more esteemed for solid and profound acquirement, Gallus had the advantage in penetration, dexterity, and readiness. (Cic. Brut. 42.) "Institutus fuit" (Servius), says Pomponius, in the ill-written fragment De Origine Juris (Dig. i. tit. 2. a. 2. § 43.), "a Balbo Lucilio, instructus autem maxime a Gallo Aquillio, qui fuit Cercinae. Itaque libri eius complures extant, Cercinae confectae." Cujas, in his comment on this passage, speaks of Cercina as an island on the coast of Sicily, but no such island is mentioned by the ancient geographers, according to whom Cercina was an island (now Gamalera) in the Mare Syrticum, where Marius lay hid. (Mela, ij. 7; Plin. H. N. v. 7.) There is some improbability in the supposition that Servius, although he visited Athens and Rhodes (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 12, Brut. 41.), should have passed his time with his preceptor in an island on the coast of Africa—a singular choice of a vacation residence for a busy jurist and his pupils! Hence some critics conjecture that Caecina, in Etruria (Mela, ij. 4.), is meant, and others have thought of Sicyon or Corcyra. It is equally doubtful whether the author of the works said to have been written at Cercina were Servius or Gallus. (Otto, in Serv. Sulpic. Thes. Jur. Civ. vol. v. p. 1585-6.) If Servius is meant, there is a needless repetition, for Pomponius, referring to Servius, shortly afterwards says, "Hujus volumina complura extant." In the time of Pomponius, some works of Aquilius Gallus were extant, but copies of them were scarce, and their contents were not such as to conduce to their popularity. Servius Sulpicius incorporated the works of Gallus, and of other disciples of Mucius, in his own writings, completed what they had left imperfect, and, while he acknowledged his obligations to their productions, he at once secured them from oblivion, and deprived them of the chance of independent fame, by the superior attraction of his own style. By Ulpian, Gallus is cited at second-hand from Mela, in Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 17. § 6. It is remarkable, that we are not acquainted with the title of any one of his works, though he is often quoted in the Digest. Thus, he is loosely quoted by Labeo (Dig. 33. a. 29. § 1.), by Africanus (Dig. 28. tit. 6. a. 33. § 7.), by Cervidius Scaevola (Dig. 28. tit. 2. a. 29.), by Licinius Rufinus (Dig. 28. tit. 5. a. 74.), by Javolenus (Dig. 40. tit. 7. a. 39, pr.), by Florentinus (Dig. 46. tit. 4. a. 18. § 1.), by Paulus (Dig. 30. a. 127; Dig. 34. tit. 2. a. 32. § 1.), by Ulpian (Dig. 8. tit. 5. a. 6. § 2; Dig. 30. a. 30. § 7., Dig. 43. tit. 24. a. 7. § 4.) This unspecific mode of quotation shows that his original works were not in men's hands, and the same inference may be deduced from the silence of the old grammarians, who never illustrate the usage of words by citations from Aquilius Gallus. His authority, however, is invoked by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (lib. iii. p. 200, ed. Sylburg.), for the statement that, on one occasion, when the sewers were out of repair, the censors agreed to pay 100 talents for their cleansing.

Aquilius Gallus early acquired high reputation as a judex, and Cicero frequently appeared as an advocate when his friend sat upon the bench. Already, in B. C. 81, the youthful orator pleaded the cause of Quintus before Gallus (Gell. xv. 28.), and, a few years afterwards, Gallus was one of the judges on the trial of Caecina. In the latter case (pro Caec. 27.), Cicero lavishes very high encomiums on his knowledge, ability, and industry, as well as his just and merciful disposition. The speech Pro Cluentio was also addressed to Gallus as a judex. Cicero himself resorted for legal advice to his friend, although, in a question relating to a right of water, he says that he preferred consulting M. Tugio, who had devoted exclusive attention to that branch of the law (pro Balb. 20.). Gallus, on the other hand, when he was consulted on questions which involved controverted facts rather than legal doubts, used to refer his clients for advice and assistance to Cicero, as the great orator and skilful advocate (Top. 12.). It is probable that Gallus was deficient in oratorical power, for on no occasion do we find him complimented by Cicero on any such gift. Among the important causes which he heard was that of Otacilia, who had carried on an adulterous intrigue with C. Visellius Varro, being seriously ill, and wishing to make her a present, which, if he died, she might recover from his heirs under colour of a debt, permitted her to charge against him in a settled account the sum of 300,000 sesterces, but, as he did not die so soon as she expected, she brought an action against himself to recover the amount with interest. This impudent demand was upset by the legal authority and learning of Aquilius Gallus, who was appointed judex in the case. (Val. Max. viii. 2.)

Such was Gallus in practice, as counsel and judex, skilful in his art, with armour always bright, and weapon always keen. But he possessed higher qualifications, which were perhaps not sufficiently appreciated by his contemporaries. He had a strong love of equity, and a strong dislike to chicanery and fraud, and a clear perception of the points in which justice was defeated by technicalities. It would have been too daring an attempt to disturb the artificial system of Roman jurisprudence by a legislation which, though it remedied some of its defects, was not in harmony with its established rules. Accordingly, Gallus applied his ingenious and inventive mind to the contrivance of legal novelties, to which his authority was sufficient to give currency, because, while they cured evils, they disturbed no settled notions. To explain all his improvements in the law would exceed our limits, but there are three which deserve special mention—his formulæ, 1st, for the institution of heirs; 2d, for releasing legal claims; and, 3d, for procedure in case of fraud.

As to the first head, a testament might have been broken, if it nominated a stranger as heir, passing over a sus heres, though such heres should be born after the testator's death. This latter event was provided for by a formula invented by Aquilius Gallus. He also provided a form, which was adopted on his authority, for the institution, as heres, of a postumus, who was not a sus heres. (Dig. 28. tit. 2. s. 29, Dig. 28. tit. 6. s. 33 § 7, Dig. 28. tit. 5. s. 74.)

As to the second head, he devised a summary mode of giving a general release of all obligations. An obligation could only be dissolved altogether by some mode appropriate to the mode in which it had been contracted; but the nature of an obligation might be altered by its renewal in another form (novatio), after which the legal incidents of the old obligation were extinguished. In order, therefore, to prevent the necessity of various modes of release, where there might be obligations of various kinds, Aquilius Gallus devised the plan of first turning by a novatio every existing obligation into a single verborum obligatio, which might be dissolved by acceptilatio, or a fictitious acknowledgment that the obligation had been discharged. A. undertakes by sponsio to pay to B. the value of every obligation of every kind by which A. is bound to B. The former obligations being thus merged in the sponsio, all claims are released at once by a fictitious acknowledgment by B. that he has received from A. the stipulated payment. Such are the principles upon which is founded the celebrated Stipulatio Aquiliana, the form of which is given in Dig. 46. tit. 4. s. 18. § 1, and in Inst. 3. tit. 29. § 2.

As to the third and most important head, the formulæ in case of fraud—that improvement which swept every species of wickedness out of its last lurking-place (evocriculum maliciarum omnium)—from what is said by Cicero, in De Nat. Dev. iii. 30, and De Off. iii. 14, we have strong reasons for concluding, that if the clause in the praetor's edict, which is preserved in Dig. 4. tit. 3. § 1, was introduced before the time when Gallus was praetor, the mode of proceeding in the judicium de dolo malo, and the legal remedies against fraud, at least received important improvements from his hands. Hugo, however, thought that the formulae de dolo malo were nothing more than new clauses in contracts. (R. R. G. p. 861, ed. 1832.)

The definition of dolus malus was a vexata quaestio. According to Gallus, there was dolus malus, "quum esset aliud simulatum, aliud actum." He was noted for definitions in other cases. His definition of latus as the place "qua fluctus alit" has been often cited as happy though metaphorical. (Cic. Topic. 7; Quint. Inst. Or. iii. c. vii.)

The jurist Aquilius Gallus (who is not recorded ever to have been tribune of the plebs) was not the proposer of the Lex Aquilia, which is a plebiscite of earlier date (Inst. 4. tit. 3. § 15), having been mentioned by Brutus (Dig. 9. tit. 2. s. 27.

§ 22) and Q. Mucius (ibid. s. 39. pr.). Furthermore, we must not (as the compiler of the Florentine Index to the Digest appears to have done) confound Aquilius Gallus with the later jurist Aquila.

The inscription in Gruter (p. 652. No. 6), in which mention is made of L. Aquilius Gemellus, the freedman of the jurist, is probably spurious (Bertrandus, De Jurisp. ii. 9; Guil. Grotius, De Vitis ICTor. i. 8. § 5—8; Maiansius, ad XXX ICTor. Frag. Comment. vol. ii. p. 87—126; Heineccius, De C. Aquilio Gallo, ICTor celeberrimo in Opus. vol. ii. pp. 777—9; Zimmern, R. R. G. vol. i. § 77.) [J. T. G.]

GALLUS, L. AQUILLIUS, was praetor in A. C. 170, and obtained Sicily for his province. (Liv. xli. 18, 19.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, ASI'NIUS. 1. L. ASI'NIUS, C. F. GALLUS, is mentioned in the Fasti as having celebrated a triumph in A. C. 26.

2. C. ASI'NIUS, C. F. GALLUS, a son of C. Asi'nius Pollio, bore the agnomen of Saloni'us. He was consul in A. C. 8 with C. Marc'ius Censorinus. He was not free from the servile flattery which at the time prevailed in the senate and among the people, but he would now and then speak in the senate with more freedom than was agreeable to the sovereign. Augustus said of him, that he had indeed the desire to be the first man in the senate, but that he had not the talent for it. Tiberius hated him, partly on account of his freedom in expressing his opinion, but more especially because Asi'nius Gallus had married Vipania, the former wife of Tiberius. At last the emperor resolved upon getting rid of him. In A. D. 30 he invited him to his table at Capreae, and at the same time got the senate to sentence him to death. But Tiberius saved his life, only for the purpose of inflicting upon him severer cruelties than death alone. He kept him imprisoned for three years, and on the most scanty supply of food. After the lapse of three years, he died in his dungeon of starvation, but whether it was compulsory or voluntary is unknown.

C. Asi'nius Gallus also distinguished himself in the history of Roman literature, in regard to which he followed in the footsteps of his father. He wrote a work in several books, entitled De Comparatione patrie ac Ciceronis, which was unfavourable to the latter, and against which the emperor Claudius wrote his defence of Cicero. The writings of Asi'nius Gallus, however, have perished; and all that has come down of his productions is a short epigram preserved in Suetonius. (Tac. Ann. i. 8, 12, 13, 76, &c., ii. 32, 33, 35, iii. 11, 36, 76, iv. 1, 20, 30, 71, v. 23, 25; Dion Cass. iv. 6, lvii. 2, lviii. 3; Schol. Acron. ad Horat. Carm. ii. 1, 16; Suet. Claud. 41; De Illust. Gram. 22; Vit. Horat. in fin.; Plin. Epist. vii. 4; Gell. xvii. 1; Quintil. xii. 1, 22.)

3. ASI'NIUS GALLUS, a son of No. 2, was a man proud of his family connection, being a step-brother of Drusus, the son of Tiberius. In the reign of Claudius, he and Statilius, and a number of freedmen and slaves, formed a conspiracy against Claudius. The object of Asi'nius Gallus was merely to satisfy his foolish vanity; but the plot was discovered, and Claudius was generous enough not to inflict any sorer punishment on the offender than exile. (Suet. Claud. 13; Dion Cass. ix. 27.)

4. L. ASI'NIUS GALLUS was consul in A. D. 12,

GALLUS, CANINIUS. 1. L. CANINIUS GALLUS. His praenomen Lucius is not mentioned by Cicero, but is taken from Dion Cassius (Ind. lib. 68), who calls his son L. F. He was a contemporary of Cicero and Caesar. In B.C. 59 he and Q. Fabius Maximus accused C. Antonius of repetundae, and Cicero defended the accused. Afterwards, however, Caninius Gallus married the daughter of C. Antonius. In B.C. 56 he was tribune of the people, and in this capacity endeavoured to further the objects of Pompey. With a view to prevent P. Lentulus Spinther, then proconsul of Cilicia, from restoring Ptolemy Auletes to his kingdom, he brought forward a rogation that Pompey, without an army, and accompanied only by two lictors, should be sent with the king to Alexandria, and endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between the king and his people. But the rogation, if it was ever actually brought forward, was not carried. The year after his tribuneship, B.C. 55, Caninius Gallus was accused, probably by M. Colonius, but he was defended by Cicero, at the request of Pompey. In B.C. 51 he was staying in Greece, perhaps as praetor of the province of Achaia, for Cicero, who then went to Cilicia, saw him at Athens. During the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Caninius Gallus appears to have remained neutral. He died in B.C. 44. He had been connected in friendship with Cicero and M. Terentius Varro, whence we may infer that he was a man of talent and acquirements. (Cic. ad Q. Frat. ii. 2, 6, ad Fam. i. 2, 4, 7, ii. 8, vii. 1, ix. 2, 3, 6, ad Att. xv. 13, xvi. 14; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 6; Dion Cass. xxxix. 16; Plut. Pomp. 49, where he is wrongly called Canidius.)

2. L. CANINIUS, L. F. GALLUS, a son of No. 1, was consul in B.C. 37 with M. Agrippa. He is mentioned in the coin annexed, which belongs to B.C. 18 as a triumvir monetalis. The obverse represents the head of Augustus, and the reverse a Parthian kneeling, presenting a standard, with L. CANINIUS GALLVS IVIR. (Fasti; Dion Cass. Indes, lib. 48, and xlviii. 49; Borghesi, in the Giornale Arcadico, vol. xxvi, p. 66, &c.)

3. L. CANINIUS GALLUS was consul suffectus in B.C. 2, in the place of M. Plantius Silvanus. (Fasti.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, C. CESTIUS, with the agnomen Camerinus, a Roman senator of the time of the emperor Tiberius, was consul in A.D. 35, with M. Servilius Nonianus. (Tac. Ann. iii. 36, vi. 7, 31; Dion Cass. lviii. 25; Plin. H. N. x. 43.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, CESTIUS, a son of the preceding, the governor of Syria (legatus, A.D. 64, 65), under whom the Jews broke out into the rebellion which ended in the destruction of their city and temple by Titus. Maddened by the tyranny of Gessius Florus, they applied to Gallus for protection; but, though he sent Neapolitanus, one of his officers, to investigate the case, and received from him a report favourable to the Jews, he took no effectual steps either to redress their injuries, or to prepare for any outbreak into which their discontent might drive them. When at last he found it necessary to act, he marched from Antioch, and, having taken Ptolemais and Lydda, advanced on Jerusalem. There he drove the Jews into the upper part of the city and the precincts of the temple; and might, according to Josephus, have finished the war at once, had he not been dissuaded by some of his officers from pressing his advantage. Soon after he unaccountably drew off his forces, and was much harassed in his retreat by the Jews, who took from him a quantity of spoil. Nero was at the time in Achaia, and Gallus sent messengers to him to give an account of affairs, and to represent them as favourably as possible for himself. The emperor, much exasperated, commissioned Vespasian to conduct the war; and the words of Tacitus seem to imply that Gallus died before the arrival of his successor, his death being probably hastened by vexation. (Joseph. Vit. § 43, Bell. Jud. ii. 14. § 3, 16. §§ 1, 2, 18. §§ 9, 10, 19. §§ 1—9, 20. § 1, iii. 1; Tac. Hist. v. 10; Suet. Vesp. 4.) [E. E.]

GALLUS, CONSTANTIUS, or, with his full name, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS (JULIUS) CONSTANTINUS GALLUS, the son of Julius Constantius and Galla, grandson of Constantius Chlorus, nephew of Constantine the Great, and elder brother, by a different mother, of Julian the Apostate. (See Genealogical Table, vol. I. p. 832.) Having been spared, in consequence of his infirm health, in the general massacre of the more dangerous members of the imperial family, which followed the death of his uncle, and in which his own father and an elder brother were involved, he was, in A.D. 351, named Caesar by Constantius II., and left in the east to repel the incursions of the Persians. The principal events of his subsequent career, and the manner of his death, which happened A.D. 354, are detailed elsewhere. [CONSTANTIUS II., p. 848.]

The appellation of Gallus was dropped upon his elevation to the rank of Caesar (Victor, de Cæs. 42), and hence numismatologists have experienced considerable difficulty in separating the medals of this prince from those of his cousin, Constantius II., struck during the lifetime of Constantine the Great, since precisely the same designation, CONSTANTIUS CAESAR, is found applied to both. Several of the coins of Gallus, however, have the epithet IVN. (junior) appended by way of distinction, and others are known by FL. CL., or FL. IVL., being prefixed, since these names do not appear to have been ever assumed by the elder Constantius. For more delicate methods of discrimination where the above tests fail, see Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 124. [W. R.]

GALLUS, C. CORNELIUS (Eutropius, vii. 10, erroneously calls him Cneius), a contemporary of Augustus, who distinguished himself as a general, and still more as a poet and an orator. He was a native of Forum Julii (Frejus), in Gaul, and of very humble origin, perhaps the son of some freedman either of Sulla or Cinna. Hieronymus, in Eusebius, states that Gallus died at the age of forty (others read forty-three); and as we know from Dion Cassius (liii. 23) that he died in B.C. 26, he must have been born either in B.C. 66 or 69. He appears to have gone to Italy at an early age, and it would seem that he was instructed by the Epicurean Syron, together with Varus and Virgil, both of whom became greatly attached to him. (Virg. Eclog. vi. 64, &c.) He began his career as a poet about the age of twenty, and seems thereby to have attracted the attention and won the friendship of such men as Asinius Pollio. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 32.) When Octavianus, after the murder of Caesar, came to Italy from Apollonia, Gallus must have embraced his party at once, for henceforth he appears as a man of great influence with Octavianus, and in B.C. 41 he was one of the triumviri appointed by Octavianus to distribute the land in the north of Italy among his veterans, and on that occasion he distinguished himself by the protection he afforded to the inhabitants of Mantua and to Virgil, for he brought an accusation against Alfeius Varus, who, in his measurements of the land, was unjust towards the inhabitants. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. ix. 10; Donat. Vit. Virg. 30, 36.) Gallus afterwards accompanied Octavianus to the battle of Actium, B.C. 31, when he commanded a detachment of the army. After the battle, when Octavianus was obliged to go from Samos to Italy, to suppress the insurrection among the troops, he sent Gallus with the army to Egypt, in pursuit of Antony. In the neighbourhood of Cyrene, Pinaris Scarpas, one of Antony's legates, in despair, surrendered, with four legions, to Gallus, who then took possession of the island of Pharos, and attacked Paracetonium. When this town and all its treasures had fallen into the hands of Gallus, Antony hastened thither, hoping to recover what was lost, either by bribery or by force; but Gallus thwarted his schemes, and, in an attack which he made on Antony's fleet in the harbour of Paracetonium, he sank and burnt many of the enemy's ships, whereupon Antony withdrew, and soon after made away with himself. Gallus and Proculeius then assisted Octavianus in securing Cleopatra, and guarded her as a prisoner in her palace. After the death of Cleopatra, Octavianus constituted Egypt as a Roman province, with peculiar regulations, and testified his esteem for and confidence in Gallus by making him the first prefect of Egypt. (Strab. xvii. p. 319; Dion Cass. li. 9, 17.) He had to suppress a revolt in the Thebais, where the people resisted the severe taxation to which they were subjected. He remained in Egypt for nearly four years, and seems to have made various useful regulations in his province; but the elevated position to which he was raised appears to have rendered him giddy and insolent, whereby he drew upon himself the hatred of Augustus. The exact nature of his offence is not certain. According to Dion Cassius (l.c. 23), he spoke of Augustus in an offensive and insulting manner; he erected numerous statues of himself in Egypt, and had his own exploits inscribed on the pyramids. This excited the hostility of Valerius Largus, who had before been his intimate friend, but now denounced him to the emperor. Augustus deprived him of his post, which was given to Petronius, and forbade him to stay in any of his provinces. As the accusation of Valerius had succeeded thus far, one accuser after another came forward against him, and the charges were referred to the senate for investigation and decision. In consequence of these things, the senate deprived Gallus of his estates, and sent him into exile; but, unable to bear up against these reverses of fortune, he put an end to his life by throwing himself upon his own sword, B.C. 26. Other writers mention as the cause of his fall merely the disrespectful way in which he spoke of Augustus, or that he was suspected of forming a conspiracy, or that he was accused of extortion in his province. (Comp. Suet. Aug. 66, de Illust. Gram. 16; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. x. 1; Donat. Vit. Virg. 39; Amm. Marc. xvii. 4; Ov. Trist. ii. 445, Anac. iii. 9, 63; Propert. ii. 34. 91.)

The intimate friendship existing between Gallus and the most eminent men of the time, as Asinius Pollio, Virgil, Varus, and Ovid, and the high praise they bestow upon him, sufficiently attest that Gallus was a man of great intellectual powers and acquirements. Ovid (Trist. iv. 10. 5) assigns to him the first place among the Roman elegiac poets; and we know that he wrote a collection of elegies in four books, the principal subject of which was his love of Lycoris. But all his productions have perished, and we can judge of his merits only by what his contemporaries state about him. A collection of six elegies was published under his name by Pomponius Gauricus (Venice, 1501, 4to), but it was soon discovered that they belonged to a much later age, and were the productions of Maximianus, a poet of the fifth century of our era. There are in the Latin Anthology four epigrams (Nos. 869, 989, 1003, and 1565, ed. Meyer), which were formerly attributed to Gallus, but none of them can have been the production of a contemporary of Augustus. Gallus translated into Latin the poems of Euphorion of Chalcia, but this translation is also lost. Some critics attribute to him the poem Ciris, usually printed among the works of Virgil, but the arguments do not appear satisfactory. Of his oratory too not a trace has come down to us; and how far the judgment of Quintilian (x. 1. § 93; comp. i. 5. § 8) is correct, who calls him durior Gallus, we cannot say. The Greek Anthology contains two epigrams under the name of Gallus, but who their author was is altogether uncertain. Some writers ascribe to C. Cornelius Gallus a work on the expedition of Aelius Gallus into Arabia, but he cannot possibly have written any such work, because he died before that expedition was undertaken. (Fontanini, Hist. Lit. Aquilejæ, lib. i.; C. C. C. Völker, Commentat. de C. Cornelii Galli Forojuliensis Vita et Scriptis, part i., Bonn, 1840, 8vo., containing the history of his life, and part ii., Elberfeld, 1844, on the writings of Gallus). A. W. Becker, in his work entitled Gallus, has lately made use of the life of Corn. Gallus for the purpose of explaining the most important points of the private life of the Romans in the time of Augustus. An English translation of this work was published in 1844. [L. S.]

GALLUS, A. DIDIVS, was curator aquarum in the reign of Caligula, A.D. 40. In the reign of Claudius, A.D. 50, he commanded a Roman army in Bosphorus, and subsequently he was appointed by the same emperor to succeed Ostorius in Britain, where, however, he confined himself to protecting what the Romans had gained before, for he was then at an advanced age, and governed his province through his legates. In his earlier years he seems to have been a man of great ambition, and of some eminence as an orator. (Frontin. de Aquaed. 102; Tac. Ann. xii. 15, 40, xiv. 29, Agric. 14; Quintil. vi. 3. § 68.) [L. S.]

to have been a man of great acquirements and of an amiable character. Among Cicero's letters there are several (ad Fam. vii. 23—27) which are addressed to M. Fadius. It seems that during the civil war he belonged to the party of Caesar, and fought under him as legate in Spain in B.C. 49. He was a follower of Epicurus in his philosophical views, but nevertheless wrote an eulogy on M. Porcius Cato Uticensis, which is lost. It should be observed that in most editions of Cicero his name is wrongly given as M. Fabius Gallus. (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 14, vii. 24, ix. 25, xiii. 59, xv. 14, ad Att. vii. 3, viii. 3, 12, xiii. 49.)

2. Q. FADIUS GALLUS, a brother of No. 1. In B.C. 46 the two brothers had a dispute, and on that occasion Cicero recommended M. Fadius Gallus to Paetus. Cicero calls Q. Fadius a homo non sapiens. (De Fin. ii. 17, 18, ad Fam. ix. 25.)

3. T. FADIUS GALLUS, was quaestor of Cicero in his consulship, B.C. 63, and tribune of the people in B.C. 57, in which year he exerted himself with others to effect the recall of Cicero from exile. At a later period T. Fadius himself appears to have lived in exile, and Cicero in a letter still extant (ad Fam. v. 18) consoled him in his misfortune. (Cic. ad Q. Frat. i. 4, ad Att. iii. 23, post Red. in Senat. 8, ad Fam. vii. 27.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, FLAVIUS, was tribune of the soldiers under Antony in his unfortunate campaign against the Parthians in B.C. 36. During Antony's retreat Flavius Gallus made an inconsiderate attack upon the enemy, for which he paid with his life. (Plut. Ant. 42, 43.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, GLICIUS, was denounced to Nero by Quintianus as an accomplice in the conspiracy of Piso; but as the evidence against him was not strong enough to condemn him, he was punished only with exile. (Tac. Ann. xv. 56, 71.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, HERENNIVS, an actor whom L. Cornelius Balbus, when at Gades, raised to the rank of an eque, by presenting him with a gold ring, and introducing him to the seats in the theatre, which were reserved for the equites. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 32.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, HERENNIUS, a Roman general, legate of the first legion of the army on the Rhine (A.D. 69) was stationed at Bonn when the Batavian insurrection broke out, and was ordered by Hordeonius Flaccus to prevent some Batavian cohorts, which had deserted from the Romans, from uniting with Civilis. Hordeonius recalled his commands, but Gallus was compelled by his own soldiers to fight, and was defeated through the fault of his Belgic auxiliaries. He was afterwards associated with Vocula in the command, after the deposition of Hordeonius, and was in command of the camp at Gelduba when a trifling accident excited a mutiny among his soldiers, who scourged and bound him; but he was released by Vocula. When Vocula was killed at Novesium, Herennius was only bound. He was afterwards killed by Valentinus and Tutor, A.D. 70. [CIVILIS; VOCULA; VALENTINUS]. (Tac. Hist. iv. 19, 20, 26, 27, 59, 70, 77.) [P. S.]

GALLUS, NONIVS, a Roman general of the time of Augustus, who in A.C. 29 defeated the Treviri and Germans. (Dion Cass. li. 20.) He may possibly be the same as the Nonius who, according to Plutarch (Cic. 38), fought under Pompey against Caesar. [L. S.]

GALLUS, OGU'LNIVS. 1. Q. OGU'LNIVS,

L. P. Q. N. GALLUS, was consul in B.C. 269 with C. Fabius Pictor, and carried on a war against the Picentes, which, however, was not brought to a close till the year after. This consulship is remarkable in the history of Rome as being the year in which silver was first coined at Rome. In B.C. 257 Q. Ogu'lnius was appointed dictator for the purpose of conducting the feriae Latinae. (Eutrop. ii. 16; Liv. Epit. 15; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 13.)

2. M. OGU'LNIVS GALLUS, was praetor in B.C. 181, with the jurisdiction in the city. (Liv. xxxix. 56, xl. 1.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, L. PLOTIVS, a native of Cisalpine Gaul, was the first person that ever set up a school at Rome for the purpose of teaching Latin and rhetoric, about B.C. 88. Cicero in his boyhood knew him, and would have liked to receive instruction from him in Latin, but his friends prevented it, thinking that the study of Greek was a better training for the intellect. L. Plotius lived to a very advanced age, and was regarded by later writers as the father of Roman rhetoric. (Sueton. De clar. Rhet. 2; Hieron. in Euseb. Chron. Ol. 173, 1; Quintil. ii. 4. § 44; Senec. Controv. ii. prooem.) Besides a work de Genetis (Quintil. xi. 3 § 143), he wrote judicial orations for other persons, as for Atratinus, who in B.C. 56 accused M. Coelius Rufus. (Comp. Cic. Fragm. p. 461; Schol. Bob. ad Cic. p. Arch. p. 357, ed. Orelli; Varro, de L. L. viii. 36.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, RUBRIUS, a contemporary of the emperor Otho, commanded a detachment of troops at Brixellum; and after the fall of Otho he assisted in suppressing the insurrection among the soldiers, A.D. 69. Shortly after he is said to have instigated Caecina to his treachery against Vitellius; and Vespasian afterwards sent him out to suppress the Sarmatians, in which he succeeded. The C. Rubrius Gallus, who was consul successively in A.D. 101, may have been a son of our Rubrius Gallus. (Tac. Hist. ii. 51, 99; Dion Cass. lxxiii. 27; Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 4. § 3.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, SULPICIVS. 1. C. SULPICIVS, C. P. SER. N. GALLUS, was consul in B.C. 243 with C. Fundanius Fundulus. (Fasti; Diod. Fragm. Vat. p. 60, ed. Dindorf.)

2. C. SULPICIVS, C. P. C. N. GALLUS. In B.C. 170 Spanish ambassadors came to Rome to complain of the avarice and extortion of the Roman commanders in Spain; and when the senate allowed them to choose four Romans as their patrons, C. Sulpicius Gallus was one of them. Towards the end of the year he was elected praetor for B.C. 169, and obtained the jurisdiction in the city as his province. During the great levy which was then made for the war against Macedonia, he protected the plebeians (i.e. the poorer classes) against the severity of the consuls. In B.C. 168 he served as tribune of the soldiers in the army of his friend L. Aemilius Paullus, with whose permission he one day assembled the troops, and announced to them that in a certain night and at a certain hour an eclipse of the moon was going to take place. He exhorted them not to be alarmed, and not to regard it as a fearful prodigy; and when at the predicted moment the eclipse occurred, the soldiers almost worshipped the wisdom of Gallus. In the autumn of the year following, when Aemilius Paullus went on an excursion into Greece, he left the command of the Roman camp in the hands of his friend; but the latter must soon after have returned to Rome, for he was elected consul for the year B. C. 166. In his consulship he carried on a successful war against the Ligurians, who were reduced to submission. On his return to Rome he was honoured with a triumph. C. Sulpicius Gallus appears to have been one of the most extraordinary men of his time; Cicero in several passages speaks of him in terms of the highest praise: he had a more perfect knowledge of Greek than any man of his time, he was a distinguished orator, and altogether a person of an elegant and refined mind. His knowledge of astronomy, which is frequently mentioned by Cicero, is attested by his predicting, with accuracy, the eclipse of the moon, which was visible in Greece. (Liv. xliii. 2, 13, 16, 17, xlv. 37, xlv. 37, 44, Epist. 46; Plin. H. N. ii. 12; J. Obseq. 71; Didasc. of Terent. Andria; Cic. Brut. 20, 23, de Re Publ. i. 14, 15, de Senect. 14, de Amic. 27, de Off. i. 6.)

3. Q. SULPICIUS GALLUS, a son of No. 2, died at an early age, and his death was borne by his father with great fortitude. (Cic. de Orat. i. 53, Brut. 23, de Amic. 2, 6, ad Fam. iv. 6.)

4. C. GALLUS (some read Gallius), a Roman senator mentioned by Cicero (in Ferr. iii. 85), but it is uncertain whether he belonged to the Sulpicia or Aquilia gens. [L. S.]

GALLUS, SURDINIUS, a wealthy Roman of the time of the emperor Claudius. When Claudius, in A. D. 46, removed a number of persons from the senate, because they had not sufficient means to keep up the senatorial dignity, Surdinius Gallus was preparing to go and settle at Carthage, but Claudius called him back, saying that he would tie him with golden chains; and Surdinius was made a senator. (Dion Cass. lx. 29.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, TISIENUS, a Roman general belonging to the party of L. Antonius and Fulvia in their war with Octavianus in B. C. 41. When Octavianus made an attack upon Nursia he was repulsed by Tisienus, who had the command in the place. In A. C. 36 he joined Sex. Pompeius in Sicily with reinforcements; but after the defeat of Sextus, he surrendered, with his army, to Octavianus. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 13, xlix. 8, 10; Appian, B. C. iv. 32, v. 104, 117, 121.) [L. S.]

GALLUS, TREBONIANUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 251-254.

C. VIRIUS TREBONIANUS GALLUS, whose origin and early history are altogether unknown, held a high command in the army which marched to oppose the first great inroad of the Goths (A. D. 251), and, according to Zosimus, contributed by his strategy to the disastrous issue of the battle, which proved fatal to Decius and Herennius. [DECIUS; HERENNIUS TRÆVSCUS.] The empire being thus suddenly left without a ruler, Gallus was selected, towards the end of November, A. D. 254, by both the senate and the soldiers, as the person best qualified to mount the vacant throne, and Hostilianus, the surviving son of the late emperor, was nominated his colleague. The first care of the new ruler was to conclude a peace with the victorious barbarians in terms of which they agreed to retire beyond the frontier, on condition of retaining their plunder and their captives and of receiving a fixed annual tribute as the price of future forbearance. The disgrace inflicted on the Roman name by this shameful concession excited the indignation of the whole nation, while the suicidal folly of the humiliating compact was soon manifested. For scarcely had the provinces enjoyed one short year of tranquillity, when fresh hordes from the north and east, tempted by the golden harvest which their brethren had reaped, poured down upon the Illyrian border. They were, however, driven back with great loss by Aemilianus, general of the legions in Moesia, whose triumphant troops forthwith proclaimed him Augustus. Gallus, upon receiving intelligence of this unexpected peril, despatched Valerianus [VALERIANUS] to quell the rebellion; but while the latter was employed in collecting an army from Germany and Gaul, Aemilianus, pressing forwards, had already entered Italy. Compelled by the urgency of the danger, Gallus, accompanied by Volusianus [VOLUSIANUS], whom he had previously invested with all the imperial dignities, marched forth to meet his rival, but before any collision had taken place between the opposing armies, both father and son were slain by their own soldiers, who despaired of success under such leaders. The precise date of this event has given rise to controversy among chronologers, some of whom fix upon the year 253, and others upon that of 254.

The name of Gallus is associated with nothing but cowardice and dishonour. The hatred and contempt attached to his memory may have led to the reports chronicled by Zosimus and Zonaras that the defeat of Decius was caused by his perfidy, and that he subsequently became the murderer of Hostilianus [HOSTILIANUS]. In addition to the misery produced by the inroads of the barbarians during this reign, great dismay arose from the rapid progress of a deadly pestilence which, commencing in Ethiopia, spread over every region of the empire, and continued its ravages for the space of fifteen years. (Zonar. xii. 20, 21; Zosim. i. 23-28; Victor, de Cæs. 30, Epist. 30; Eutrop. ix. 5; Jornandes, de Reb. Goth. 19.) [W. R.]

GALLUS, P. VOLU'MNIUS, with the agnomen Amintinus, was consul in B. C. 461 with Ser Sulpicius Camerinus. (Liv. iii. 10; Dionys. x. 1; Diod. xi. 84; Val. Max. i. 6. § 5; Plin. H. N. ii. 57.) [L. S.]

GALVIA, CRISPINILLA. [CRISPINILLA.] GAME'LII (γαμῆλοι Seul), that is, the divinities protecting and presiding over marriage. (Polux, i. 24; Maxim. Tyr. xvi. 6.) Plutarch (Quæst. Rom. 2) says, that those who married required (the protection of) five divinities, viz. Zeus, Hera, Aphrodite, Peitho, and Artemis. (Comp. Dion Chrys. Orat. vii. p. 568.) But these are not all, for the Moeræ too are called Seai γαμῆλαι (Spanheim ad Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 23, in Del. 292, 297), and, in fact, nearly all the gods might be regarded as the protectors of marriage, though the five mentioned by Plutarch perhaps more particularly than others. The Athenians called their month of Gamelion after these divinities. Respecting the festival of the Gamelia see Dict. of Ant. v. [L. S.]

GANNASCUS, a chief of the Chauci, a Suevian race settled between the Weser (Visurgis) and the Elbe (Albia). Gannascus himself, however, was of Batavian origin, and had long served Rome among the Batavian auxiliaries. He had deserted in A. D.

47, when, at the head of the Chauci, he passed up the Rhine, and ravaged the western bank of the river. His inroads were stopped by Cn. Domitius Corbulo [CORBULO], into whose hands Gannascus was betrayed, and executed as a deserter. (Tac. Ann. xi. 18, 19.) [W. B. D.]

GANNYS, distinctly mentioned by Dion Cassius in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of book seventy-eight as an active supporter of Elagabalus, being classed in the latter passage with Comazon, is believed to be the person whose name has dropped out of the text at the commencement of the sixth chapter in book seventy-nine, who is there represented as the preceptor and guardian of Elagabalus, as the individual who by his astuteness and energy accomplished the overthrow of Macrinus, and as one of the first victims of the youthful tyrant after he was seated upon the throne. Salmasianus (ad Spartian. Hadrian. 16) endeavours to show that Gannys and Comazon are not real personages, but epithets of contempt applied by the historian to the profligate Syrian, whose sensuality and riotous folly would cause him to be designated as ἔδωρ καὶ καμψύρρα (i. e. glutton and reveller). This position has, however, been most successfully attacked by Reimarus (ad Dion. Cass. lxxviii. 38), and is unquestionably quite untenable. [COMAZON.] [W. R.]

GANYMÉDES (Γανυμήδης). According to Homer and others, he was a son of Tros by Calirhoë, and a brother of Ilus and Assaracus; being the most beautiful of all mortals, he was carried off by the gods that he might fill the cup of Zeus, and live among the eternal gods. (Hom. Il. xx. 231, &c.; Pind. Ol. i. 44, xi. in fin.; Apollod. iii. 12, § 2.) The traditions about Ganymedes, however, differ greatly in their detail, for some call him a son of Laomedon (Cic. Tusc. i. 22; Eurip. Troad. 822), others a son of Ilus (Tzet. ad Lycoph. 34), and others, again, of Erichthonius or Assaracus. (Hygin. Pub. 224, 271.) The manner in which he was carried away from the earth is likewise differently described; for while Homer mentions the gods in general, later writers state that Zeus himself carried him off, either in his natural shape, or in the form of an eagle, or that he sent his eagle to fetch Ganymedes into heaven. (Apollod. l. c.; Virg. Aen. v. 253; Ov. Met. x. 255; Lucian, Dial. Deor. 4.) Other statements of later date seem to be no more than arbitrary interpretations foisted upon the genuine legend. Thus we are told that he was not carried off by any god, but either by Tantalus or Minos, that he was killed during the chase, and buried on the Mysian Olympus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀπρῶγλα; Strab. xiii. p. 587; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 986, 1205.) One tradition, which has a somewhat more genuine appearance, stated that he was carried off by Eos. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 115.) There is, further, no agreement as to the place where the event occurred. (Strab., Steph. Byz. l. c., Horat. Carm. iii. 20, in fin.) The early legend simply states that Ganymedes was carried off that he might be the cup-bearer of Zeus, in which office he was conceived to have succeeded Hebe (comp. Diod. iv. 75; Virg. Aen. i. 28); but later writers describe him as the beloved and favourite of Zeus, without allusion to his office. (Eurip. Orest. 1392; Plat. Phaedr. p. 255; Xenoph. Symp. viii. 30; Cic. Tusc. iv. 33.) Zeus compensated the father for his loss with the present of a pair of divine horses (Hom. Il. v.

266, Hymn. in Ven. 202, &c.; Apollod. ii. 5, § 9; Paus. v. 24, § 1), and Hermes, who took the horses to Tros, at the same time comforted him by informing him that by the will of Zeus, Ganymedes had become immortal and exempt from old age. Other writers state that the compensation which Zeus gave to Tros consisted of a golden vine. (Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 1399; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1697.) The idea of Ganymedes being the cup-bearer of Zeus (urniger) subsequently gave rise to his identification with the divinity who was believed to preside over the sources of the Nile (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. vi. 26; Pind. Fragm. 110. ed. Böckh.), and of his being placed by astronomers among the stars under the name of Aquarius. (Eratosth. Catad. 26; Virg. Georg. iii. 304; Hygin. Pub. 224; Poet. Astr. ii. 29.) Ganymedes was frequently represented in works of art as a beautiful youth with the Phrygian cap. He appears either as the companion of Zeus (Paus. v. 24, § 1), or in the act of being carried off by an eagle, or of giving food to an eagle from a patera. The Romans called Ganymedes by a corrupt form of his name Catamitus. (Plaut. Men. i. 2. 34.)

Ganymedes was an appellation sometimes given to handsome slaves who officiated as cupbearers. (Petron. 91; Martial, Epigr. ix. 37; Juv. v. 59.) [L. S.]

GANYMÉDES (Γανυμήδης). 1. Governor of Aenos, in Thrace, while the town and district belonged to Ptolemy Philopater, king of Egypt. (Polyb. v. 34.) Ganymedes betrayed Aenos to Philip II., king of Macedonia, B. C. 200. (Liv. xxxi. 16.)

2. A eunuch attached to the Egyptian court, and tutor of Arsinoë, youngest daughter of Ptolemy Auletes. [ARSINOË, No. 6.] Towards the end of B. C. 48 Ganymedes accompanied Arsinoë in her flight from Alexandria to the Aegyptian camp; and, after assassinating their leader, Achillas [ACHILLAS], he succeeded to the command of the troops, whose favour he had secured by a liberal donative. Ganymedes, by his skillful dispositions and unremitting attacks, greatly distressed and endangered Caesar, whom he kept besieged in the upper city of Alexandria. By hydraulic wheels, he poured sea-water into the tanks and reservoirs of the Roman quarter; cut off Caesar's communication with his fleet, equipped two flotillas from the docks, the guardships, and the trading vessels, and twice encountered Caesar, once in the roadstead, and once in the inner harbour of Alexandria. But after her brother Ptolemy joined the insurgents, the power of Arsinoë declined, and Ganymedes disappears from history. (Hirt Bell. Alex. 4—24; Dion Cass. xlii. 39—44; Lucan, x. 520—531.) [W. B. D.]

GAOS (Γαός), the commander of the Persian fleet, in the great expedition sent by Artaxerxes against Evagoras in Cyprus, B. C. 386. In this situation he was subordinate to Tiribazus, whose daughter he had married, and who held the chief command by sea; but he contributed essentially to the success of the war, and totally defeated the fleet of Evagoras off Citium. But the protracted siege of Salamis having given rise to dissensions among the generals, which led to the recall of Tiribazus, Gaos became apprehensive of being involved in his disgrace, and determined to revolt from the Persian king. Accordingly, after the termination of the Cyprian war, he kept together the forces under his command, on whose attachment he deemed that he could rely, and entered into an alliance with Acoria, king of Egypt, and with the Lacedæmonians, who gladly embraced the opportunity to renew hostilities against Persia. But in the midst of his preparations, Gæus was cut off by secret assassination. (Diod. xv. 3, 9, 18.) It is undoubtedly the same person who is called by Polyænus (vii. 20) Glæus (Γλαῖος), whom that author mentions as carrying on war in Cyprus. There is some doubt, indeed, which is the more correct form of the name. (See Casaubon, ad Polyæn. l. c.; Wesseling, ad Diod. xv. 3.) [E. H. B.]

GARANUS, a shepherd of gigantic bodily strength, who is said to have come from Greece into Italy in the reign of Evander, and slew Cacus. (Serr. ad Aen. viii. 203.) Aurelius Victor (Orig. Gent. Rom. 6) calls him Recaranus, but both writers agree in identifying him with the Greek Hercules. [L. S.]

GARGILIUS MARTIALIS. [MARTIALIS.] GARGARUS (Γάργαρας), a son of Zeus, from whom the town and mountain of Gargara in Mysia were believed to have derived their name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Γάργαρα.) [L. S.]

GARGONIUS, a Roman eque, whom Cicero calls an unlearned rabulist, but a very fluent and shrewd speaker. (Brut. 48.) A different person of the same name is ridiculed by Horace. (Sat. i. 2. 27, 4. 92.) It must be observed that in many MSS. and editions his name is written Gorgonius instead of Gargonius. There is also a rhetorician of the name of Gargonius or Gorgonius (some read Gargius), who is mentioned by Seneca, but is otherwise unknown. (Controv. l. 7, iv. 24, Suasor. i.) [L. S.]

GARIDAS, a Græco-Roman jurist, said by Nic. Comanenus Papadopoli (who calls him Garidas Leo) to have been a judex velli. (Praenot. Mystag. p. 15, 371, 400, 407.) He wrote, concerning homicides and those who take refuge in sanctuaries, to Constantine Ducas (reigned A. D. 1059-1067), not Michael Ducas, as stated by Bach and by Pohl (ad Sueres. Notit. Basil. p. 140. n. 5; Basil. ed. Fabrot. vol. vii. p. 693). He also wrote a treatise concerning actions in alphabetical order, in which arrangement he was afterwards imitated by Potho. (Basil. vol. ii. p. 548, 556, 574, 651, 652, vol. iii. p. 78, 115, 249, 353, 389, 391, vol. vii. p. 631, 914; Assemani, Bibl. Jur. Or. ii. 20. p. 411; Heimbach, De Basil. Orig. p. 73; Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Gr. Rom. Delin. § 43.) [J. T. G.]

GAUDA, a Numidian, was son of Mastanabal, grandson of Masinissa, and half-brother to Jugurtha, and had been named by his uncle Micipsa as heir to the kingdom, should Adherbal, Hiempsal, and Jugurtha die without issue. In the Jugurthine war he joined the Romans. Sallust represents him as weak alike in body and in mind; and Marius therefore, when (in a. c. 108) he was endeavouring to form a party for himself against Metellus, whom he wished to supersede in the command, had little difficulty in gaining Gauda, to whom Metellus had refused certain marks of honour, to which, as king-presumptive, the Numidian conceived himself entitled. (Sall. Jug. 65; comp. Plat. Mar. 7, 3.) [E. E.]

GAUDENTIUS, the author of an elementary treatise on music, which is written in Greek. No information whatever has come down to us concerning him, and we are in utter ignorance about him except one or two points which we may gather from the treatise which bears his name. In his theory Gaudentius follows the doctrines of Aristoxenus, whence it is inferred that he lived before the time of Ptolemy, whose views seem to have been unknown to him. His treatise bears the title Εἰσαγωγή ἀρμονικῆς; it treats of the elements of music, of the voice, of sounds, intervals, systems, &c., and forms an introduction to the study of music which seems to have enjoyed some reputation in antiquity. Cassiodorus (Divin. Lect. 8) mentions it with praise, and tells us that one of his contemporaries, Mutianus, had made a Latin translation of it for the use of schools. This translation is, however, lost. The Greek original is printed with notes and a Latin translation in Meibom's Antiq. Musicae Scriptores. (Comp. Fabr. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 647, &c.) [L. S.]

GAUDENTIUS, the pupil and friend of Philastrius [PHILASTRIUS], was, upon the death of his master, elected to the vacant see of Brescia by the united voice of both clergy and laity. Having received intelligence of his elevation while travelling in the east, he sought to decline the responsibility of the sacred office. But being warmly pressed by Ambrose, and threatened at the same time with excommunication by the oriental bishops in case he should persist in a refusal, his scruples were at length overcome. The most remarkable event of his subsequent career was the embassy which he undertook to the court of Arcadius, in A. D. 405, in behalf of Chrysostom, who has commemorated with eloquent gratitude this mark of attachment, although it was productive of no happy result. The year in which Gaudentius was born is unknown, as well as that in which he was raised to the episcopate, and that in which he died. Tillemont fixes upon A. D. 410 as the period of his decease, while by others it is brought down as low as 427.

The extant works of Gaudentius consist of twenty-one discourses (sermones), simple in style, but devoid of all grace or felicity of expression, deeply imbued with allegorical phantasies and farfetched conceits, exhibiting little to please or to instruct. Of these ten were preached during Easter (Paschales), and were committed to writing at the request of Benevolus, a distinguished member of the congregation, who had been precluded by sickness from being present; five are upon remarkable texts in Scripture, but not connected with each other; one is the address delivered on the day of his ordination (De Ordinatione sui) before St. Ambrose, who officiated on that occasion; one is on the dedication of the church (De Dedicatione Basilicæ) built to receive the relics of forty martyrs; two are in the form of epistles; the first Ad Germinium on the obligation of almsgiving, the second Ad Paulum Diaconum on the words of St. John's Gospel, "My father is greater than I," misinterpreted by the Arians; the remaining two, De Petro et Paulo, and De Vita et Obitu Philastrii, were first added in the edition of Galeardus.

The Rhythmus de Philastrio, Liber de Singularitate Clericorum, and the Commentarii in Symbolum, which have been ascribed to various fathers, certainly do not belong to Gaudentius.

The collected writings of Gaudentius were first published in the Patrum Monumenta Orthodoxographia of J. J. Grynaeus, fol. Bas. 1569, will be found also in the Bibl. Patr. Max. fol. Lug. Bat. 1677.

vol. v. p. 942, and under their best form in the edition of Philastrius by Galeardus, fol. Brix. 1738. [W. R.]

GAURADAS (Γαυράδας), the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology, in the Doric dialect, of that fanciful kind in which an echo is made to repeat the last word of the line, and thus to return an answer to its sense. The first two, out of the six lines of the epigram, may serve for an example:—

Ἄχρ' φίλα μοι συγκатаίνουσιν τι.—τί;
Ἐρῶ κόρισκας δ' δέ μ' οὐ φιλεῖ.—φιλεῖ.

Nothing more is known of Gauradas. [P. S.]

GA'VIUS or GA'BIUS, a name which occurs in some Roman municipia. Cicero mentions at least three persons of this name:—

1. P. GAVIUS, of Cosa, crucified by Verres (Cic. a. Ferr. v. 61).

2. T. GAVIUS CAEPIO, a man of wealth and rank, whose son was tribune of the soldiers in the army of Bibulus in Syria, B. C. 50 (ad Att. v. 20. § 4).

3. L. GAVIUS, who attended to the business of Brutus in Cappadocia, when Cicero was proconsul in Cilicia, and to whom Cicero offered a praefecture at the request of Brutus. Cicero, however, complains bitterly of the disrespectful behaviour of Gavius, and calls him "canis P. Clodii." (ad Att. vi. 1. § 4, 3. § 6.) Whether he is the same as the Gavius of Firmum (ad Att. iv. 8. b. § 3) cannot be determined.

Three persons of this name likewise occur in the history of Roman literature:—

1. GAVIUS APICIUS. [APICIUS, No 2.]

2. GAVIUS BASSUS. [BASSUS.]

3. GAVIUS SILO, a rhetorician, mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Senec. Controv. v. Praef.)

GAZA, THEODO'RUS, one of the latest of the scholars and writers of the Byzantine empire, was a native, not of Athens, as some have erroneously supposed, but of Thessalonica; and on the capture of that city by the Turks (A. D. 1430), he fled into Italy. He appears to have gone first to Mantua, where he studied the Latin tongue, under Victorinus of Feltria, who was then teaching at Mantua. In A. D. 1439 he was at the council of Florence; and in 1440 he was at Sienna. He afterwards settled at Ferrara, where he was appointed rector and professor of Greek in the Gymnasium on its establishment (which took place under duke Lionel, who occupied the duchy from 1441 to 1450); and, by his talents and reputation, attracted students thither from all parts of Italy. At Ferrara he composed his elements of grammar. It has been said that before this appointment he was reduced to the greatest destitution; but this is doubtful, though he has himself recorded that he gained his subsistence at one time by transcribing books; and a copy of the Politica of Aristotle and of the Iliad of Homer, transcribed by him, were, a century since, and perhaps still are, extant at Venice.

In 1450 he was, with several other Greeks, invited to Rome by Pope Nicholas V., and was employed in translating the works of Greek authors into Latin. After the death of Nicholas, Theodore went (A. D. 1456) to Naples, where he obtained an honourable appointment from the king, Alfonso the Magnanimous, to whose favour he was recommended by Panormita, the king's secretary. On the death of Alfonso (A. D. 1458), he returned to Rome, where he remained, under the patronage of Cardinal Bessarion, by whose recommendation he was provided with a benefice in the southern part of the kingdom of Naples; according to some statements, in Apulia, according to others in the country of the Brutii, i. e. in Calabria. The benefice was itself small; and the fraud or carelessness of those who received the income for him (as he continued to reside at Rome), made it still less. Disappointed in the hope of a reward for his literary labours (especially for his translations of Aristotle's De Historia Animalium) from the Pope (Sixtus IV.), whose niggardly recompense he is said to have thrown indignantly into the Tiber, he retired (according to the account most commonly received) to his benefice, and there ended his days. He was certainly buried there. Hody has, however, shown reason to doubt the truth of the story of his indignation at the Pope's niggardliness (although this niggardliness is made the subject of an indignant remonstrance by Melancthon, and of some bitter verses by Jul. Caesar Scaliger); and several authorities of the period in which he lived state that he died at Rome. It is remarkable that the place of the death of a man so eminent should be thus doubtful. Melchior Adam (Vitae Germanorum Philosopharum, ed. 3d, p. 7) states that Rudolphus Agricola heard him (A. D. 1476 or 1477) "Aristotelis scripta enarrantem"; an obscure expression, but which, if founded in fact, shows that he must have at least paid a visit to Ferrara during or after his second residence at Rome. His death occurred A. D. 1478, when he must have been far advanced in years.

The ability and learning of Theodore Gaza received the highest praise in his own and the succeeding age. His accurate acquaintance with the Latin language, and his ready and elegant employment of it, made it doubtful whether his Latin versions of Greek writers or his Greek versions of Latin writers were the more excellent. Hody has collected the eulogies passed upon him in prose and verse by many scholars, including Politian, Erasmus, Xylander, Jul. Caesar, and Jos. Scaliger, Melancthon, and Huet. He was, however, severely criticised in his own day by Georgius Trapezuntius and his son Andreas. He had incurred the enmity of George by making new Latin versions of writings which George had already translated; and Politian, though elsewhere the eulogist of Theodore, charges him with having concealed the obligations which he owed to the versions of his predecessor.

His works are as follows: 1. Γραμματικὴ Ελεγγυρίς τὰ εἰς τέσσαρα, or Introductio Grammaticae Libri IV. This Greek grammar was first printed by Aldus Manutius at Venice A. D. 1495: it long enjoyed a high reputation, and was repeatedly reprinted, entire or in separate portions. A Latin version was also made of the first and second books by Erasmus, and of the other parts by others. 2. Περὶ Μηνῶν, or De Mensibus, a treatise on the months of the Athenian calendar, first printed, with the grammar, by Aldus, as above. This also has been repeatedly reprinted, either by itself, or with a Latin version by Perellus; the version has also been separately printed, and is inserted in the Thesaurus of Gronovius. (Vol. ix. col. 977—1016.) 3. Περὶ Ἀρχαιογλωσσῶν Τόμῳ πρῶτῳ, Epistola ad Fro-

Philosophum de Origine Throcarum, published with a Latin version by Allatius, in his Σέμματα. 8vo. Colon. Ag. 1653. vol. ii. p. 381, &c. A Latin version by Castalio had been previously published with the version of the History of Laonicus Chalcondyles, by Clanserus. Fol. Basil, 1556, p. 181, &c. 4. Epistola Latina ad Christophor. Persam, printed in the Giornale de' Lett. d' Italia, vol. xix. p. 337, 12mo. Ven. 1714; and in the Disertazioni Fossiane of Apostolo Zeno, 4to. Ven. 1753, vol. ii. p. 139. Some other letters of his are mentioned by Allatius, Contra Crryphon. p. 18; and a Commentarius ad Statuas Philostrati is noticed by Nic. Commenus, Prænotion Mytalog. p. 187. He also took part in the controversy on the comparative merits of the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy; but his Contradictorius Liber ad Besaronem, pro Aristotele, in Plotonem, has never been printed. Some other unpublished writings of his are noticed by Fabricius.

His principal translations from Greek into Latin were as follows: 1. Aristotelis de Historiæ Animalium Libri IX. de Partibus Animalium Libri IV. de Generatione Animalium Libri V. In the preface he calls himself "Theodorus Græcicus Thessalonicensis." Fol. Venet. 1476. These translations have been frequently reprinted among the works of Aristotle, with or without the original. 2. Aristotelis Problemata. This version was made under the pontificate of Nicholas V., and revised under that of Sixtus IV.; and was printed at Rome A. D. 1475. The earliest edition mentioned by Fabricius is that of Venice. Fol. A. D. 1493. 3. Theophrasti Historia Plantarum Libri X., and De Causis Plantarum Libri VI. This version, prepared during the pontificate of Nicholas V., was first printed at Treviso, A. D. 1483. (Panzer, Annot. Typog. vol. iii. p. 40.) It has been reprinted, with corrections, by Heinsius and Bodaens. The little book, Theophrasti de Suffrutibus, Theodoro Gaza Interprete, published by H. Sybold, at Stussburg, is merely a reprint of the last four books of the Historia Plantarum. 4. Alexandri Aphrodisiæ Problemata Libri II., printed at Venice (fol. A. D. 1501); and often reprinted. Gaza, in his preface to this translation, rejects the common opinion, that it was the work of Alexander Aphrodisianus, and ascribes it to some later writer; but he does not name Alexander Trallianus. [ALEXANDER APHRODISIENSIS]. 5. Aelianus de Insuetudine Aciebus. Fabricius does not mention any earlier edition of this version than that of Cologne, A. D. 1524; but it was printed at Rome as early as 1487, in 4to., by Eucherius Silberus. (Panzer, Ann. Typ. vol. ii. p. 491.) 6. Chrysostomi Homilias quinque de Incomprehensibili Dei Natura. This version is found in several of the editions of Chrysostom's works. In Fabricius there is a notice of some other unpublished translations by Gaza, as of the Aphorismi of Hippocrates, and the Libri de Re Militari of the emperor Maurice.

His versions from Latin into Greek were: 1. Μήνυμα Τυλλίου Κικέρωνος Περὶ τῶν Κἀτὸν ἢ περὶ τῶν Μ. T. Ciceronis Cato sive de Senectute; and 2. the Οἶκον τοῦ Σκίπριου, Somnium Scipionis, of the same author. These were both printed by Aldus Manutius at Venice, A. D. 1519. 3. A letter of Pope Nicholas V. to Constantine Palæologus, the last emperor of Constantinople. Both the original and the version are given in the Opuscula Aurea Theologica of Arcudius, 4to. Rome, A. D. 1630, and again A. D. 1670. (Hody, De Græcis Illustribus Linguae Græcæ, &c. Induxatoribus. 8vo. Lond. 1742. C. F. Boerner, De Doctis Hominiibus Græciæ. 8vo. Lips. 1750; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. x. pp. 388—395.) [J. C. M.]

GEA'NIA GENS, a very ancient patrician gens, which traced its origin to the mythical Gyas, one of the companions of Aeneas. (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. v. 117.) According to both Livy (i. 30) and Dionysius (iii. 29), the Geganii were one of the most distinguished Alban houses, transplanted to Rome on the destruction of Alba by Tullus Hostilius, and enrolled among the Roman patres. The name, however, occurs even in the reign of Numa, who is said to have chosen Geganias as one of the vestal virgins. (Plut. Num. 10.) Another Geganias is mentioned as the wife of Servius Tullius (Plut. de Fort. Rom. p. 323), or of Tarquinius Priscus (Dionys. iv. 7); and a third Geganias occurs in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus. (Plut. Comp. Lyc. c. Num. 3.)

There appears to have been only one family in this gens, that of MACERINUS, many members of which filled the highest offices in the state in the early times of the republic. The last of the family who is mentioned is M. Geganius Macerinus, who was consular tribune in B. C. 367; and from that time the name of Geganias does not occur at all in history till the year B. C. 100, when we read of one L. Geganias who was killed along with Cn. Dolabella, the brother of Saturninus, in the troubles occasioned by the seditious schemes of the latter. (Oros. v. 17.)

GELA'NOR (Γελανόρ), king of Argos, who was expelled by Danaus. (Paus. ii. 16. § 1, 19. § 2, &c.; Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; compare DANAUS.) [L. S.]

GELA'SIUS (Γελάσιος), the name of three Greek ecclesiastical writers. There were also two Popes of the name, but neither of them comes within the limits of the present work.

1. Bishop of CAESAREA, in Palestine, author of a book, Κατὰ Ἀνωμόλους, Against the Anomœans [AETIUS]. Photius distinguishes him from the nephew of Cyril mentioned below; but Fabricius and Cave identify them. (Phot. Bibl. Codd. 89, 102.)

2. Bishop of CAESAREA, in Palestine. He was sister's son to Cyril of Jerusalem, by whose influence or authority he was appointed to his see, apparently before A. D. 367. [CYRILLUS OF JERUSALEM.] It was at Cyril's desire that Gelasius undertook to compose an ecclesiastical history, as Photius says he had read in the Προόμιον εἰς τὰ μετὰ τὴν ἀκηλυσαστικὴν ἱστορίαν Ἐδασίου τοῦ Παμφίλου, Preface to the Continuation of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius Pamphili, written by Gelasius himself. It may be observed that Photius does not seem to have read the whole work, but only the preface. It is probable that the work is referred to by Gelasius of Cyzicus in his History of the Council of Nice (i. 7), in the passage 'Ὅτε μὴ Πουφίνος ἢ γοῦν Γελάσιος ταῦτα λέγει ἄδε: from which passage probably arose the statement mentioned by Photius, but refuted by a reference to dates, that Cyril and his nephew Gelasius had translated the Ecclesiastical History of Rufinus into Greek. Fabricius confounds this Continuation of Eusebius with the History of the Nicæna Council, by Gelasius of Cyzicus; but against all evidence. for Photius expressly distinguishes between the two works, and between their respective writers, comparing the style of one with that of the other. And the preface to the Continuation quoted by Photius distinctly asserts the author to have been the nephew of Cyril. The Continuation is not extant. Fabricius, without giving his authority, places the death of Gelasius in A. D. 394.

The following writings of a Gelasius of Caesarea are mentioned; but it is not clear to which of the Gelasii they belong.

1. An Exposition of the Creed, cited by Leontius, Adv. Nestorium, lib. i., not far from the end.
2. Τῆς δεσποτικῆς Ἐπιφάνειας Πανήγυρις, or Εἰς τὰ Ἐπιφάνια λόγος, A Homily for the Epiphany, twice cited by Theodoret (Erasm. Dial. i. iii.), who classes the writer among "the ancients of Palestine." 3. A work of which Labbe has cited a fragment in his Conspectus Operum Damasceni; and which is described as Practica oroyel-eois secundum Ecclesiam. (Phot. Bibl. Codd. 88, 89; Theodoret. Opera, vol. iv. pp. 46, 251, ed. Schulze; Leontius, Adv. Nest. apud Bibl. Patrum, vol. ix. p. 684, ed. Lyon. 1677; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 290, &c.)

3. Of CYZICUS, was the son of a presbyter of the church of Cyzicus, and it was while at home in his father's house that he met with an old volume written on parchment, containing a full account of what was said and done at the first council of Nice. From this record he derived considerable aid in arguing with the Eutychians during their ascendancy under the usurper Basiliscus, A. D. 475—477; and this induced him to collect further information respecting the Council, from Joannes, Eusebius of Caesarea, Rufinus, and others. He embodied the information thus collected in a work termed by Photius Πρακτικὸν τῆς Πρώτης Συνόδου ἐν τριῶν τόμοις; The Acts of the First Council, in three parts; but, as Photius remarks, it is as much entitled to the name of History as of Acts. The work is extant in the different editions of the Concilia; but it has been suspected that the third part, or book, has been mutilated or corrupted by the earliest editors, in order to get rid of the testimony which (judging from the abstract of Photius) it afforded, that Constantine was not baptized at Rome by Pope Sylvester. The first book comprehends the history of Constantine to his victory over Licinius. The second comprehends the history of the Council; and contains some discussions between certain "philosophers," advocates of "the impious Arius and the blasphemies invented by him," and the "holy bishops" of the opposite party; which discussions Cave believes to be pure inventions either of Gelasius or of the author of the ancient manuscript which formed the basis of his work. The third book, as we now have it, contains only a few letters of the emperor Constantine. Baronius ascribes to Gelasius of Cyzicus a treatise against the Eutychians and Nestorians, of which he supposes the work De Duabus Naturis, which is commonly regarded as the original Latin work, and passes under the name of Pope Gelasius I., to be only a version. Baronius does not appear to have many supporters in this supposition. It may be observed that one manuscript used by Photius of the History of the Nicene Council was anonymous, but in another the work was inscribed "By Gelasius, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine." This inscription probably originated in a mistake. Photius could not find out who the author of the work was further than he had described himself in the preface, but says that there had been two, if not three, bishops of Caesarea of the name. (Phot. Bibl. Codd. 15, 88, 89; Labbe, Concilia, vol. ii. col. 103—286; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 291, &c., vol. xii. p. 581, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 454, ed. Ox. 1740—43; Baronius, Annal. ad Ann. 496, cap. v. &c.; Pagi, Critica in Baron.) [J. C. M.]

GELIMER (Γελίμπερ), last king of the Vandals (A. D. 530—534), son of Gelaria, grandson of Genzo, and great-grandson of Genseric, who, by the imprisonment and subsequent murder of Hilderic, the reigning sovereign, usurped the throne of Carthage, A. D. 530. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 9.) Justinian, who had formed an alliance with Hilderic, in consequence of the protection afforded by him to the Catholics in Africa, commenced a war upon Gelimer, under the command of Belisarius, which, after the two battles of Carthage and Bulla, ended in the overthrow of the Vandal kingdom in Africa, A. D. 534 (Ibid. i. 10, ii. 9); thus fulfilling a current prophecy, of which the first half had been accomplished in the defeat of Bonifacius by Genseric [GENSERIC]: "G. shall conquer B., and then B. shall conquer G." (Ibid. i. 21.)

His brother, Zano, was killed at Bulla. (Ibid. ii. 3.) He himself fled to Mount Pappua (ii. 4), was taken after a severe siege (ii. 7), carried to Constantinople, compelled to perform obeisance to Justinian, and then, though precluded by his Arianism from the Patrician order, was treated kindly, and passed the rest of his life in an estate which was allowed to him in Galatia. (ii. 9.)

His general character resembled the mingled cunning and cruelty which marked the princes of the Vandal tribes. But it can hardly be accident that has preserved so many traits of an almost romantic strain of thought and feeling. Such is his interview with his brother at Bulla, when they embraced each other in tears, with clasped hands, and without speaking a word (ii. 25). Such, when on Mount Pappua, is his request to the besieging general for a loaf, as not having seen bread for many days; a sponge to wipe his inflamed eyes, and a harp, to sing a dirge composed by himself on his own miseries (ii. 6); or, again, his determination to surrender at the moving sight of the two children fighting in the extremity of hunger for a cake (ii. 7). Such (if we adopt the interpretation of his friends) was the hysterical laugh in which, on his capture, he indulged at this sudden reverse of human fortune (ii. 7.), and his reiterated exclamation, without tear or sigh, as he walked in Belisarius' triumphal procession, "Vanity of vanities—all is vanity." (ii. 9. Comp. Gibbon, c. 41.) [A. P. S.]

GELLIAS (Γελλίας), a citizen of Agrigentum, celebrated for his great wealth and magnificent style of living, as well as for his unbounded hospitality. He flourished just before the destruction of Agrigentum by the Carthaginians under Hannibal, the son of Giscon (B. C. 406). On that occasion he fled for refuge to the temple of Athena; but when he saw that no sanctuary could afford protection against the impiety of the enemy, he set fire to the temple and perished in the flames. (Diod. xiii. 83, 90; Athen. i. p. 4, a; Val. Max. iv. 8.) The name is written Tellias in most of the MSS. of Athenaeus, and the error (if it be one) must be of ancient date, as the name is thus quoted both by Suidas

GELLIA GENS, plebeian, was of Samnite origin, and afterwards settled at Rome. We find two generals of this name in the history of the Samnite wars, Gellius Statius in the second Samnite war, who was defeated and taken prisoner, a. c. 303 (Liv. ix. 44), and Gellius Egnatius in the third Samnite war. [EGNATIUS, No. 1.] The Gellii seem to have settled at Rome soon after the conclusion of the second Punic war; since the first who is mentioned as a Roman is Cn. Gellius in the time of Cato the Censor, who defended L. Turcius when the latter was accused by Cn. Gellius. (Gell. xiv. 2.) This Cn. Gellius was probably the father of Gellius, the historian, mentioned below, with whom he has been frequently confounded. (Meyer, Orator. Rom. Fragm. p. 141, 2nd edition.) The Gellii subsequently attained the highest offices in the state; but the first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was L. Gellius Poplicola, a. c. 72. The only surnames of this gens under the republic are CANUS and POPLICOLA. It is doubtful to whom the following coin of this gens refers: it has on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse a soldier and a woman in a quadriga, with CN. GEL. ROMA.

A. GELLIUS, not Agellius as Lipsius and others have imagined, a Latin grammarian, with regard to whose history we possess no source of information except his own book. From this we gather that he was of good family and connections, a native probably of Rome; that he had travelled much, especially in Greece, and had resided for a considerable period at Athens; that he had studied rhetoric under T. Castricius and Sulpicius Apollinaris, philosophy under Calpurnius Taurus and Peregrinus Proteus, enjoying also the friendship and instructions of Favorinus, Herodes Atticus, and Cornelius Fronto; that while yet a youth he had been appointed by the praetor to act as an umpire in civil causes; and that subsequently much of the time which he would gladly have devoted to literary pursuits had been occupied by judicial duties of a similar description. The precise date of his birth, so of his death, is unknown; but from the names of his preceptors and companions we conclude that he must have lived under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and M. Aurelius, a. d. 117—180.

His well-known work entitled Noctes Atticae, because it was composed in a country-house near Athens during the long nights of winter, is a sort of miscellany, containing numerous extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on a great variety of topics connected with history, antiquities, philosophy, and philology, interspersed with original remarks, dissertations, and discussions, the whole thrown together into twenty books, without any attempt at order or arrangement. We here find preserved a multitude of curious and interesting passages from authors whose works have perished, and a vast fund of information elucidating questions which must otherwise have remained obscure; but the style is deformed by that species of affectation which was pushed to extravagant excess by Apuleius—the frequent introduction of obsolete words and phrases derived for the most part from the ancient comic dramatists. The eighth book is entirely lost with the exception of the index, and a few lines at the beginning of the sixth were long wanting, until the deficiency was supplied from the Epitome of the Divine Institutions of Lactantius (c. 28), first published in a complete form in 1712, by Pfaff, from a MS. in the Royal Library at Turin. [LACTANTIUS.] It is not probable that any portion of the Noctes Atticae was moulded into shape before a. d. 143, since, in the second chapter of the first book, Herodes Atticus is spoken of as “consulari honore praeditus,” and the seventeenth chapter of the thirteenth book contains an allusion to the second consulship of Erucius Clarus, which belongs to a. d. 146.

The Editio Princeps of A. Gellius was printed at Rome, fol. 1469, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, with a prefatory epistle by Andrew, afterwards bishop of Aleria, to Pope Paul II.; was reprinted at the same place by the same typographers in 1472, followed or preceded by the beautiful impression of Jenson, fol. Ven. 1472; and at least seven other editions of less note came forth in Italy, chiefly at Venice, before the close of the fifteenth century. The first which can advance any claim to a critical revision of the text founded on the collation of MSS. is that published at Paris, 8vo. 1585, under the superintendence of Henry Stephens and Louis Carrio, which served as the standard until superseded by the accurate labours of J. F. Gronovius, 12mo. Amst., L. Elsev., 1651, and D. Elsev., 1665, of which the latter is the superior. The Octavo Variorum (Lug. Bat. 1666, 1687) exhibit the text of J. F. Gronovius, with some additional matter by Thysius and Oisellus; but these are not equal in value to the Quarto Variorum of Jac. Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 1706 (reprinted, with some dissertations, by Conradi, 8vo. Leips. 1762), which must be regarded as the best edition, for the most recent that of Lion, 2 vols. 8vo. Gotting. 1824, 1825, is a slovenly and incorrect performance.

We have translations into English by Beloe, 3 vols. 8vo. Lond. 1795; into French by the Abbé de Vertueil, 3 vols. 12mo. Par. 1776, 1789, and by Victor Verger, 3 vols. Par. 1820, 1830; into German (of those portions only which illustrate ancient history and philosophy) by A. H. W. von Walterstern, 8vo. Lemgo, 1785. [W. R.]

CN. GELLIUS, a contemporary of the Gracchi, was the author of a history of Rome from the earliest epoch, extending, as we gather from Censorinus, down to the year b. c. 145 at least. We know that the Rape of the Sabines was commemorated in the second book; the reign of Titus Tatius in the third; the death of Postumius during the second Punic war, and the purpose to which his skull was applied by the Boii (Liv. xxiii. 24), in the thirty-third; and we find a quotation in Choriamus from the ninety-seventh, if we can trust the number. Hence it is manifest that a considerable space was devoted to the legends connected with the origin of the nation; and that if these books were in general equal in length to the similar divisions in Livy, the compilation of Gellius must have been exceedingly voluminous, and the details more ample than those contained in the great work of his successor, by whom, as well as by Plutarch, he seems to have been altogether neglected, although occasionally cited by Dionysius, and apparently both an accurate chronologer and a diligent investigator of ancient usages.

Krause, in his Vitae et Fragmenta Historicorum Romanorum, has enumerated no less than three Gellii, Cnaeus, Sextus, and Aulus; but although "Gellius" is frequently named as an annalist without any distinguishing praenomen, the two latter personages are in all probability imaginary. The only direct testimony to the existence of Sextus is contained in the tract De Origine gentis Romanae (c. 16), which is a modern forgery; the argument derived from the use of the plural Γέλλιοι by Dionysius (i. 7) will be found, upon consulting the passage, to be altogether inconclusive (Niebuhr, Röm. Hist. vol. ii. note 11); and the word Gellii adduced from Cicero (de Leg. i. 2) is a conjectural emendation. As to Aulus, we find in Nonius, it is true (s. v. Bubo), a reference to "A. Gellius historiarum libr. primo;" and in Vopiscus (Prob. sub init.) some MSS. have "M. Cato Agellius quoque," instead of the received reading, "M. Cato et Gellius historici;" but it is clear that such evidence cannot be admitted with any confidence. (Cic. de Divin. i. 26; comp. de Leg. i. 2; Dionys. i. 7, ii. 31, 72, 76, iv. 6, vi. 11, vii. 1; Plin. H. N. vii. 56; Solin. Polyh. 2, where one of the best MSS. has Gellius for Caelius; Gell. xiii. 22, xviii. 12; Censorin. de Die Nat. 17; Macrobi. Sat. i. 8, 16, ii. 13; Charisius, pp. 39, 40, 50, 55; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. iv. 390, vii. 638; Marius Victorin. p. 2468.) [W. R.]

GELLIUS, PUBLICIUS, a jurist, one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius. [T. CAESUS.] From the unusual combination of two apparently gentile names, conjectural alterations of the passage in the Digest where Publicius Gellius is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 44) have been attempted by several critics. Rutilius (Vitae Ictorum, c. 45) reads Publius Caecilius, and Hotomann reads Publicola Gellius. Accordingly, the jurist has been attempted to be identified with the L. Gellius Publicola who is spoken of by Cicero (Brut. 47) as a second-rate orator, contemporary with L. Crassus and M. Antonius; but the disciple of Servius must have been of rather later date. Maiansius makes Publicius and Gellius distinct jurists, and alters the text of Pomponius by reading duodecim instead of decem, as the number of the disciples of Servius. There is no necessity for alteration, for Publicius is used as a fictitious praenomen by Paulus, in Dig. 36. tit. 2. s. 24; and the jurist Publicius is cited, along with Africanus, by Ulpian (Dig. 38. tit. 17. s. 2. § 8); and is also cited by Modestinus (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 51. § 1), and by Marcellus (Dig. 31. a. 50. § 2).

There was a praetor Publicius, who introduced into the edict a celebrated clause (Dig. 6. tit. 2. a. 1. pr.), which gave origin to the Publiciana in rem actio. By this action a bona fide possessor was enabled, by the fiction of usucapion, to recover the lost possession of a thing, although he was not dominus ex jure Quiritium. (Inst. 4. tit. 6. § 45.) It is not unlikely that this Publicius was the jurist cited in the Digest; and there is some ground for identifying him with Q. Publicius, who was praetor peregrinus in B. C. 69. (Cic. pro Cluent. 46).

(Bertrandus, de Jurisp. ii. 16; Guil. Grotius, Vitae Juris. i. 11, § 15—18; Maiansius, ad vers. Ictorum Frag. Comment. vol. ii. p. 154—161; Zimmern, R. R. G. vol. i. § 79; Hugo, R. R. G. ed. 1832, p. 535.) [J. T. G.]

GELLIUS STATIUS. [GELLIA GENE.]

GELON (Γέλων). 1. Son of Deinomenes tyrant of Gela, and afterwards of Syracuse. He was descended from one of the most illustrious families in his native city, his ancestors having been among the original founders of Gela, and having subsequently held an important hereditary priesthood. (Herod. vii. 153.) Gelon himself is first mentioned as one of the body-guards in the service of Hippocrates, at that time tyrant of Gela, and distinguished himself greatly in the wars carried on by that monarch, so as to be promoted to the chief command of his cavalry. On the death of Hippocrates, the people of Gela rose in revolt against his sons, and attempted to throw off their yoke. Gelon espoused the cause of the young princes, and defeated the insurgents; but took advantage of his victory to set aside the sons of Hippocrates, and retain the chief power for himself, B. C. 491. (Herod. vii. 154, 155; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 95.) He appears to have held undisturbed rule over Gela for some years, until the internal dissensions of Syracuse afforded him an opportunity to interfere in the concerns of that city. The oligarchical party (called the Geomori, or Gamori) had been expelled from Syracuse by the populace, and taken refuge at Camenae. Gelon espoused their cause, and proceeded to restore them by force of arms. On his approach the popular party opened the gates to him, and submitted without opposition to his power (B. C. 485). From this time he neglected Gela, and bent all his efforts to the aggrandisement of his new sovereignty; he even destroyed Camarina (which had been rebuilt by Hippocrates not long before), in order to remove the inhabitants to Syracuse, whither he also transferred above half of those of Gela. In like manner, having taken the cities of Euboea and the Hyblaean Megara, he settled all the wealthier citizens of them at Syracuse, while he sold the lower classes into slavery. (Herod. vii. 155, 156; Thuc. vi. 4, 5.) By these means Syracuse was raised to an unexampled height of wealth and prosperity, and Gelon found himself possessed of such power as no Greek had previously held, when his assistance was requested by the Lacedaemonians and Athenians against the impending danger from the invasion of Xerxes. He offered to support them with a fleet of 200 triremes, and a land force of 28,000 men, on condition of being entrusted with the chief command of the allied forces, or at least with that of their fleet. But both these proposals being rejected, he dismissed the envoys with the remark, that the Greeks had lost the spring out of their year. (Herod. vii. 157—162; Timaeus, Frag. 87, ed. Paris, 1841.)

There is some uncertainty with regard to the conduct that he actually pursued. According to Herodotus, he sent Cadmus of Coa with a sum of money to await at Delphi the issue of the approaching contest, and should it prove unfavourable to the Greeks, to make offers of submission to the Persian monarch. But the same historian adds, that the Sicilian Greeks asserted him to have been actually preparing to join the allied armament when he was prevented by the news of the Carthaginian invasion of Sicily (Herod. vii. 163—165), and this appears to have been also the account of the matter given by Ephorus (ap. Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 146). The expedition of the Carthaginians is attributed by the last-mentioned historian (l. c.), as well as by Diodorus (xi. 1, 20), to an alliance concluded by them with Xerxes: Herodotus, with more probability, represents them as called in by Terillus, tyrant of Himera, who had been expelled from that city by Theron of Agrigentum. The circumstances of their expedition are variously related, and may be suspected of much exaggeration (see Niebuhr, Lect. on Rom. Hist. vol. i. p. 105, ed. Schmitz), but the leading facts are unquestionable. The Carthaginian general Hamilcar arrived at Panormus with an army, as it is said, of 300,000 men, and advancing without opposition as far as Himera, laid siege to that place, which was, however, vigorously defended by Theron of Agrigentum. Gelon had previously formed an alliance and matrimonial connection with Theron, having married his daughter Demarete (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ii. 1, 29): no sooner, therefore, did he hear of his danger than he advanced to his succour at the head of a force of 50,000 foot and 5000 horse. In the battle that ensued the Carthaginians were totally defeated, with a loss, as it is pretended, of 150,000 men, while nearly the whole of the remainder fell into the hands of the enemy as prisoners. Hamilcar himself was among the slain, and a few ships, which had made their escape with a number of fugitives on board, perished in a storm, so that scarcely a messenger returned to bear the disastrous news to Carthage. (Herod. vii. 165, 166; Diod. xi. 20—24; xiii. 59; Ephorus, ap. Schol. Pind. Pyth. i. 146; Polyæn. i. 27. § 2.) This victory was gained, according to the accounts reported by Herodotus, on the very same day as that of Salamis, while Diodorus asserts it to have been the same day with Thermopylae: the exact synchronism may in either case be erroneous, but the existence of such a belief so early as the time of Herodotus must be admitted as conclusive evidence of the expedition of the Carthaginians having been contemporary with that of Xerxes; hence the battle of Himera must have been fought in the autumn of 480 B.C. (Comp. Aristot. Pol. 23. § 1.)

So great a victory naturally raised Gelon to the highest pitch of power and reputation: his friendship was courted even by those states of Sicily which had been before opposed to him, and, if we may believe the accounts transmitted to us, a solemn treaty of peace was concluded between him and the Carthaginians, by which the latter repaid him the expenses of the war. (Diod. xi. 26; Timæus, ap. Schol. Pind. Pyth. ii. 3.) A stipulation is said by some writers to have been inserted that the Carthaginians should refrain for the future from human sacrifices, but there can be little doubt that this is a mere fiction of later times. (Theophrast. ap. Schol. Pind. L. c.; Plut. Apophth. p. 175, de rr. Num. vind. p. 552.) Gelon applied the large sums thus received, as well as the spoils taken in the war, to the erection of several splendid temples to adorn his favoured city, at the same time that he sent magnificent offerings to Delphi, and the other sanctuaries in Greece itself. (Diod. xi. 26; Paus. vi. 19. § 7; Athen. vi. p. 231.) He seems to have now thought himself sufficiently secure of his power to make a show of resigning it, and accordingly presented himself unarmed and thinly clad before the assembled army and populace of Syracuse. He then entered into an elaborate review of his past conduct, and concluded with offering to surrender his power into the hands of the people—a proposal which was of course rejected, and he was hailed by the acclamations of the multitude as their preserver and sovereign. (Diod. xi. 26; Polyæn. i. 27. § 1; Ael. V. H. vi. 11.) He did not, however, long survive to enjoy his honours, having been carried off by a dropsy in B.C. 478, only two years after his victory at Himera, and seven from the commencement of his reign over Syracuse. (Diod. xi. 38; Arist. Pol. v. 9; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 89; Plut. de Pyth. Orac. p. 403.) It appears from Aristotle (Pol. v. 10; see also Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 95) that he left an infant son, notwithstanding which, according to Diodorus, he on his deathbed appointed his brother Hieron to be his successor.

We know very little of the internal administration or personal character of Gelon: it is not unlikely that his brilliant success at Himera shed a lustre over his name which was extended to the rest of his conduct also. But he is represented by late writers as a man of singular leniency and moderation, and as seeking in every way to promote the welfare of his subjects; and his name even appears to have become almost proverbial as an instance of a good monarch. (Diod. xi. 38, 67, xiii. 22, xiv. 66; Plut. Dion. 5, de ser. Num. vind. p. 551.) He was, however, altogether illiterate (Ael. V. H. iv. 15); and perhaps this circumstance may account for the silence of Pindar concerning his alleged virtues, which would otherwise appear somewhat suspicious. But even if his good qualities as a ruler have been exaggerated, his popularity at the time of his death is attested by the splendid tomb erected to him by the Syracusans at the public expense, and by the heroic honours decreed to his memory. (Diod. xi. 38.) Nearly a century and a half afterwards, when Timoleon sought to extirpate as far as possible all records of the tyrants that had ruled in Sicily, the statue of Gelon alone was spared. (Plut. Timol. 23.)

Concerning the chronology of the reign of Gelon see Clinton (F. H. vol. ii. p. 266. &c.), Pausanias (vi. 9. § 4, 5, viii. 42. § 8), Dionysius (vol. 1), and Niebuhr (Rom. Hist. vol. ii. p. 97, note 201). The last writer adopts the date of the Parian chronicle, which he supposes to be taken from Timæus, according to which Gelon did not begin to reign at Syracuse until B.C. 478; but it seems incredible that Herodotus should have been mistaken in a matter of such public notoriety as the contemporaneity of the battle of Himera with the expedition of Xerxes.

2. Son of Hieron II., king of Syracuse, who died before his father, at the age of more than 50 years. Very little is known concerning him, but he appears to have inherited the quiet and prudent character of Hieron himself; and it is justly recorded to his praise, by Polybius, that he sacrificed all objects of personal ambition to the duty of obedience and reverence to his parents. (Polyb. vii. 8.) It seems clear, however, that he was associated by Hieron with himself in the government, and that he even received the title of king. (Schweighäuser, ad Polyb. v. 88; Diod. Eac.

Val. xxvi. p. 568.) Livy asserts that after the battle of Cannæ, Gelon was preparing to abandon the alliance of Rome for that of Carthage, and that he was only prevented from doing so by his sudden death; but this seems quite at variance with the statement of Polybius of his uniform submission to his father's views, and may very likely deserve as little credit as the insinuation with which Livy immediately follows it—that his death occurred so opportunely, as to cast suspicion upon Hieron himself. (Liv. xxiii. 30.) Gelon was married to Nereia, daughter of Pyrrhus, by whom he left a son, Hieronymus, and a daughter, Harmonia, married to a Syracusan named Themistius. (Polyb. vii. 4; Justin. xxviii. 3; Paus. vi. 12 § 3.) Archimedes dedicated to him his treatise called Arenarius, in which it may be observed that he addresses him by the title of king. (Arenar. p. 319. ed. Torell.)

The coins referred by earlier writers to the elder Gelon are generally admitted by modern numismatists to belong to this prince; the head on the obverse is probably that of Gelon himself; though Eckhel (vol. i. p. 255) considers it as that of the elder Gelon, and that the coins were struck in his honour, under the reign of Hieron II.

3. A native of Epeirus, in the service of Neoptolemus II., king of that country, who took occasion to form a plot against the life of Pyrrhus, when that prince and Neoptolemus had met to perform a solemn sacrifice. The conspiracy was, however, discovered, and Neoptolemus himself assassinated by his rival, B. C. 296. (Plut. Pyrrh. 5.) [E. H. B.] GELONUS. [ECHIDNA.]

GEMINA, one of the ladies who attended the philosophical instructions of Plotinus when he was at Rome in the early part of the reign of the emperor Philip, A. D. 244. Her affluence is indicated by the circumstance that the philosopher resided and taught in her house, and her age by the circumstance that her daughter, of the same name with herself, was also one of his zealous disciples. (Porphyr. Vit. Plotin. c. 3, 9.) [J. C. M.]

GEMINIUS, I. C. Praetor of Macedonia, A. C. 92. He sustained a severe defeat from the Maedians, a Thracian tribe, who afterwards ravaged the province. (Liv. Epit. 70; Jul. Obseq. de Prodig. 113.)

2. A decurio of Terracina, and a personal enemy of C. Marius the elder. The troop of horse which discovered Marius in the marshes of Minturnae, B. C. 88, had been despatched by Geminius to apprehend him. (Plut. Mar. 36, 38.)

3. A zealous partizan of M. Antony, was deputed by the triumvir's friends in Rome to remonstrate with him on his ruinous connection with Cleopatra. Geminius went to Athens in the winter of B. C. 32—31, but could not obtain a private audience from Antony. At length, being menaced by Cleopatra with the torture, he withdrew from Athens, leaving his mission unaccomplished. (Plut. Ant. 59.)

4. A Roman eque, put to death at the end of A. D. 33, on a charge of conspiracy against Tiberius, but really because of his intimacy with Sejanus (Tac. Ann. vi. 14.) [W. B. D.]

GEMINIUS METTIUS. [METTIUS.]

GEMINUS (Γεμινος). This name comes down to us in the manuscripts of Proclus, with a circumflex on the penultimate syllable. Gerard Vossius believes, nevertheless, that it is the Latin word: Petavius and Fabricius admit the circumflex without other comment than reference to Proclus. Any one is justified in saying either Geminus or Geminus, according to his theory.

Of the man belonging to this dubious name we know nothing but that, from a passage in his works relative to the Egyptian asvms vagus of 120 years before his own time, it appears that he must have been living in the year B. C. 77. He was a Rhodian, and both Petavius and Vossius suspect that he wrote at Rome; but perhaps on no stronger foundation than his Latin name and his Greek tongue, which make them suppose that he was a libertus. Proclus mentions him (p. 11 of Grynæus) as distinguishing the mathematical sciences into συντάξις and ἀριθμητική, in the former of which he places geometry and arithmetic, in the latter mechanics, astronomy, optics, geodesy, canonics, and logiké (no doubt a corruption of logistiké, or computation; Barocius has ars supputativa). Again (p. 31) Proclus mentions him as author of a geometrical work containing an account of spiral, conchoid, and cissoid lines. But Delambre (Astr. Anc. vol. i. p. 211) saw reason to question the skill of Geminus both in arithmetic and geometry.

The only work of Geminus now remaining is the Ελασμενική ἐκ τῶν Φαινομένων, which many wrongly make to be a commentary on the Phænomena of Aratus. The work on the sphere attributed to Proclus is not much more than an abridgment of some chapters of Geminus. The book of the latter is a descriptive treatise on elementary astronomy, with a great deal of historical allusion. There is a full account of it in Delambre (l. c.). The total rejection of the supposed effects of the risings and settings of the stars, &c. upon the weather is creditable to Geminus. The work was first published by Edo Hildericus, Gr. Lat. Altorf, 1590, 8vo. This edition was reprinted at Leyden, 1603, 8vo. H. Briggs diligently compared the edition with a manuscript at Oxford, and handed the results to Petavius, who made a similar comparison with another manuscript of his own, and published a corrected edition (Gr. Lat.) in his Uranologion, Paris, 1630, fol. The most recent edition is that in Halma's edition of Ptolemy, Paris, 1819, 4to. Petavius also informs us that another work of Geminus was sent to England in manuscript, with other portions of the library of Barocius (the editor of Proclus, we presume). (Proclus; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 31, &c.; Petavius, Uranologion; Weidler, Hist. Astron.; Delambre, Astron. Anc.) [A. De M.]

GEMINUS, ANTONINUS, son of M. Aurelius and Faustina, twin brother of the emperor Commodus. He died when a child of four years old. [M. AURELIUS.] [W. R.]

GEMINUS, ATYDIUS, a praetor of Achaia, but at what time is unknown. (Tac. Ann. iv. 43.) [L. S.]

GEMINUS, DUCENNIUS, was appointed by Nero, in A. D. 63, one of the three consuls who had to superintend the public vectigalia and to prosecute those who had before managed them badly. In the reign of Galba he was praefect of the city. (Tac. Ann. xv. 18, Hist. i. 14.) [L. S.]

GEMINUS, FUFIVS. In a.c. 35, when Octavianna, after subduing the Pannonians, retired to Rome, he left Fufius Geminus, with a part of his army, behind in Pannonia. Soon after the departure of Octavianus, the Pannonians rose again; but Geminus succeeded in compelling them, by several battles, to remain quiet, although he had at first been driven by them from the town of Siscia. (Dion Cass. xlix. 36.) He seems to be the same person as the one whom Florus (iv. 12. § 8) calls Vitius. Whether he stood in any relation to C. Fufius Geminus, who was consul in A.D. 29, is unknown. (Tac. Ann. v. 1.) [L. S.]

GEMINUS, SERVILIUS. 1. P. SERVILIUS, Q. F. CN. N. GEMINUS, was consul in A.C. 252, with C. Aurelius Cotta. Both consuls carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians, and some towns were taken by them. Himera was among the number; but its inhabitants had been carried off by the Carthaginians. In A.C. 248 he was consul a second time, with his former colleague, and besieged Lilybaeum and Drepana, while Carthago endeavoured to make a diversion by a descent upon the coast of Italy. (Zonar. viii. 14, 16.)

2. CN. SERVILIUS, P. F. Q. N. GEMINUS, a son of No. 1, was consul in A.C. 217, with C. Flaminius. He entered his office on the ides of March, and had Gaul for his province. He afterwards gave up his army to the dictator, Q. Fabius, and while his colleague fought the unfortunate battle of Lake Trasimene, Cn. Servilius sailed with a fleet of 120 ships round the coasts of Sardinia and Corsica in chase of the Carthaginians; and having received hostages everywhere, he crossed over into Africa. On his voyage thither he ravaged the island of Meninx, and spared Cercina only on the receipt of ten talents from its inhabitants. After he had landed with his troops in Africa, they indulged in the same system of plunder; but being careless and unacquainted with the localities, they were taken by surprise and put to flight by the inhabitants. About one thousand of them were killed, the rest sailed to Sicily, and the fleet being there entrusted to P. Sura, who was ordered to take it back to Rome, Cn. Servilius himself travelled on foot through Sicily; and being called back by the dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus, he crossed the straits, and went to Italy. About the autumn he undertook the command of the army of Minucius, and, in conjunction with his colleague M. Atilius Regulus, he carried on the war against Hannibal, though he carefully avoided entering into any decisive engagement. His imperium was prolonged for the year 216; and before the battle of Cannae he was the only one who agreed with the consul L. Aemilius Paullus in the opinion that a battle should not be ventured upon. However, the battle was fought, and Cn. Servilius himself was found among the dead. (Liv. xxi. 57, xxii. 1, 31, 32, 43, 49; Polyb. iii. 75, 77, 88, 96, 106, 114, 116; Appian, Ann. 8, 12, 16, 18, 19, 22-24; Cic. Thuc. i. 37.)

3. M. SERVILIUS, C. F. P. N. PALEX GEMINUS, was elected augur in A.C. 211, in the place of Spurius Carvilius, who had died; and in A.C. 203 he was curule aedile, and, conjointly with his colleague, he dedicated a golden quadriga on the Capitol. In the year same he was magister equitum to the dictator, P. Sulpicius Galba, with whom he travelled through Italy, to examine the causes which had led several towns to revolt against Rome. In A.C. 202 he was consul with Tib. Claudius Nero, and obtained Etruria for his province, which he occupied with his two legions, and in which his imperium was prolonged for the year following. In A.C. 200 he was one of the ten commissioners to distribute land in Samnium and Appulia among the veterans of Scipio. In A.C. 197 he was one of the triumvirs appointed for a period of three years, to establish a series of colonies on the western coast of Italy. In A.C. 167, during the disputes as to whether a triumph was to be granted to Aemilius Paullus, the conqueror of Macedonia, M. Servilius addressed the people in favour of Aemilius Paullus. (Liv. xxvi. 23, xxix. 38, xxx. 24, 26, 27, 41, xxxi. 4, xxxii. 29, xxxiv. 45, xlv. 36, &c.)

4. M. SERVILIUS GEMINUS was consul in A.D. 3, with L. Aelius Lamia (Val. Max. i. 8. § 11); but it must be observed that his cognomen, though mentioned by Valerius Maximus, does not occur in the Fasti. [L. S.]

GEMINUS, TANUSIUS, a Roman historian who seems to have lived about the time of Cicero. The exact nature of his work is uncertain, although we know that in it he spoke of the time of Sulla. (Suet. Caes. 9.) Plutarch (Caes. 22) mentions an historian whom he calls Tanusias, and whom Vossius (de Hist. Lat. i. 12) considers to be the same as our Tanusius. Seneca (Epist. 93) speaks of one Tanusius as the author of annals; and it is not improbable that this is merely a slight mistake in the name, for Tanusius; and if this be so, Tanusius Geminus wrote annals of his own time, which are lost with the exception of a fragment quoted by Suetonius. [L. S.]

GEMINUS, TULLIUS, a poet of the Greek Anthology. There are ten epigrams in the Anthology under the name of Geminus (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 279; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 254), of which the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and tenth are inscribed, in the Vatican MS. simply Γεμινου, and the eighth Γαυλιου: the first is inscribed, in the Planudean Anthology, Τυλλίου Γεμινου, and the seventh has the same heading in the Vatican MS: the 9th is inscribed, in the Planudean, Τυλλίου Γεμινου, and, in the Vatican, Τυλλίου Σαβίνου (i. e. Sabini). It is doubtful whether the Tullius, whose epigrams were included in the collection of Philip, was Tullius Geminus or Tullius Laurea. Most of the epigrams of Geminus are descriptions of works of art. They are written in a very affected manner. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 897; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 498.) [P. S.]

GEMINUS, VETURIUS. [CICURINUS.] GEMISTUS, GEORGIUS (Γεμίστος ὁ Γεωργίος), or GEORGIUS PLETHO (ὁ Πλήθων), one of the later and most celebrated Byzantine writers, lived in the latter part of the fourteenth and in the beginning of the fifteenth century. He was probably a native of Constantinople, but passed most of his life in the Peloponnesus. In 1426 he held a high office, under the emperor Manuel Palaeologus. He was called Γεμιστός, or Πλήθων, on account of the extraordinary amount of knowledge which he possessed in nearly all the branches of science; and the great number of writings which he left prove that his surname was by no means mere flattery. Gemistus was one of the deputies of the Greek church that were present at the council of Florence, held in 1438, under pope Eugenius IV., for the purpose of effecting a union between the Latin and Greek churches. Gemistus at first was rather opposed to that union, since his opinion on the nature of the Holy Ghost differed greatly from the belief of the Romish church, but he afterwards gave way, and, without changing his opinion on that subject, was active in promoting the great object of the council. The union, however, was not accomplished. Gemistus was still more renowned as a philosopher than as a divine. In those times the philosophy of Aristotle was prevalent, but it had degenerated into a mere science of words. Disgusted with scholastic philosophy, Gemistus made Plato the subject of long and deep study, and the propagation of the Platonic philosophy became henceforth his principal aim: the celebrated cardinal Bessarion was one of his numerous disciples. During his stay at Florence he was introduced to Cosmo de Medici; and having succeeded in persuading this distinguished man of the superiority of the system of Plato over that of Aristotle, he became the leader of a new school of philosophy in the West. Plato's philosophy became fashionable at Florence, and had soon gained so much popularity in Italy as to overshadow entirely the philosophy of Aristotle. But Gemistus and his disciples went too far: it was even said that he had attempted to substitute Platonism for Christianity; and before the end of the century Plato had ceased to be the model of Italian philosophers. Gemistus is, nevertheless, justly considered as the restorer of Platonic philosophy in Europe. He was, of course, involved in numberless controversies with the Aristotelians, in the West as well as in the East, among whom Georgius, of Trebisond, held a high rank, and much bitterness and violence were displayed on each side. In 1441 Gemistus was again in the Peloponnesus as an officer of the emperor: he was then advanced in years. He is said to have lived one hundred years, but we do not know when he died.

Gemistus wrote a surprising number of scientific works, dissertations, treatises, compilations, &c. concerning divinity, history, geography, philosophy, and miscellaneous subjects. Several of them have been printed. The principal are:—

1. Ἐκ τῶν Διοδώρου καὶ Πλουτάρχου, περὶ τῶν μετὰ τὴν ἐν Μαντινείᾳ μάχῃ, ἐν κεφαλαιοῖς διδλφνῶν, being extracts of Diodorus Siculus and Plutarchus, which are better known under their Latin title, De Gestis Graecorum post pugnam ad Mantinea Duobus Libris Digesta. Editions:—The Greek text, Venice, 1503, fol.; a Latin translation, by Marcus Antonius Antimachus, Basel, 1540, 4to.; the Greek text, together with Herodotus Basel, 1541; the Greek text, by Zacharias Orthus, professor at the university of Greifswald, Rostock, 1575, 8vo.; the same by professor Reichard, under the title Γεωργίου Γεμίστου τοῦ καὶ Πλάτωνος Ἑλληνικῶν Βιβλία Β, Leipzig, 1770, 8vo. There are French, Italian, and Spanish translations of this book.

2. Περὶ Εὐμαρτύνης, De Fato. Edition:—

With a Latin translation, and Bessarion's epistle on the same subject, by H. S. Reimarus, Leiden, 1722, 8vo.

3. Περὶ Ἀρετῶν, De Virtutibus. Editions:—The text, together with some of the minor works of the author, Antwerp, 1552, fol.; with a Latin translation, by Adolphus Orcanus, Basel, 1552, 8vo.; by H. Wolphius, Jena, 1590, 8vo.

4. Oraciones duas de Robus Peloponnesiacis constitutendis, one addressed to the emperor Manuel Palaeologus, and the other to the despot Theodorus. Ed. with a Latin translation, together with the Editio Princeps of the Eclogae of Stobaeus, by G. Canterus, Antwerp, 1575, fol.

5. Περὶ τῶν Ἀριστοτέλους πρὸς Πλάτωνα διαφ-εραῖ, De Platonicae atque Aristotelicae Philosophiae Differentia. Ed.:—The Greek text, with a Latin paraphrase, by Bernardinus Donatus, Venice, 1532, 8vo.; the same, with a dissertation of Donatus on the same subject, ib. 1540, 8vo.; the same, with the same dissertation, Paris, 1541, 8vo.; a Latin translation, by G. Chariandrus, Basel, 1574, 4to. This is one of his most remarkable works.

6. Μαγικὰ λόγια τῶν ἀπὸ Ζωροάστρου ἐξηγ-ήθηνα. The Greek title differs in the MSS. : the work is best known under its Latin title, Oracula Magica Zoroastri, and is an essay on the religion of the ancient Persians. Ed.:—The text, with a Latin translation, by T. Opsopoeus, Paris, 1599, 8vo.; by Thyrillisch, Leipzig, 1719, 4to.

Besides these works, Gemistus made extracts of Appian's Syriaca, his object being to elucidate the history of the Macedonian kings of Syria : of Theophrastus (History of Plants) ; Aristotle (History of Animals, &c.) ; Diodorus Siculus (with regard to the kingdoms of Assyria and Media) ; Xenophon, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, and several other writers, whose works are either partly or entirely lost. He further wrote Prolegomena Artis Rhetoricae, Funeral Orations (G. Gemistii sive Plethonis et Michaelis Apostolii Orationes Funebres Duae, in quibus de Immortalitate Animae exponitur, nunc primum ex MSS. editae, by Professor Fülleborn, Leipzig, 1793, 8vo.) ; Essays on Music, Letters to Cardinal Bessarion, and other celebrated contemporaries, &c. &c., which are extant in MS. in different libraries of Europe. His geographical labours deserve particular notice. The Royal Library at Munich has a MS. of Gemistus, entitled Διαγραφὴ ἀπόσης Πελοποννήσου παραλλοῦ καὶ μεσογείου, being a description of the Peloponnesus, in which he fixes the positions according to the system of Ptolemy, with the writer's own corrections and additions. Gemistus wrote also a Topography of Thessaly, and two small treatises, the one on the form and size of the globe, and the other on some geographical errors of Strabo, which are contained in the Anecdota of Siebenkees. Laporte Duthell, the translator of Strabo, derived considerable advantage from extracts of Gemistus, from the 7th, 8th, and 11th book of Strabo ; and the celebrated Latin edition of Ptolemy, published in 1478, and dedicated to pope Sixtus IV., by Calderino, was revised after an ancient Greek MS. of Ptolemy, in which Gemistus had written his corrections. A publication of all the different inedited MSS. of Gemistus extant in various libraries in Europe would be most desirable: the classical no less than the Oriental scholar would derive equal advantage from such an undertaking. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 79, not. dd. xii. p. 85.

&c.; Leo Allatius, De Georgiis, No. 55; Wharton in Appendix to Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 141; Boivin, Académie des Belles Lettres, vol. ii. p. 716; Hamberger, Nachrichten von den vornehmsten Schriftstellern, vol. iv. p. 712, &c.) [W. P.]

GENESIUS (Γενέσιος), that is, "the father," a surname of Poseidon, under which he had a sanctuary near Lerna, on the sea-coast. (Paus. ii. 38 § 4.) The name is identical in meaning with Genethlius (γενέθλιος), under which the same god had a sanctuary at Sparta. (Paus. iii. 15 § 7.) [L. S.]

GENESIUS, JOSEPHUS, or JOSEPHUS BYZANTI'NUS, a Byzantine writer who lived in the middle of the tenth century, is the author of a Greek history, which he wrote by order of the emperor Constantine (VII.) Porphyrogenitus. This history, which is divided into four books, and is entitled Βασίλειον Βίβλια Δ, begins with the year 813, and contains the reigns of Leo V., the Armenian, Michael II., the Stammerer, Theophilus, Michael III., and Basil I., the Macedonian, who died in 886. The work of Genesius is short, and altogether a poor compilation, or extract; but as it contains the events of a period of Byzantine history, of which we have but scanty information, it is nevertheless of importance. A MS. of this work was discovered at Leipzig in the sixteenth century, and attracted the attention of scholars. Godfrey Olearius translated it into Latin, but death prevented him from publishing his translation. It has been said that there was an edition of Genesius of 1570, published at Venice, but this is a mistake. The first edition was published at Venice by the editors of the Venetian Collection of the Byzantines, in 1733, in fol., under the title "Josephi Genesii de Rebus Constantinopolitanis, &c., Libri IV.," with a Latin translation by Berlier. The editors perused the Leipzig MS. mentioned above, but they mutilated and misunderstood the text. The best edition is by Lachmann in the Bonn edition of the Byzantines, 1834, 8vo. Joannes Scylitza is the only earlier writer who mentions the name of Genesius. Fabricius shows that it is a mistake to suppose that Josephus Genesius and Josephus Byzantinus were two different persons. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 529; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 97; Hamberger, Nachrichten von den vornehmsten Schriftstellern, vol. iii. p. 686.) [W. P.]

GENETAEUS (Γενηταίος), a surname of Zeus, which he derived from Cape Genetus on the Euxine, where he was worshipped as εὐξείνιος, i. e. "the hospitable," and where he had a sanctuary. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 378, 1009; Val. Flacc. v. 148; Strab. xii. p. 548.) [L. S.]

GENETHLIUS (Γενέθλιος), of Patrae, in Palestine, a Greek rhetorician, who lived between the reigns of the emperors Philippus and Constantine. He was a pupil of Mucianus and Agapetus, and taught rhetoric at Athens, where he died at the early age of twenty-eight. He was an enemy and a rival of his countryman Callinicus. Suidas (s. v. Γενέθλιος), to whom we are indebted for this information, enumerates a variety of works which Genethlius wrote, declamations, panegyrics, and commentaries on Demosthenes; but not a trace of them has come down to us. (Comp. Eudoc. p. 100; Hesych. Miles. s. v. Γενέθλιος.) [L. S.]

GENETYLLIS (Γενετυλλίς), the protectress of birth, occurs both as a surname of Aphrodite

(Aristoph. Nub. 52, with the Schol.), and as a distinct divinity and a companion of Aphrodite. (Suidas.) Genetyllis was also considered as a surname of Artemis, to whom women sacrificed dogs. (Hesych. s. v. Γενετυλλίς; Aristoph. Lys. 2.) We also find the plural, Γενετυλλίδες, or Γενετῶδες, as a class of divinities presiding over generation and birth, and as companions of Aphrodite Colias. (Aristoph. Thesmoph. 130; Paus. i. 1 § 4; Alciph. iii. 2; comp. Bentley ad Hor. Carm. Sæc. 16.) [L. S.]

GENITRIX, that is, "the mother," is used by Ovid (Mét. xiv. 536) as a surname of Cybele, in the place of mater, or magna mater, but it is better known, in the religious history of Rome, as a surname of Venus, to whom J. Caesar dedicated a temple at Rome, as the mother of the Julia gens. (Suet. Cæs. 61, 78, 84; Serv. ad Aen. i. 724.) In like manner, Elissa (Dido), the founder of Carthage, is called Genitrix. (Sil. Ital. i. 81.) [L. S.]

GENIUS, a protecting spirit, analogous to the guardian angels invoked by the Church of Rome. The belief in such spirits existed both in Greece and at Rome. The Greeks called them δαίμονες, daemons, and appear to have believed in them from the earliest times, though Homer does not mention them. Hesiod (Op. et Dies, 235) speaks of δαίμονες, and says that they were 30,000 in number, and that they dwelled on earth unseen by mortals, as the ministers of Zeus, and as the guardians of men and of justice. He further conceives them to be the souls of the righteous men who lived in the golden age of the world. (Op. et Dies, 107; comp. Diog. Laert. vii. 79.) The Greek philosophers took up this idea, and developed a complete theory of daemons. Thus we read in Plato (Phædr. p. 107), that daemons are assigned to men at the moment of their birth, that thenceforward they accompany men through life, and that after death they conduct their souls to Hades. Pindar, in several passages, speaks of a γενέθλιος δαίμων, that is, the spirit watching over the fate of man from the hour of his birth, which appears to be the same as the dei genitales of the Romans. (Ol. viii. 16, xiii. 101, Pyth. iv. 167; comp. Aeschyl. Sept. 639.) The daemons are further described as the ministers and companions of the gods, who carry the prayers of men to the gods, and the gifts of the gods to men (Plat. Sympos. p. 202; Appul. de Deo Socrat. 7), and accordingly float in immense numbers in the space between heaven and earth. The daemons, however, who were exclusively the ministers of the gods, seem to have constituted a distinct class; thus, the Corybantes, Dactyla, and Cabeiri are called the ministering daemons of the great gods (Strab. x. p. 472); Gigon, Tychon, and Orthages are the daemons of Aphrodite (Hesych. s. v. Γιγνών; Tzetz. ad Lycophr. 538); Hædreus, the daemon of Demeter (Etym. Magn. s. v. Ἀδρεῦς), and Acraeus, the daemon of Dionysus. (Paus. i. 2 § 4.) It should, however, be observed that all daemons were divided into two great classes, viz. good and evil daemons. The works which contain most information on this interesting subject are Appuleius, De Deo Socratis, and Plutarch, De Genio Socratis, and De Defectu Oraculorum. Later writers apply the term δαίμονες also to the souls of the departed. (Lucian, De Mort. Perieg. 36; Dorville, ad Chariton. i. 4.)

the name Genius itself is Latin (it is connected with gen-itus, γέν-ν-ο-μαι, and equivalent in meaning to generator or father; see August. de Civ. Dei, vii. 13). The genii of the Romans are frequently confounded with the Manes, Lares, and Penates (Censorin. 3.); and they have indeed one great feature in common, viz. that of protecting mortals; but there seems to be this essential difference, that the genii are the powers which produce life (dii genitales), and accompany man through it as his second or spiritual self, whereas the other powers do not begin to exercise their influence till life, the work of the genii, has commenced. The genii were further not confined to man, but every living being, animal as well as man, and every place, had its genius. (Paul. Diac. p. 71; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 302.) Every human being at his birth obtains (sortitur) a genius. Horace (Epist. ii. 2. 187) describes this genius as vultu mutabilis, whence we may infer either that he conceived the genius as friendly towards one person, and as hostile towards another, or that he manifested himself to the same person in different ways at different times, i. e. sometimes as a good, and sometimes as an evil genius. The latter supposition is confirmed by the statement of Servius (ad Aen. vi. 743), that at our birth we obtain two genii, one leading us to good, and the other to evil, and that at our death by their influence we either rise to a higher state of existence, or are condemned to a lower one. The spirit who appeared to Cassius, saying, "We shall meet again at Philippi," is expressly called his evil spirit, κακοδαίμων. (Val. Max. i. 7. § 7; Plut. Brut. 36.) Women called their genius Juno (Senec. Epist. 110; Tibull. iv. 6. 1); and as we may thus regard the genii of men as being in some way connected with Jupiter, it would follow that the genii were emanations from the great gods. Every man at Rome had his own genius, whom he worshipped as sanctus et sanctissimus deus, especially on his birthday, with libations of wine, incense, and garlands of flowers. (Tibull. ii. 2. 5; Ov. Trist. iii. 13. 18, v. 5, 11; Senec. Epist. 114; Horat. Carm. iv. 11. 7.) The bridal bed was sacred to the genius, on account of his connection with generation, and the bed itself was called lectus genialis. On other merry occasions, also, sacrifices were offered to the genius, and to indulge in merriment was not unfrequently expressed by genio indulgere, genium curare or placare. The whole body of the Roman people had its own genius, who is often seen represented on coins of Hadrian and Trajan. (Arnob. ii. 67; Serv. ad Aen. vi. 603; Liv. xxx. 12; Cic. pro Cluent. 5.) He was worshipped on sad as well as on joyous occasions; thus, e. g. sacrifices (maiores hostiae caesae quinque, Liv. xxi. 62) were offered to him at the beginning of the second year of the Hannibalian war. It was observed above that, according to Servius (comp. ad Aen. v. 95), every place had its genius, and he adds, that such a local genius, when he made himself visible, appeared in the form of a serpent, that is, the symbol of renovation or of new life. The genii are usually represented in works of art as winged beings, and on Roman monuments a genius commonly appears as a youth dressed in the toga, with a patera or cornucopia in his hands, and his head covered; the genius of a place appears in the form of a serpent eating fruit placed before him. (Hartung, Die Reliq. der Röm. i. p. 32, &c.; Schömann, de Dii Manibus, Laribus, et Geniis, Greifswald, 1840.) [L. 8.]

GENNA'DIUS, a presbyter of Marseilles, who flourished at the close of the fifth century, is known to us as the author of a work De Viris Illustribus, containing one hundred short lives of ecclesiastical writers from A. D. 392 to about A. D. 495, thus forming a continuation of the tract by Jerome which bears the same title. The last notice, devoted to the compiler himself, embraces all that is known with regard to his history and compositions: "Ego Gennadius, Massiliæ presbyter, scripsi adversus omnes hæreses libros octo, et adversus Nestorium libros sex, adversus Pelagium libros tres, et tractatus de mille annis et de Apocalypsi beati Johannis, et hoc opus, et epistolam de fide mea misi ad beatum Gelasium, urbis Romæ episcopum." Gelasius died A. D. 496.

Of the writings here enumerated, none have been preserved, with the exception of the Biographical Sketches and the Epistola de Fide mea, or, as it is sometimes headed, Libellus de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus, which was at one time ascribed to St. Augustin. Notwithstanding the pretensions put forth by Gennadius himself as a champion of orthodoxy, expressions have been detected in both of the above pieces which indicate a decided leaning towards Semipelagianism. On the other hand, it has been maintained that the whole of these passages are interpolations, since the most obnoxious are altogether omitted in the two oldest MSS. of the De Viris Illustribus now extant, those of Luca and Verona. The preliminary remarks upon Jerome are also, in all probability, the production of a later hand.

The De Viris Illustribus was published in a volume containing the Catalogue of Jerome, along with those of Isidorus, Honorius, &c., by Saffridus, 8vo. Colon., 1580; with the notes of Miræus, fol. Antw. 1639; with the notes of Miræus and E. S. Cyprianus, 4to., Helms., 1700; by J. A. Fabricius, in his Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica, fol., Hamb., 1718, and is included in most editions of the collected works of Jerome.

The Libellus de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus will be found in the Benedictine edition of St. Augustin, vol. viii. Append. p. 75. and was published separately by Elmenhorst, 4to., Hamburg, 1614. (See the historians of Semipelagianism referred to at the end of the article CASIANUS.) [W. R.]

GENNADIUS (Γεννάδιος), the name of two Greek prelates, both bishops or patriarchs of Constantinople.

1. The earlier of the two was a presbyter of the Church of Constantinople, and became bishop of that see, A. D. 459, on the decease of Anatolius [ANATOLIUS]. He was one of those who pressed the emperor Leo I., the Thracian, to punish Timothy Aelurus (or the Cat), who had occupied the see of Alexandria on the murder of Proterius, and his intervention was so far successful that Timothy was banished, A. D. 460. He also opposed Peter Gnaphæus (or the Fuller) who, under the patronage of Zeno, son-in-law of the emperor, and general of the Eastern provinces, had expelled Martyrius from the see of Antioch, and occupied his place. Gennadius honourably received Martyrius, who went to Constantinople, and succeeded in procuring the banishment of Peter, A. D. 464. Gennadius died, A. D. 471, and was succeeded by Acacius [ACACIUS, No. 4]. Theodore Anagnostes (or the Reader) has preserved some curious particulars of Gennadius, whose death he seems to ascribe to the effect of a vision which he had while praying by night at the altar of his church. He saw the Evil one, who declared to him that, though things would remain quiet in his lifetime, his death would be followed by the devastation of the Church, or, as Theophanes has it, by the predominance of the Devil in the Church. (Evang. H. E. ii. 11; Theod. Lect. H. E. excerpta apud Niceph. Callist. i. 13—26; Theophan. Chronog. vol. i. pp. 172—176, ed. Bonn.)

2. The second GENNADIUS belongs to the last age of the Byzantine empire, the fall of which he survived. He was known in the earlier part of his life as GEORGIUS SCHOLARIUS (Γεωργίος ὁ Σχολάριος).

It has been disputed whether there were two persons contemporaries, called originally Georgius Scholarius and afterwards Gennadius, or only one. Leo Allatius and Matthæus Caryophyllus, bishop of Iconium, agree in making two: one a layman who attended the emperor John II. Palaeologus at the Council of Florence, and warmly and constantly advocated the union of the Greek and Latin churches; and the other a monk, an intimate friend and disciple of Mark, archbishop of Ephesus, the great opponent of the union, and cordially combined with him in that opposition. But Allatius and Caryophyllus differ remarkably from each other in this: according to the former, the layman afterwards became an ecclesiastic and patriarch of Constantinople, while the monk never acquired any ecclesiastical dignity, and perhaps died before the overthrow of the Byzantine empire: according to the latter, the layman died before the overthrow, while the monk survived it and became patriarch. We concur with Fabricius and others that the distinction of two Georgii and Gennadii is unsupported by evidence, and improbable in itself, and that there was only one person at that time who at successive periods of his life bore the names of George and Gennadius. The subject is discussed by Allatius in his Diatriba de Georgio, contained in the 12th vol. of the Bibl. Gr. of Fabricius, and by Fabricius himself in the 11th vol. of the same work. It is to be observed that Allatius makes even a third Gennadius Georgius Scholarius, whom he terms Metropolitā Phasorum, to whom Franciscus Philéppus addresses a Greek elegy in the second book of his Psychagogia Carm. Græc.

George Scholarius was probably a native of Constantinople, and obtained at an early age a high reputation for his attainments both in philosophical and legal knowledge, and for his eloquence. The time of his birth is not known. He enjoyed the friendship of the most important personages at the court of Constantinople, the emperor John II. Palaeologus, the princes Constantine (afterwards emperor) and Theodore Palaeologus, brothers of John, and the great duke Luke Notaras, son-in-law of John. He corresponded with persons of eminence in Italy, including Franciscus Philéppus (who was intimate with George during his stay at Constantinople), Mark Lipomanus, and Ambrose the Camaldolite. Many of his letters to these persons are extant in MS. but without date or place of writing.

In A. D. 1438—39, George, who held the post of chief judge of the palace, attended the emperor John at the councils of Ferrara and Florence. It is probable that he had been originally unfavourable to the project of uniting the Greek and Latin Churches, which formed the business of these councils; but his opinions were either changed or overruled by the emperor, who was anxious for the union; and though a layman, he was allowed to speak at the council in favour of the project. (Labbe, Concil. vol. xiii. col. 478.) The three orations ascribed to him and subjoined to the Acts of the Council (Labbe, vol. xiii. col. 563—675), are probably much interpolated. A letter of his to the council is also subjoined to the Acts, col. 543—564. A letter of Mark of Ephesus to George severely reprehends this dereliction of his former views; and it was possibly the influence of Mark which determined George, on his return to Constantinople, to give his most strenuous opposition to the union.

When Constantine XIII. Palaeologus ascended the throne, on the death of his brother John, A. D. 1448, George energetically disputed with the bishop of Cortona, the legate sent by Pope Nicholas V. to induce the new emperor to confirm the union of Florence; but fearing that his opposition would irritate the emperor, he retired into a monastery, which he had bound himself by a vow to do as early as his thirtieth year, but had hitherto been prevented by various circumstances from carrying into effect. When the pope renewed his efforts for the union (A. D. 1452), the Greek clergy, of whom the greater number and the most important were opposed to the union, were guided by the influence and advice of Gennadius; but the union was, notwithstanding their opposition, confirmed by the emperor. During the siege of Constantinople, Gennadius foretold the overthrow of the city and empire, as the penalty of their having betrayed the faith of their fathers.

On the capture of the city by Mohammed II., Gennadius attempted to escape, but was brought back. The patriarch of Constantinople, a favourer of the union of Florence, had fled into Italy, and Mohammed directed the clergy of Constantinople to elect another in his room. Gennadius was unanimously chosen, although against his own will; but after a time, disheartened by the condition of his church, he abdicated his patriarchal dignity, about A. D. 1457, or 1458, according to some indications in his own writings, or 1459, according to other statements. After his abdication, he retired to a monastery near Serræ. The time of his death is not known.

The writings ascribed correctly or otherwise to Gennadius, and extant in MS., are very numerous. They are given by Fabricius and Harless to the number of nearly a hundred; beside his letters, which are tolerably numerous, and have furnished Fabricius with the materials of his account of the writer. His Orationes at the council of Florence have been noticed; and an Apologia pro quinque Capitulis Concilii Florentini, which, if it be really his, has been much interpolated, has been repeatedly printed in a Latin version in the Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. xxvi. ed. Lyon. 1677), and elsewhere. His exposition of the Christian faith, addressed to Mohammed II., entitled Περὶ τῆς μὲν πρὸς τοὺς ὁρθόδοξους τῶν ἀνθρώπων, exists in two forms, of which the shorter is given in the Turco-Græcia of Crusini, with a Latin and a Turkish version, the latter in Greek and Roman, or rather Italic characters. A Latin version is printed in the Bibliotheca Patrum and elsewhere. The Bibliotheca Patrum contains a version of all or most of his other writings. An edition of this treatise, with a Latin version by J. A. Brassicanus, 8vo., Vienna, 1530, contains another piece ascribed to Gennadius, entitled Homologia sine Confessio Fidei. A considerable part of his works is on the question of the union of the churches, and these are almost entirely in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. pp. 349—393; Allatius, Diatriba de Georg. apud Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii.; Crusius, Turco-Graecia, lib. i. ii.) [J. C. M.]

GENSERIC (Γησέριχος), king of the Vandals, and the most terrible of any of the barbarian invaders of the empire. He was the bastard son of Godigisidus (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 3) or Modigisidus (Hist. Miscell. 14), king of the Vandal settlers in Spain, and left, in conjunction with his brother Gontharis or Gonderic, in possession of the throne. His life divides itself into two parts: 1st, the conquest of Africa (A. D. 429—439); 2nd, the naval attacks on the empire itself (A. D. 439—477).

1. In May A. D. 429 (Idatii Chron.), at the invitation of Bonifacius [BONIFACIUS], Genserich crossed the straits of Gibraltar, at the head of 50,000 men, to take possession of the Roman provinces in the north of Africa. Joined by the Moors and the Donatists, of whom the former disgraced his march by their savage licentiousness, and the latter by their fanatical cruelties, he ravaged the whole country with frightful severity. Of the two chief cities, Hippo fell before him. After the death of Augustin, and the flight of Bonifacius, in 431, and the capture of Carthage, in October 439, the whole province was divided amongst the Vandals, and every city, except Carthage, dismantled. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 3, 5; Chronicles of Idatius, Prosper, Marcellinus; Victor Vitensis, ap. Ruinart.)

2. The fleets of Genserich were the same terror to the coasts of the Mediterranean as those of Carthage had been six centuries before, and as those of the Normans were four centuries afterwards. In June 455, invited by the empress Eudocia to aid her against the usurper Maximus, Genserich sailed to Ostia; and, although somewhat mitigated by the supplications of Pope Leo, who again interceded for his country at the gates of Rome [ATTILA], he attacked and sacked the city for fourteen days and nights, and returned, carrying with him the statues from the Capitol, the vessels of the Temple of Jerusalem from the Temple of Peace, and thousands of captives—amongst them the empress and her daughters, whose sufferings have become famous through the alleviation which they received from the Christian charity of Deogratias, bishop of Carthage. In the same invasion were destroyed Capua, Nola, and Neapolis. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 4, 5; Jornandes, Reb. Get. c. 45; Chronicles of Idatius, &c.; Hist. Miscell. 15.)

Twice the empire endeavoured to revenge itself, and twice it failed: the first was the attempt of the Western emperor Majorian (A. D. 457), whose fleet was destroyed in the bay of Carthage. The second was the expedition sent by the Eastern emperor Leo, under the command of Heraclius, Marcellinus, and Bantiscus (A. D. 468), which was also baffled by the burning of the fleet off Bona. After thus securing all his conquests, and finally making peace with Zeno, the Eastern emperor, he died A. D. 477, at a great age, leaving in his will instructions that his kingdom should always descend in the line of the eldest male heir. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 6, 7.)

In person Genserich was of short stature, and lame, from a fall from his horse; of few words, austere life, fierce, covetous, and cunning. (Jornandes, Reb. Get. c. 33.) In religion he shared the Arianism of all the Gothic tribes; and in the cruelties exercised under his orders against his Catholic subjects he exhibited the first instance of persecution carried on upon a large scale by one body of Christians against another. (Victor Vitensis, ap. Ruinart.) Of his general cruelty, the most notable instance is the cold-blooded murder of 500 Zacynthian nobles, in revenge for his repulse at Taenarus. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 22.) So also his cruelties to Gonderic's widow and sons. (Prosop. A. D. 442.) The story of the murder of Gonderic himself was disputed by the Vandals. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 4.) His skill in generalship is indicated by the ingenious concealment of the fewness of his forces in 429, by giving his commanders the name of Chiliarchs. (ib. 5.) The two most striking personal anecdotes recorded of him are, first, the interview with Majorian, when not discovering his imperial guest, through the disguise which he had assumed, Genserich was startled by the spontaneous clashing of the arms in the arsenal, and took it to be caused by an earthquake (ib. 7); the second, his answer to the pilot, who asked him, as they left the port of Carthage, on one of his marauding expeditions, where they should go? "Against whomsoever God's anger is directed." (ib. 5.)

His name long remained as the glory of the Vandal nation. (Procop. Bell. Vand. ii. 2.) But his career in Africa was shorn of its natural effects by the reconquest of that province under Belisarius. In works of art, the city of Rome lost more by his attack than by that of any other of the barbarian invaders. (Comp. Gibbon, c. 33, 36.) [A. P. S.]

GENTIUS (Γέντιος, or Γένθιος—the latter is, according to Schweighäuser, the reading of all the MSS. of Polybius), son of Pleuratus, a king of the Illyrians, contemporary with Perseus, the last king of Macedonia. He is first mentioned as having incurred the displeasure of the Romans on account of the piracies of his subjects, who infested all the Adriatic, and his answers to their complaints were far from satisfactory. (Liv. xl. 42.) This was as early as B. C. 180; eight years afterwards, when it was seen that matters were clearly tending to a rupture between the Romans and Perseus, fresh complaints were made against Gentius by the people of the Greek city of Issa, who accused him of joining with the king of Macedonia in preparing war against Rome. (Liv. xlii. 26.) Yet it does not appear that any negotiations had actually taken place between them at this time, and it is certain that Gentius did not openly declare in favour of Perseus until long after. Immediately on the breaking out of the war (B. C. 171), fifty-four light vessels belonging to him, which were stationed at Dyrrachium, were seized by the prætor, C. Lucretius, under pretence that they were sent thither to the assistance of the Romans. (Liv. xlii. 48.) It is not clear whether Gentius had yet made up his mind which side he would take: perhaps he was waiting to see the probable result of the war. Several embassies had been previously sent him by the Romans, but without effect; and it was even said that one of the ambassadors, L. Decimianus, had allowed himself to be bribed by the Illyrian king. (Liv. xlii. 26, 37, 45.) The envoys of Perseus could at first obtain little more success: Gentius represented that he could not stir without money, which the Macedonian king was unwilling to grant; and it was not till the fourth year of the war (B.C. 168) that Perseus, alarmed at the successes of the Romans, consented to secure the alliance of the Illyrian by the payment of a sum of 300 talents. A treaty having been concluded on these terms, and confirmed by oaths and the sending of mutual hostages, Gentius allowed himself to be led into acts of direct hostility against the Romans, before he had actually received the stipulated sum: but as soon as Perseus saw that he was so far committed that he could no longer withdraw from the contest, he immediately recalled the messengers, who had actually set out with the money, and refused to fulfil his agreement (Polyb. xxviii. 8, 9, xxix. 2, 3, 5; Liv. xiv. 23—27.) Yet, though thus scandalously defrauded by his ally, Gentius made no attempt to avert the war, but assembled forces both by sea and land. The contest was, however, very brief: no sooner had the Roman praetor, L. Anicius, entered Illyricum at the head of an army, than many towns submitted to him. Gentius threw himself into the strong fortress of Scodra; but having been defeated in a combat beneath the walls, he despaired of success, and placed himself at the mercy of the Roman general. The whole war is said to have been terminated within the space of thirty days. Anicius spared the life of his captive, but sent him to Rome, together with his wife and children, to adorn the triumph which he celebrated the following year (B.C. 167). From thence Gentius was sent as prisoner to Spoletium, where he probably ended his days in captivity. (Liv. xlv. 30—32, xlv. 43; Polyb. xxx. 13; Appian, Illyr. 9; Eutrop. iv. 6.)

According to Polybius, Gentius was immoderately given to drinking, which inflamed his naturally cruel and violent disposition, and led him to commit great excesses. Soon after his accession he put to death his brother, Pleuratus, who had been engaged to marry Pituta, the daughter of a Dardanian prince, and kept the intended bride for himself. (Polyb. xxix. 5; Liv. xlv. 30.) He subsequently married a princess of the name of Elera, who was sent captive to Rome together with him. (Liv. xlv. 32.) According to Pliny (H.N. xxv. 34) and Dioscorides (iii. 3), the herba Gentiana, well known for its medicinal properties, derives its name from this Gentius, who first made known its value. [E.H.B.]

GENUCIA GENS, patrician, as is clear from the fact of T. Genucius Augurinus having been consul in A.D. 451, and M. Genucius Augurinus in A.D. 445, since in those years plebeians were not yet allowed to hold the consulship. In the earliest as well as in the later times we find plebeian Genucii, who acted as strenuous champions of their order; and they had probably become plebeians in the usual manner, either by mixed marriages or by transition to the plebs. The cognomens of this gens are AVENTINENSIS, AUGURINUS, CIPUS, CLIPENSA. [L.S.]

GENUCIUS. 1. T. GENUCIUS, was tribune of the plebs in A.C. 476; and in conjunction with his colleague, Q. Considius, he brought forward an agrarian law, and also accused T. Menenius Laetanus, who was charged with being the cause of the destruction of the Fabii on the Cremera. (Liv. ii. 52; Dionys. ix. 26; comp. CONNIDIUS, No. 1.)

2. CN. GENUCIUS, was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 473, and used the most vehement exertions to carry into effect the agrarian law, for the evasion of which he brought a charge against L. Furius and C. Manlius, the consuls of the preceding year. The patricians were greatly alarmed, and assassinated Genucius in his bed on the night before the accusation was to be brought before the people. (Liv. ii. 54; Dionys. ix. 37, &c., x. 38; Zonar. vii. 17; comp. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 208, &c.)

3. GENUCIUS, a tribune of the people, who was insulted by the Faliscans, against whom, in consequence, the Romans declared war. (Plut. C. Gracch. 3.) To what time this event belongs is not quite certain, though it may refer to the last war against the Faliscans, which broke out in B.C. 241.

4. L. GENUCIUS, was sent in B.C. 210 as ambassador to Syphax, king of Numidia. (Liv. xxvii. 4.)

5. M. GENUCIUS, tribune of the soldiers in B.C. 193, under the consul L. Cornelius Merula, fell in battle against the Boians. (Liv. xxxv. 5.)

6. GENUCIUS, a priest of the Magna Mater, that is, a gallus. A legacy had been left him, and he had been pronounced the legitimate heir by the praetor Cn. Aufidius Orestes; but the consul Mam. Aemilius Lepidus (B.C. 77) declared that he could not take possession of the inheritance, being neither a man nor a woman, but an eunuch. (Val. Max. vii. 7. § 6.) [L.S.]

GEORGIUS (Γεωργιος), historical, the name of several persons mentioned by the Byzantine historians, but none of them were of much importance.

1. One of the officers (Theophanes describes him as κουβερτωρ τῶν Μαρίων, "steward of the lands or revenues of Marina") of Justinian I., on whose illness (A.D. 561) he was accused by the ex-praefect, Eugenius, of wishing to raise Theodore, the son of Peter Magister, to the empire. The charge was supported by the praefects, Aetherius of Antioch and Gerontius of Constantinople; but on examination, it could not be proved; and the accuser, Eugenius, was himself punished, though not capitally. (Theoph. Chronog. vol. i. p. 363, ed. Bonn.)

2. Collector of the revenue in the cities of the eastern part of the Byzantine empire, was sent as ambassador by the emperor Mauricius shortly before his death in A.D. 602 to Chosroës or Khoru II., king of the Persians. (Theophylact. Sinocat. Hist. viii. 1; Phot. Bibl. cod. 65, p. 32, ed. Bekker.)

3. Turmarchus, or commander of a division of the troops of the thema Armeniacum in the sixth Persian campaign of Heraclius (A.D. 626 or 627) against Chosroës or Khoru II. (Theoph. Chronog. vol. i. pp. 492, 499, ed. Bonn.)

4. Praefectus Militarium Tabularum, in the reign of the emperor Theophilus (who reigned from A.D. 829 to 842), mentioned on one or two occasions by the continuator of Theophanes. An Arabian prophetess or fortune-teller, whom the emperor had sent for to court, is said to have foretold that George would be killed by a slave in the Hippodrome, and his property confiscated. (Theoph. Continuad. lib. iii. De Theophilo Michaelis Filio, c. 27; Sym. Mag. De Theophilo, c. 14.)

5. Brother to the emperor Michael IV., the Paphlagonian, before whose elevation George (who was an eunuch) was in a low condition, but was

(A. D. 1035) after that event elevated to the office of Protovestiarius. On the accession of Michael V. Calaphates (A. D. 1041), he was banished to his estate in Paphlagonia. (Cedren. Compend. vol. ii. pp. 504, 512, ed. Bonn.)

6. Distinguished by the title SEBASTUS, lived in the reign of Alexis II. Comnenus, who reigned from A. D. 1180 to 1183. [ALEXIS, or ALEXIUS II. COMNENUS.] Andronicus, afterwards the emperor Andronicus I. [ANDRONICUS I. COMNENUS], had married George's sister, and wished to employ him and another person to make away with the empress Maria, mother and guardian of Alexis. Both of them refused to embroil their own hands in her blood, but wanted either the power or the will to prevent him from executing his purpose by other instruments. (Nicetas Choniates. Alex. Manuel. Fil. c. 17.)

7. BRANAS (Βρανᾶς), with his brother Demetrius Branas, was engaged, A. D. 1165, in the expedition sent by the emperor Manuel Comnenus against the Hungarians. (Cinnamus, vi. 7; Ducange, Familiae Byzant. p. 215, ed. Paris.)

8. BRYENNIUS (Βρυέννιος), was governor of the fortresses of Stenimachus and Trapeza during the reign of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the elder. He recovered (A. D. 1322) the town of Philippopolis, which had fallen into the hands of Terterus, king of the Moesi or Bulgarians. George Bryennius afterwards held the office of Magnus Drungarius. (Cantacuzenus, i. 36, 37; Ducange, Famil. Byzant. p. 177.)

9. BURAPHUS (Βορᾶφος), the patrician, count of the Thema Obsequium, comprehending the parts of Mysia and Bithynia adjacent to the Propontia. He was in Thrace with his forces, defending that province from the Bulgarians, when he entered into a conspiracy with Theodore Myricus to dethrone the emperor Philipicus, or Burdanes, who was seized and blinded (A. D. 718) by Rufus, an officer sent by George to Constantinople with a few soldiers. But George himself and his principal accomplices suffered the same fate very shortly after at the hands of the new emperor Artemius or Anastasius II. (Nicephor. Constantinop. De Rebus post Mauric. Gestis, p. 55, ed. Bonn.; Theophanes, Chronog. vol. i. p. 587, 588, ed. Bonn.)

10. CHUMNUS (Χοῦμνος), one of the officers (δὲ ἐκ τῆς τρωτένης) of the court of Joannes I. Palaeologus, during his minority. Having insulted the Magnus Domesticus, Joannes Cantacuzenus, and fearing his vengeance, he was led to join the party of Apocaucus, and took part in the war against Cantacuzenus (A. D. 1341). Having become weary of the war, or of his party, he accused Apocaucus of mismanagement and was in consequence imprisoned in his own house by him. (Cantacuzenus. Hist. iii. 2, 19, 20, 54, 55.)

11. COCALAS (Κωκαλάς), a leader of some note on the side of Palaeologus, in the struggle between Joannes I. Palaeologus and Joannes Cantacuzenus. (Cantacuz. Hist. iii. 93, 94.)

12. DROSUS (Δρόσος), secretary of Aaron, governor of Baspracania, on the Armenian frontier, was sent by the emperor Constantine X. Monomachus (apparently about A. D. 1049) to the sultan of the Seljukian Turks, to negotiate the release of the Byzantine general, Liparites, who had been taken in war. (Cedren. Compend. vol. ii. p. 580, ed. Bonn.)

13. EUPHORBENUS CATACALON (Εὐφορβήνους

Κατακαλόν), commanded the fleet of Alexis I. on the Danube, against the Scythians, and was one of the generals in the war against the Comani. Both these wars took place before the first crusade, A. D. 1096. (Anna Comn. Alexias, lib. vii. x. pp. 169, 192, 273, ed. Paris; Ducange, Fam. Byz. p. 178.)

14. MANGANER or MANGANES (Μαγγάνης or Μαγκάνης), was one of the secretaries of Alexis I. [ALEXIS or ALEXIUS I. COMNENUS], when he besieged Constantinople (A. D. 1081), in his struggle to wrest the crown from his predecessor, the emperor Nicephorus III. Botaniates. He was a crafty far-seeing man, apt at finding excuses for the delay of anything which the interest of his master required to be deferred. Anna Comnena formed from his name a verb (μαγγανεύειν or μαγκανεύειν) denoting "to find excuses;" and a noun (μαγγανεύημα) denoting "a pretext." (Anna Comn. Alex. ii. 8, 10, pp. 116—122, ed. Bonn.)

15. MANIACES (Γεώργιος δὲ Μανιάκης), the patrician, the son of Gudelius Maniaces, was governor of the city and thema of Teluch (Τελούχ), in or near the Taurus, in the reign of the emperor Romanus III. Argyrus, about A. D. 1030. After the defeat of the emperor by the Saracens near Antioch, George defeated the victorious enemy by stratagem near Teluch; and by this exploit obtained the governorship of the Roman province of Lower Media. He was, apparently after this, protospatharius and governor of the cities on the Euphrates; and in A. D. 1032 took the town of Edessa, partly by bribing the governor; and found there the supposed letter of the Lord Jesus Christ to Augarus (or Abgarus), king of Edessa, which he sent to the emperor. He was afterwards governor of Upper Media and Aspracania.

In the reign of Michael IV. the Paphlagonian (A. D. 1035), he was sent with an army into Southern Italy, then a part of the Byzantine empire, to carry on the war against the Saracens, the command of the fleet being entrusted to Stephen, husband of the emperor's sister. One of George's exploits was the conquest of Sicily (A. D. 1038), though the Saracens, who occupied the island, were assisted by 50,000 auxiliaries from Africa. Two years after (A. D. 1040) he gained a great victory over the Saracens of Africa, who had sought to recover the island, killing 50,000 of them in one battle. The negligence of Stephen having allowed the Saracen commander to escape, a quarrel ensued between him and George; and Stephen, embittered by a blow and by the reproaches which he had received from George, accused him to Joannes, the brother and minister of the emperor, of meditating a revolt. George was consequently sent home a prisoner, but was released by Michael V. Calaphates, after his accession, A. D. 1041. The disasters of the Byzantines in Italy, after his recall, induced Zoe, who succeeded Michael, to send him thither again as general (A. D. 1042). He recovered the province from the power of his own Frankish mercenaries, who had seized it. Meantime, his interests at home were assailed by Romanus Sclerus, whose sister was concubine to the emperor Constantine X. Monomachus, who had married Zoe. Romanus, plundered the Anatolian estates of George, and procured his deprivation of the title "Magister." Provoked by these wrongs, George revolted, gained over the troops under his command, put to death the Byzantine Pardon, who had been sent to succeed him in his command, and assuming the title of emperor crossed over into Bulgaria to assert his claim. He refused the offers of the emperor Constantine, and routed his army, but fell in the moment of victory by a wound from an unknown hand, A. D. 1042 or 1043. (Zonaras, xvii. 12; Cedren. Compend. vol. ii. pp. 494, 500, 512, 514, 520—523, 541, 545—549, ed. Bonn.; Jean Scylitza Curopolates, Historia, p. 720, ed. Bonn.)

16. NOSTRONGUS (Νοστρόγγος), a Byzantine nobleman, to whom the emperor Theodore Lascaris II. (1255—1258) had intended to give his daughter in marriage; an alliance the prospect of which tended to make him, during the minority of Joannes Lascaris, the son of Theodore, insufferably arrogant. (Georg. Pachymer, De Michael Palaeol. i. 21, vol. i. p. 65, ed. Paris.)

17. PALAEOLOGUS. [PALAEOLOGUS.]

18. PRIGANES, military chief of the thema Opsesium, was the chief supporter of Symbatus, rival of Basil the Macedonian [BASILIUS I. MACEDON], in the revolt to which he was led by his jealousy of Basil's elevation to the rank of Augustus by the reigning emperor Michael III., A. D. 866. Symbatus and George ravaged the open country about Constantinople, and while they reviled Basil, and denied his claim to the throne, spoke with great respect of Michael. Being deserted by their troops, they fled, and George sought refuge in Cotyaeum, one of the cities of his government, where he was soon after taken by the emperor's troops: he was scourged, blinded, and either exiled or detained in custody in his own house. On the accession of Basil as sole emperor, he was restored to his former honours. (Theophan. Continuat. Chronog. lib. v. de Basilio Macedone, c. 19; Symeon Mag. de Michael et Theodora, c. 44; Georg. Monach. de Michael et Theodora, c. 31.)

19. PROBATA (Προβάτα) was sent as ambassador by the emperor Michael IV., the Paphlagonian, to the Saracen Emir of Sicily (A. D. 1035), to treat of peace. In 1040, in the same reign, he commanded an army against the Servians. (Cedren. Compend. vol. ii. p. 513, 526.)

20. STRAUS (Στραύς) was sent by the emperor Justinian II., with a few ships and 300 soldiers, against the town of Chersonae, in the Chersonesus Taurica, the inhabitants of which were in a state of insurrection. George, with his party, was admitted into the town, and there he was killed by the townsmen, with Joannes, one of his chief officers, and the rest of his troops taken prisoners, A. D. 711. (Theophan. Chronog. vol. i. p. 580, ed. Bonn.)

Beside personages belonging to the Byzantine empire, there were many Georges in the states which were formed out of it during its decay, or at its fall. The name occurs in the notices of the Serbian, or Bulgarian, or Albanian provinces and chieftains. The most eminent was George Castriota, better known by the epithet Scanderbeg, who lived about the time of the final capture of Constantinople (A. D. 1453). Among the Comneni of Trebizond [COMNENUS] there was one emperor George (A. D. 1266 to 1280), and there were several Georges members of the imperial family.

[J. C. M.]

GEORGIUS (Γεώργιος), literary and ecclesiastical. The following list contains only the principal writers of that name. Those whose works are lost, or exist only in MS., may be found by a reference to Fabric. Bibl. Gr.; the index to which enumerates more than a hundred persons of this name.

1. ACROPOLITA. [ACROPOLITA.]

2. OF ALEXANDRIA. [See No. 7.]

3. OF ALEXANDRIA, the writer of a life of Chrysostom, which has been several times printed (sometimes with a Latin version by Godfrey Tilmann), in editions of the works of Chrysostom. Photius gives an account of the work, but says he could state nothing certain respecting the author. He is styled Bishop of Alexandria, and it is the opinion of those who have examined into the matter that he lived after the commencement of the seventh century. A George was Catholic bishop or patriarch of Alexandria from A. D. 616 to 630, and as no other patriarch appears under that name between A. D. 600 and the time of Photius, he was probably the writer. The life of Chrysostom occupies above a hundred folio pages, in Savile's edit. of Chrysostom (vol. viii. pp. 157, 265). It abounds in useless and fabulous matter. The writer in his preface professes to have drawn his account from the writings of Palladius and Socrates, and from the oral statements of faithful priests and pious laymen. Oudin ascribes to this writer the compilation of the Chronicon Paschale, but without foundation. (Georgius, Vita Chrys.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 96; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 451, vol. viii. p. 437, vol. x. pp. 210, 707; Allatius, Distrib. de Georg. apud Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 16; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 577, ed. Ox. 1740-43.)

4. AMYRUTZA, or AMYRUTZES, a native of Trepezus or Trebizond. He was high in favour at Constantinople with the emperor Johannes or John II. Palaeologus, and was one of those whom the emperor consulted about his attendance at the council of Florence, A. D. 1439. George afterwards returned to Trebizond, and was high in favour with David, the last emperor of Trebizond, at whose court he seems to have borne the offices of Logotheta and Protovestiarius. His intellectual attainments obtained for him the title of "the philosopher." On the capture of Trebizond by the Turks (A. D. 1461), he obtained the favour of the sultan, Mohammed II., partly by his handsome person and his skill in the use of the javelin, but chiefly through a marriage connection with a Turkish pacha. Mohammed often conversed with him on philosophy and religion, and gave him some considerable posts in the seraglio at Constantinople. He embraced the Mohammedan religion, together with his children; and his death, which occurred suddenly, while he was playing at dice, is represented by some Christian writers as the punishment of his apostasy; from which we may perhaps infer that it followed that event after no great interval.

He wrote in Greek, apparently in the early part of his life, at a year before his renunciation of Christianity, a work the title of which is rendered into Latin by our authorities, "Ad Demetrium Nauplii Ducem de iis quas contingunt in Synodo Florentina." In this he opposed the projected union of the Greek and Latin churches. Allatius mentions this work in his De Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae, and quotes from it. Two other works, of which the titles are thus given, Dialogus de Fide in Christo cum Rege Turcarum, and Epistola ad Bessarion Cardinalem, are or were extant in MS. (Gery, Appendix to Cave's Hist. Lit.

p. 182, ed. Oxon. 1740-43; Bayle, Dictionnaire, &c., s. v. Amyrutzeas.)

5. ANEPONTMUS, or without a surname. [See the PERIPATETIC, No. 41.]

6. ARISTINUS, an historian. Joseph, bishop of Modon (who flourished about A. D. 1440), in his defence of the council of Florence, in reply to Mark of Ephesus, cites Georgius Aristinus as an authority for the statement, that the addition of the words "filioque" to the Nicene creed had been made shortly after the second oecumenical council (that of Constantinople, A. D. 381), in the time of Pope Damasus. (Allatius, Diatrib. de Gorg. apud Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 21.)

7. Of CAPPADOCIA, a man of bad character, a heretic and a persecutor, and an intruder into the see of the orthodox Athanasius, then in banishment, and yet, strange to tell, a saint in the Roman Calendar, and the patron saint of England. It is possible, indeed, that his moral delinquency has been aggravated by the party spirit of the ecclesiastical historians, and other writers to whom his Arianism made him odious; but it is hard to believe that their invectives are without considerable foundation. He was born, according to Ammianus, at Epiphaneia, in Cilicia, but our other authorities speak of him as a Cappadocian. His father was a fuller. Gregory Nazianzen, whose passionate invective is our chief authority for his early history, says that he was of a bad family (κακοῦ γένους); but it does not appear whether it was discreditable for anything more than its humble occupation. George appears to have been a parasite, a hanger-on of the wealthy, "one that would sell himself," according to Gregory, "for a cake." He obtained an appointment connected with the supply of bacon to the army; but being detected in some unfaithfulness, was stripped of his charge and his emoluments, and was glad to escape without bodily punishment. According to Gregory, he afterwards wandered from one city or province to another, till he was fixed at Alexandria, "where he ceased to wander, and began to do mischief." It is probable, however, that he held office as a receiver of some branch of the revenue at Constantinople, having by bribery obtained the favour of the eunuchs who had influence at the court of Constantius II., the then reigning emperor. Athanasius, who notices this appointment, calls him ταμιευόμενος, "a peculator;" but it is not clear whether he refers to his former official delinquency or to some new offence.

Thus far it does not appear that George had even professed to be a Christian: we have certainly no intimation that he sustained any ecclesiastical character before his appointment to the see of Alexandria. Athanasius says it was reported at the time of his appointment that he had not been a Christian at all, but rather an idolator; and there is reason to believe that Athanasius is right in charging him with professing Christianity for interest sake. Arianism was patronised by Constantius, and George consequently became a zealous Arian; and was, after his appointment to Alexandria, concerned in assembling the Arian councils of Seleucia (A. D. 359) and Constantinople (A. D. 360). According to Socrates and Sozomen, Gregory, whom the Arian party had appointed to the see of Alexandria, vacant by the expulsion of Athanasius, had become unpopular, through the tumults and disasters to which his appointment had led; and was at the same time regarded as not zealous enough in the support of Arianism. He was therefore removed, and George was appointed by the council of Antioch (A. D. 354, or, according to Mansi, A. D. 356) in his place. It is probable that George was appointed from his subservience to the court, and his readiness to promote any fiscal exactions, and his general unscrupulousness; and he was induced to accept the appointment by the hope of gain, or, as Athanasius expresses it, "he was hired" to become bishop. Count Heraclian was sent by Constantius to gain the support of the heathen people of Alexandria to George's election; and he succeeded in his object, by giving them hopes of obtaining toleration for their own worship; and the emperor, in a letter preserved by Athanasius, recommended the new prelate to the support and favour of the Alexandrians generally. But a persecution of the Trinitarian party had commenced even before the arrival of George, which took place during Lent, A. D. 355. They were dispossessed of the churches; and Sebastian, commander of the troops in Egypt, publicly exposed some women, who had devoted themselves to a life of religious celibacy, naked before the flame of a large fire, to make them renounce orthodoxy. On George's arrival, the persecution continued as fiercely as before, or even more so. Widows and orphans were plundered of their houses and of their bread; several men were so cruelly beaten with fresh-gathered palm branches, with the thorns yet adhering to them, that some were long before they recovered, and some never recovered at all; and many virgins, and thirty bishops, were banished to the greater Oasis, or elsewhere: several of the bishops died in the place of exile, or on the way. Athanasius, however, escaped, and remained in concealment till George's death. George and his partisans refused at first to give up to their friends for burial the bodies of those who died, "sitting," says Theodoret, "like daemons about the tomb." His persecutions led to a revolt. The Trinitarian party rose against him, and would have killed him. He escaped, however, and fled to the emperor; and the Trinitarians re-occupied the churches. A notary was sent, apparently from Constantinople; the orthodox were again expelled; the guilty were punished, and George returned, rendered more tyrannical by this vain attempt to resist him.

While his bitter persecution of the orthodox was embittering the anger of that numerous party, his rapacity and subservience to the court offended all. He suggested to Constantius to require a rent for all the buildings which had been erected at the public cost, and ministered to the emperor's cruelty, as well as his rapacity, by accusing many Alexandrians of disobedience to his orders. Mindful of his own interest, he sought to obtain a monopoly of nitre and of the marshes where the papyrus and other reeds grew, of the salterns, and of biers for the dead and the management of funerals in Alexandria. His luxury and arrogance tended further to increase the hatred entertained towards him. A passage in Athanasius (De Synod. c. 12) gives some reason to think that sentence of deposition was pronounced against him at the Council of Seleucia (A. D. 359); but if so, it was not carried into effect.

The immediate cause of his downfall was his persecution of the heathens. He had excited their fears by exclaiming at the view of a splendid ample, "How long shall this sepulchre stand?" But the crowning provocation was this: there was a spot in the city occupied by the ruins of a forsaken temple of Mithras, or the Sun, and still regarded by the heathens as sacred, though filled with the refuse and off-scouring of the streets. This spot Constantius had given to the church at Alexandria; and George determined to clear it out, and build a church upon it. The workmen, in clearing it out, found in the adytum, or sacred recess of the old temple, statues, sacred utensils, and the skulls of human victims, either slain in sacrifice, or that the soothsayers might examine their entrails, and foretell future events thereby. Some zealots brought these things out, and exposed them to the mockery and jeers of the Christians. This irritated the heathens; and as the news had just arrived of the death of Constantius (Nov. A. D. 361), and the accession of Julian as sole emperor, and also of the execution of Artemius, ex-governor of Egypt, they thought their time of ascendancy was come, and rose in insurrection. George, whose persecutions seem to have been directed against all who differed from him, was at the time presiding in a synod, where those who held the sentiments of Aëtius [ARIUS] were compelled to subscribe a condemnation of their own opinions. The rioters rushed into the church where the synod was assembled, dragged him out, and would have killed him on the spot. He was, however, rescued by the authorities, and apparently to satisfy his enemies, committed to prison. But not many days after, at day-break, the mob forced the prison, dragged him out, bound him (it is doubtful whether living or dead) on a camel, and, after parading him through the city, tore him to pieces, and burnt his mangled remains. His murder appears to have taken place about the end of the year 361. Though described by Athanasius as a man of coarse manners and ignorant, at least in theology, he left a valuable library, which the emperor Julian ordered to be sent to Antioch for his own use. He had formerly, while in Cappadocia, borrowed some books of George. The general hatred entertained towards him was evidenced by the absence of any attempt to rescue him. The Arians subsequently charged the Athanasian party with instigating his murderers; but Sozomen "rather thought" it was the spontaneous act of the Gentiles. (Amm. Marc. xxii. 11; Gregor. Naz. Oratio XXI.; Epiphani. Adv. Hæres. ii. Hæres. 48, or 68, iii. Hæres. 56 or 76; Athanas. Historia Arianorum ad Monachos, c. 51, 75, De Synodis, c. 12, 37, Epistola ad Episcopos Aegypti et Lybie, c. 7, Apolog. de Fuga sua, c. 6, 7, Ad Imp. Constantium Apolog. c. 30, Petitio ad Imper. Julian, apud Athanas. Opera, vol. i. 782, ed. Benedictin.; Socrat. H. E. ii. 14, 28, iii. 2, 3, 4; Sozomen. H. E. iii. 7, iv. 10, v. 7; Theodoret, H. E. ii. 14; Philostorg. H. E. (apud Phot.) vii. 2; Vita Athanasii, apud Phot. Bibl. Cod. 258.)

It is difficult either to trace or to account for the introduction of the odious George among the saints of the Romish and Greek churches; and it is to be observed that the identification of the bishop of Alexandria with the St. George of the calendar is stoutly objected to by some Roman Catholic and some Anglican writers — for instance, Papebroche and Heylyn. In A. D. 494 (or perhaps 496) his rank as a canonised saint was recognised by Pope Gelasius I. at a council at Rome, but his "gesta" were rejected as Apocryphal, and written by heretics; a probable intimation that the facts of his history had not yet been sufficiently perverted to be received. As time proceeded, various fabulous and absurd "Acta" were produced, which Papebroche admits to be unworthy of credit. The Greek "Acta" are considered by him as more trustworthy; but he does not place even them in the first class; though a Latin version of them is given in the Acta Sanctorum, with a long Commentarius Prævius, by Papebroche. The distortions of the history are singular. St. George still appears as a Cappadocian and a layman, but he is made a soldier of Diocletian, under whom he is described as suffering martyrdom. The length, variety, and intermission of his sufferings are a probable distortion of the various inflictions of the enraged multitude before and after his imprisonment. The magician Athanasius, successively an opponent of Christianity, a convert, and a martyr, is his chief antagonist; and the city of Alexandria appears as the empress Alexandra, the wife of Diocletian, and herself a convert and a martyr. The story of the dragon appears only in later legends; the monster, who is, we suspect, nothing else than a still more distorted representation of the fugitive Athanasius, is described as lurking about a lake as large as a sea (Mareotis?), near the city of Silena (Alexandria?), in Lybia. St. George was known among the Greeks as τροπαιοφόρος, or the Victorious; and he was one of the saints who were said to assist the first Crusaders. He was revered in England in the Anglo-Saxon period; during the Norman and earlier part of the Plantagenet dynasty his reputation increased; and under Edward III., or perhaps earlier, he came to be regarded as the patron saint of the nation. (Acta Sanctorum, 23d April; Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c. ch. 21, 23; Heylyn, Hist. of St. George.)

8. CERDREUS. [CERDREUS.]

9. CERAMEUS. Some MSS. give the name of George to the writer, better known as Theophanes Cerameus. [CERAMEUS.]

10. CHARTOPHYLAX [Of NICOMEDEIA, No. 36, and of PISIDIA, No. 44.]

11. CHARTOPHYLAX, a writer so called, distinct from either George of Nicomedeia, or George of Pisidia, and sometimes designated "Callipolitanus;" lived apparently in the 13th century. He wrote some Greek iambics referring to events in the history of Italy about the middle of that century, quotations from which are given by Bandini. (Bandini, Catal. Cod. Laurent. Medic. vol. i. p. 25, &c.; Allatius, Diatrib. de Georg. apud Fabr. vol. xii. p. 14.)

12. CHOEROBOSCUS. [CHOEROBOSCUS.]

13. CHRYSOCOCCUS. [CHRYSOCOCCUS.]

14. CHUMNUS. [CHUMNUS.]

15. CODINUS. [CODINUS.]

16. Of CORCYRA, or CORFU. Two archbishops of the name of George occupied the see of Corcyra, one in the twelfth, and one in the thirteenth century. The elder of the two was in favour with the emperor Manuel Comnenus, who gave him the charge of fortifying the town of Corfu, which Manuel had taken from the Normans of Southern Italy. The emperor Frederick Barbarossa, who had hostile intentions against Manuel, endeavoured to induce George to betray the island to him, but in vain. George's answer is preserved by Baronius. George was sent A. D. 1178 by Manuel to attend the third Lateran (eleventh General) Council at Rome, and also to meet Frederick Barbarossa; but he was detained six months by sickness at Brindisi or Otranto, and the council was closed before his recovery. He was therefore recalled by Manuel. Baronius gives a Latin version of several of George's letters. (Baron. Annal. Eccles. ad Annos 1176, 1178, 1179, 1180, 1188; Allatius, ibid. p. 38, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 217; Oudin, Comment. de Script. Eccles. vol. ii. col. 1536.)

17. Of CORCYRA, or CORFU, the younger, was the author of several works, especially of one against the Minorite Friars, and of another on the use of leavened bread in the eucharist. Allatius and Cave confound this George of Corfu with the preceding, but Oudin has shown that they must be distinguished, and fixes the date of the younger about A. D. 1236. Allatius, in some of his works, has quoted passages from George of Corfu on the procession of the Holy Spirit, and on the fire of purgatory, but we have no means of ascertaining to which of the two these passages belong. (Allatius and Cave, l. cc.; Oudin, l. c. and vol. iii. col. 110.)

18. CURTÆIUS (Κουρτίου) or SCHOLARIUS, was author of some tracts on grammatical subjects extant in MS. It is doubtful if he is the same as Georgius Scholaris, afterwards Gennadius, patriarch of Constantinople. (GENNADIUS, No. 2.) The subject of the works ascribed to him would lead to the opinion that he is not. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. p. 342.)

19. Of CYPRUS, the elder, patriarch of Constantinople from A. D. 678 to 683. He held for a time the sentiments of the Monothelites, but afterwards, at the council of Constantinople (A. D. 680), renounced them. He was anathematized after his death at the iconoclastic council of Constantinople under Constantine Copronymus, A. D. 753 or 754. (Theophan. Chronog. vol. i. pp. 544, 554, 660, ed. Bonn; Allatius, ibid. p. 14; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 151.)

20. Of CYPRUS, the younger, afterwards GEORGIUS, has been said by some to have been of Latin parents, but this is shown by Rubens, editor of the life of George, to be an error. He held the office of protopostolarius at Constantinople at the time of the accession of Andronicus Palaeologus the elder [ANDRONICUS II.] (A. D. 1282). He was a man of learning and eloquence, and the reviver, according to Nicephorus Gregoras, of the long-disused Attic dialect. During the reign of Michael Palaeologus, father of Andronicus, he had been favourable to the union of the Greek and Latin churches, which Michael had much at heart; and supplied the emperor with arguments with which to press the patriarch of Constantinople (Joseph) and the other opponents of the union; but on the accession of Andronicus, who was opposed to the union, it is probable that George altered his views; for on the death of the patriarch Joseph, Andronicus determined that George, though as yet a layman, should be appointed to the office. The Greek church was at this time torn by dissension. Beside the dispute about the procession of the Holy Spirit, there had been an extensive schism occasioned by the deposition of Arsenius, patriarch of Constantinople [ARSENIUS, No. 1] early in the reign of Michael (A. D. 1266). The emperor was anxious to heal these dissensions, and possibly thought a layman more likely to assist him in so doing than a professed theologian; and George was recommended to the office by his literary reputation. The emperor, by tampering with some of the bishops, obtained his purpose; and George, after being rapidly hurried through the successive stages of monk, reader, deacon, and priest, was consecrated patriarch (April, A. D. 1283), and took the name of Gregory. The Arsenians, however, refused to return to the church, unless upon the testimony of heaven itself; and it was arranged at a synod or conference at Adramyttium, apparently just after the consecration of Gregory, that they and the party now predominant in the church (called Josephites from the late patriarch) should each prepare a book in support of their respective views, and that the two volumes should be submitted to the ordeal of fire. Both books, as might be expected, were consumed; and the Arsenians regarding this as a token that heaven was against them, submitted, and were at once led by the emperor in person, through a violent snow storm, to receive the communion from the hands of the patriarch Gregory. They soon, however, repented of their submission, and Gregory having excommunicated the refractory, the whole party broke off from the church again. This division was followed by troubles arising out of the controversy on the procession of the Holy Spirit, aggravated by the harshness used under Gregory's influence towards the ex-patriarch, Joannes or John Beccus or Vecus, a distinguished advocate of the doctrine of the Latin church; and a book, which Gregory had been ordered to prepare on the subject, and to the sentiments of which he had procured the approval of the emperor and several of the superior clergy, excited such animadversion and opposition, that, either in disgust or by constraint, he resigned the office of patriarch, A. D. 1289, and retired to a monastery. He died in the course of the following year, as many supposed, from grief and mortification. (Pachymer, De Mich. Palaeol. v. 12, De Andron. Palaeol. i. 8, 14—22, 34—37, ii. 1—11; Niceph. Greg. Hist. Rom. v. 2, vi. 1—4.)

The published works of George of Cyprus are as follows:—1. Ἐκθεσις τοῦ τόμου τῆς εἰσεως κατὰ τοῦ Βέκκου, Expositio Fidei adversus Beccum (seu Vecum). This was the work which led to his troubles and consequent abdication. 2. Ὁμολογία, Confessio Fidei, delivered in consequence of the outcry against the preceding work. 3. Ἀπολογία πρὸς τὴν κατὰ τοῦ τόμου μέμνην λοχωρωμένην, Responsio validissima ad Expositionis Consensum. 4. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὸν τόμον ἐμὴν λοχωρωμένων, Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὸν τόμον ἐμὴν λοχωρωμένων: this is a letter to the emperor Andronicus, complaining of the wrong done to him. These four pieces are given in Banduri's Imperium Orientale, pp. 942—961, ed. Paris. 5. Ἐγκύμιον εἰς τὴν Ὁδολογίαν, Encomium Mariae. Published by Bonaventura Vulcanius, with a poem of Paulus Silentiarius, Bvo., Leyden, 1591. These two pieces were published both in a separate volume, and with the Περὶ Κόσμου, De Mundo, of Aristotle. The Encomium Mariae has been since reprinted. 6. Proverbia, in alphabetical order, subjoined to the edition of the Proverbia of Michael Apostolius by Pantinus, 8vo., Leyden, 1619. 7. Λόγος εἰς τὸν ἄγιον καὶ μεγαλομάρτυρα καὶ τροπαιοφόρον Γεώργιον, Oratio in honorem Sancti Georgii Magni Martyris ac Victoris. This encomium on St. George of Cappadocia [GEORGIUS, No. 7. above.] is printed in the Acta Sanctorum, April, Vol. III. A Latin version is given in the body of the volume, pp. 123—131, and the Greek original in the Appendix, pp. xxv—xxxiv. 8. Senectutius, 8vo., Col., 1536. This is given by Fabricius as a separate work; we suspect that it is identical with the Proverbia, No. 6. 9. Eusebium Georgii Logothetæ Acropolitæ; an extract from this was prefixed to the edition of the Chronicon of Acropolita [ACROPOLITA], by Theodor Doms, 8vo. Leyden, 1614, and to the Paris edition. 10. Vita Georgii Cyprii. This Greek memoir of George was published by J. F. Bernard de Rabeis, a Dominican, with a Latin version, notes, and dissertations, 4to. Venice, 1753, and was shown by the editor to be an autobiography. Many other works of George of Cyprus remain in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 57, &c.; Allatius, Ibid. p. 127. &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 329; Oudin, Comment. de Script. Eccles. vol. iii. Col. 556-564.)

21. DIABRETA (Διαβρίτης), a monk of Alexandria, of uncertain date. His Σχόλια εἰς τὸ Περὶ Βιβρίων Ἐργον, Commentarius ad Hermogenis Libros de Inventione, were published by Wala, Rhetores Græci, vol. vi. p. 504, &c., 8vo. Stuttgart and Tubing., 1834.

22. ELEUTHIUS. A life of Theodore of Siceon or Sydon, for a time bishop of Anastasiopolis, in Galatia, in which country Siceon was probably situated, is professedly written by Georgius Eleuthius, a disciple of the saint, and an eye-witness of much that he relates. According to his own account, his parents were of Adigermarus or Adigermarus, a place otherwise unknown, but perhaps in Galatia, and had been childless for many years after marriage, and his birth was the result of the prayers of Theodore, to whose care he was assigned at a very tender age for education, and with whom he continued twelve years. (Georg. Eleuth. Vita Sancti Theodor. Siceotæ, c. 124, in the Acta Sanctorum, April, vol. iii.; Allatius, Ibid. p. 14; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. x. p. 336.)

23. EPARCHIUS, so called as being eparch or vicar of Africa. St. Maximus wrote in his name An Epistle to some Nuns of Alexandria, who had separated from the church. There is also a letter from Maximus addressed to George. They are published among the works of St. Maximus. George the eparch lived in the earlier half of the seventh century. He is also called Georgius Panchemmus. (Photinus, Bibl. cod. 192, 194; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 649; Allatius, Ibid. p. 23; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii., Dissert. i. p. 9, ed. Ox. 1740-43.)

24. GEMISTUS, or PLETHO. [GEMISTUS.]

25. GRAMMATICUS, or the GRAMMARIAN. This name is sometimes given to George Choeroboscus [CHOEROBOSCUS], sometimes to others. Allatius mentions with great praise some Anacreontic poems by George the Grammarian, which he had in his possession, and which he was very desirous to publish. (Allatius, Ibid. p. 22; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 340, 341.)

26. HAGIOPOLITA, or of JERUSALEM. Allatius cites some passages from a treatise of this writer, of whom nothing further appears to be known, on incorporeal beings—Λόγος ἐγκύμωστος εἰς τοὺς ἀπύκωτους. Allatius, who had translated the work into Latin, condemns it, as containing many novelties and blasphemies concerning angels and their ministry. (Allatius, Ibid. p. 17)

27. HAMARTOLUS (ἁμαρτωλός), or the SINNER, a monk who lived about the middle of the ninth century. He is the author of a Chronicon, as yet unpublished, extending from the Creation to the reign of Michael III., the son of Theophilus and Theodora. Extracts from this Chronicon have been given by various writers, as Allatius, Petavius, Rader, and Gretzer, and by Hody in his Dissertatio prefixed to the Chronicon of Malala, c. 41. This George must not be confounded with others of the same name (as George Cedrenus, George Scylitzes, George Syncellus, George of Nicomedeia, George the Monk), who have written chronicles. George Cedrenus, Theophanes, Michael Glycas, and others, have in several places transcribed passages from his Chronicon. (Allatius, Ibid. p. 30; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. pp. 463, 685.)

28. HERMONTIUS. [HERMONYMIUS.]

29. OF LAODICEIA, one of the leaders of the Arian, or rather Semi-Arian party in the ecclesiastical struggles of the fourth century. His family were of Alexandria, and it is probable that he was born and spent his early life there. He was a presbyter of the church of Alexandria before the council of Nice (A. D. 325), and was anxious to soothe the irritation caused by the dispute between Alexander, the bishop, and Arius. [ALEXANDER, vol. i. p. 111, b.; ARIUS, ATHANASIUS.] The letters which he wrote for this purpose, both to the bishop and to the Arian clergy, of which extracts are given by Athanasius (De Synodis, c. 17), show that he held the Son to have been produced by the Father. It was probably this opinion that led to his deposition from the office of presbyter; though Athanasius says (Ib.) that there were other charges against him, but does not state what they were. He elsewhere says he was deposed "for his wickedness," διὰ τὴν κακίαν αὐτοῦ (Apol. de Fuga sua, c. 26), but this is probably only another word for heresy. George is said to have subsequently been a presbyter at Arethusa in Syria; and after that he succeeded Theodotus in the bishopric of Laodiceia, in the same province. Athanasius says that he named himself bishop; but it is difficult to understand what the charge means, except that perhaps George solicited the office, instead of affecting any coyness in accepting it. He was aided in obtaining it by his Arian friends, and must have been in possession of the bishopric before the meeting of the council of Antioch (A. D. 329 or 330), at which Eustathius of Antioch was deposed [EUSTATHIUS, No. 1]; for he was present at the council. His account of the proceedings there was one of the authorities used by Socrates and Sozomen; though Socrates says that some of his statements were inconsistent with each other. He afforded shelter about the same time to Eusebius of Emesa or Emisa [EUSEBIUS of EMISA], when driven from his see, and succeeded in procuring his restoration. In A. D. 335 he was present at the council of Tyre. In A. D. 347 he did not attend the council of Sardica, his enemies said it was through fear: in his absence he was sentenced to be deposed and excommunicated, but the sentence does not appear to have been carried into effect. He admitted to communion Cyril of Jerusalem [CYRILLUS of JERUSALEM], who had been deposed (A. D. 358) by Acacius, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, and in A. D. 359 headed the predominant party of the Semi-Arians, at the council of Seleucia in Isauria, where Cyril was restored. George and his party had at this time to withstand the orthodox on the one hand and the Aetians or Anomoeans on the other. He wrote to the council of Ancyra (A. D. 358) a letter against Eudoxius of Antioch, whom he charged with being a disciple of Aetius; and he excommunicated the younger Apollinarius, who was a reader in the church at Laodiceia, on account of the friendship he had formed with Athanasius. He took part in the appointment of Meletius to the bishopric of Antioch, and delivered one of three discourses then preached at the desire of the emperor Constantius II. on Prov. viii. 22—"The Lord possessed me in the beginning of his way, before his works of old." His exposition of the passage was the least orthodox of the three; that of Meletius, the new bishop, the most orthodox. We know nothing of George after the death of Constantius, A. D. 361. His character is not impugned, except for his heresy, by any other writer than Athanasius, who charges him with living intemperately, and thereby incurring reproach even from his own party. It is hard to determine whether there is any, or how much, truth in the charge. Fabricius states (Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 293) that George became in his latter days an Eunomian or Aetian, but he does not cite his authority, and we doubt the correctness of the statement. George of Laodiceia had studied philosophy. He wrote, 1. Letters to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, and to the Arians of Alexandria, already noticed. 2. Ἐγκύκλιος εἰς ἐκθέσιν τῶν ἑσπερίων, Encomium Eusebii Emiseni, containing the account already mentioned of the council of Antioch. 3. A work against the Manichaeans, now lost, mentioned by Heraclian (apud Phot. Bibl. cod. 85). (Athan. Apol. contra Arian. c. 36, 48, 49, Hist. Arian. ad Monach. c. 4, 17, Apol. de Fuga sua, c. 26, Epistol. ad Episcop. Aegypt. et Libyae, c. 7, De Synodis, c. 17; Socrates, H. E. i. 24, ii. 9, 10; Sozom. H. E. iii. 6, iv. 13; Theodoret, H. E. ii. 8, 31, v. 7; Philostorg. H. E. viii. 17; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. viii. ix.)

30. LECAPENUS, a monk of Thessaly, who lived about the middle of the fourteenth century, and wrote on grammar and rhetoric. A treatise, Περὶ συντάξεως τῶν ἰνδύων, De Constructione Verborum, was printed at Florence A. D. 1515 and 1520, and at Venice, by Aldus Manutius and Asulanus A. D. 1525, with the Greek grammar of Theodore Gaza. In the printed editions the work is said to be by George Lecapenus; but Allatius, on the authority of several MSS., claims it as the work of Michael Syncellus of Jerusalem. Some works of George Lecapenus remain in MS. Among them are: 1. A Grammar, or rather Lexicon of Attic Words, in alphabetical order. 2. An Exposition of the Enchiridion of Epictetus. 3. A treatise On the Figures of Homer. 4. A History. 5. A Poem, in iambic verse. 6. Several Letters. He also made a selection of the Letters of Libanius. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. pp. 191, 297, 343, vol. viii. p. 79; Allatius, Ibid. p. 59.)

31. METHIMINENSIS [of MYTILENE, No. 35].

32. METROCHITA. [METROCHITA.]

33. MONACHUS, or THE MONK. Many MSS. preserved in the various European libraries bear the name of George the Monk as the author. Great perplexity has been occasioned by the vagueness of the designation, and its applicability to various persons of the name of George, but who are usually identified by some additional designation. There is extant in MS. a Chronicon of George the Monk, whom some have identified, but there is reason to think incorrectly, with George Hamartolus [No.

27], or George Moschamper [No. 34], or with the author of the Vitae Recentior. Imperatorum mentioned below. Georgius Monachus, or George the Monk, who wrote Scholae in Divisionem Rhetoricae, may possibly be the Georgius Grammaticus already noticed [No. 25], but this is only conjecture; and the Georgius Monachus, of whom a little work, Epitome Philosophiae, is extant in MS., is probably the Georgius or Gregorius Anonymus, or Peripateticus mentioned below [No. 41]. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 685, vol. xi. p. 629; Allatius, Ibid. p. 120.)

A George the Monk is the author of a work, Βίαι τῶν νέων βασιλέων, Vitae Recentiorum Imperatorum, included in the published collections of the Byzantine historians. This work is the second part of a Chronicon apparently quite different from that mentioned above. It is chiefly taken from the Chronographia of George Syncellus [No. 46], and extends from the reign of Leo the Armenian to the death of Romanus Lecapenus, from A. D. 813 to A. D. 948. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vii. p. 685; Bekker, Praefatio ad Vol. quo continetur Georg. Monach. Vitae Recent. Imp. ed. Bonn. 8vo. 1838.)

34. MOSCHAMPAR. [MOSCHAMPAR.]

35. MYTILENAEUS, or of MYTILENE. He is the author of a homily In Salutiferam D. N. Jesu Christi Passionem, published by Gretzer, De Cruce, vol. ii. A work on the same subject, extant in MS. and described as by Georgius Methiminnensis, or Methinenais (of Methymna?), has been conjectured to be the same work, but the conjecture does not appear to be well founded. A George, Metropolitan of Mytilene, probably the same with the subject of the present article, is the author of two works extant in MS., Davidis et Symonis Confessoris et Martyrum Officium and Eorundem Vita ac Historia. Some epigrams in praise of the writings of Dionysius Areopagita, by Georgius Patricius, a native of Mytilene, are said by the Jesuit Delrio (Fundiculae Areopagit. c. xxi.) to have been printed, but he does not say where; but whether the author is the subject of the present article is by no means clear. (Allatius, Ibid. p. 22; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 628)

36. OF NICOMEDIA. He held the office of chartophylax (record-keeper) in the Great Church at Constantinople, whence he is sometimes called Georgius Chartophylax (but he must not be confounded with Georgius Chartophylax Callipolitanus [No. 11]), and was afterwards archbishop of Nicomedia. He lived in the latter part of the ninth century, and was the friend of Photius, many of whose letters are addressed to him. Combes has confounded him with Georgius Pisida [No. 44], and has placed him in the reign of Heraclius, two centuries before his proper period. Several of his Homiliae are published in the Novum Auctarium of Combes, vol. i. Three Idiomela (hymns or pieces set to music peculiar to them), written by him, are contained in the same collection, and a Latin translation of several of his Homiliae, and of two of his Idiomela, one of them in praise of St. John Chrysostom, the other in praise of the Nicene Fathers, are contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum (vol. xii. p. 692, &c., ed. Lyon., 1677). Beside the homilies in Combes, ascribed to George of Nicomedia, another in the same collection On the Nativity of the Virgin, ascribed there to Andreas of Crete, is supposed to be by him. Among

As many unpublished works a Chronicon is enumerated; but there is difficulty in distinguishing between the Chronica of the various Georges. A homily or tract by Athanasius On the Presentation of Christ in the Temple is in some MSS. ascribed to George of Nicomedeia. (Allatius, Ibid. pp. 9—13; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 459, vol. x. p. 214; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. p. 63.)

37. PACHYMERES. [PACHYMERES.]

38. PANKUTHENUS. [GEORGIUS EPARCHUS, No. 23.]

39. PARDUS. [PARDUS.]

40. PATRICIUS [of MYTILENE, No. 35.]

41. PERIPATETICUS, or ANEPONYMUS, or GEORGIUS ANEPONYMUS. Fabricius speaks of two works as having been published by Jo. Voegelinus, Sto. Augsburg A. D. 1600. One is described as Epistola Organica Aristotelica, Gr. Lat., by Gregorius Aneponymus (i. e. without a surname); the other as Compendium Philosophiae, Gr. Lat., by Georgius Aneponymus. The two are probably one and the same work (comp. Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. iii. pp. 220, 294), and may probably be identified with a work noticed by Allatius (Diatrib. de Georg. apud Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 120) as extant in MS., and described by him as Georgii Monachi Epitome Philosophiae. It appears that a Latin version of the same work by Laurentius Valla was published in Sto. at Basel, A. D. 1542; in which the original was ascribed to Nicephorus Blemmyda. (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 630.)

42. PHORBENUS. [PHORBENUS.]

43. PHRANZA, or PHRANZES. [PHRANZA.]

44. PIDIDA (the PISIDIAN). The name of this writer occurs in the genitive case, in which it is commonly found, under the various forms, Πισιδίου, Πισιδος, Πισιδίου, Πισιδίου, Πισιδίου, Πισιδίου; in Latin it is written Pisides and Pisida. He was, as his name indicates, a Pisidian by birth, and flourished in the time of the emperor Heraclius (who reigned from A. D. 610 to 641), and of the patriarch Sergius (who occupied the see of Constantinople from A. D. 610 to 639). In the MSS. of his works he is described as a deacon, and Χαρτοφύλαξ, Chartophylax, "record keeper," or Χερουφόλαξ, Cherouphylax, "keeper of the sacred vessels," of the Great Church (that of St. Sophia) at Constantinople. By Nicephorus Callisti he is termed "Ecclesiarius" (Ἐκκλησιαρχός), a designation not equivalent, as some have supposed, to Chartophylax, but describing a different office. We have no means of determining if he held all these offices together or in succession, or if any of the titles are incorrectly given. He appears to have accompanied the emperor Heraclius in his first expedition against the Persians, and to have enjoyed the favour both of that emperor and of Sergius, but nothing further is known of him.

The works of George the Pisidian are as follows:—1. Εἰς τὴν κατὰ Περσῶν ἔκστρατεῖαν Ἡρακλείου τοῦ βασιλέως, διπορείαι τρεῖς, De Expeditionibus Heraclii Imperatoris contra Persas Libri tres. This work is mentioned by Suidas, and is probably the earliest of the extant works of this writer. The three books are written in trimeter iambics, and contain 1098 verses. They describe the first expedition of Heraclius, whose valour and piety are immoderately praised, against the Persians, A. D. 622, when he attacked the frontier of Persia, in the neighbourhood of the Taurus. The descriptions of the author lead us to regard him as an eye-witness; and the poem was probably written not long after the events he records. 2. Πόλεμος Ἀδαρικός, or Ἀδαρικός, Bellum Avaricum, or Avarica; more fully, Εἰς τὴν γενομένην ἐφοδὸν τῶν βαρβαρῶν καὶ εἰς τὴν αὐτῶν ἀποτοχὴν ἥτοι ἐκθέσις τοῦ γενομένου πολέμου εἰς τὸ εἶχος τῆς Κωνσταντινουπόλεως μεταφ' Ἀδάρων καὶ τῶν Πολέμων, De invasione facta a barbaris ac de frustrato eorum consilio, sive expositione belli quod gentium est ad moenia Constantinopolis inter Abares et Goses. This poem consists of one book of 541 trimeter iambic verses, and describes the attack of the Avars on Constantinople, and their repulse and retreat (A. D. 626), while Heraclius was absent, and a Persian army occupied Chalcedon, opposite Constantinople. 3. Ἀκάθιστος ὕμνος, Hymnus Acathistus, was composed on occasion of the victory over the Avars, commemorated in No. 2. It is ascribed to George by his editor Quercius on internal evidence, which cannot, however, be regarded as conclusive. 4. Εἰς τὴν δόξαν τοῦ Χριστοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν ἀνάστασιν, In Sanctam Jesu Christi, Dei Nostri, Resurrectionem. This poem consists of 129 trimeter iambic verses, in which George exhorts Flavius Justinian, the son of Heraclius, to emulate the example of his father. It was probably written about A. D. 627. 5. Εἰς Ἡράκλειον τὸν βασιλέα, De Heraclio Imperatore, commonly cited by the title Ἡρακλίου, Heraclius, or Ἡρακλιδίους Ἀκροάσεις δύο, Heraclidius Libri Duo. It has the second title, ἥτοι εἰς τὴν τέλειαν πύσιν Χοσρόου βασιλέως Περσῶν, sive de Extremo Chosroas Persarum Regis Escidio. But this title does not correctly describe it, for it takes a hasty survey of the transactions and exploits of Heraclius at home and abroad, and only slightly touches on the final overthrow of Chosroes. It was perhaps written when the intelligence of that monarch's death first reached Constantinople, about the end of A. D. 628, and before the return of Heraclius. 6. Ἐξαήμερον ἥτοι Κοσμομυρία, Opus Sex Dierum seu Mundi Opificium. This poem consists of 1910 trimeter iambic verses in the edition of Quercius, who restored some lines omitted by previous editors. It has been supposed that this work has come down to us in a mutilated condition, for Suidas speaks of it as consisting of 3000 verses. But it is possible that the text of Suidas is corrupt, and that we should read εἰς ἑξή διασχίλια, instead of τρισχίλια. The poem has no appearance of incompleteness. The Hexaëmeron contains a prayer as if by the patriarch Sergius, for Heraclius and his children. The poem was probably written about A. D. 629. 7. Εἰς τὸν μάταιον βίον, De Vanitate Vitae. This poem consists of 262 iambic verses, but has no internal mark of the time when it was written. 8. Κατὰ Σευήρου, Contra Severum, or Κατὰ δυσσεβοῦς Σευήρου Ἀντιοχείας, Contra Imperium Severum Antiochie. This poem consists of 731 iambic verses. A passage of Nicephorus Callisti (Hist. Eccl. xviii. 48) has been understood as declaring that George wrote a poem against Johannes Philoponus, and it has been supposed that Philoponus is aimed at in this poem under the name of Severus, while others have supposed that Nicephorus refers to the Hexaëmeron, and that Philoponus is attacked in that poem under the name of Proclus. But the words of Nicephorus do not require us to understand that George wrote against Philoponus at all. This poem against Severus contains the passage to which Nicephorus refers, and in which the Monophysite opinions which Philoponus held are attacked. 9. Ἐγκώμιον εἰς τὸν ἄγιον Ἀναστάσιον μάρτυρα, Encomium in Sanctum Anastasium Martyrem; or, more fully, Βίος καὶ πολιτεία καὶ ἀθλήσεις τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ἐνδόξου ὁσίου μάρτυρος Ἀναστασίου τοῦ μαρτυρησάντος ἐν Πέρσῃ, Vita, Institutum, et Certamen Sancti, Gloriosi, et Venerabilis Martyris Anastasii, qui in Perside Martyrium passus est. This piece is in prose. 10. Εἰς τὸν ἐν Βααζέρονι παῖν, In Templum Deiparæ Constantinopolim in Blacheris situm; a short poem in iambic verse.

These are all the extant works of George; but that he wrote others appears from the quotations which are found in ancient writers, and of which a considerable number have been collected from the Chronographia of Theophanes, the Lexicon of Suidas, the Compendium of Cedrenus, the Historia Ecclesiastica of Nicephorus Callisti, and the Commentaries of Isaacius Tzetzes. George is mentioned also by Johannes Tzetzes.

Some works known or asserted to be extant have been ascribed to George, but without sufficient reason. Usher and others have conjectured that he was the compiler of the Chronicon Paschale, but Quercius refutes the supposition. Possavino mentions a MS. work of his, De Gestis Imperatorum Constantinopolitanorum; but the supposition of the existence of such a work probably originated in a mistake. A MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna is described by Nesselius and Reimannus as Georgii Pisidis Diaconi et Chartophylacis magnæ Ecclesiæ Constantinopolitanæ et Cyrilli Monachi Breviarium Chronographicum ex Variis Historiis concinnatum, &c. This MS. is probably the same which Raderus mentions as having been read by him. It is a modern MS., probably of the latter part of the sixteenth century; and an examination of the title of the MS. itself shows that the Chronological Compendium is ascribed to Cyril alone. But to the proper title of this work is prefixed the inscription Γεωργίου τοῦ Πισίδου καὶ Κυπριανοῦ; an indication, perhaps, that the writer of the Codex intended to transcribe some of the works of George. The astronomical poem known as Empedocli Sphaera, consisting of 168 iambic verses, has been conjectured to be George's; but it has been observed by Fabricius, that the writer speaks in one place like a polytheist, while all the known writings of George are distinct expressions of Christian belief; and Quercius thinks this objection is decisive. Le Long speaks of Greek Commentaries on the Epistles of Paul by George of Pisidia as being extant in the Imperial Library at Vienna, but they are not noticed in the catalogues of Lambecius and Reimannus; and it is probable that Le Long's statement is erroneous. Some persons have improperly confounded George of Pisidia with George of Nicomedia, who lived two centuries later [GEORGIUS, No. 36]; and Cave erroneously makes George of Pisidia archbishop of Nicomedia, although he correctly fixes the time in which he lived.

The versification of George is correct and elegant, and inharmonious verses are very rare. He was much admired by the later Byzantine writers, and was very commonly compared with Euripides, to whom some did not hesitate to prefer him. But his poems, however polished, are frequently dull, though in the Hexæmeron there are some passages of more elevated character.

The Hexæmeron and De Vanitate Vitæ, with such fragments as had been then collected, with a Latin version by Fed. Morel, were first published in 4to. Paris, 1584. Some copies of the edition have the date 1585 in the title-page. The Hexæmeron was also published by Brunellus, as a work of Cyril of Alexandria, together with some poems of Gregory Nazianzen and other pieces, 8vo. Rome, 1590. Both pieces, with the fragments, were reprinted in the appendix to the Bibliotheca Patrum of La Bigne, fol. Paris, 1624, and with the version of Morel, and one or two additional fragments, in the Paris edition of the Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. 1654, vol. xiv. p. 389, &c. The Latin version of Morel is in the edition of the Bibliotheca, fol. Lyon. 1677, vol. xii. p. 323, &c. The De Expeditione Imperatoris Heraclii contra Persas, the Bellum Avaricum, the Hymnus Acolithis, the In Sanctam Jesu Christi D. N. Resurrectionem, the Heraclius, the Hexæmeron, the De Vanitate Vitæ, the Contra Severum, the Encomium in S. Anastasium Martyrem, and a much-enlarged collection of fragments, with a valuable preface, introductions to the several pieces, a Latin version and notes by Joseph Maria Quercius of Florence, were published in the Corporis Historiæ Byzantinæ Nova Appendix, fol. Rome, 1777. The Appendix comprehends also the works of Theodosius Diaconus and Corippus Africanus Grammaticus by other editors. The De Expeditione contra Persas, Bellum Avaricum, and Heraclius are edited by Bekker and included in the Bonn reprint of the Byzantine writers. The little poem In Templum Deiparæ, &c., was printed by Ducange in p. 65 of the notes to his Zonaras, in the Paris edition of the Byzantine historians. Bandurius printed it with a Latin version in his Imperium Orientale, lib. vii. p. 177; and Fabricius, with another Latin version, in his Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 615. (Quercius, ut sup.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 185, vol. vii. pp. 450, 472, &c., vol. viii. pp. 612, 615; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 583.)

45. SCHOLARIUS. [GENNADIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE, No. 2.]

46. SYNCELLUS; termed also ABBAS and MONACHUS, lived in the latter part of the eighth and beginning of the ninth century. He obtained his distinguishing epithet from having been syncellus or personal attendant of Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, who died A. D. 806. Theophanes, who was his friend, describes him as a man of talent and learning, especially well versed in chronological and historical subjects, which he had studied very deeply. He died in "the orthodox faith," without completing his principal (and indeed only known) work, the completion of which he strongly urged, as his dying request, upon his friend Theophanes.

He is the author of a chronography, or chronicle, the title of which in full is as follows: Ἐκλογὴ Χρονογραφίας συνταγμένη ὑπὸ Γεωργίου Μοναχοῦ Συγκέλλου γεγονότος Ταρασίου Πατριάρχου Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ἀπὸ Ἀδὰμ μέχρι Δικλητιανοῦ, A select Chronicle, drawn up by George the Monk, Syncellus of Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, from Adam to Diocletian. The author states that he intended to bring his work down to A. D. 800; but, as already stated, he was cut off by death, and the work only comes down to the accession of Diocletian, A. D. 284. The work is included in the various editions of the Byzantine writers. Goarus, the Parisian editor, suggested that we have the work of Syncellus in a complete form, but the contrary opinion seems to be the better founded. Possevino, Vossius, and others have identified Syncellus with Georgius Hamartolos [No. 27]; but Allatius has shown that this identification is erroneous. Syncellus has transcribed verbatim a considerable part of the Chronicon of Eusebius, so that his work has been employed to restore or complete the Greek text of the Chronicon. The Chronographia of Theophanes, which extends from A.D. 285 to A.D. 813, may be regarded as a continuation of that of Syncellus, and completes the author's original design. The Bonn edition of Syncellus is edited by W. Dindorf, and, with the brief Chronographia of Nicephorus of Constantinople, occupies two volumes 8vo., 1829. (Theophanes, Prooemium ad Chronog.; Cetera. Compend. sub init.; Allatius, Ibid. p. 24; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. vi. p. 457; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 641.)

47. SYRACUSANUS. Some of the hymns in the Messa, or services for the saints' days in the Greek church, are ascribed to George, who was bishop of Syracuse about A.D. 663, and who is said to have studied Greek literature at Constantinople, and to have become an accomplished scholar. He wrote also Troparia, or hymns for the feasts of the Nativity and the Epiphany. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. x. p. 629.)

48. TRAPEZUNTIVS (Τραπεζούντιος) of TRAPEZUNTI or TRAPEZOND. The surname of George Trapezuntius is taken, not from the place of his birth, for he was a native of Crete (Nic. Comnenus Papadopolis says of Chandace (Candia?), the capital of the island), but from the former seat of his family. His contemporary, Cardinal Bessarion, commonly designates him "Cretensis." He was born 4th April, A.D. 1396, and came into Italy probably about A.D. 1428, as he was invited into that country by Franciscus Barbarus, a Venetian noble, to teach Greek in Venice after the departure of Franciscus Philiphus who left that city in that year. George received the freedom of the city from the senate. It appears from his commentary on Cicero's Oration for Q. Ligarius, that he learned Latin (Nic. Comnenus Papadopolis says at Padua) under Victorinus of Felitre, who was also the teacher of Theodore Gaza. After a few years he removed from Venice, and, after several ineffectual attempts to establish himself as a teacher in different towns, settled at Rome, where he was made professor of philosophy and polite literature, with a salary from the Papal government; and where his lectures were attended by hearers from Italy, France, Spain, and Germany. The year of his settlement at Rome is not ascertained. The account of Boissardus, who says (Joannes Viror. Illustr.) "Primum omnium Græcorum Græcæ literas docuit Roma cum laude utpote qui clarebat A. Chr. 1430 Eugenio IV. pontificatum tenente," is not accurate, as Eugenius did not become pope till 1431. Trithemius says that he flourished at Rome in the time of Eugenius IV., A.D. 1435, which may be true; at any rate, he was at Rome before the council of Florence, A.D. 1439. He had become eminent in Italy before 1437, when he wrote to the Byzantine emperor, Joannes or John II., exhorting him to disregard the promises of the council of Basel, and to attend the council which was to be summoned at Ferrara, in Italy; but it is not clear from what part of Italy the letter was written. He was secretary, according to Hody, to the two popes, Eugenius IV. and Nicholas V. (who acceded to the papal crown A.D. 1447), but according to other statements he received the appointment from Nicholas V. apparently about A.D. 1450. He occupied for many years a position of unrivalled eminence at Rome, as a Greek scholar and teacher, and a translator of the Greek authors; but the arrival of many scholars whom Nicholas invited to that city, and the superior reputation of the version of Aristotle's Problemata, made by Theodore Gaza subsequently to George's version of the same treatise, and the attacks of Laurentius Valla, threw him into the shade. Valla attacked him because he had censured Quintilian; and this literary dispute led to a bitter personal quarrel between Valla and George; but after a time they were reconciled. Poggio, the Florentine, had also a dispute with George, who boxed his antagonist's ears, in the presence of the pope's other secretaries, a tolerable proof of the greatness of the provocation, or the irritability of George's temper. For some time George had Bessarion for his patron, but he lost his favour by his attack on the reputation of Plato, in maintaining the rival claims of Aristotle. George ceased to teach as professor in A.D. 1450, perhaps on his appointment as papal secretary.

Beside the duties of his professorship and his secretaryship, he was much engaged in translating into Latin the works of Greek authors; but, from the haste with which they were brought out, arising from his anxiety to receive the promised payment for them, they appeared in an imperfect or mutilated form.

Having lost the favour of Nicholas, who was alienated from him, as George himself states, because he refused to allow his versions of certain Greek philosophers and fathers to appear under the names of others, and perhaps also by the intrigues of his rivals, he went to Naples, to the court of Alfonso the Magnanimous, who gave him a respectable salary; but he was, after a time, reconciled to the pope by the friendly offices of Franciscus Philiphus, and returned to Rome about A.D. 1453.

In A.D. 1465 he visited his native island, and from thence went to Constantinople. On his return by sea from Constantinople to Rome, he was in imminent danger of shipwreck, and, in his peril, he besought the aid of the martyr, Andreas of Chios, who had a few months before suffered martyrdom at Constantinople; and he made a vow that if he escaped and came safely to his destination, he would write in Latin the narrative of his martyrdom. He fulfilled his vow about two years afterwards, and embodied in the narrative an account of the circumstances which led him to write it.

In his old age George's intellect failed, and he sunk into second childhood. His recollection was completely lost in literary matters, and he is said to have forgotten even his own name. In this crazy condition he wandered about the streets of Rome in a worn cloak and with a knotted staff. According to some accounts, this wreck of his intellect was the result of a severe illness; others ascribe it to grief and mortification at the trifling reward which he received for his literary labours. A story is told of him (Boissard, l.c.), that having received of the pope the trifling sum of 100 ducats for one of his works which he had presented to him, he threw the money into the Tiber, saying, "Perire labores, percat et eorum ingrata merces" ("My labours are lost, let the thankless recompense of them perish too"): but the similarity of the story to an anecdote of Theodore Gaza destroys, or at least much impairs its credibility. George's son, Andreas Trapezantius, in his prefatory address to Pope Sixtus IV., prefixed to George's translation of the Almagest of Ptolemy, declares that his life was shortened by the malignity of "his powerful enemy;" but who this enemy was Andreas does not mention. It could hardly have been Theodore Gaza, the rival of George, for he died A. D. 1478, while George himself did not die until A. D. 1485 or 1486, at the age of about 90. He was buried near his residence, in the Church of the Virgin Mary, formerly the Temple of Minerva at Rome, where was a monumental inscription in the floor of the church; but it had been so worn by the feet of the persons frequenting the church, that even in Allatius's time nothing was visible but the traces of the name.

George of Trebizond left a son, Andreas or Andrew, who, during his father's lifetime, wrote in his defence against Theodore Gaza; but he was a person of no talent or eminence. A daughter of Andrew was married to the Roman poet Faustus Magdalena, who was killed at the sacking of Rome by the troops of Charles V., A. D. 1527. Faustus, who was a friend of Leo X., used to speak much of his wife's grandfather.

The character of George is unfavourably represented by his biographers Allatius and Boerner, the latter of whom describes him as deceitful, vain, and envious. The disputes in which he was involved with the principal scholars with whom he had any thing to do confirm these unfavourable representations.

The works of George of Trebizond are numerous, consisting partly of original works, a few in Greek, the rest in Latin; partly of translations from Greek into Latin: many of them, however, remain in MS. We notice only those that have been printed; arranging them in classes, and giving the works in each class chronologically, according to the date of their earliest known publication.

I. ORIGINAL WORKS. I. IN GREEK. 1. Πρὸς τὸν ὀφθαλμοῦ καὶ δευτέρου Βασιλέα Ῥωμανῶν Ἰωάννην τὸν Παλαιολόγον, Epistola ad excelssimum sacratissimumque Regem Romanorum Joannem Palaeologum. Subjoined by Pontanus, together with a Latin version, to his Latin versions of Theophylact Simocatta and Phranza, 4to. Ingolstadt, 1604. 2. Πρὸς Ἰωάννην τὸν Κουβουκλίσιον περὶ τῆς ἑκπορεύσεως τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος, Ad Joannem Cubuclesium de Processione Spiritus Sancti. 3. Περὶ τῆς ἑκπορεύσεως τοῦ Ἁγίου Πνεύματος, καὶ περὶ τῆς ματρὸς ἁγίας καθολικῆς Ἐκκλησίας, τοῖς ἐν Κρήτῃ θεοῖς ἀνδράσι ἱερομονάχοις τε καὶ ἱερέσι, De Processione Spiritus Sancti, et de Una Sancta Catholica Ecclesia, Divinis Hominibus, qui in Creta Insula sunt, Hieromonachis et Sacerdotibus. Both of these were published with a Latin version in the Græcia Orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. i. pp. 469—582. Rome, 1652. II. IN LATIN. A. Rhetorica, Libri V., fol. Venice, 1470. This date is fixed by the chief bibliographical authorities, but is not given in the work. The Rhetorica has been often reprinted. Valentine Curio, in the preface to his edition, 4to. Basil, 1522, states that the work was left by the author in so imperfect a state that its revision had cost the editor much labour. He adds that it embodied a translation of a considerable part of the rhetorical works of Hermogenes. 5. De Octo Partibus Orationis ex Prisciano Compendium, 4to. Milan, 1472. The same work appears to have been printed in 1537 in 8vo. at Augsburg, under the title of De Octo Partibus Orationis Compendium, omitting ex Prisciano; though some of our authorities hesitate about identifying the two works. 6. De Artificio Ciceronianæ Orationis pro Q. Ligario (sometimes described as Expositio in Orationem Ciceronis pro Q. Ligario); printed with the commentaries of some other writers on some of the orations of Cicero, fol. Venice, 1477, and several times reprinted. 7. Commentarius in Philippicam Ciceronis, 4to. Venice. The year of publication is not known. These two works have been reprinted in some collections of commentaries on Cicero's orations. 8. Dialectica, 4to. Strasburg, 1509. Twelve editions of this little work were published between 1509 and 1536. The work entitled Compendium Dialecticæ ex Aristotele, by George of Trebizond, published without note of time or place, is probably the same work. 9. Comparationes Philosophorum Platonis et Aristotelis, 8vo. Venice, 1523. We are not aware that the work was printed before this date, but it must have been circulated in some form, as it was the work which drew upon George the anger of Cardinal Bessarion, who published a reply to it under the title Adversus Colaninictorem Platonis, Libri Quinque, fol. Rome, 1469. In this reply he criticises George's translation of Plato's treatise De Legibus, which has never been printed. 10. De Anticicis in quorum Rationes Fata sua rejicit. 11. Our Astrologorum Judicia plerumque falluntur. These two works were printed with Omar De Nativitatibus, 8vo. Venice, 1526. 12. Expositio in illud "Si cum volo manere domus veniam", 8vo. Basil, 1543; and reprinted in both editions of the Orthodoxographia (Basil, 1535 and 1569) and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. vi. ed. Paris, 1576. In this exposition of a passage (c. xxi. 22) in the Gospel of John, George contended that the evangelist was still living on the earth. 13. In Claudii Ptolemæi Centum Sententias (or Centiloquium) Commentarius, with a reprint of Nos. 10 and 11, and with the treatise of Joannes Pontanus, Quatenus credendum sit Astrologis, 8vo. Cologne, 1544. 14. Acta Beati Andreæ Chii; printed in the De Probatis Sanctorum Vitis of Surius, Maii, 29. p. 324, fol. Cologne, 1618, and in the Acta Sanctorum of Bollandus, Maii, tom. vii. p. 184, &c. 11. TRANSLATIONS. 15. Eusebii Pamphili de Præparatione Evangelica a Georgio Trapezantio traductus, fol. Venice, 1470. In this version the whole of the fifteenth book is omitted; yet it obtained great reputation, as was shown by its being reprinted nine or ten times during the fifteenth century. 16. Joannes Chrysostomus super Mattheum, Fol. Cologne, 1487. There is an edition without note of time or place, but which, from the character of the type, is supposed to be printed by Mentelius of Strasburg, whose other works bear date from 1473 to 1476. This translation is not wholly original; in some of the homilies it is only the ancient version of Anianus revised. 17. Rhetoricorum Aristotelis ad Theodectam Libri Tres. A version of this work of Aristotle, which some of our authorities state to be by George of Trebizond, but which does not bear his name in the title, was published in fol., Leipsic, 1503, and Venice, 1515; but his version was certainly printed, at Paris, 8vo. 1530, and with the rest of Aristotle's works at Basel, 1538. 18. Opus insignis Beati Patris Cyrilli Patriarchae Alexandriae in Evangelium Joannis, fol. Paris, 1508. Of the twelve books of which this work consists George translated the first four and the last four; the remainder were translated by Jodocus Clichtoveus, who edited the work. 19. Joannis Chrysostomi de Laudibus et Excellentia Sancti Pauli Homiliae quatuor per Georg. Trapozantium e Graeco traductae, fol. Leipzig, 1510. 20. Præclarum Opus Cyrilli Alex. qui Theophrastus vocatur, fol. Paris, 1513. This version of the work of Cyril on the Trinity has been often reprinted. 21. Almagesti Ptolemaei Libri XIII., fol. Venice, 1515. 22. Sti Gregorii Nysseni De Vilas Perfectione, sive Vita Moysis, 4to. Vienna, 1517. 23. Sti Basilii Magni adversus Apologiam Eunomii Arianæticus, Libri V. The version of the third book was printed with the Acta Concilii Florentini, and other pieces, fol. Rome, 1526; and the whole version has been printed in some Latin and Graeco-Latin editions of the works of Basil. 24. Historia Sacerdotum Barlaam et Josephal, subjoined to the works of Joannes Damascenus, fol. Basel, 1548. So wretchedly is this version executed, that doubts have been cast upon its authorship. The reputation of George as a translator is, however, very low. Beside the errors which resulted from haste, he appears to have been very unfaithful, adding to his author, or cutting out, or perverting passages almost at will.

Among his unpublished translations are several of Aristotle's works, including the Problemata, Physica, De Anima, De Animalibus, De Generatione et Corruptione; also the De Legibus and the Parmenides of Plato. His version of Plato's work, De Legibus, was severely criticised by Bessarion in his Adversus Calumniatores Platonis; and his version of Aristotle's De Animalibus is said to have been used by Theodore Gaza, though without acknowledgment, in the preparation of his own version. 49. XIPHILINUS. [XIPHILINUS.]

50. ZEGABENUS. [ZEGABENUS.] [J. C. M.]

GEPHYRAEI (Γεφυραῖοι), an Athenian family or clan, to which Harmodius and Aristogeiton belonged. (Herod. v. 55.) The account they gave of themselves was that they came originally from Eretria. Herodotus believed them to be of Phoenician descent, and to have been of the number of those who followed Cadmus into Boeotia. He states (comp. Strab. ix. p. 404) that they obtained the territory of Tanagra for their portion, and that being driven thence by the Boeotians, they came to Athens, where they were admitted to the rights of citizenship, subject only to a few trifling disqualifications. (Herod. v. 57; Suid. s. v. Γεφυραῖοι.) The place of their settlement was on the banks of the Cephissus, which separated the territory of Athens from that of Eleusis, and their name, according to the Etymologicon Magnum, was derived from the bridge (γέφυρα), which was built over the river at this point. Such a notion, however, is quite untenable, since (to mention no other reason) "bridge" appears to have been a comparatively recent meaning of γέφυρα. It is just possible that the name may have contained the idea of separation. We find that there were temples at Athens, which belonged peculiarly to these Gephyraei, to the exclusion of the rest of the Athenians, especially one to Demeter ACHAEA, whose worship they seem to have brought with them from Boeotia. (Herod. v. 61; comp. Plut. de Is. et Osir. 69; Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 1225.) Suidas (s. v. Δόρυ κνήκεον) speaks of the Athenians having been ordered by an oracle, when they were assailed by Eumolpus, to send away every tenth man of the Gephyraei to Delphi; for it is clear that of δεκαεσθύντες is the right reading of the passage in question. (Comp. Eustath. ad Il. iii. p. 408; Lobeck, Aglaoph. p. 214.) Those who were thus offered to the god were sent probably as sacred slaves for the service of the temple. (Comp. Müller, Dor. ii. 2. § 14.) [E. E.]

GERAEUS (Γήρας), a poet of Cyrene, who wrote an epigram on the poet Aratus. (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 897.) [P. S.]

GERANA (Γερὰνα), a Pygmean woman, and wife of their king, Nicodamas, by whom she became the mother of Mopsus (according to Boeus, ap. Athen. ix. p. 393, of a tortoise). Being highly esteemed and praised for her beauty among the Pygmies, she despised the gods, especially Artemis and Hera, who in revenge metamorphosed her into a crane. In this state she always fluttered about the place in which her son Mopsus dwelt, until she was killed by the Pygmies. This is said to have been the origin of the war between the Cranes and the Pygmies. (Anton. Lib. 16, who calls her Oenoë; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1322; Ov. Met. vi. 90.) [L. S.]

GERASIMUS, a writer of uncertain date, author of a Chronographia or Chronicon, from which "a passage worthy of note concerning the eruption of Mt. Vesuvius, in the reign of Titus, and the cause of subterranean fires, according to the opinion of the Christians of that time," &c., is quoted in the Eclogae Aetolicae of Joannes the patriarch, extant in MS. in the Imperial Library at Vienna. Fabricius notices one or two other persons of the name. (Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 630.) [J. C. M.]

GERMANICUS CAESAR, the elder, a son of Nero Claudius Drusus, was nephew of the emperor Tiberius, and brother of the emperor Claudius. His birth was most illustrious. From his father and paternal grandmother (the empress Livia), he inherited the honours of the Claudii and the Drusi, while his mother, the younger Antonia, was the daughter of the triumvir Antony, and the niece of the emperor Augustus. [See the genealogical table, Vol. I. p. 1076.] He was born in B.C. 15, probably in September, for his son Caligula named that month Germanicus, in honour of his father. (Suet. Cal. 1, 15.) His praenomen is unknown; nor can his original cognomen be ascertained, for the imperial family began now to be above the ordinary rules of hereditary name. By a decree of the senate, the elder Drusus, after his death, received the honourable appellation Germanicus, which was also granted to his posterity. (Dion Cass. iv. 2.) It seems at first to have been exclusively assumed by the elder son, who afterwards earned an independent title to it by his own achievements. When Augustus, in A.D. 4, adopted Tiberius, and appointed him successor to the empire, the young Germanicus had already, by his promising qualities, gained the favour of the emperor, who recommended Tiberius to take him as a son. (Suet. Cul. 4; Tac. Ann. i. 3; Zonar. x. 36.) In subsequent inscriptions and coins he is styled Germanicus Caesar, Ti. Aug. F. Divi Aug. N.; and in history the relationships which he acquired by adoption are often spoken of in place of the natural relationships of blood and birth. Upon his adoption into the Julia gens, whatever may have been his formal legal designation, he did not lose the title Germanicus, though his brother Claudius, as having now become the sole legal representative of his father, chose also to assume that cognomen. (Suet. Claud. 2.)

In A.D. 7, five years before the legal age (Suet. Cul. 1), he obtained the quaestorship; and in the same year was sent to assist Tiberius in the war against the Pannonians and Dalmatians. (Dion Cass. iv. 31.) After a distinguished commencement of his military career, he returned to Rome in A.D. 10, to announce in person the victorious termination of the war, whereupon he was honoured with triumphal insignia (without an actual triumph), and the rank (not the actual office) of praetor, with permission to be a candidate for the consulship before the regular time. (Dion Cass. lvi. 17.)

The successes in Pannonia and Dalmatia were followed by the destruction of Varus and his legions. In A.D. 11, Tiberius was despatched to defend the empire against the Germans, and was accompanied by Germanicus as proconsul. The two generals crossed the Rhine, made various incursions into the neighbouring territory, and, at the beginning of autumn, re-crossed the river. (Dion Cass. lvi. 25.) Germanicus returned to Rome in the winter, and in the following year discharged the office of consul, though he had never been aedile nor praetor. In the highest magistracy, he did not scruple to appear as an advocate for the accused in courts of justice, and thus increased that popularity which he had formerly earned by pleading for defendants before Augustus himself. Nor was he above ministering to the more vulgar pleasures of the people, for at the games of Mars, he let loose two hundred lions in the Circus; and Pliny (H. N. ii. 26) mentions his gladiatorial shows. On the 16th of January, in A.D. 13, Tiberius, having returned to Rome, celebrated that triumph over the Pannonians and Dalmatians, which had been postponed on account of the calamity of Varus; and Germanicus appears, from the celebrated Gemma Augustea (as explained by Mongez, Iconographie Romaine, Paris, 1821, p. 61), to have taken a distinguished part in the celebration. (Suet. Tib. 20.)

Germanicus was next sent to Germany with the command of the eight legions stationed on the Rhine; and from this point of his life his history is taken up by the masterly hand of Tacitus. Upon the death of Augustus, in August, A.D. 14, an alarming mutiny broke out among the legions in Germany and Illyricum. In the former country the mutiny commenced among the four legions of the Lower Rhine (the 5th, 21st, 1st, and 20th), who were stationed in summer quarters upon the borders of the Ubii, under the charge of A. Caecina. The time was come, they thought, to raise the pay of the soldier, to shorten his period of service, to mitigate the hardship of his military tasks, and to take revenge on his old enemy, the centurion. Germanicus was in Gaul, employed in collecting the revenue, when the tidings of the disturbance reached him. He hastened to the camp, and exerted all his influence to allay discontent and establish order. He was the idol of the army. His open and affable manners contrasted remarkably with the haughty and reserved of Tiberius; and like his father, Drusus, he was supposed to be an admirer of the ancient republican liberty. Some of the troops interrupted his harangue, by declaring their readiness to place him at the head of the empire; whereupon, as if contaminated by the guilty proposal, he jumped down from the tribunal whence he was speaking, declared that he would rather die than forfeit his allegiance, and was about to plunge his sword into his breast, when his attempt was forcibly stayed by the bystanders. (Tac. Ann. i. 35.)

It was known that the army of the Upper Rhine (consisting of four legions, the 2nd, 13th, 16th, and 14th, which were left in the charge of Silius), was tainted with the disaffection of the troops under Caecina, and from motives of policy it was thought necessary to comply with the demands of the soldiers. A council was held, and a feigned letter from Tiberius was concocted, in which, after 20 years of service, a full discharge was given; and, after 16 years, an immunity from military tasks, other than the duty of taking part in actions. (Missio sub oculo.) The legacy left by Augustus to the troops was to be doubled and discharged. To satisfy the requisition of the 21st and 5th legions, who demanded immediate payment, Germanicus exhausted his own purse, and his friends were equally liberal. Having thus quelled the disturbances in the lower army, by almost unlimited concession, he repaired to the four legions on the Upper Rhine; and though they voluntarily took the military oath of obedience, he prudently granted them the same indulgence which had been conferred on their disorderly comrades.

The calm was of short duration. Two legions of the Lower Rhine (the 1st and 20th) had been stationed for the winter at Ara Ubiorum (between Bonn and Cologne). Hither two deputies from the senate arrived with despatches from Germanicus; and the conscience-stricken soldiers imagined that they were come to revoke the concessions which had been extorted by fear. A formidable tumult again arose, and (according to the account of Tacitus) it was only on the departure of Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus, carrying in her bosom her young boy Caligula, the darling of the camp, and attended by the wives of her husband's friends, that the refractory legions were smitten with pity and shame. They could not bear to see so many high-born ladies seek in the foreign protection of the Treveri that security which was denied to them in the camp of their own general; and were so far worked upon by the feelings which this incident occasioned as to inflict summary punishment themselves on the leaders of the revolt. (Tac. Ann. i. 41; comp. Dion Cass. lviii. 5; Zonar. xi. 1.)

The other two legions of the Lower Rhine, the 5th and 21st, with whom the mutiny began, remained in a state of discontent and ferment in their winter quarters at Castra Vetera (Xanten). Ger-

Germanicus sent word to Caecina, that he was coming with a strong force, and would slaughter them indiscriminately, unless they anticipated his purpose by themselves punishing the guilty. This object was accomplished in an effectual, but revolting manner, by a secret nocturnal massacre of the disaffected ringleaders. Germanicus entered the camp while it was still reeking with carnage, ordered the corpses to be buried, and shed many tears on witnessing the sad spectacle. His emotion at sight of the result was accompanied by disapprobation of the means, which he designated as more befitting the readiness of the butcher than the skill of the physician. (Tac. Ann. i. 49.)

The soldiers were now anxious to be led to the field, that by the wounds they received in battle they might appease the manes of their brethren in arms; and their general was not unwilling to satisfy this desire. He crossed the Rhine, and fell upon the villages of the Marri, whom he surprised and slaughtered by night, during a festive celebration. He then laid waste the country for fifty miles round, sparing neither age nor sex, levelled to the ground the celebrated temple of Tanfana, and, on his way back to winter quarters, pushed his troops successfully through the opposing tribes (Bructeri, Tubantes, Usipetes,) between the Marri and the Rhine. (Tac. Ann. i. 48—51; Dion Cass. lvi. 3—6; Suet. Tib. 25; Vell. Pat. ii. 125.)

The intelligence of these proceedings affected Tiberius with mingled feelings—pleasure at the suppression of the mutiny among the German legions, anxiety on account of the indulgences by which it was bought, and the glory and popularity acquired by Germanicus. While he regarded his nephew and adopted son with suspicion and dislike, he commemorated his services in the senate in terms of elaborate, but manifestly insincere praise. The senate, in the absence of Germanicus, and during the continuance of the war, voted that he should have a triumph.

In the beginning of spring, A. D. 15, he fell upon the Catti, burnt their chief town Mattium (Maden near Gudensberg), devastated the country, slaughtered the inhabitants, sparing neither woman nor child, and then returned to the Rhine. Soon afterwards a deputation arrived from Segestes applying for the assistance of the Roman general. Segestes had always espoused the cause of the Romans, and had quarrelled with his son-in-law, Arminius, the conqueror of Varus. He was now blockaded by his own people, who despised him for his servile truckling to foreign domination. Germanicus hastened to his rescue, overcame the besiegers, and not only liberated Segestes, but gained possession of his daughter, Thunelda (Strab. vii. p. 292), a woman of lofty spirit, who sympathized with the patriotic feelings of her husband Arminius. Again Germanicus conducted the army victorious back to its quarters, and, at the direction of Tiberius, took the title of Imperator.

Arminius, enraged beyond endurance at the captivity of his wife, who was then pregnant, roused to war not only the Cherusci, but all the adjoining tribes. Germanicus made a division of his forces, in order to divide the force of the enemy. The infantry were conducted by Caecina through the Bructeri, the cavalry by Pedito through the borders of Friesland, while Germanicus himself, with four legions, embarked in a flotilla, and sailed by the Lacus Flevis (the Zuydersee) to the Ocean, and thence up the Ems. In the vicinity of this river the three divisions formed a junction. Germanicus ravaged the country between the Ems and the Lippe, and penetrated to the Salts Teutobergiensis, which was situated between the sources of those two rivers. In this forest the unburied remains of Varus and his legions had lain for six years bleaching in the air. With feelings of sorrow and resentment, the Roman army gathered up the bones of their ill-fated comrades, and paid the last honours to their memory. Germanicus took part in the melancholy solemnity, and laid the first sod of the funeral mound. (Tac. Ann. i. 57—62; Dion Cass. lvi. 18.) Arminius, in the mean time, had assembled his forces, and retiring into a difficult country, turned upon the pursuing troops of the Romans, who would have sustained a complete defeat had not the legions of Germanicus checked the rout of the cavalry and subsidiary cohorts. As it was, the general thought it prudent to retreat in the same three-fold division in which he had advanced. Pedito, with the cavalry, was ordered to keep the coast, and Caecina, with all speed, to get across the Pontes Longi, a mounded causeway leading over the marshes between Cäfeld and Velen, and along the banks of the Yssel (Ledebr, Land und Volk der Bructerer, Berlin, 1827). Caecina, in whose division Agrippina travelled, was obliged to fight his way hardly [AGRIFFINA]. Germanicus himself returned to the station on the Rhine by water, and, in a gusty night, was well nigh losing the 2nd and 14th legions, who, under the command of P. Vitellius, marched along a dangerous shore, exposed to the wind and tide, for the sake of lightening the burden of the transport vessels. The greater part, nevertheless, after many difficulties and adventures, succeeded in making their way to the river Unsingis (Hunse), where they rejoined the flotilla, and were taken on board. When the army arrived at its destination, Germanicus visited the sick and wounded, and contributed from his own purse to the wants of the soldiers.

In the next year (A. D. 16), warned by the losses he had recently sustained from the deficiency of his fleet, he gave orders for the building of a thousand vessels, and appointed as the place of rendezvous that part of the Batavian island where the Vahalis (Waal) diverges from the Rhine. With such aid, he hoped to facilitate the transport of men and provisions, and to avoid the dangerous necessity of marching through bogs and forests. In the meantime, hearing that Aliso, a castle on the Lippe, was besieged, he hastened to its defence; but on his arrival, found that the besiegers had dispersed. However, he was not left without employment. The mound erected to the memory of the legions of Varus had been thrown down by the Germans; and an ancient altar, built in honour of his father, was in a state of dilapidation. These he restored and repaired. The causeways between Aliso and the Rhine were in want of new moats and landmarks. These works he completed.

The fleet being now ready, he entered the canal of his father, Drusus, whom he invoked to favour his enterprise; and after sailing through the Zuydersee to the ocean, landed at Amisia, a place near the mouth of the river Amisia (Ems), on the left bank. He then marched upward along the course of the river, leaving his fleet behind. Arminius was on the further side of the Weeser, in command of the Cherusci; and, in order to get to the Weser, it was necessary to cross the Ems. The delay occasioned by the necessity of forming a bridge across the Ems, and the difficulty of the passage, made Germanicus feel his error in landing on the left bank, and leaving his galleys at Amisia. He had still greater difficulty in effecting the passage of the Weser in the face of the enemy. Seeing now that an important action was at hand, he determined to ascertain for himself the temper and feelings of the troops. Accordingly, in the beginning of the night, accompanied by a single attendant, he went secretly into the camp, listened by the side of the tents, and enjoyed his own fame. He heard the praise of his graceful form, his noble birth, his patience, his courtesy, his steady consistency of conduct. He found that his men were eager to show their loyalty and gratitude to their general, and to slake their vengeance in the field of battle. His sleep that night was blessed by a dream of happy omen, and, on the next day, when the troops were all ready for action, eight eagles were seen to enter the woods. Germanicus cried out to the legions, "Come on, follow the Roman birds, your own divinities." A great victory was gained with little loss to the Romans, Arminius having barely escaped, after smearing his face with his own blood, in order to disguise his features. His uncle, Inguiomar, had an equally narrow escape. This battle was fought upon the plain of Idistavicus (between Rintel and Hausberg), and was celebrated by a trophy of arms erected upon the spot. A second engagement took place soon afterwards, in a position where the retreat of both parties was cut off by the nature of the ground in their rear, so that the only hope consisted in valour—the only safety in victory. The result was equally successful to the Romans. In the heat of action Germanicus, that he might be the better known, uncovered his head, and cried out to the troops "to keep on killing and take no prisoners, since the only way to end the war was to exterminate the race." It was late at night before the legions ceased from their bloody task. In honour of this second victory a trophy was erected, with the inscription: "The army of Tiberius Caesar, having subdued the nations between the Rhine and the Elbe, dedicates this monument to Mars and Jupiter, and Augustus." No mention was made of the name of Germanicus.

The summer was already far advanced, when Germanicus, with the greater part of the troops, sailed back by the Ems to the Ocean. During the voyage a terrific storm occurred: several of the ships were sunk; and Germanicus, whose vessel was stranded on the shore of the Chauci, bitterly accused himself as the author of so gross a disaster, and could scarcely be prevented by his friends from flinging himself into the sea, where so many of his followers had perished. However, he did not yield to inactive grief. Lest the Germans should be encouraged by the Roman losses, he sent Silius on an expedition against the Catti, while he himself attacked the Marsi; and, by the treacherous information of their leader, Maloventus, recovered one of the eagles which had belonged to the legion of Varus. Emboldened by success, he carried havoc and desolation into the country of the enemy, who were struck with dismay when they saw that shipwreck, and hardship, and loss, only increased the ferocity of the Romans.

Germanicus had some time previously received intimation of the wish of Tiberius to remove him from Germany, and to give him command in the East, where Parthia and Armenia were in commotion on account of the dethronement of Vonones. Knowing that his time was short, he hastened his operations; and upon his return to winter quarters, felt convinced that another campaign would suffice for the successful termination of the war. But the summons of Tiberius now grew pressing. He invited Germanicus to come home, and take the triumph which had been voted to him, offered him a second consulship, suggested that more might now be gained by address than by force of arms, reminded him of the severe losses with which his successes were purchased, and appealed to his modesty by hinting that he ought to leave an opportunity to his adoptive brother, Drusus, of acquiring laurels in the only field where they could now be gathered. This touched one of the true reasons of his recall, for the emperor, though willing to play him off against Drusus, had no desire that his popularity should throw Drusus completely into the shade. [DRAVUS, No. 11.] Germanicus had petitioned for another year, in order to complete what he had begun, but he could not resist the mandate of Tiberius, though he saw that envy was the real cause of withdrawing from his grasp an honour which he had already earned. (Tac. Ann. ii. 26.)

On his return to Rome he was received with warm and enthusiastic greeting, the whole population pouring forth to meet him twenty miles from the city, and on the 26th of May, A. D. 17, he celebrated his triumph over the Cherusci, Catti, Angrivarii, and other tribes, as far as the Elbe. His five children adorned his car, and many of the most illustrious Germans ministered to the pomp of their conqueror. Among others, Thusnelda, the wife of Arminius, followed in the procession of captives. (Tac. Ann. ii. 41; Suet. Cal. i.; Vell. Pat. ii. 129; Euseb. Chron. No. 2033; Oros. vii. 4.) Medals are extant which commemorate this triumph. (See the cut below.)

The whole of the Eastern provinces were assigned, by a decree of the senate, to Germanicus, with the highest imperium; but Tiberius placed Cn. Piso in command of Syria, and was supposed to have given him secret instructions to check and thwart Germanicus, though such instructions were scarcely wanted, for Piso was naturally of a proud and rugged temper, unused to obedience. His wife Plancia, too, was of a haughty and domineering spirit, and was encouraged by Livia, the empress-mother, to vie with and annoy Agrippina.

In A. D. 18, Germanicus entered upon his second consulship at Nicopolis, a city of Achaia, whither he had arrived by coasting the Illyrian shore, after a visit to Drusus in Dalmatia. He then surveyed the scene of the battle of Actium, which was peculiarly interesting to him, from his family connection with Augustus and Antony. He had an anxious desire to view the renowned sites of ancient story and classic lore. At Athens he was welcomed with the most reverent honour, and, in compliment to the city, went attended with a single lictor. At Ilium, his memory reverted to Homer's poem, and to the origin of the Roman race. At Colophon he landed, to consult the oracle of the Clarian Apollo, and it is said that the priest daily foreboded his early fate.

At Rhodes he fell in with Piso, whom he saved from danger of shipwreck, but Piso, not appeased by his generosity, hurried on to Syria, and, by every artifice and corruption, endeavoured to acquire favour for himself, and to heap obloquy on Germanicus. Plancina, in like manner, cast insult and reproach on Agrippina. Though this conduct did not escape the knowledge of Germanicus, he hastened to fulfil the object of his mission, and proceeded to Armenia, placed the crown upon the head of Zeno, reduced Cappadocia to the form of a province, and gave Q. Servaeus the command of Commagene. (Joseph. Ant. Jud. xviii. 25.) He then spent the winter in Syria, where, without any open and violent rupture, he and Piso scarcely attempted to conceal in each other's presence their mutual feelings of displeasure and hatred. (Tac. Ann. ii. 57.) In compliance with the request of Artabanus, king of the Parthians, Germanicus removed Vonones, the deposed monarch, to Pompeiopolis, a maritime town of Cilicia. This he did with the greater pleasure, as it was mortifying to Piso, with whom Vonones was an especial favourite, from his presents and obsequious attention to Plancina.

In the following year, A. D. 19, Germanicus visited Egypt, induced by his love of travel and antiquity, and ignorant of the offence which he was giving to Tiberius; for it was one of the arcana of state, established by Augustus, that Egypt was not to be entered by any Roman of high rank without the special permission of the emperor. From Canopus, he sailed up the Nile, gratifying his taste for the marvellous and the old. The ruins of Thebes, the hieroglyphical inscriptions, the vocal stamæ of Memnon, the pyramids, the reservoirs of the Nile, excited and rewarded his curiosity. He consulted Apis as to his own fortunes, and received the prediction of an untimely end. (Plin. H. N. viii. 46.)

On his return to Syria, he found that every thing had gone wrong during his absence. His orders, military and civil, had been neglected or positively disobeyed. Hence arose a bitter interchange of reproaches between him and Piso, whom he ordered to depart from Egypt. Being soon after seized with an attack of illness, he attributed his distemper to the sorcery practised against him by Piso. In accordance with an ancient Roman custom, which required a denunciation of hostility between private individuals as well as between states, in order that they might be fair enemies, Germanicus sent Piso a letter renouncing his friendship. (Suet. Cal. 1; Tac. Ann. ii. 70.) It is remarkable that a similar custom existed in the middle ages, in the diffidatio or defiance of feudal dominions, preparatory to private war. (Allen, On the Royal Prerogative, p. 76.) Whether there were any ground for the suspicion of poisoning which Germanicus himself entertained against Piso and Plancina, it is impossible now to decide with certainty. Germanicus seems to have been of a nervous and credulous temperament. He could not bear the sight of a cock, nor the sound of its crow. (Plut. de Incid. et Od. 3.) Wherever he met with the opacities of illustrious men, he offered sacrifices to their manes. (Suet. Cal. 1.) The poisoning which he now suspected was not of a natural kind: it was a confection, partaking of magic, if we may judge from the proofs by which it was supposed to be evidenced:—pieces of human flesh, charms, and medallions, leaden plates inscribed with the name of Germanicus, half-burnt ashes moistened with putrid blood, and other sorceries by which lives are said to be devoted to the infernal deities, were found imbedded in the walls and foundations of his house. Feeling his end approaching, he summoned his friends, and called upon them to avenge his foul murder. Soon after, he breathed his last, on the 9th of October, A. D. 19, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, at Epidaphne near Antiocheia. (Tac. Ann. ii. 72, 83; Kal. Antiat. in Orelli, Inscript. vol. ii. p. 401; Dion Cass. lvi. 18; Seneca, Qu. Nat. l. 1; Zonar. xi. 2; Joseph. Ant. Jud. xviii. 2, 5; Plin. H. N. xi. 37, 71; Suet. Cal. 1.) His corpse was exposed in the forum at Antiocheia, before it was burnt, and Tacitus candidly admits (ii. 73) that it bore no decisive marks of poison, though Suetonius speaks of livid marks over the whole body, and foam at the mouth, and goes on to report that, after the burning, the heart was found unconsumed among the bones,—a supposed symptom of death by poison.

Germanicus, as he studiously sought popularity by such compliances as lowering the price of corn, walking abroad without military guard, and conforming to the national costume, so he possessed in an extraordinary degree the faculty of winning human affection. The savageness of his German wars fell heavily upon the barbarians, with whom he had no community of feeling. To those who came into personal communication with him, he was a mild-mannered man. Tacitus, whose accounts of his campaigns are full of fire and sword, of wide desolation and unsparing slaughter, yet speaks of his remarkable mansuetudo in hostes. In governing his own army his discipline was gentle, and he was evidently averse to harsh measures. He had not that ambition of supreme command, which often accompanies the power of commanding well, nor was he made of that stern stuff which would have enabled him to cope with and control a refractory subordinate officer with the cleverness and activity of Piso. He was a man of sensitive feeling, chaste and temperate, and possessed all the amiable virtues which spread a charm over social and family intercourse. His dignified person, captivating eloquence, elegant and refined taste, cultivated understanding, high sense of honour, unaffected courtesy, frank munificence, and polished manners, befitted a Roman prince of his exalted station, and seemed to justify the general hope that he might live to dispense, as emperor, the blessings of his government over the Roman world. He shines with fairer light from the dark atmosphere of crime and tyranny which shrouds the time that succeeded his death. The comparison between Germanicus and Alexander the Great, which is suggested by Tacitus (Ann. ii. 73), presents but superficial resemblances. Where can we find in the Roman general traces of that lofty daring, those wide views, and that potent intellect which marked the hero of Macedon?

The sorrow that was felt for the death of Germanicus was intense. Foreign potentates shared the lamentation of the Roman people, and, in token of mourning, abstained from their usual amusements. At home unexampled honours were decreed to his memory. It was ordered that his name should be inserted in the Salian hymns, that his curule chair, mounted with crowns of oak leaves, should always be set in the public shows, in the space reserved for the priests of Apollo, that his statue in ivory should be carried in procession at the opening of the games of the Circus, and that the flamines and augurs who succeeded him should be taken from the Julia gens. A public tomb was built for him at Antioch. A triumphal arch was erected in his honour, on Mount Amanus, in Syria, with an inscription recounting his achievements, and stating that he had died for his country; and other monuments to his memory were constructed at Rome, and on the banks of the Rhine. The original grief broke out afresh when Agrippina arrived in Italy with his ashes, which were deposited in the tomb of Augustus. But the Roman people were dissatisfied with the stinted obsequies with which, on this occasion, the ceremony was conducted by desire of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. ii. 83, iii. 1—6.)

By Agrippina he had nine children, three of whom died young, while the others survived him. (Sennia Drusorum, vol. i. p. 1077; Suet. Cal. 7.) Of those who survived, the most notorious were the emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero.

He was an author of some repute, and not only an orator but a poet. (Suet. Cal. 3; Ov. Fast. i. 21, 25, Ex Pont. ii. 5, 41, 53, iv. 8, 68; Plin. H. N. viii. 42.) Of the Greek comedies (mentioned by Suetonius) which he composed, we have no fragments left, but the remains of his Latin translation of the Phaenomena of Aratus evince considerable skill in versification, and are superior in merit to the similar work of Cicero. By some critics the authorship of this work has been, without sufficient cause, denied to Germanicus. (Barth. Advers. x. 21.) The early scholia appended to this translation have been attributed, without any certainty, now to Fulgentius, and now to Caesius or Calpurnius Bassus. They contain a citation from Prudentius. We have also fragments of his Dioemeia or Prognostica, a physical poem, compiled from Greek sources. Of the epigrams ascribed to him, that on the Thracian boy (Maittaire, Corpus Poetarum, ii. 1547) has been much admired, but it is an example of a frigid conceit. (Burmann. Anthol. Lat. ii. 103, v. 41; Brunck. Analect. vol. ii. p. 285.) The remains of Germanicus were first printed at Bononia, fol. 1474, then at Venice, fol. 1488 and 1499, in aedibus Aldi. A very good edition was published by the well-known Hugo Grotius, when he was quite a youth, with plates of the constellations, to illustrate the phaenomena of Aratus, 4to, Leyden, 1600. There are also editions in the Carmina Familiae Caesarum, by Schwarz, 8vo. Coburg, 1715, and by C. F. Schmid, 8vo. Lüneburg, 1728. The latest edition is that of J. C. Orelli, at the end of his Phaedrus, 8vo. Zurich, 1831.

The eventful life and tragic death of Germanicus, embellished by the picturesque narrative of Tacitus, have rendered him a favourite hero of the stage. There is an English play, with the title "Germanicus, a tragedy, by a Gentleman of the University of Oxford," 8vo. London, 1775. Germanicus also gives name to several French tragedies—one by Bursault, which was highly prized by Corneille, a second by the jesuit Dominique de Colonia, a third by Pradon, which was the subject of an epigram by Racine, and a fourth, published by A. V. Arnault in 1816, which occasioned some sensation on its first representation, and was translated into English by George Bernel. (Louis de Beaufort, His- toire de Caesar Germanicus, 12mo. Leyden, 1741; Caesar Germanicus, ein Historisches Gemälde, 8vo. Stendal, 1796; F. Hoffmann, Die vier Feldzüge des Germanicus in Deutschland, 4to. Götting, 1816; Niebuhr, Lect. on the Hist. of Rom. vol. ii. Lect. 61.) [J. T. G.]

COIN OF GERMANICUS.

GERMANUS. 1. One of the commanders of the expedition sent by the emperor Theodosius II., A. D. 441, to attack the Vandals in Africa. (Proper. Aquit. Chron.)

2. The patrician, a nephew of the emperor Justinian I. He was grown up at the time of Justinian's accession (A. D. 527), for soon after that he was appointed commander of the troops in Thrace, and almost annihilated a body of Antae, a Slavonic nation who had invaded that province. He was sent into Africa on occasion of the mutiny of the troops there under Tzotzas, after the recovery of that province from the Vandals by Belisarius, who had been called away into Sicily by the mutinous temper of the army in that island. Germanus was accompanied by Domnicus, or Domnichus, and Symmachus, men of skill, who were sent with him apparently as his advisers. On his arrival at Carthage (A. D. 534) he found that two thirds of the army were with the rebel Tzotzas (Τζότζας, as Theophanes writes the name; in Procopius it is Stotzas, Στότζας), and that the remainder were in a very dissatisfied state. By his mildness, he assuaged the discontent of his troops; and on the approach of Tzotzas, marched out, drove him away, and overtaking him in his retreat, gave him so decisive a defeat at Κάλας Βάραπας, i. e. Scalas Veteres, in Numidia, as to put an end to the revolt, and to compel Tzotzas to flee into Mauritania. A second attempt at mutiny was made at Carthage by Maximus; but it was repressed by Germanus, who punished Maximus by crucifying or impaling him at Carthage. Germanus was shortly after (about A. D. 539 or 540) recalled by Justinian to Constantinople. Immediately after his return from Africa he was sent to defend Syria against Choroas, or Khosro I., king of Persia; but his forces were inadequate for that purpose, and, after leaving a portion of his troops to garrison Antioch, which was, however, taken by Choroas (A. D. 539 or 540), he withdrew into Cilicia. After this Germanus remained for some time without any prominent employment. Either his ill success in Syria involved him in disgrace, or he was kept back by the hatred of the empress Theodora, the fear of whose displeasure prevented any of the greater Byzantine nobles from intermarrying with the children which Germanus had by his wife Passara (Πασάρπα); and he was obliged (A. D. 545) to negotiate a match between his daughter, who was now marriageable, and Joannes, nephew of Vitalian the Goth, though Joannes was of a rank inferior to that of his bride. Even this match was not effected without much opposition and grievous threats on the part of the empress. Germanus had another ground of dissatisfaction. His brother Borais or Boraides had on his death left his property to Germanus and his children, to the prejudice of his own wife and daughter, to whom he bequeathed only so much as the law required. The daughter appealed against this arrangement, and the emperor gave judgment in her favour. Thus alienated from his uncle, Germanus and his sons Justin and Justinian, the first of whom had been consul (he is probably the Flavius Justinus who was consul A. D. 540), were solicited to join in the conspiracy of Artabanes, who, after the death of the empress Theodora, was plotting the murder of the emperor Justinian and his general, Belisarius. But their loyalty was proof against the solicitation, and they gave information of the plot. Germanus was nevertheless suspected by the emperor of participation in it, but succeeded in making his innocence clear.

In A. D. 550 Justinian appointed Germanus to the command against the Goths in Italy. He undertook the charge with great zeal, and expended in the collection of a suitable force a larger amount from his private fortune than the emperor contributed from the public revenue. His sons Justin and Justinian were to serve under him, and he was to be accompanied by his second wife, Matasuntha (Ματασούνθα), an Ostro-Gothic princess, widow of the Gothic king Vitiges, and granddaughter of the great Theodoric. His liberality and high reputation soon attracted a large army of veterans; many soldiers formerly in the pay of the empire, now in that of the Goths, promised to desert to him, and he had reason to hope that his connection with their royal family would dispose the Goths themselves to submit. The mere terror of his name caused the retreat of a Slavonic horde who had crossed the Danube to attack Thessalonica; and he was on his march, with the brightest prospects, into Italy, when he died, after a short illness, at Sardica in Illyricum. He had, beside the children above mentioned by his first wife, a posthumous son by Matasuntha, called, after him, Germanus. (Procopius, De Bell. Vandal. ii. 16—19, De Bello Persico, ii. 6, 7, De Bello Gotico, iii. 12, 31—33, 37—40, Hist. Arcana, c. 5, with the notes of Alemannus; Theophan. Chronog. vol. i. p. 316, &c., ed. Bonn.)

3. One of the generals of the emperor Tiberius II. The emperor manifested his esteem for him by giving him his daughter Charito in marriage (A. D. 582), on which occasion he received the title of Cæsar. Another daughter of Tiberius was married to Mauricius or Maurice, afterwards emperor. (Theophan. Chronog. p. 388, ed. Bonn; Zonar. xiv. 11.)

4. The patrician, contemporary with the emperor Mauricius or Maurice, is perhaps the same as No. 2. Theodosius, the son of Maurice, married his daughter A. D. 602. During the revolt which closed the reign and life of Maurice, Theodosius and Germanus left Constantinople on a hunting excursion, and while absent had some communication with the revolted troops under Phocas, who offered the imperial crown to either or both of them (A. D. 602). On their return to Constantinople, Maurice accused Germanus of conspiring against him, and Germanus in alarm fled to one of the churches in Constantinople. The emperor sent to drag him from his sanctuary, but the resistance of his servants enabled him to escape to the great church. Maurice then caused Theodosius to be beaten with rods, on suspicion of aiding his father-in-law to escape. Germanus, it is said, would have given himself up, but the malcontents in the city would not allow him to do so; and he, in anticipation of Maurice's downfall, tampered with them to obtain the crown. Meantime the army under Phocas approached, and Germanus, probably through fear, went out with others to meet him. Phocas offered him the crown, but he, suspecting the intentions of the rebel, declined it. Phocas having himself become emperor, and being apprehensive of Germanus, first made him a priest (A. D. 603), and afterwards (A. D. 605 or 606), feeling still insecure, put him to death, together with his daughter. (Theophan. Chronog. p. 388, 445-456, &c. ed. Bonn; Theophyl. Simocatta, Hist. viii. 4, 8, 9, 10, and apud Phot. Bibl. cod. 65; Zonar. xiv. 13, 14; Cedren. vol. i. p. 710, ed. Bonn.)

5. Governor of Edessa (A. D. 587) in the reign of the emperor Maurice, was chosen general by the troops who guarded the eastern frontier, and who had, by their mutinous behaviour, put their commander, Priscus, to flight. During the reign of Phocas, we find a Germanus, apparently the same, holding the military command on the same frontier. Narses, a Roman (or Byzantine) general, having revolted and taken possession of Edessa, Germanus was ordered to besiege the town, and was there defeated and mortally wounded (A. D. 604) by a Persian army, which Choaroes or Khosro II., whose assistance the rebel had implored, sent to his relief. (Theophan. Chronog. vol. i. p. 451, ed. Bonn; Theophylact. Simocat. Hist. iii. 2, 3, and ap. Phot. Bibl. cod. 65; Zonar. xiv. 14; Cedren. vol. i. p. 710, ed. Bonn.)

6. AUSTISIDORENSIS, or ST. GERMAIN of AUXERRE, one of the most eminent of the early saints of the Gallic church, lived a little before the overthrow of the western empire. He was born at Auxerre, about A. D. 378, of a good family, and at first followed the profession of the bar. Having embraced the Christian religion, and entered the church, he was ordained deacon by Amator, bishop of Auxerre, and on his death shortly after was unanimously chosen his successor, and held the see from A. D. 418 to 449. He was eminent for his zeal against heresy, his success as a preacher, his holiness, and the miracles which he is said to have wrought. Among the remarkable incidents of his life were his two visits to Britain, the first in or about A. D. 429 and 430; the second in A. D. 446 or 447, shortly before his death, which, according to Bede, took place at Ravenna, in Italy, apparently in A. D. 448. His transactions in Britain were among the most important of his life, especially in his first visit, when he was sent over by a council, with Lupus Trecaenus or Trecaeninus (St. Loup of Troyes), as his associate, to check the spread of Pelagianism. He was successful not only in the main object of his mission, but also in repelling in a very remarkable manner an incursion of the Saxons, who were struck with panic by the Britons (who, under the guidance of Germanus, were advancing to repel them), raising a shout of "Alleluia." This incident occurred before the commencement of the Saxon conquest under Hengist, during the first visit of Germanus. The writings of Germanus churches. He does not appear to have left any writings, but the Decreta of Germanus II. of Constantinople, contained in the Jus Græco-Romanum of Leuclavius, have been sometimes improperly ascribed to him. (Niceph. Gregor. Hist. Byzant. iv. 5, 8; Georg. Phranza, Chronicon, i. 3; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. xi. p. 170, &c., L'Art de Vérifier les Dates.) [J. C. M.]

GERMI'NUS, PAULUS (Παῦλος Γερμῖνος), or PAULUS of MYRIA (Παῦλος ὁ ἐκ Μυρίας), wrote some commentaries on the orations of Lysias. Photius says he had caused the loss of many of that orator's finest productions, by asserting that they were spurious, and thus leading men to neglect them: a remarkable evidence of the credit attached to the judgment of Paulus. Paulus ascribed to Lysias the two pieces Περὶ τῆς ἰσχυρότητος δευτέρᾳ De Deo Iphicratia. (Phot. Bibl. cod. 262; Suidas, s. v. Παῦλος Γερμῖνος; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. vol. ii. pp. 766, 770.) [J. C. M.]

GERON (Γέρων), that is, "the old man;" under this name Nereus was worshipped at Gythium in Laconia. (Paus. i. 23. § 8; comp. Hea. Theop. 234.) [L. S.]

GERONTIUS. 1. A Roman officer (Ammianus calls him "comes") who embraced the party of Magnentius, and was condemned by the emperor Constantius II. when at Arles (Aries), A. D. 353, to be tortured and banished. (Amm. Mar. xiv. 5.)

2. A Briton, one of the two generals appointed by the usurper Constantine to command his army, after the death of his first generals, Nevigastus and Justinian. The reputation of Gerontius and his colleague (Edovinchus, a Frank) is attested by the fact that Sarus, whom Stilicho had sent to attack Constantine, and who was besieging the usurper in Vienna (Vienne), in Gaul, prepared for a retreat when he heard of their appointment, and escaped with loss and difficulty into Italy (A. D. 403).

When Constans, son of Constantine, whom his father had sent to subdue Spain, returned, after effecting the subjugation of that country, to his father in Gaul, he left Gerontius to guard the passes of the Pyrenees. Being sent back again, he took Justus with him as his general, and thus offended the proud spirit of Gerontius, and induced him to revolt (A. D. 408). His first step was to negotiate with the barbarians (probably the Vandals, Alans, and Suevi), who were ravaging Gaul and Spain, and the troubles he excited appear to have recalled Constantine from Italy, whither he had gone apparently, to assist, but really to dethrone Honorius. After his return, he was attacked by Gerontius. The insurgents had driven Constans out of Spain, where Gerontius had declared his friend (or perhaps his servant) Maximus emperor, and left him at Tarragona; and Constans being taken at Vienna (Vienne), was slain by order of Gerontius, and Constantine himself was besieged by Gerontius in Arles. But the approach of an army sent by Honorius, under his general Constantius, obliged Gerontius to raise the siege, and being abandoned by the greater part of his troops, who went over to Constantius, he fled towards Spain. The troops there, however, looking upon him as quite ruined, conspired to kill him. Attacked by superior numbers, he defended himself most resolutely, and killed many of his assailants; but finding escape impossible, he put an end to his own life, after first killing, at their own request, his wife, and a faithful Alan friend or servant, who accompanied him. The wife of Gerontius is expressly said by Sozomen to have been a Christian; the silence of the historian leads us to suppose that Gerontius himself was a heathen. His revolt, by preventing Constantine from holding the barbarians in check, led to the assumption of independence in self-defence by the Britons and Armoricans. (Zosim. vi. 1—6; Oros. v. 22; Prosp. Aquit. Chron.; Bede, Hist. Ecc. i. 11; Sozom. H. E. ix. 12, 13; Olympiod. apud Phot. Bibl. cod. 80.) [J. C. M.]

GERONTIUS, bishop of Nicomedeia. He was ordained or acted as deacon at Milan under Ambrose [AMBRASIUS], but having asserted that he had in the night seen the she-dæmon Onocleia (i. e. "the ass-legs," so called from her form), had seized her, shaved her head, and set her to grind in the mill, Ambrosius, deeming the relator of such tales unfit for the deaconship, ordered him to remain at home for some time, and purify himself by penitence or penance. Gerontius, instead of obeying, went to Constantinople, and being a man of winning address, made friends at the court there, and obtained by their means the bishoprick of Nicomedeia, to which he was ordained by Helladius, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, for whose son he had, by his interest, procured a high military appointment at court. Ambrose, hearing of his appointment, wrote to Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople (who held that see from A. D. 381 to 397) to depose Gerontius, and so prevent the continuance of so glaring a violation of all ecclesiastical order. Nectarius, however, could effect nothing; but when Chrysostom, two years after his accession to the patriarchate, visited the Asiatic part of his province (A. D. 399), Gerontius was deposed. The people of Nicomedeia, to whom his kindness and attention, shown alike to rich and poor, and the benefits of his medical skill, for which he was eminent, had endeared him, refused to acknowledge his successor, Pansophius, and went about the streets of Nicomedeia and of Constantinople, singing hymns and praying for the restoration of Gerontius. They served to swell the number of the enemies of Chrysostom; and in the synod of the Oak (A. D. 403), Gerontius appeared as one of his accusers. (Sozom. H. E. viii. 8; Phot. Bibl. cod. 59.) [J. C. M.]

GERO'STRATUS (Γερόστρατος), king of Aradus, in Phoenicia, was serving, together with the other princes of Phoenicia and Cyprus, in the Persian fleet, under Autophrades, when Alexander, after the battle of Issus, advanced into Phoenicia. But his son Straton hastened to submit to the conqueror, and Gerostratus himself soon after joined Alexander, with the squadron under his command. Several of the other princes did the same, and the opportune accession of this naval force was of the most essential service to Alexander in the siege of Tyre, B. C. 332. (Arrian, ii. 13, 20.) [E. H. B.]

G'ERYON or GERY'ONES (Γερύωνες), a son of Chrysaor and Calirrhoe, a fabulous king of Hesperia, who is described as a being with three heads, and possessing magnificent oxen in the island of Erythia. He acts a prominent part in the stories of Heracles. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 10; comp. HERACLES.) [L. S.]

GESIUS (Γέσιος), an eminent physician, called by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Γέτα) ὁ περιπαλωτατος ιατροσόφιστος, was a native of Gea, a place near Petra, in Arabia, and lived in the reign of the emperor Zenon, A. D. 474—491. He was a pupil of Domna, whose reputation he eclipsed, and whose scholars he enticed from him by his superior skill. He was an ambitious man, and acquired both riches and honours; but his reputation as a philosopher, though he wished to be considered such, was not very great. (Damascius ap. Suid s. v. Γέσιος, and Phot. Cod. 242. p. 352, b. 3, ed. Bekker.) He may perhaps be the physician mentioned by one of the scholiasts on Hippocrates. (Dietz, Schol. in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. ii. p. 343, note.) The little medical work that bears the name of Cassius Iatrosophiasta has been by some persons attributed to Gesius, but without sufficient reason. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 170, ed. Vet.) [W. A. G.]

A. GE'SSIUS, known only from coins, from which we learn that he was the chief magistrate at Smyrna during the latter end of the reign of Claudius and the beginning of that of Nero. The following coin has on the obverse the heads of Claudius and Agrippina, the mother of Nero, and on the reverse Nemesis, with A. ΓΕΣΣΙΟΣ ΦΙΛΟΠΑΤΡΙΣ. The coin was struck by the Smyrnaeans to congratulate Claudius on his marriage with Agrippina.

COIN OF A. GESSIUS.

GE'SSIUS FLORUS. [FLORUS.]

GE'SSIUS MARCIANUS. [MARCIANUS.]

GETA, HOSIDIUS, the fabricator of a tragedy entitled Medea, extending to 462 verses, of which the dialogue is in dactylic hexameters, the choral portions in anapaestic dimeters cat., the whole, from beginning to end, being a cento Virgilianus, and affording perhaps the earliest specimen in Roman literature of such laborious folly. Our knowledge of the compiler is derived exclusively from the following passage in Tertullian (de Praescript. Haeret. c. 39): "Vides hodie ex Virgilio fabulam in totum aliam componi, materia secundum versus, versibus secundum materiam concinnata. Denique Hosidius Geta Medeam tragoediam ex Virgilio plenissime exsuxit." Although these words do not justify us in asserting positively that Geta was contemporary with Tertullian, it is evident that they in no way support the position assumed by some critics, that he must be considered as the same person with the Cn. Hosidius Geta whose exploits during the reign of Claudius in Mauritania and Britain are commemorated by Dion Cassius (lx. 9, 20), and who appears from inscriptions to have been one of the consules suffecti for A. D. 49.

The drama, as it now exists, was derived from two MSS, one the property of Salmasius (see his notes on Capitolin. Maecia. c. 11, and on Trebell. Poll. Gallien. c. 8), the other preserved at Leyden, merely a transcript of the former. The first 134 lines were published by Scriverius, in his Collectanea Veterum Tragicorum, &c., 8vo. Lug. Bat.

1620, but the piece will be found complete in the Anthologia Latina of Burnmann, i. 178, or n. 235, ed. Meyer, and in the edition of the Poetae Latini Minores of Wernsdorff, as reprinted, with additions, at Paris, 1826, by Lemaire, vol. vii. p. 441. It was at one time absurdly enough supposed to be the Medea of Ovid, a mistake which probably arose from some ignorant confusion of the name Hosidius or Ovidius Geta with the banishment of Ovidius to the country of the Getae. [W. R.]

GETA, C. LICINIUS, consul A. C. 116, was expelled from the senate by the censors of the following year, who at the same time degraded thirty-one of the other senators. Geta was restored to his rank at a subsequent census, and was himself censor in A. C. 108. (Cic. pro Cluent. 42; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 9.) [W. B. D.]

GETA, LUSIUS, praetorian prefect under Claudius I. A. D. 48. He was superseded during the arrest of the empress Messalina by the freedman Narcissus, and deprived of his prefecture in A. D. 52, by Agrippina, who regarded him as a creature of Messalina's, and attached to her son Britannicus. (Tac. Ann. xi. 31, 33, xii. 42.) [W. B. D.]

GETA, L. or P. SEPTIMIUS, the second son of Septimius Severus and Julia Domna, was born at Milan on the 27th of May, A. D. 189, three years before the elevation of his parents to the purple, and is said to have been named after his paternal grandfather or paternal uncle. Geta accompanied his father to the Parthian war, and, when Caracalla was declared Augustus in 198, received from the soldiers the appellation of Caesar, which was soon after confirmed by the emperor and the senate. We find him styled Caesar, Pontifex, and Princeps Juventutis, on the medals struck before the beginning of 205, at which time he entered upon his first consulship. His second consulship belongs to 208, when he proceeded along with the army to Britain, and in the following year he received the tribunician power and the title of Augustus, honours equivalent to a formal announcement that he was to be regarded as joint-heir to the throne. Upon the death of Severus, at York, in 211, the brothers returned to Rome, and the rivalry, gradually ripening into hatred, which was well known to have existed between them from their earliest years, was now developed with most unequivocal violence. Even during the journey the elder is said to have made several ineffectual attempts to assassinate his detested colleague; but Geta was so completely aware of his danger, and took such effectual precautions, that he escaped their machinations, while the affection entertained for his person by the soldiers rendered open force impracticable. But, having been at length thrown off his guard by the protestations of Caracalla, who feigned an earnest desire for a reconciliation, and persuaded their mother to invite them both to meet in her chamber without attendants, in order that they might exchange forgiveness, he was murdered by some centurions who had been placed in ambush for the purpose, in the very arms of Julia, who, although covered with the blood of her son, was obliged to smile approbation of the deed, that she might escape a like fate. Geta perished towards the end of February, A. D. 212, in the twenty-third year of his age.

Although Geta was rough in his manners and profligate in his morals, he never gave any indication of those savage passions which have branded the name of Caracalla with infamy, but, on the contrary, he took delight in the liberal arts and in the society of learned men, and was generally accounted upright and honourable.

After the murder of his brother, Caracalla ordered all his statues to be broken, all inscriptions in his honour to be erased, and all coins bearing his effigy or designation to be melted down. Notwithstanding these measures, many of Geta's medals have come down to us, and the obliteration of a portion of the legend upon some great public monuments, such as the arch of Severus, has served, by attracting attention and inquiry, to keep alive his memory.

As in the case of Commodus, we find a variation in the phenomenon. The earlier coins exhibit Lucius and Pebellus indifferently, but the former disappears from all the productions of the Roman mint after his first consualship, while both are found together on some of the pieces struck in Greece and Asia. The cause of these changes is quite unknown.

COIN OF CARACALLA. (See remarks at the end of CARACALLA.)

COIN OF GETA, exhibiting on the reverse both emperors and the goddess Liberalitas.

(Dion Cass. lxxvi. 2, 7, 11, lxxvii. 1—3, 12; Spartian. Sever. 8, 10, 14, 16, 21, Caracall.; Geta; Herodian. iii. 33, 46, iv. 4—10; Vict. Caes. 20, 21; Eutrop. viii. 10.) [W. R.]

GETA, P. SEPTIMIUS, a brother of Septimius Severus, after having held the offices of quaestor, praetor of Crete, and of Cyrene, was elevated to the consulship in A. D. 203, along with Plautianus (PLAUTIANUS), and appears at one time to have entertained hopes of being preferred to his nephews. He is said to have revealed to the emperor with his dying breath the ambitious schemes of Plautianus, whom he hated, but no longer feared; and it is certain that from this period the influence of the favourite began to wane. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 2; Spartian. Sept. Sev. 8, 10, 14; Gruter, Corpus Inscript. mxcix. 7.) [W. R.]

GIGANTES (Γίγαντες). In the story about the Gigantes or giants, we must distinguish the early legends from the later ones. According to Homer, they were a gigantic and savage race of men, governed by Eurymedon, and dwelling in the distant west, in the island of Thrinacia; but they were extirpated by Eurymedon on account of their insolence towards the gods. (Horn. Od. vii. 59, 204, x. 120; comp. Paus. viii. 29. § 2.) Homer accordingly looked upon the Gigantes, like the Phaeacians, Cyclopes, and Laestrygonae, as a race of Autochthones, whom, with the exception of the Phaeacians, the gods destroyed for their overbearing insolence, but neither he nor Hesiod knows any thing about the contest of the gods with the Gigantes. Hesiod (Theog. 185), however, considers them as divine beings, who sprang from the blood that fell from Uranus upon the earth, so that Ge was their mother. Later poets and mythographers frequently confound them with the Titans (Serr. ad Aen. viii. 698, Georg. i. 166, 278; Hor. Carm. iii. 4. 42), and Hyginus (Praef. Fab. p. 1) calls them the sons of Ge (Terra) and Tartarus. Their battle with Zeus and the Olympian gods seems to be only an imitation of the revolt of the Titans against Uranus. Ge, it is said (Apollod. i. 6. § 1, &c.), indignant at the fate of her former children, the Titans, gave birth to the Gigantes, that is, monstrous and unconquerable giants, with fearful countenances and the tails of dragons. (Comp. Ov. Trist. iv. 7, 17.) They were born, according to some, in Phlegrae (i. e. burning fields), in Sicily, Campania, or Arcadia, and, according to others, in the Thracian Pallene. (Apollod., Paus. ii. cc.; Pind. Nem. i. 67; Strab. pp. 245, 281, 330; Schol. ad Hom. Il. viii. 479.) It is worthy of remark that Homer, as well as later writers, places the Gigantes in volcanic districts, and most authorities in the western parts of Europe. In their native land they made an attack upon heaven, being armed with huge rocks and the trunks of trees. (Ov. Met. i. 151, &c.) Porphyrion and Alcyoneus distinguished themselves above their brethren. The latter of them, who had carried off the oxen of Helios from Erytheia, was immortal so long as he fought in his native land; and the gods were informed that they should not be able to kill one giant unless they were assisted by some mortal in their fight against the monsters. (Comp. Schol. ad Pind. Nem. i. 100; Eratosth. Calast. 11.) Ge, on hearing of this, discovered a herb which would save the giants from being killed by mortal hands; but Zeus forbade Helios and Eos to shine, took himself the herb, and invited Hercules to give his assistance against the giants. Hercules, indeed, killed Alcyoneus, but as the giant fell on the ground, he came to life again. On the advice of Athena, Hercules dragged him away from his native land, and thus slew him effectually. Porphyrion attacked Hercules and Hera, but was killed by the combined efforts of Zeus and Hercules, the one using a flash of lightning and the other his arrows. (Comp. Pind. Pyth. viii. 19 with the Schol.) The other giants, whose number, according to Hyginus, amounted to twenty-four, were then killed one after another by the gods and Hercules, and some of them were buried by their conquerors under (volcanic) islands. (Eurip. Cycl. 7; Diod. iv. 21; Strab. p. 489; Serr. ad Aen. iii. 578.) The fight of the giants with the gods was represented by Phidias on the inside of the shield of his statue of Athena. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. 4.) The origin of the story of the Gigantes must probably be sought for in similar physical phenomena in nature, especially volcanic ones, from which arose the stories about the Cyclopes. [L. S.]

GILDO, or GILDON (the first is the usual form in Latin writers, but Claudian, for metrical reasons, sometimes uses the second), a Moorish chieftain in the latter period of the Western Empire. His father, Nubel, was a man of power and influence "velut regulus," among the Moorish provincials, and left several sons, legitimate and illegitimate, of whom Firmus, Zamma, Gildo, Masecel (written also Mascizel and Masecil, and, by Zosimus, Μασκέλλος), Dias, Salmaces, and Masuca, and a daughter, Cyria, are mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus. Zamma, who was intimate with Count Romanus, was killed by Firmus; and the persecution which this murder provoked Romanus to institute drove Firmus into revolt (A. D. 372). The revolt, in which Firmus was supported by his sister Cyria and by all his brothers, except Gildo, was quelled by the Count Theodosius, father of the emperor Theodosius the Great. Masuca was mortally wounded and taken in the course of the war, and Firmus destroyed himself. Gildo rendered good service to Theodosius in this war, and thus apparently paved the way for his future advancement.

He subsequently attained the offices of Comes Africæ, and Magister utriusque militiæ per Africam. If we can trust to an expression of Claudian, that Africa groaned under his government for twelve years, his appointment to these offices must date from about A. D. 386, in the reign of Valentinian II. How he acted when Africa was seized by the rebel Maximus, A. D. 387 or 388, is not known; but from his continuing to hold the government of the province after the revolt of Maximus was quelled, it is probable that he continued faithful. The Codex Theodosianus (9. tit. 7. s. 9) shows that he possessed his high offices in A. D. 393. In the war of Theodosius against Arbogastes and Eugenius (A. D. 394), Gildo acted very ambiguously. It is probable that he professed allegiance to Theodosius, but did not send to him any contributions of ships, money, or men. Claudian intimates that Theodosius, irritated by this, proposed to attack him, but was prevented by death.

In A. D. 397 Gildo was instigated by Eutropius the eunuch to transfer his allegiance and that of his province from the western to the eastern empire, and the emperor Arcadius accepted him as a subject. Stilicho, guardian of Honorius, was not disposed quietly to allow this transfer, and the matter was laid before the Roman senate, which proclaimed Gildo an enemy, and denounced war against him. Just about this time, Masecel, brother of Gildo, either disapproving his revolt, or having had his life attempted by him, fled into Italy, leaving in Africa two sons, who were serving in the army there, and whom Gildo forthwith put to death. Masecel, who had shown soldierly qualities in the revolt of Firmus, was placed by Stilicho at the head of the troops (apparently 5000 in number, though Zosimus speaks of "ample forces"), sent against Gildo (A. D. 398). Masecel, who was a Christian, took with him several monks; and his prayers, fastings, and other religious exercises, were very constant. He landed in Africa, and marched to a place between Thebeste in Numidia and Metridera in Africa Proper, where he was met by Gildo, who, though not yet fully prepared for defence, had assembled an irregular army of 70,000 men, partly Roman troops who had revolted with him, partly a motley assembly of African tribes. Masecel, whose enthusiasm was excited by a dream, in which St. Ambrose, lately deceased at Milan, appeared to him and promised him victory, easily routed the forces of his brother; and Gildo, who had managed to escape to the sea, was driven by contrary winds into the harbour of Tabraca, and being taken and imprisoned, put an end to his own life by hanging himself (A. D. 398).

If any confidence may be placed in the representations of Claudian, Gildo was a tyrant detestable alike for cruelty, lust, and avarice: the poet describes him as worn out with age at the time of his revolt. He was a Pagan, but his wife and his daughter Salvina (who had been married somewhere about A. D. 390 to Nebridius, nephew of Flacilla [FLACILLA], first wife of the emperor Theodosius the Great, and had been left a widow with two children,) were ladies of approved piety, as was also Cyria, sister of Gildo, who had devoted herself to a life of perpetual virginity.

Masecel did not survive his brother. He was received by Stilicho on his return with apparent honour and real jealousy, and while crossing a bridge, apparently at Milan, among the retinue of Stilicho, was, by his order, shoved, as if accidentally, into the river, carried away by the stream, and drowned. Orosius regards his death as a divine judgment for his having been puffed up with pride at his victory, and having forsaken the society of the monks and religious persons with whom he before kept company, and especially for having dragged some accused persons out of a church, where they had taken sanctuary. This change of demeanour excites a suspicion that his former exercises of piety were a feint to excite the enthusiasm of his own army, or act upon the superstitious fears of his opponents. (Amm. Marc. xxix. 5; Oros. vii. 36; Zosim. v. 11; Marcellin. Chron.; Claudian, de Bell. Gildon., and de Laudibus Stilichonis, lib. I.; Hieronymus, Epist. lxxxv., ad Salvianum, vol. iv. col. 663, ed. Benedict; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. v.; Gibbon, c. 29.) [J. C. M.]

GILLO. 1. Q. FULVIUS GILLO, a legate of Scipio Africanus I., in Africa, by whom he was sent to Carthage in B. C. 203. Gillo was prætor in B. C. 200, and obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxx. 21, xxxi. 4, 6.)

2. CN. FULVIUS (GILLO), probably a son of the preceding, was prætor in B. C. 167, and had the province of Hispania Citerior. (Liv. xlv. 16.)

GILLUS (Γίλλος), a Tarentine, ransomed the Persian nobles, who had been sent by Darius Hystaspis on an exploring expedition with DEMOCEDUS, and who, on their return from Crotona, had been cast on the Iapygian coast, and reduced to slavery. Darius offered Gillus any recompense he pleased, whereupon he requested the king's interposition to restore him to his native city, from which he had been banished; and he begged at the same time that this might be effected quietly through the mediation of the Cnidians, between whom and the Tarentines there was friendship, arising probably from their common origin. The attempt to procure his recall was made without success. (Herod. iii. 138; Müller, Dor. i. 6. § 12.) [E. E.]

GISCO or GISGO (Γίσκων or Γίσκων). 1. A son of the Hamilcar who was killed in the battle of Himera, B. C. 480. In consequence of the calamity suffered by the Carthaginians under his father's command, Gisco was compelled to quit his native city, and spend his life in exile at Selinus. He was father of the Hannibal who commanded the second Carthaginian expedition to Sicily, A. C. 409. (Diod. xiii. 43; Just. xix. 2.)

2. Son of Hanno, and probably the father of Hamilcar, the adversary of Agathocles. He is mentioned by Diodorus (xvi. 81) as being in exile at the time of the great defeat sustained by the Carthaginians at the river Crimissus (B.C. 339). According to Polyænus he had been banished, as implicated in the designs of his brother Hamilcar to possess himself of the sovereign power (Polyænus. i. 11, see also Justin. xxii. 7); but it appears that he had previously distinguished himself, both by his courage and skill as a general, and after the disaster just alluded to the Carthaginians thought fit to recall him from exile, and send him, at the head of a fresh army of mercenaries, to restore their affairs in Sicily. But though he succeeded in cutting off two bodies of mercenary troops, in the service of Syracuse, he was unable to prevent the destruction of Mamercus of Catania, and Hicetas of Leontini, the two chief allies of the Carthaginians; and shortly afterwards the ambassadors who had been sent from Carthage succeeded in concluding a treaty with Timoleon, by which the river Halycus was fixed as the boundary of the contending powers (B.C. 338). After this victory we hear no more of Gisco. (Plut. Timol. 30—34; Diod. xvi. 81, 82; Justin. xxii. 3, 7.)

3. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Lilybaeum, at the end of the first Punic war. (Polyb. i. 66.) It appears that he must have succeeded Hamilco in this command, but at what period we are not informed. After the conclusion of peace (B.C. 241), Hamilcar Barca having brought down his troops from Eryx to Lilybaeum, resigned his command in disgust, and left to Gisco the charge of conducting them from thence to Carthage. The latter prudently sent them over to Africa in separate detachments, in order that they might be paid off and disbanded severally; but the Carthaginian government, instead of following this wise course, waited till the whole body were reunited in Africa, and then endeavoured to induce them to compromise the amount due to them for arrears. The consequence was, the breaking out of a general mutiny among them, which ultimately led to the sanguinary civil war known by the name of the Inexpiable. The mutinous troops, to the number of 20,000, having occupied the city of Tunia, only twelve miles from Carthage, Gisco, who during his command in Sicily had made himself highly popular with the army, was deputed to them, with full powers to satisfy all their demands. But this concession came too late. Those who had taken the lead in the meeting, apprehensive of being given up to vengeance, should any composition be effected, now exerted all their endeavours to inflame the minds of the soldiery, and urge them to the most unreasonable demands. Spendius and Matho, two of the most active of the ringleaders, had been appointed generals, and it was at their instigation that the troops, exasperated by an imprudent reply of Gisco to some of their demands, fell upon that general, seized the treasures that he had brought with him, and threw him and his companions into prison. (Polyb. i. 66—70.) From this time the mercenaries, who were joined by almost all the native Africans subject to Carthage, waged open war against that city. Gisco and his fellow-prisoners remained in captivity for some time, until Spendius and Matho, alarmed at the successes of Hamilcar Barca, and apprehensive of the effects which the lenity he had shown towards his prisoners might produce among their followers, determined to cut them off from all hopes of pardon by involving them in the guilt of an atrocious cruelty. For this purpose they held a general assembly of their forces, in which, after alarming them by rumours of treachery, and exasperating them by inflammatory harangues, they induced them to decree, on the proposal of the Gaul Autaritus, that all the Carthaginian prisoners should be put to death. The sentence was immediately executed in the most cruel manner upon Gisco and his fellow-captives, seven hundred in number. (Polyb. i. 79, 80.)

4. Father of Hasdrubal, who was general in Spain, together with Hasdrubal and Mago, the two sons of Hamilcar Barca. (Liv. xxiv. 41; Polyb. ix. 11.) It is not improbable that this Gisco may be the same with the preceding one. Livy also calls the Hamilcar who was governor of Malta at the beginning of the second Punic war, son of Gisco (Liv. xxi. 51); but whether this refers to the same person we have no means of ascertaining.

5. An officer in the service of Hannibal, of whom a story is told by Plutarch (Fab. Max. 15), that having accompanied his general to reconnoitre the enemy's army just before the battle of Cannæ, Gisco expressed his astonishment at their numbers. To which Hannibal replied: "There is one thing yet more astonishing—that in all that number of men there is not one named Gisco."

6. One of the three ambassadors sent by Hannibal to Philip, king of Macedonia, in B.C. 215, who fell into the hands of the Romans. (Liv. xxiii. 34.) He may perhaps be the same with the preceding.

7. A Carthaginian who came forward in the assembly of the people to harangue against the conditions of peace proposed by Scipio, after the battle of Zama, B.C. 202. Hannibal, who knew that all was lost, and that it was useless to object to the terms offered, when there were no means of obtaining better, forcibly interrupted him, and dragged him down from the elevated position he had occupied to address the assembly; an act which he afterwards excused, by saying, that he had been so long employed in war, he had forgotten the usages of peaceful assemblies. (Liv. xxx. 37.) The same circumstance is related by Polybius (xv. 19), but without mentioning the name of the speaker.

8. Son of Hamilcar (which of the many persons of that name we know not) was one of the chief magistrates at Carthage at the time of the disputes which led to the third Punic war. Ambassadors having been sent from Rome to adjust the differences between the Carthaginians and Masinissa (B.C. 152), the senate of Carthage was disposed to submit to their dictation; but Gisco, by his violent harangues, so inflamed the minds of his hearers against the Romans, that the ambassadors even became apprehensive for their personal safety, and fled from the city. (Liv. Epi. xlviii.)

9. Surnamed Stritanus, one of the ambassadors sent from Carthage to Rome, with offers of submission, in order to avert the third Punic war, B.C. 149. (Polyb. xxxvi. 1.) [E. H. B.]

GI'TIADAS (Γιτίδας), a Lacedæmonian architect, statuary, and poet. He completed the temple of Athena Poliouchos at Sparta, and ornamented it with works in bronze, from which it was called the Brazen House, and hence the goddess received the surname of Χαλκοῦχος. Gitiadas made for this temple the statue of the goddess and other works in bronze (most, if not all of which, seem to have been bas-reliefs on the walls), representing the labours of Heracles, the exploits of the Tyndarids, Hephaestus releasing his mother from her chains, the Nymphs arming Perseus for his expedition against Medusa, the Birth of Athena, and Amphitrite and Poseidon. The artist also served the goddess as a poet, for he composed a hymn to her, besides other poems, in the Doric dialect. (Paus. iii. 17. § 3.)

Gitiadas also made two of the three bronze tripods at Amyclae. The third was the work of Callon, the Aeginetan. The two by Gitiadas were supported by statues of Aphrodite and Artemis (Paus. iii. 18. § 5). This last passage has been misinterpreted in two different ways, namely, as if it placed the date of Gitiadas, on the one hand, as high as the first or second Messenian War, or, on the other hand, as low as the end of the Peloponnesian War. The true meaning of Pausanias has been explained by Müller (Aeginet. p. 100), and Thiersch (Epochen, p. 146, &c., Ammerk. p. 40, &c.; comp. Hirt, in the Amalthea, vol. i. p. 260). The passage may be thus translated:—"But, as to the things worth seeing at Amyclae, there is upon a pillar a pentathlete, by name Aenetus."

Of him, then, there is an image and bronze tripods. (But as for the other more ancient tripods, they are said to be a tithe* from the war against the Messenians.) Under the first tripod stands an image of Aphrodite, but Artemis under the second: both the tripods themselves and what is wrought upon them are the work of Gitiadas: but the third is the work of the Aeginetan Callon: but under this stands an image of Cora, the daughter of Demeter. But Aristander, the Parian, and Polycleitus, the Argive, made [other tripods]: the former a woman holding a lyre, namely, Sparta; but Polycleitus made Aphrodite, surnamed 'the Amyclaeae.' But these last tripods exceed the others in size, and were dedicated from the spoils of the victory at Aegospotami." That is, there were at Amyclae three acts of tripod, first, those made from the spoils of the (first or second) Messenian War, which Pausanias only mentions parenthetically; then, those which, with the statue, formed the monument of the Olympic victor Aenetus, made by Gitiadas and Callon; and, lastly, those made by Aristander and Polycleitus out of the spoils of the battle of Aegospotami. But in another passage (iv. 14. § 2), Pausanias appears to say distinctly that the tripods at Amyclae, which were adorned with the images of Aphrodite, Artemis, and Cora, were dedicated by the Lacedaemonians at the end of the first Messenian War. There can, however, be little doubt that the words from Ἀποδοῖσιν to ἐραυῖα, are the gloss (which afterwards crept into the text) of some commentator who misunderstood the former passage. Another argument that Gitiadas cannot be placed nearly so high as the first Messenian War is derived from the statement of Pausanias (iii. 17. § 6) that the Zeus of Learchus of Rhegium was the oldest work in bronze at Sparta.

These difficulties being removed, it is clear from the way in which Gitiadas is mentioned with Callon by Pausanias that he was his contemporary, and he therefore flourished about B. C. 516. [CALLON.] He is the last Spartan artist of any distinction.

* According to the reading of Jacobs and Bekker, δαδῖν for δέκα.

His teacher is unknown; but, as he flourished in the next generation but one after Dipoeus and Scyllis, he may have learnt his art from one of their pupils; perhaps from Theodorus of Samos, who lived a considerable time at Sparta. (Hirt. Geach. d. Bild. Kennt. p. 108.) [P. S.]

GLABER, P. VARIINIUS, praetor, B. C. 73. He was among the first of the Roman generals sent against the gladiator Spartacus [SPARTACUS], and both in his own movements and in those of his lieutenants he was singularly unfortunate. Spartacus repeatedly defeated Glaber, and once captured his war-horse and his lictors. But, although commissioned by the senate to put down the insurrection of the slaves, Glaber had only a hastily levied army to oppose to Spartacus, and a sickly autumn thinned its ranks. (Appian, B. C. i. 116; Plut. Crass. 9; Frontin. Strat. i. 5. § 22) Florus (iii. 20) mentions a Clodius Glaber; compare, however, Plutarch (L. c.) [W. R. D.]

GLABRIO, a family name of the Acilia gens at Rome. The Acilii Glabrones were plebeian (Liv. xxv. 10, 24, xxvi. 57), and first appear on the consular Fasti in the year B. C. 191, from which time the name frequently occurs to a late period of the empire. The last of the Glabrones who held the consulate was Anicius Acilius Glabrio Faustus, one of the supplementary consuls in A. D. 438.

1. C. ACILIUS GLABRIO, was quaestor in B. C. 203, and tribune of the plebs in 197, when he brought forward a rogation for planting five colonies on the western coast of Italy, in order probably to repair the depopulation caused by the war with Hannibal. (Liv. xxii. 29.) Glabrio acted as interpreter to the Athenian embassy in B. C. 155, when the three philosophers, Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus came as envoys to Rome. [CARNEADES.] (Gell. vii. 14; Plut. Cat. Maj. 22; Macrob. Sat. i. 5.) Glabrio was at this time advanced in years, of senatorial rank; and Plutarch calls him a distinguished senator (L. c.). He wrote in Greek a history of Rome from the earliest period to his own times. This work is cited by Dionysius (iii. 77), by Cicero (de Off. iii. 32), by Plutarch (Romul. 21), and by the author of Orig. Gent. Rom. (c. 10. § 2). It was translated into Latin by one Claudius, and his version is cited by Livy, under the titles of Annales Acilianii (xxv. 39) and Libri Acilianii (xxxv. 14). We perhaps read a passage borrowed or adapted from the work of Glabrio in Appian (Syriac. 10). Atilius Fortunatianus (de Art. Metric. p. 2680, ed. Putsch) ascribes the Saturnian verse

to an Acilius Glabrio. (Krause, Vet. Hist. Rom. Fragm. p. 84.)

2. M'. ACILIUS, C. F. L. N. GLABRIO, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 201, when he opposed the claim of Cn. Corn. Lentulus, one of the consuls of that year, to the province of Africa, which a unanimous vote of the tribes had already decreed to P. Scipio Africanus I. (Liv. xxx. 40.) In the following year Glabrio was appointed commissioner of sacred rites (decemvir sacrorum) in the room of M. Aurelius Cotta, deceased (xxxi. 50). He was praetor in B. C. 196, having presided at the Ple beian Games in the Flaminian Circus; and from the fines for encroachment on the demesne lands he consecrated bronze statues to Ceres and her offspring Liber and Libera (xxxiii. 25, comp. iii. 55; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 24) at the end of 197. Glabrio was praetor peregrinus (Liv. xxxiii. 24, 26), and quelled an insurrection of the praedial slaves in Etruria, which was so formidable as to require the presence of one of the city legions. (Liv. xxxiii. 36.) In a. c. 193 he was an unsuccessful competitor for the consulship, which, however, he obtained in 191. (xxxv. 10, 24.) In this year Rome declared war against Antiochus the Great, king of Syria [ANTIOCHUS III.]; and the commencement of hostilities with the most powerful monarch of Asia was thought to demand unusual religious solemnities. In the allotment of the provinces, Greece, the seat of war, fell to Glabrio; but before he took the field he was directed by the senate to superintend the sacred ceremonies and processions, and to vow, if the campaign were prosperous, extraordinary games to Jupiter, and offerings to all the shrines in Rome. (Liv. xxxvi. 1, 2.)

Glabrio, to whom the senate had assigned, besides the usual consular army of two legions, the troops already quartered in Greece and Macedonia, appointed the month of May and the city of Brundisium as the time and place of rendezvous. From thence he crossed over to Apollonia, at the head of 10,000 foot, 2,000 horse, and 15 elephants, with power, if needful, to levy in Greece an additional force of 5000 men. (Liv. xxxvi. 14; Appian. Syr. 17.) He made Larissa in Thessaly his headquarters, from which, in co-operation with his ally, Philip II., king of Macedonia, he speedily reduced to obedience the whole district between the Cambesian mountain chain and mount Oeta. Limnaea, Pellinaeum, Pharsalus, Pherae, and Scotussa, expelled the garrisons of Antiochus, and his allies the Athamanes; Philip of Megalopolis, a pretender to the crown of Macedonia, was sent in chains to Rome; and Amynder, the king of the Athamanes, was driven from his kingdom. (Liv. Appian. ll. cc.)

Antiochus, alarmed at Glabrio's progress, entrenched himself strongly at Thermopylae; but although his Aetolian allies occupied the passes of mount Oeta, the Romans broke through his outposts, and cut to pieces or dispersed his army. Boeotia and Euboea next submitted to Glabrio: he reduced Lania and Heracleia at the foot of Oeta, and in the latter city took prisoner the Aetolian Democritus, who the year before had threatened to bring the war to the banks of the Tiber. The Aetolians now sent envoys to Glabrio at Lania. They proposed an unconditional surrender of their nation "to the faith of Rome." The term was ambiguous; Glabrio put the strictest interpretation upon it (comp. Liv. vii. 31), and when the envoys remonstrated, threatened them with chains and the dungeon. His officers reminded Glabrio that their character as ambassadors was sacred, and he consented to grant the Aetolians a truce of ten days. During that time, however, the Aetolians received intelligence that Antiochus was preparing to renew the war. They concentrated their forces therefore at Naupactus, in the Corinthian gulf, and Glabrio hastened to invest the place. (Polyb. xx. 9, 10; Liv. xxxvi. 28.) His march from Lania to Naupactus lay over the highest ridge of Oeta; a handful of men might have held it against the whole consular army. But the difficulties of the road were all that Glabrio had to contend with, so completely had his stern demeanour and his repeated victories quelled the spirit of the Aetolians. Naupactus was on the point of surrendering to Glabrio, but it was rescued by the intercession of the proconsul, T. Quintus Flamininus, and the besieged were permitted to send an embassy to Rome. After attending the congress of the Achaean cities at Aegium, and a fruitless attempt to procure a recall of the exiles to Elis and Sparta, Glabrio returned to Phocia, and blockaded Amphissa. While yet engaged in the siege, his successor, L. Cornelius Scipio, arrived from Rome, and Glabrio gave up to him the command. (Polyb. xxi. 1, 2; Liv. xxxvii. 35, xxxviii. 6; Appian. Syr. 21.) A triumph was unanimously granted to Glabrio, but its unusual splendour was somewhat abated by the absence of his conquering army, which remained in Greece. He triumphed in the autumn of a. c. 190. "De Aetoleis et rege Syriae Antiocho." Glabrio was a candidate for the censorship in a. c. 189. But the party of the nobles which, in 192, had excluded him from the consulship, again prevailed. It was rumoured that a part of the rich booty of the Syrian camp, which had not been displayed at his triumph, might be found in his house. The testimony of his legatus, M. Porcius Cato, was unfavourable to him, and Glabrio withdrew from an impeachment of the tribunes of the plebs, under the decent pretext of yielding to a powerful faction. (Liv. xxxvii. 57; Plut. Cat. Maj. 12, 13, 14; Flor. ii. 8. § 10; Aur. Vict. Vir. Illustr. 47, 54; Front. Strat. ii. 4. § 4; Eutrop. iii. 4; Appian. Syr. 17—21.)

3. M'. ACILIUS M'. F. C. N. GLABRIO, son of the preceding, dedicated, as duumvir under a decree of the senate, a. c. 181, the Temple of Piety in the herb-market at Rome. The elder Glabrio had vowed this temple on the day of his engagement with Antiochus at Thermopylae, and his son placed in it an equestrian statue of his father, the first gilt statue erected at Rome (Liv. xl. 34; Val. Max. ii. 5. § 1). Glabrio was one of the curule aediles in a. c. 165, when he superintended the celebration of the Megalensian games (Terent. Andr. tit. fab.), and supplementary consul in a. c. 154, in the room of L. Postumius Albinus, who died in his consular year. (Obsequ. de Prod. 76; Fast. Capit.)

4. M'. ACILIUS GLABRIO, tribune of the plebs. The date of his tribuneship is not ascertained. He brought forward and carried the lex Acilia de Repetundis, which prohibited ampliato and compendatio. (Cic. in Verr. Act. Pr. 17, in Verr. ii. 1, 9, Pseudo-Ascon. in Act. I. Verr. p. 149, in Act. II. Verr. p. 165, Orelli.) For the Lex Caecilia mentioned by Valerius Maximus (vi. 9. § 10), we should probably read Lex Acilia. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Repetundae.)

5. M'. ACILIUS M. F. M. N. GLABRIO, son of the preceding and of Mucia, a daughter of P. Mucius Scaevola, consul in a. c. 133. He married a daughter of M. Aemilius Scaurus, consul in a. c. 115 (Cic. in Verr. i. 17), whom Sulla, in a. c. 82, compelled him to divorce. (Plut. Sull. 33, Pomp. 9.) Glabrio was praetor urbanus in a. c. 70, when he presided at the impeachment of Verres. (Cic. in Verr. i. 2.) Cicero was anxious to bring on the trial of Verres during the praetorship of Glabrio

(Id. 18; Pseudo-Ascon. in Verr. argum. p. 125, Orelli), whose conduct in the preliminaries and the presidency of the iudicium he commends (in Verr. Act. ii. v. 29, 63), and describes him as active in his judicial functions and careful of his reputation (in Verr. i. 10, 14), although, in a later work (Brut. 68), he says that Glabrio's natural indolence marred the good education he had received from his grandfather Scaevola. Glabrio was consul with C. Calpurnius Piso in B.C. 67, and in the following year proconsul of Cilicia (Schol. Gronov. in Cic. pro Leg. Man. pp. 438, 442, Orelli), to which, by the Gabinian law [GABINIUS], Bithynia and Pontus were added. (Sal. Hist. v. p. 243, ed. Gerlach; Plut. Pomp. 30.) He succeeded L. Lucullus in the direction of the war against Mithridates (Dion Cass. xxxv. 14; Cic. pro Leg. Man. 2. § 5), but his military career was not answerable to his civil reputation. Glabrio hurried to the East, thinking that Mithridates was already conquered, and that he should obtain an easy triumph. But when, instead of a vanquished enemy, he found a mutinous army and an arduous campaign awaiting him, he remained inactive within the frontiers of Bithynia. (Dion Cass. xxxv. 17; Cic. pro Leg. Man. l.c.) Glabrio was indeed worse than inefficient. He directly fomented the insubordination in the legions of Lucullus by issuing, soon after his arrival in Asia, a proclamation releasing Lucullus's soldiers from their military obedience to him, and menacing them with punishment if they continued under his command. (App. Mithrid. 90.) Lucullus resigned part of his army to Glabrio (Cic. pro Leg. Man. 9), who allowed Mithridates to ravage Cappadocia, and to regain the greater portion of the provinces which the Romans had stripped him of. (Dion Cass. l.c.) Glabrio was himself superseded by Cn. Pompey, as soon as the Manilian law had transferred to him the war in the East. In the debate on the doom of Catiline's accomplices in December, B.C. 63, Glabrio declared in favour of capital punishment, before the speech of Cato determined the majority of the senate (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21), and he approved generally of Cicero's consulship (Phil. ii. 5). He was a member of the college of pontiffs in B.C. 57. (Har. Resp. 6, ad Q. fr. ii. 1.)

6. M'. ACILIUS GLABRIO, son of the preceding and of Aemilia, daughter of M. Aemilius Scaurus, consul in B.C. 115. Glabrio addressed the judges in behalf of his father-in-law, who was impeached for extortion in B.C. 54. [SCAURUS.] (Ascon. in Cic. Scaurium. p. 29, Orelli.) Glabrio was born in the house of Cn. Pompey, B.C. 81, who married his mother after her compulsory divorce from the elder Glabrio [No. 5]. Aemilia died in giving birth to him. (Plut. Sull. 33, Pomp. 9.) In the civil wars, B.C. 48, Glabrio was one of Caesar's lieutenants, and commanded the garrison of Oricum in Epeirus (Caes. B. C. iii. 15, 16, 39). During the African war Glabrio was stationed in Sicily, and at this time, B.C. 46, Cicero addressed to him nine letters (ad Fam. xiii. 30—39) in behalf of friends or clients to whom their affairs in Sicily, or the casualties of the civil war, rendered protection important. When Caesar, in B.C. 44, was preparing for the Parthian wars, Glabrio was sent forward into Greece with a detachment of the army, and succeeded P. Sulpicius Rufus in the government of Achaia. He was twice defended on capital charges by Cicero, and acquitted; and during the civil wars, he, in return, was serviceable to his former advocate (Cic. ad Fam. vii. 30, 31). In Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 50, some editors read, for Aucto, Acilio, and refer it to this Glabrio. (Orelli, Onom. Tull. p. 7.)

7. M'. ACILIUS GLABRIO, was consul with Trajan in A.D. 91. The auguries which promised Trajan the empire, predicted death to his colleague in the consulship. To gain the favour of Domitian, Glabrio fought as a gladiator in the amphitheatre attached to the emperor's villa at Alba, and slew a lion of unusual size. Glabrio was first banished and afterwards put to death by Domitian. (Suet. Dom. 10; Dion Cass. lxxvii. 12, 14; Juv. Sat. iv. 94.) [W. B. D.]

GLA'PHYRA (Γλαφύρα), an hetaera, whose charms, it is said, chiefly induced Antony to give the kingdom of Cappadocia to her son Archelaus, in B.C. 34. (Dion Cass. xlix. 32; App. Bell. Civ. v. 7; comp. Vol. I. p. 263.) [E. E.]

GLAUCÉ (Γλαύκη). 1. One of the Nereides, the name of Glaucé being only a personification of the colour of the sea. (Hom. Il. xviii. 39.)

2. One of the Danaides. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.)

3. An Arcadian nymph. (Paus. viii. 47. § 2.)

4. The wife of Upis, the mother of what Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 23) calls the third Diana.

5. A daughter of king Creon of Corinth. Jason, after deserting Medea, engaged himself to her, but Medea took vengeance by sending her a wedding garment, the magic power of which burnt the wearer to death. Thus Glaucé and even her father perished. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Diod. iv. 55; Hygin. Fab. 25; comp. Eurip. Med.)

6. A daughter of Cyclopeus of Salamis, who married Actaeus, and became by him the mother of Telamon. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 7.)

7. A daughter of Cyncus, who was slain by the Greeks in the Trojan war, whereupon Glaucé became the slave of the Telamonian Ajax. (Dict. Cret. ii. 12, &c.) [L. S.]

GLAUCIA (Γλαυκία), a daughter of the river-god Scamander. When Heracles went to war against Troy, Deimachus, a Boeotian, one of the companions of Heracles, fell in love with Glaucia. But Deimachus was slain in battle before Glaucia had given birth to the child she had by him. She fled for refuge to Heracles, who took her with him to Greece, and entrusted her to the care of Cleon, the father of Deimachus. She there gave birth to a son, whom she called Scamander, and who afterwards obtained a tract of land in Boeotia, traversed by two streams, one of which he called Scamander and the other Glaucia. He was married to Acidusa, from whom the Boeotian well, Acidusa, derived its name, and had three daughters, who were worshipped under the name of "the three maidens." (Plut. Quaest. Gr. 41. [L. S.])

GLAUCIA, C. SERVIILIUS, praetor in B.C. 100, co-operated with C. Marius, then consul for the sixth time, and with L. Appuleius Saturninus, tribune of the plebs in the same year. Glaucia held the comitia of the tribes at an irregular time and place, and thus procured the election of Saturninus to the tribuneship. He was candidate for the consulship in the year immediately succeeding his praetorship, although the laws appointed an interval of at least two years. Glaucia was the only praetor who accompanied Saturninus in his flight to the Capitol, and when the fugitives were compelled by want of water to surrender, he perished with him.

Cicero says (in Cat. iii. 6) that although Glaucia was not included by the senate in their decree for the execution of Saturninus and his partisans, Marius put him to death on his own authority. (Cic. Brut. 62, pro C. Rabir. perd. 7, in Cat. i. 2, Philipp. viii. 5, de Harusp. Resp. 24; Schol. Bob. in Milonian. p. 277, Orelli; App. B. C. i. 28, 32; Val. Max. ix. 7; Plut. Mar. 27, 30; Vell. Pat. ii. 12; Flor. iii. 16, § 4.) Cicero compares Glaucia to the Athenian demagogue Hyperbolus (Brut. 62), and says that he was the worst of men. He admits, however, that he was eloquent, acute, and witty. (de Or. ii. 61, 65.) An anecdote related by Cicero (pro Rab. Post. 6, § 14) conveys some notion of Glaucia's manner. He used to tell the plebs, when a rogatio was read to them, to mind whether the words "dictator, consul, praetor, or magister equitum" occurred in the preamble. If so, the rogatio was no concern of theirs: but if they heard the words "and whosoever after this enactment," then to look sharp, for some new letter of law was going to be forged. Glaucia was the author of a law de Repetundis of which the fragments are collected by Orelli (Index Legum. p. 269), and he introduced a change in the form of compendiariness. (Cic. in Verr. i. 9.) [W. B. D.]

GLAUCIAS (Γλαυκίας). 1. King of the Illyrians, or rather of the Taulantians, one of the Illyrian tribes. He is first mentioned as bringing a considerable force to the assistance of Cleitus, another Illyrian prince, against Alexander the Great, a.c. 335. They were, however, both defeated, and Cleitus forced to take refuge within the Taulantian territories, whither Alexander did not pursue him, his attention being called elsewhere by the news of the revolt of Thebes. (Arrian, i. 5, 6.) We next hear of Glaucias, nearly 20 years later, as affording an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, when his father Aeacides was driven out of Epeirus. (Plut. Pyrrh. 3; Justin. xvii. 3.) By this measure he gave offence to Cassander, who sought to gain possession of Epeirus for himself, and who in vain offered Glaucias 200 talents to give up the child. Not long after, the Macedonian king invaded his territories, and defeated him in battle; but though Glaucia bound himself by the treaty which ensued to refrain from hostilities against the allies of Cassander, he still retained Pyrrhus at his court, and, in a.c. 307, took the opportunity, after the death of Acetas, king of Epeirus, to invade that country with an army, and establish the young prince, then 12 years old, upon the throne. (Diod. xix. 67; Plut. Pyrrh. 3; Justin. xvii. 3; Paus. i. 11, § 5.) The territories of Glaucias bordered upon those of the Greek cities, Apollonia and Epidamnus; and this proximity involved him in frequent hostilities with those states; in 312 he even made himself master of Epidamnus, by the assistance of the Coreymaeans. (Diod. xix. 70, 78.) The date of his death is not mentioned; but it appears that he was still reigning in a.c. 302, when Pyrrhus repaired to his court, to be present at the marriage of one of his sons. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4.)

2. An officer of cavalry in the service of Alexander at the battle of Gaugamela. (Arrian, iii. 11.)

3. (Perhaps the same with the preceding). A follower of Cassander, whom he entrusted with the charge of Roxana and her son Alexander when he confined them as prisoners in the citadel of Amphipolis. After the peace of b.c. 311, Cassander sent secret orders to Glaucias to put both his captives to death, which instructions he immediately obeyed. (Diod. xix. 52, 105.) [E. H. B.]

GLAUCIAS (Γλαυκίας), a rhetorician of Athens, who appears to have lived in the first century of our aera, but he is mentioned only by Plutarch (Sympos. i. 10, 3, ii. 2).

GLAUCIAS (Γλαυκίας), a Greek physician, belonging to the sect of the Empirici (Galen, de Meth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142, Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." iii. 29, vol. xvii. pt. ii. p. 94), who lived after Serapion of Alexandria, and before Heracleides of Tarentum, and therefore probably in the third or second century b.c. (Celsus, de Medic. i. Praef. p. 5.) Galen mentions him as one of the earliest commentators on the whole of the works of Hippocrates (Comment. in Hippocr. "de Humor." i. 24, vol. xvi. p. 186), and he also wrote an alphabetical glossary on the difficult words occurring in the Hippocratic collection. (Erot. Gloss. Hippocr. p. 16, ed. Franz.) His commentaries on Hippocrates are several times quoted and referred to by Galen. (Comment. in Hippocr. "de Humor." i. Praef. ii. 30, vol. xvi. pp. 1, 324, 327; Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. VI." i. Praef. ii. 65, vol. xvii. pt. i. pp. 794, 992.) It is uncertain whether he is the person quoted by Pliny. (H. N. xx. 99, xxi. 102, xxii. 47, xxiv. 91.) Fabricius says he was the master of Heracleides of Tarentum, and Apollonius, but for this statement the writer has not been able to find any authority. (Bibl. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 171, ed. Vet.) [W. A. G.]

GLAUCIAS (Γλαυκίας), a statuery of Aegina, who made the bronze chariot and statue of Gelon, the son of Deinomenes, afterwards tyrant of Syracuse, in commemoration of his victory in the chariot race at Olympia, Ol. 73, a.c. 488. The following bronze statues at Olympia were also by Glaucias:—Philon, whose victory was recorded in the following epigram by Simonides, the son of Leoprepes,—

Πατρὸς μὲν Κορκέρα, Φίλων δ' ὄνομ', εἰμὶ δὲ
Γλαύκου

Τῆς, καὶ νίκη τῆς δού' ἀλυμπίδας:

Glaucus of Carystus, the boxer, practising strokes (σκιαμαχῶν); and Theagenes of Thasos, who conquered Euthymus in boxing in Ol. 75, a.c. 480 (Paus. vi. 6, § 2). Glaucias therefore flourished a.c. 488—480 (Paus. vi. 9, § 3, 10, § 1, 11, § 3).

GLAUCIDES (Γλαυκίδης), one of the chief men of Abydos when it was besieged by Philip V. of Macedon, in a.c. 200, and apparently one of the fifty elders whom the people had bound by an oath to slay the women and children and to burn the treasures of the city, as soon as the enemy should have got possession of the inner wall. Glaucides, however, with some others, shrunk from what they had undertaken, and sent the priests with suppliant wreaths to make a surrender of the town to Philip. (Polyb. xvi. 29—34; Liv. xxxi. 17.) [E. E.]

GLAUCIDES, a Greek statuery, one of those who made "athletas, et armatos, et venatores, sacrificantesque" (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19, § 34).

GLAUCION, a painter of Corinth, and the teacher of Athenion [ΑΘΗΝΙΩΝ, No. 1]. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. a. 40, § 29.) [P. S.]

GLAUCIPPUS (Γλαυκίππος), a son of the Athenian orator Hyperides, is said by Plutarch

(Vil. x. Orat. p. 848), who calls him a rhetor, to have written orations, one of which, viz. against Phocion, is mentioned by Plutarch himself. (Phoc. 4; comp. Athen. xiii. p. 590; Suid. s. v. Γλαύκις; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 266, p. 495, ed. Bekker.) Whether he is the same as the rhetorician Glaucippus, of whom a fragment is preserved by Seneca (Controv. iv. 25), or as the Glaucippus who wrote on the Sacra of the Athenians (Macrobi. Sat. i. 13), is uncertain. [L. S.]

GLAUCON (Γλαῦκων), an Athenian mentioned by Teles (ap. Stob. Floril. vol. ii. p. 82, ed. Gaiss.), who appears to have borne a distinguished part in the last struggle of the Athenians against Antigonos Gonatas, known by the name of the Chremonidean war, B. C. 263. After its termination he fled, together with Chremonides, to the court of Ptolemy Philadelphus, where he was received with great honour, and rose to a high place in the king's confidence. Droysen (Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 206) supposes him to be the same Glaucan that is mentioned by Pytherrmus (ap. Athen. ii. p. 44) as a water-drinker, and who is there called one of the tyrants of the Peirææus (ἑν τοῖς Πειραιῶσι τυραννεύουσι); but this expression is understood by Thirlwall, with more probability, to refer to the thirty tyrants of B. C. 404. (Thirlwall's Greece, vol. viii. p. 92 not.) [E. H. B.]

GLAUCON (Γλαῦκων), an Athenian, who, together with his brother Glaucus, and Theopompus, father of Macartatus, endeavoured by a forged will to obtain possession of some property, to the exclusion of Phylomache, who was next of kin to the deceased. The forgery was detected, but the attempt was renewed by them successfully in another trial (διαδικασία; see Dict. of Ant. s. v.), which placed Theopompus in possession of the property (Dem. c. Macart. pp. 1051, 1052). The speech of Demosthenes πρὸς Μακάρτατον was written to recover it for Eubulides, the son of Phylomache. [E. E.]

GLAUCON (Γλαῦκων), grammarians. 1. An eminent rhapsodist, or expositor of Homer, mentioned by Plato, in conjunction with Metrodorus of Lampascus, and Steimbrotus of Thasos. (Ion. p. 530, d.; see the notes of Müller and Nitzsch.) 2. A writer on Homer, quoted by Aristotle. (Poët. 25: this is one of the passages which Ritter considers as the additions of a later writer: he believes that Glaucon lived after Aristotle.) 3. Of Tarsus, also a writer on Homer, and apparently the head of a grammatical school. He wrote a work entitled γλῶσσαι. (Schol. ad Hom. Il. i. 1; Athen. xi. p. 480, f.) 4. Of Teos, a writer on recitation. (Aristot. Rhét. iii. 1.) Whether of the above writers, the first and second are the same as either the third or the fourth, or different from either, it is impossible to determine. The first is supposed by some to have been an Athenian, because Plato does not mention his country. (Comp. Villosin, Proleg. ad Hom. p. 25.) [P. S.]

GLAUCON (Γλαῦκων), relatives of Plato. 1. The son of Critias, son of Dropidea, was also the brother of Callaeschrus, and the father of Charmides and of Plato's mother, Perictione; he was, consequently, uncle to Critias (the tyrant) on the father's side, and to Plato on the mother's side. (Plat. passim; Xen. Mem. iii. 7. § 1; Heindorf, ad Plat. Charm. p. 154.)

2. The son of Ariston, and brother of Plato, who, besides mentioning him elsewhere, makes him one of the speakers in the republic. He is also introduced as a speaker in Xenophon's Memorabilia (iii. 6). Suidas (s. v. Πλάτων) calls him Glaucus. (See also Diog. Laërt. iii. 4; Plat. de Frat. Amor. p. 484, c.) In Plato's Parmenides also, Glaucus is one of the speakers; but a doubt has been raised whether this is not a different person, on the ground of an anachronism which the passage contains. Considering, however, the frequency of anachronisms in Plato, it seems most probable that this Glaucus is his brother. (Comp. Heindorf, ad Plat. Parmen. p. 126.) There is, perhaps, more doubt about the Glaucus who is one of the speakers in the Symposium (p. 172, c.).

It is universally believed that this Glaucus is the Athenian philosopher mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius, as the author of a book containing nine dialogues, entitled, Φειδῶλος, Ἐδρίπιδης, Ἀμύντιχος, Εὐόλος, Λυσισθένης, Ἀριστοφάνης, Κέφαλος, Ἀναξίφνημος, Μενέξενος. Thirty-two other dialogues, which were ascribed to him, are designated as spurious by Diogenes (ii. 124).

The following pedigree represents the relationships above referred to:—

GLAUCUS (Γλαῦκος). 1. A grandson of Aeolus, son of Sisyphus and Merope, and father of Bellerophon. (Hom. Il. vi. 154; Apollod. i. 9. § 3; Paus. ii. 4. § 2.) He lived at Potniae, despised the power of Aphrodite, and did not allow his mares to breed, that they might be the stronger for the horse race. According to others, he fed them with human flesh, for the purpose of making them spirited and warlike. This excited the anger of Aphrodite or the gods in general, who punished him in this way:—when Acastus celebrated the funeral games of his father, Pelias, at Iolcus, Glaucus took part in them with a chariot and four horses; but the animals were frightened and upset the chariot. (Paus. iii. 18. § 9, v. 17. § 4; Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Nonn. Dionys. xi. 143.) According to others, they tore Glaucus to pieces, having drunk from the water of a sacred well in Boeotia, in consequence of which they were seized with madness; others, again, describe this madness as the consequence of their having eaten a herb called hippomane. (Hygin. Fab. 250, 273; Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 318, Phoen. 1159; Strab. p. 409; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 269; Etym. Magn. p. 685. 42; Paus. ix. 8. § 1; Aelian, H. A. xv. 25; Virg. Georg. iii. 267.) It was believed on the Corinthian isthmus that it was haunted by the shade of Glaucus, who frightened the horses during the race, and was therefore called ταράκωνος. (Paus. vi. 20. § 9.) Glaucus of Potniae (Γλαῦκος Ποντιεύς) was the title of one of Aeschylus' lost tragedies. (Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Trilog. p. 561.)

Nachtrag, p. 175, Die Griech. Tragöed. vol. i. pp. 30, 62.)

2. A son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Belerophon. He was a Lycian prince, and led his hosts from Xanthus to the assistance of Priam in the war with the Greeks. (Hom. Il. ii. 875, vi. 266; Herod. i. 147.) He was one of the most eminent heroes on the side of the Trojans, and connected with Diomedes by ties of hospitality, which shows a very early intercourse between the Greeks and Lycians. (Hom. Il. vii. 13, xii. 387, xiv. 426, xvi. 492, &c., xvii. 140, &c.) He was slain by Ajax, but his body was carried back to Lycia. (Quint. Smyrn. Paradip. iii. 236, iv. 1, &c.)

3. A son of Antenor, fought in the Trojan war, and was slain by the Telamonian Ajax. (Paus. x. 27; Dict. Cret. iv. 7.)

4. One of the numerous sons of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 13.)

5. A son of the Messenian king Aegyptus, whom he succeeded on the throne. He distinguished himself by his piety towards the gods, and was the first who offered sacrifices to Machaon. (Paus. iv. 3. § 6.)

6. One of the sons of the Cretan king Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete. When yet a boy, while he was playing at ball (Hygin. Fab. 136), or while pursuing a mouse (Apollod. iii. 3. § 1, &c.), he fell into a caak full of honey, and died in it. Minos for a long time searched after his son in vain, and was at length informed by Apollo or the Curetes that the person who should devise the most appropriate comparison between a cow, which could assume three different colours, and any other object, should find the boy and restore him to his father. Minos assembled his soothsayers, but as none of them was able to do what was required, a stranger, Polyidus of Argos, solved the problem by likening the cow to a mulberry, which is at first white, then red, and in the end black. Polyidus, who knew nothing of the oracle, was thus compelled by his own wisdom to restore Glaucus to his father. By his prophetic powers he discovered that Glaucus had not perished in the sea, and being guided by an owl (γλαυκῆ) and bees, he found him in the caak of honey. (Aelian, H. A. v. 2.) Minos now further demanded the restoration of his son to life. As Polyidus could not accomplish this, Minos, who attributed his refusal to obstinacy, ordered him to be entombed alive with the body of Glaucus. When Polyidus was thus shut up in the vault, he saw a serpent approaching the dead body, and killed the animal. Presently another serpent came, carrying a herb, with which it covered the dead serpent. The dead serpent was thereby restored to life, and when Polyidus covered the body of Glaucus with the same herb, the boy at once rose into life again. Both sought for assistance from without; and when Minos heard of it, he had the tomb opened. In his delight at having recovered his child, he munificently rewarded Polyidus, and sent him back to his country. (Comp. Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 811; Pausanias. 27; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Schol. ad Eurip. Alcest. 1; Hygin. P. A. ii. 14; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iii. 96.) The story of the Cretan Glaucus and Polyidus was a favourite subject with the ancient poets and artists; it was not only represented in mimic dances (Lucian, de Saltat. 49), but Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides made it

7. Of Anthedon in Boeotia, a fisherman, who had the good luck to eat a part of the divine herb which Cronos had sown, and which made Glaucus immortal. (Athen. vii. c. 48; Claud. de Nupt. Mar. x. 158.) His parentage is different in the different traditions, which are enumerated by Athenæus; some called his father Copeus, others Polybus, the husband of Euboea, and others again Anthedon or Poseidon. He was further said to have been a clever diver, to have built the ship Argo, and to have accompanied the Argonauts as their steersman. In the sea-fight of Jason against the Tyrrhenians, Glaucus alone remained unhurt; he sank to the bottom of the sea, where he was visible to none save to Jason. From this moment he became a marine deity, and was of service to the Argonauts. The story of his sinking or leaping into the sea was variously modified in the different traditions. (Bekker, Anecd. p. 347; Schol. ad Plat. de Leg. x. p. 611.) There was a belief in Greece that once in every year Glaucus visited all the coasts and islands, accompanied by marine monsters, and gave his prophecies. (Paus. ix. 22. § 6.) Fishermen and sailors paid particular reverence to him, and watched his oracles, which were believed to be very trustworthy. The story of his various loves seems to have been a favourite subject with the ancient poets, and many of his love adventures are related by various writers. The place of his abode varies in the different traditions, but Aristotle stated that he dwelt in Delos, where, in conjunction with the nymphs, he gave oracles; for his prophetic power was said by some to be even greater than that of Apollo, who is called his disciple in it. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1310; Tzetz. ad Lycoph. 753; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 271; Ov. Met. xiii. 904, &c.; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 437, Aen. iii. 420, v. 832, vi. 36; Strab. p. 405.) A representation of Glaucus is described by Philostratus (Imag. ii. 15); he was seen as a man whose hair and beard were dripping with water, with bristly eye-brows, his breast covered with sea-weeds, and the lower part of the body ending in the tail of a fish. (For further descriptions of his appearance, see Nonn. Dionys. xiii. 73, xxiv. 73, xxxix. 99; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 318, 364; Stat. Silv. iii. 2. 36, Theb. vii. 335, &c.; Vell. Pat. ii. 83.) This deified Glaucus was likewise chosen by the Greek poets as the subject of dramatic compositions (Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Trilogie, pp. 311, &c., 471, &c., Nachtrag, p. 176, &c.), and we know from Velleius Paterculus that the mimus Plancus represented this marine dæmon on the stage. [L. S.]

GLAUCUS (Γλαῦκος), the son of Epicydes, a Lacedæmonian, of whom an anecdote is related by Herodotus (vi. 86) that in consequence of his having the highest reputation for justice, a Milesian deposited with him a large sum of money; but when, many years afterwards, the sons of the owner came to demand back their property, Glaucus refused to give up the money, and disclaimed all knowledge of the transaction. Before, however, he ventured to confirm his falsehood by an oath, he consulted the oracle at Delphi, and, terrified at the answer he received, immediately restored the deposit. But the god did not suffer the meditated perjury to go unpunished, and the whole family of Glaucus was exterminated before the third generation. The same story is alluded to by Pausanias (ii. 18, § 2, viii. 7, § 4), and by Juvenal (xiii. 199). [E. H. B.]

GLAUCUS (Γλαῦκος). 1. Of Athens; and 2. of Nicopolis, poets of the Greek Anthology, whose epigrams seem to have been confounded together. The Anthology contains six epigrams, of which the 1st, 2nd, 4th, and 5th are simply inscribed Γλαῦκου, the 3rd, Γλαῦκου Ἀθηναίου, and the 6th, Γλαῦκου Νικοπολίτη. From internal evidence, Jacobs thinks that the 1st and 2nd belong to Glaucus of Nicopolis, and that the 3rd, 4th, and 5th were written by one poet, probably by Glaucus of Athens. These latter three are descriptions of works of art. Perhaps all the epigrams should be ascribed to Glaucus of Athens. (Brunck. Ana. vol. ii. pp. 347, 348; Jacobs. Anth. Graec. vol. iii. pp. 57, 58, vol. xiii. p. 898; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 122, vol. iv. p. 476.)

3. A Locrian, who is mentioned as one of the writers on cookery (ὄψαρτυτικά, Athen. vii. p. 324, a., ix. p. 369, b., xii. p. 516, c., xiv. p. 661, e.; Pollux, vi. 10.)

4. Of Rhegium, sometimes mentioned merely as of Italy, wrote on the ancient poets and musicians (σὺνγραμμα τι περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ποιητῶν τε καὶ μουσικῶν, Plut. de Mus. 4, p. 1132, e.). Diogenes Laërtius quotes statements of his respecting Empedocles and Democritus, and says that he was contemporary with Democritus (viii. 52, ix. 38). Glaucus is also quoted in the argument to the Persae of Aeschylus. (Γλαῦκος ἐν τοῖς περὶ Ἀλκυίου μύθοις.) His work was also ascribed to the orator Antiphon. (Plut. Vit. X. Orat. p. 833, d.)

5. A sophist and hierophant of the Eleusinian mysteries. (Philostrat. de Sophist. ii. 20, p. 601.)

6. A writer on the geography and antiquities of Arabia, often quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus, who calls his work sometimes Ἀραβικὴ ἀρχαιολογία, and sometimes Ἀραβικὰ (s. v. Ἀλवान, Γέα, &c.; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. pp. 443-4, ed. Westermann.). [P. S.]

GLAUCUS (Γλαῦκος), of Caryatus, the son of Demylos, was one of the most celebrated Grecian athletes. He was a περιοδώνκτης, having gained one Olympic, two Pythian, eight Nemean, and eight Isthmian victories in boxing. It is said that while still a boy, he refixed a ploughshare which had dropped out of its place by the blows of his fist, without the help of a hammer. His statue at Olympia was made by GLAUCIAS of Aegina. (Müller, Aeginet. iii. 4. p. 103; Krause, Olymp. p. 292.) [P. S.]

GLAUCUS (Γλαῦκος), artists. 1. Of Chios, a statuary in metal, distinguished as the inventor of the art of soldering metals (κόλλησις). His most noted work was an iron base (θεοκρηνηρίδιον, Herod.; στέδνημα, Paus.), which, with the silver bowl it supported, was presented to the temple at Delphi by Alyattes, king of Lydia. (Herod. i. 25.) This base was seen by Pausanias, who describes its construction (x. 16, § 1), and by Athenaeus (v. p. 210, b. c.), who says that it was chased with small figures of animals, insects, and plants. Perhaps it is this passage that has led Meyer (Kunstgeschichte, vol. ii. p. 24) and others into the mistake of explaining κόλλησις as that kind of engraving on steel which we call damascene work. There is no doubt that it means a mode of uniting metals by a solder or cement, without the help of the nails, hooks, or dovetails (δεσμός), which were used before the invention of Glaucus. (Pausan. l. c.; Müller, in Böttiger's Amalthæa, vol. iii. p. 25.) Plutarch also speaks of this base as very celebrated. (De Defect. Orac. 47, p. 436, a.) The skill of Glaucus passed into a proverb, Γλαῦκου τέχνη. (Schol. ad Plat. Phaed. p. 13, Ruhnkens, pp. 381-2, Bekker.) Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἀλδάλην) calls Glaucus a Samian. The fact is, that Glaucus belonged to the Samian school of art.

Glaucus is placed by Eusebius (Chron. Arm.) at OI. 22, 2 (B. C. 694). Alyattes reigned B. C. 617—560. But the dates are not inconsistent, for there is nothing in Herodotus to exclude the supposition that the iron base had been made some time before Alyattes sent it to Delphi.

2. Of Lemnos, a distinguished statuary (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀλδάλην), is perhaps the same as the former, for several of the Samian school of artists wrought in Lemnos.

3. Of Argos, was the statuary who, in conjunction with Dionysius, made the works which Smicythus dedicated at Olympia. Glaucus made the statues of Iphitus crowned by Ecceheiria (the goddess of truces), of Amphitrite, of Poseidon, and of Vesta, which Pausanias calls "the greater offerings of Smicythus." Dionysius made "the lesser offerings." (Paus. v. 26. §§ 2-6. [Dionysius.] [P. S.]

GLAUCUS (Γλαῦκος). 1. Called by Arrian (Anab. vii. 14) Glaucias (Γλαυκίας), the name of the physician who attended on Hephaestion at the time of his death, B. C. 325, and who is said to have been either crucified or hanged by Alexander, for his ill success in treating him. (Plut. Alex. c. 72.)

2. Another physician of the same name at Alexandria, who is said to have informed Q. Dellius of a plot formed against him by Cleopatra, probably B. C. 31. (Plut. Anton. c. 59.)

3. Another physician of the same name, is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacian (ap. Galen, de Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. iv. 7, vol. xii. p. 743.), and lived in or before the first century after Christ.

4. A physician, about the end of the first century after Christ, mentioned by Plutarch as a contemporary in his treatise De Sanitate Tuenda (init.).

GLICIA or GLY'CIAS, M. CLAUDIUS, a freedman of P. Claudius Pulcher [CLAUDIUS, No. 13], to whom he was clerk or messenger. When Claudius, after his defeat at Drepana, B. C. 249, was cited by the senate to answer for his misconduct, and commanded to appoint a dictator, he nominated Glicia. (Suet. Tib. 2.) The appointment was, however, instantly cancelled, even before Glicia had named his master of the equites. (Fasti. Capit.) His disgrace did not prevent Glicia from appearing at the Great Games in his pretexta as if he had been really dictator. (Liv. Epit. xix.) Glicia was afterwards legatus in Corsica, to the consul C. Licinius Varus, B. C. 236, where, presuming to treat with the Corsicans without orders from the senate or the consul, he was first delivered up to the enemy as solely responsible for the treaty, and, on their refusal to punish him, was put to death at Rome. (Dion. Cass. fr. 45; Zonar. viii. p. 400, B; Val. Max. vi. 3, 3; Comp. Grot. de Jur. Bell. et Pac. ii. 21, § 4.) [W. B. D.]

GLICIUS GALLUS. [GALLUS.]

of the plebs, A. C. 67. When one of his colleagues, C. Cornelius [C. CORNELIUS], brought forward a rogation which the senate disliked, Globulus laid his tribunitian interdict on its reading by the clerk. (Ascon. in Cic. pro Cornel. p. 57, ed. Orelli.) But he appeared as evidence in defence of Cornelius, when impeached for disregarding the interdict. (Ascon. p. 61.) Globulus was praetor of Asia Minor in A. C. 63—64, since he was the immediate predecessor of L. Flaccus (Sall. Cat. 45; Cic. pro Flacc. 3) in that province. (Cic. pro Flacc. 32; Schol. Bob. pro Flacc. pp. 233, 245, Orelli.) [W. B. D.] GLOS. [GAOS]

GLUS (ΓΛΟΥΣ), an Egyptian, was son of Tamos, the admiral of Cyrus the younger. When Menon, the Thessalian, had persuaded his troops to show their zeal for Cyrus, by crossing the Euphrates before the rest of the Greeks, Glus was sent by the prince to convey to them his thanks and promises of reward. After the battle of Cunaxa he was one of those who announced to the Greeks the death of Cyrus, and he is mentioned again by Xenophon as watching their movements, when, in the course of their retreat, they were crossing the bridge over the Tigris. (Xen. Anab. i. 4. § 16, 5. § 7, ii. 1. § 3, 4. § 24.) [E. E.]

GLYCAS, MICHAEL (Μιχαήλ ὁ Γλυκάς), a Byzantine historian, was a native either of Constantinople or Sicily, whence he is often called "Seculus." There are great doubts with regard to the time when he lived. Oudin, Hamberger, and others, are of opinion that he was a contemporary of the last emperors of Constantinople, as may be concluded from letters of his being extant in MS. which are addressed to the last Constantine, who perished in the storm of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453; but it is doubtful whether those letters are really written by him. Walch, Fabricius, Vossius, and Cave, on the contrary, believe that Glycas lived in the twelfth century. However this may be, it is certain that he lived after 1118, because his Annals go down to that year. Glycas was probably an ecclesiastic: he possessed an extensive amount of knowledge, and he was acquainted with several languages. His style is generally clear and concise, and he is justly placed among the better Byzantine historians. The Annals (Βίβλος χρονικὴ) mentioned above are his principal work. They are divided into four parts. The first part treats of the creation of the world: it is a physico-theological treatise; the second part is historical, and contains the period from the Creation to Christ; the third goes from Christ to Constantine the Great; and the fourth from Constantine the Great to the death of the emperor Alexia I. Comnenus, in 1118. It was first published in a Latin translation, by Leunclavius, together with a continuation of the Annals down to the capture of Constantinople, by the editor, Basel, 1572, 8vo. The first part of the work was first published in Greek, with a Latin translation, by Meursius, under the title of "Theodori Metochitae Historiae Romanae a Julio Caesare ad Constantinum Magnum," Lugdun. 1618, 8vo.; and it is also given in the 7th vol. of Meursius's works: Meursius erroneously attributed it to Theodorus Metochita. The whole of the Greek text was first published by Labbe, who took great care in collecting MSS., and added valuable notes, as well as the translation of Leunclavius, which he revised in many places. This edition forms part of the Paris collection of the Byzantine, and appeared at Paris 1660, fol.; it was reprinted at Venice 1729, fol. The best edition is by I. Bekker, in the Bonn collection of the Byzantine, 1836, 8vo.

Besides this historical work, Glycas wrote a great number of letters, mostly on theological subjects; some of them have been published, under the title of "Epistolae sive Dissertationes decem et Graece et Latine, interprete J. Lamio, cum Notis," in the first vol. of J. Lamius, Deliciae Eruditiorum. (Dissertatio de Aetate et Scriptis M. Glycae, in Oudin, Commentarius de Scriptis Ecclesiasticis, vol. iii. p. 2522; Vita Glycae, in Lamius, Deliciae Eruditiorum; Hamberger, Zuverlässige Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern, vol. iv. p. 729, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 206, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 199.) [W. P.]

GLY'CERA (ΓΛΥΚΙΡΑ), "the sweet one," a favourite name of hetairae. The most celebrated hetairae of this name are, 1. The daughter of Thalesis and the mistress of Harpalus. (Athen. xiii. pp. 586, 595, 605, &c.) [HARPALUS.] 2. Of Sicily, and the mistress of Pausias. [PAUSIAS.] 3. A favourite of Horace. (Hor. Carm. i. 19. 30. iii. 19. 29.)

GLYCERIOUS, one of the phantom emperors of the latest period of the western empire. Before his accession he held the office of Comes domesticorum, and is described by Theophanes as ἀνὴρ ἀδύκλιμος ("a man of good reputation"). After the death of the emperor Olybrius and the patrician Ricimer, Glycerius was instigated to assume the empire by Gundibatus or Gundobald the Burgundian, Ricimer's nephew. His elevation took place at Ravenna in March, A. D. 473. His reign was too short, and the records of it are too obscure, for us to form any trustworthy judgment of his character. He showed great respect for Epiphanius, bishop of Ticinum or Pavia, at whose intercession he pardoned some individuals who had incurred his displeasure by some injury or insult offered to his mother. When Widemir, the Ostro-Goth, invaded Italy, Glycerius sent him several presents, and induced him to quit Italy and to march into Gaul, and incorporate his army with the Visigoths, who were already settled in that province. This event, which is recorded by Jornandes, is, by Tillemont, but without any apparent reason, placed before the accession of Glycerius. The eastern emperor Leo I., the Thracian, does not appear to have acknowledged Glycerius; and, by his direction, Julius Nepos was proclaimed emperor at Ravenna, either in the latter part of 473 or the beginning of 474. Nepos marched against Glycerius, and took him prisoner at Portus (the harbour of Rome at the mouth of the Tiber), and compelled him to become a priest. He was appointed then, or soon afterward, to the bishopric of Salona in Dalmatia.

The subsequent history of Glycerius is involved in some doubt. The Chronicon of Marcellinus comprehends the notice of his deposition, ordination to the priesthood, and death in one paragraph, as if they had all happened in the same year. But according to Malchus, he was concerned in the death of the emperor Nepos, who, after being driven from Italy by the patrician Orestes, preserved the imperial title, and apparently a fragment of the empire, at Salona, and was killed (A. D. 480) by his own followers, Viator and Ovida or Odiva, of whom the second was conquered and killed the year after by Odoacer. A Glycerius appears among the archbishops of Milan mentioned by Ennodius, and Gibbon, though with some hesitation, identifies the archbishop with the ex-emperor, and suggests that his promotion to Milan was the reward of his participation in the death of Nepos; but we much doubt whether the two were identical. (Marcellinus, Marius Aventicensis and Cassiodorus, Chron.; Jorman. de Rob. Get. c. 56, de Regn. Succ. p. 58, ed. Lindenbrogii, Hamb. 1611; Malchus and Candidus, apud Phot. Codd. 78, 79; Evagr. H. E. ii. 16; Ennod. Epiphan. Ticta Vita and Carmina apud Sirmond. Opera Varia, vol. i.; Excerpta Ignoti Auctoris, subjoined to Amm. Marc., by Valesius and other editors; Eckhel; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. vi.; Gibbon, c. 36.) [J. C. M.]

GLYCIS, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Γλύκισ), or perhaps also GLYCAS (Γλυκάς), patriarch of Constantinople from 1316 to 1320, was a scholar of great learning, and renowned for his oratorical attainments. He was the teacher of Nicephorus Gregoras, the historian, who speaks of him with great praise in several passages of his History. Glycis resigned his office, worn out by age, sickness, and labour, and retired to the convent of Cynotissa, living there upon a small sum of money, which was all that he had reserved for himself out of his extensive property.

Glycis wrote in a superior style, and endeavoured to purify the Greek language from those barbarisms with which it was then crowded. He was not only distinguished as a scholar and divine, but also as a statesman. The emperor sent him as ambassador to Rome, and Glycis wrote an account of his journey thither, of which Nicephorus Gregoras speaks with great praise, but which is unfortunately lost. His other works are, a Greek grammar, extant in MS. in various libraries, entitled Περὶ Ὀρθότητος Συντάξεως. He has also left some minor productions; such as Ἡ παρατήρησις τοῦ Πατριάρχου, in which he explains the motives that induced him to resign the patriarchate, and Ἐρωτησικὸν εἰς τὸν βασιλέα τὸν ἄγιον, an admonition to the holy emperor, viz. Michael Palaeologus, extant in MSS. in the Royal Library in Paris. (Wharton's Appendix to Cave's Hist. Lit. p. 21, ad an. 1316; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 520; Jahn, Anecd. Graecae, Praef. p. 1.) [W. P.]

GLYCON (Γλύκων). 1. A lyric poet, from whom the Glycean metre took its name. Nothing remains of him but three lines, which are quoted by Hephaestion in illustration of the metre. (Ench. p. 33.)

2. The author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 278; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 254, vol. xiii. p. 898.)

3. Another name for the philosopher Lycon. (Diog. Laërt. v. 65.)

4. Of Pergamus, a celebrated athlete, on whom Antipater of Thessalonica wrote an epitaph. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 126, No. 68; Anth. Palat. x. 124; Horat. Ep. i. 1, 30.)

5. A grammarian, ridiculed in an epigram by Apollinarius. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 283, Anth. Palat. xi. 399.)

6. Spiridion, or Scyridicus, a rhetorician mentioned by Quintilian (Inst. vi. 1. § 41), and frequently by Seneca. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 122, vol. vi. p. 130.) [P. S.]

GLYCON (Γλύκων). 1. An Athenian sculptor, known to us by his magnificent colossal marble statue of Hercules, which is commonly called the "Farnese Hercules." It was found in the baths of Caracalla, and, after adorning the Farnese palace for some time, it was removed, with the other works of art belonging to that palace, to the royal museum at Naples: it represents the hero resting on his club, after one of his labours. The swollen muscles admirably express repose after severe exertion. The right hand, which holds the golden apples, is modern: the legs also were restored by Gulielmo della Porta, but the original legs were discovered and replaced in 1787. The name of the artist is carved on the rock, which forms the main support of the statue; as follows:—

ΕΠΟΙΕΙ

Though no ancient writer mentions Glycon, there can be no doubt that he lived in the period between Lysippus and the early Roman emperors. The form of the Omega, in his name, which was not used in inscriptions till shortly before the Christian era, fixes his age more definitely, for there is no reason to doubt the genuineness of the inscription. The silence of Pliny suggests a doubt whether Glycon did not live even later than the reign of Titus.

At all events, it seems clear that the original type of the "Hercules Farnese" was the Hercules of Lysippus, of which there are several other imitations, but none equal to the Farnese. One of the most remarkable is the Hercules of the Pitti palace, inscribed ΑΤΣΙΠΠΙΟΤ ΕΡΦΟΝ, but this inscription is without doubt a forgery, though probably an ancient one. (Winckelmann, Geschichte d. Kunst, b. x. c. 3, § 18; Meyer, Kunstgeschichte, vol. iii. pp. 58—61; Müller, Archäol. d. Kunst, § 129, n. 2, § 160, n. 5; Mus. Borbon. vol. iii. pl. 23, 24; Müller, Denkmäl. d. Alt. Kunst, vol. i. pl. xxxviii.)

The only other remaining work of Glycon is a base in the Biscari museum at Catania, inscribed:

ΓΑΥΚΩΝ ΑΘΗΝΑ
ΙΟΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ

2. The engraver of a gem in the royal library at Paris. (Clarac, Description des Antiques du Musée Royal, p. 420.) [P. S.]

GLYCON (Γλύκων), called in some editions of Cicero Glauccon, the physician to the consul, C. Vibius Pansa, who upon his death, after the battle of Mutina, April, B. C. 43, was thrown into prison by Torquatus, Pansa's quaestor, upon a suspicion of having poisoned his wounds. (Sueton. Aug. 11; comp. Tac. Ann. i. 10.) This accusation, however, seems to have been unfounded, as there is extant a letter from M. Brutus to Cicero, in which he earnestly begs him to procure his liberation, and to protect him from injury, as being a worthy man, who suffered as great a loss as any one by Pansa's death, and who, even if this had not been the case, would never have allowed himself to be persuaded to commit such a crime. (Cic. ad Brut. 6.) He is perhaps the same person who is quoted by Scribonius Largus. (De Compos. Medicam. c. 206.) [W. A. G.]

GNAEUS, or CNEIUS (Γναῖος), an engraver of gems, contemporary with Dioscorides, in the time of Augustus. Several beautiful gems are inscribed with his name. (Mus. Florent. vol. ii. tab. 7; Stoich, Pierres gravées, tab. 23; Bracci, tab. 43.) [P. S.]

GNATHAENA (Γνάθηνα), a celebrated Greek hetæra, of whom some witty sayings are recorded by Athenæus (xiii. p. 585). She wrote a ῥήμας οὐκ ἐστὶν, in the same fashion as ῥήμας were commonly written by philosophers. It consisted of 323 lines, and was incorporated by Callimachus in his ῥήμας τῶν ῥήμας. [L. S.]

GNESIPPUS (Γνησίππος), the son of Cleomachus, a Dorian lyric poet, according to Meineke, whose light and licentious love verses were attacked by Chionidea, Cratinus, and Eupolia. The passages quoted by Athenæus seem, however, to bear out fully the opinion of Welcker, that Gnesippus was a tragic poet, and that the description of his poetry given by Athenæus (παρρησιασθέντων τῆς ὁδοῦ ποιοῦντος) refers to his choral odes. (Athen. xiv. p. 638, d. e.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 7, 27—29; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. vol. iii. pp. 1024—1029.) [P. S.]

GNIPHO, M. ANTONIUS, a distinguished Roman rhetorician, who lived in the last century before the Christian æra. He was born in B. C. 114, and was a native of Gaul, but studied at Alexandria. He was a man of great talent and extraordinary memory, and was thoroughly acquainted with Greek as well as Roman literature, and he is further praised as a person of a kind and generous disposition. After his return from Alexandria, he taught rhetoric at first in the house of J. Caesar, who was then a boy, and afterwards set up a school in his own house. He gave instruction in rhetoric every day, but declaimed only on the nundines. Many men of eminence are said to have attended his lectures, and among them Cicero, when he was prætor. He died in his fiftieth year, and left behind him many works, though Ateius Capito maintained that the only work written by him was De Latino Sermone, in two books, and that the other treatises bearing his name were productions of his disciples. (Suet. De Illust. Gram. 7; Macrobi. Sat. iii. 12.) Schütz, in his preface to the Rhetorica ad Herennium (p. 23, &c.), endeavours to show that that work is the production of M. Antonius Gnipho; but this is only a very uncertain hypothesis. [CICERO, p. 727.] [L. S.]

GNOSTICUS (Γνωστικός), the fourteenth in descent from Asclepius, the elder son of Nebrus, the brother of Chryseus, and the father of Hippocates I., Podalirius II., and Aeneius. He lived probably in the sixth century B. C. (Jo. Tzetzen, Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xii. p. 630, ed. Vet.; Poet. Epist. ad Artas. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770.) [W. A. G.]

GOBIDAS. [COBIDAS.]

GOBRYAS (Γοβρύας). 1. A noble Assyrian, who, in Xenophon's Cyropædia, goes over to Cyrus, and renders him various important services (iv. 6, v. 2, vii. 5, viii. 4).

2. A noble Persian, one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian. When the attack was made, and Smerdis fled to his chamber, he was pursued by Dareius and Gobryas. In the darkness of the room Dareius was afraid to strike at the Magian, lest he should kill Gobryas; but Gobryas perceiving his hesitation, exclaimed, "Drive your sword through both of us." Dareius struck, and fortunately pierced only the Magian. (Herod. iii. 78, 79; Plut. Oper. vol. ii. p. 50, e., and Wyttenbach's Note; Justin. i. 9; Val. Max. iii.

2, ext. § 2; Aristeid. vol. i. p. 502, vol. ii. p. 236.) Gobryas accompanied Dareius into Scythia, and discovered the true meaning of the symbolical defiance of the Scythians. (Herod. iv. 132, 134.) He was doubly related to Dareius by marriage: Dareius married the daughter of Gobryas, and Gobryas married the sister of Dareius; and one of his children by her was Mardonius. (Herod. vii. 2, 5.)

3. One of the commanders of the army with which Artaxerxes II. met his brother Cyrus. (Xenoph. Anab. i. 7. § 12.) [P. S.]

GOLGUS (Γόλγος), a son of Adonis and Aphrodite, from whom the town of Golgi, in Cyprus, was believed to have derived its name. (Schol. ad Theocrit. xv. 100.) [L. S.]

GO'NATUS ANTIGONUS. [ANTIGONUS.]
GO'NGYLUS (Γογγύλος). 1. Of Eretria, was the agent by whose means Pausanias entered into communication with Xerxes, B. C. 477. To his charge Pausanias entrusted Byzantium after its recapture, and the Persian prisoners who were there taken, and who, by his agency, were now allowed to escape, and (apparently in their company) he also himself went to Xerxes, taking with him the remarkable letter from Pausanias, in which he proposed to put the Persian king in possession of Sparta and all Greece, in return for marriage with his daughter. (Thuc. i. 129; Diod. xi. 44; Nepos. Paus. 2.)

Xenophon, on his arrival in Mysia with the Cyrean soldiers (B. C. 399), found Hellas, the widow of this Gongylus, living at Pergamum. She entertained him, and, by her direction, he attacked the castle of Asidates, a neighbouring Persian noble. She had borne her husband two sons, Gorgion, and another Gongylus, the latter of whom, on finding Xenophon endangered in his attempt, went out, against his mother's will, to the rescue, accompanied by Procles, the descendant of Demaratus. (Xen. Anab. vii. 8. §§ 8, 17.) These two sons, it further appears (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. § 6), were in possession of Gambrium and Palaegambrium, Myrina and Gryniun, towns given by the king to their father in reward for his treachery. On Thibron's arrival with the Lacedæmonian forces, and the incorporation, shortly after the above occurrence, of the Cyrean troops with them, they, with Eurysthenes and Procles, placed their towns in his hands, and joined the Greek cause.

2. A Corinthian captain, who in the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 414, took charge of a single ship of reinforcements for Syracuse. He left Leucas after Gylippus, but, sailing direct for Syracuse itself, arrived there first. It was a critical juncture: the besieged were on the point of holding an assembly for discussion of terms of surrender. His arrival, and his news of the approach of Gylippus, put a stop to all thought of this; the Syracusans took heart, and presently moved out to support the advance of their future deliverer. Thucydides seems to regard this as the moment of the turn of the tide. On the safe arrival of Gongylus at that especial crisis depended the issue of the Sicilian expedition, and with it the destiny of Syracuse, Athens, and all Greece. Gongylus fell, says Plutarch, in the first battle on Epipolæ, after the arrival of Gylippus. (Thuc. vii. 2; Plut. Nicias, 19.) [A. H. C.]

GORDIANUS, the name of three Roman emperors, father, son, and grandson.

1. M. ANTONIUS GORDIANUS, surnamed AFRICANUS, the son of Metius Marullus and Ulpia Gordiana, daughter of Anninus Severus, traced his descent by the father's side from the Gracchi, by the mother's from the emperor Trajan, and married Fabia Orestilia, the great grand-daughter of Antoninus. His ancestors had for three generations at least risen to the consulship, a dignity with which he himself was twice invested. His estates in the provinces were believed to be more extensive than those of any other private citizen: he possessed a suburban villa of matchless splendour on the Praenestine way, and inherited from his great grandfather the house in Rome which had once belonged to the great Pompeius, had afterwards passed into the hands of M. Antonius, and still bore the name of the Domus Rostrata, derived from the trophies captured in the piratical war, which decorated its vestibule when Cicero wrote the second Philippic. Gordianus in youth paid homage to the Muses, and among many other pieces composed an epic in thirty books, called the Antoniniae, the theme being the wars and history of the Antonines. In maturer years he declaimed with so much reputation that he numbered emperors among his audiences; his quaestorship was distinguished by profuse liberality; when aedile he far outstripped all his predecessors in magnificence, for he exhibited games every month on the most gorgeous scale at his own cost; he discharged with honour the duties of a praetorian judge; in his first consulship, A. D. 213, he was the colleague of Caracalla; in his second of Alexander Severus; and soon afterwards was nominated proconsul of Africa, to the great joy of the provincials. Nor was his popularity unmerited. In all things a foe to excess, of gentle and affectionate temper in his domestic relations, he expended his vast fortune in ministering to the enjoyment of his friends and of the people at large, while his own mode of life was of the most frugal and temperate description, and the chief pleasure of his declining years was derived from the study of Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and Virgil.

The spirit of resistance excited in every region of the empire by the tyranny of Maximinus was first kindled into open rebellion in Africa by the flagrant injustice of the imperial procurator, who sought to gain the favour of his master by emulating his oppression. Some noble and wealthy youths of Tisdrus, whom he had condemned to pay a fine which would have reduced them to indigence, collecting together their slaves and rustic retainers, sent them forwards by night to the city, commanding them to mix with the crowd, so as not to excite suspicion, while they themselves entered the gates at day-break, and boldly repaired to the presence of the officer of the revenue, as if for the purpose of satisfying his demands. Seizing a favourable moment, they plunged their daggers into his heart, while the soldiers who rushed forwards to the rescue were instantly assailed by the peasants, and destroyed or put to flight. The conspirators, feeling that their offence was beyond forgiveness, determined to identify some one of conspicuous station with their enterprise. Hurrying to the mansion of the venerable Gordianus, now in his eightieth year, they burst into his chamber, and before he could recover from his surprise, invested him with a purple robe, and hailed him as Augustus. While the ringleaders were explaining the event of the morning, and bidding him choose between death upon the spot and the imperial dignity accompanied by distant and doubtful danger, the whole city had assembled at his gates, and with one voice saluted him as their sovereign. Gordianus, perceiving that resistance was fruitless, yielded to the wishes of the multitude; and all the chief cities of Africa having ratified the choice of Tisdrus, he was escorted a few days afterwards to Carthage in a sort of triumphal procession, and saluted by the title of Africanus. From thence he despatched letters to Rome, announcing his elevation, inveighing at the same time against the cruelty of Maximinus, recalling those whom the tyrant had banished, and promising not to fall short of the liberality of his predecessors in largesses to the soldiers and populace.

The senate and all Rome received the intelligence with enthusiastic joy, the election was at once confirmed, Gordianus and his son were proclaimed Augusti. The hatred long suppressed now found free vent, Maximinus was declared a public enemy, his statues were cast down, and his name was erased from all public monuments. Italy was divided into districts, twenty commissioners were appointed to raise armies for its defence, and the most energetic measures were adopted to secure the co-operation of the distant provinces. Meanwhile, affairs at Carthage had assumed a very unexpected aspect. A certain Capellianus, procurator of Numidia, who had long been on bad terms with Gordianus, and had been recently suspended by his orders, refused to acknowledge his authority, and collecting a large body of the well-trained forces who guarded the frontier, hastened towards the capital. The new prince could oppose nothing except an effeminate crowd, destitute alike of arms and discipline. Such a rabble was unable for a moment to withstand the regular troops of Capellianus. The son of Gordianus, after vainly attempting to rally the fugitives, perished in the field; and his aged father, on receiving intelligence of these disasters, died by his own hands, after having enjoyed a sort of shadow of royalty for less than two months.

The elder Gordianus was a man of ordinary stature, with venerable white hair, a full face rather ruddy than fair, commanding respect by his eye, his brow, and the general dignity of his countenance, and is said to have borne a strong resemblance to Augustus in voice, manner, and gait.

Eckhel is very angry with Capitolinus for expressing a doubt whether the Gordians bore the appellation of Antonius or Antoninus. It is certain that the few medals and inscriptions in which the name appears at full length uniformly exhibited the former; but when we recollect that Fabia Orestilia, the wife of the elder, was a lineal descendant of Antoninus, and that the virtues of the Antonines were celebrated both in prose and verse by her husband, it does not appear improbable that, in common with many other emperors, he may have

2. M. ANTONIUS GORDIANUS, eldest son of the foregoing and of Fabia Orestilla, was born in A. D. 192, was appointed legatus to his father in Africa, was associated with him in the purple, and fell in the battle against Capellianus, as recorded above, in the forty-sixth year of his age.

Less simple in his habits, and less strict in his morality than his parent, he was nevertheless respected and beloved both in public and private life, and never disgraced himself by acts of ostentatious profligacy, although he left upwards of sixty children by various mistresses, and enjoyed the somewhat questionable distinction of being selected by the favour of Elagabalus to fill the office of quaestor. He became praetor under the more pure auspices of Alexander, and acquitted himself with so much credit as a judge, that he was forthwith, at a very early age, promoted to the consulship. Several light pieces in prose and verse attested his love of literature, which he imbibed in boyhood from his preceptor, Serenus Sammonicus, whose father had accumulated a library of sixty thousand volumes, which the son inherited, and on his death bequeathed to his pupil.

No period in the annals of Rome is more embarrassed by chronological difficulties than the epoch of the two Gordians, in consequence of the obscurity, confusion, and inconsistency which characterise the narratives of the ancient historians, inasmuch that we shall find six weeks, a hundred days, six months, one year, two years, and even six years, assigned by conflicting authorities as the limits of their reign, while in like manner Balbinus, with Pupienus, are variously stated to have occupied the throne for twenty-two days,—for three months,—for one year,—or for two years. Without attempting to point out the folly of most of these assertions, it will be sufficient to state that Eckhel has proved in the most satisfactory manner that the revolt in Africa against Maximinus must have taken place in A. D. 238, probably about the beginning of March, and that the death of the two Gordians happened in the middle of April, after a reign of six weeks, while the assassination of Balbinus and Pupienus, with the accession of the third Gordian, could not have been later than the end of the following July. Our limits do not permit us to enter into a minute investigation of these, but it may be useful to indicate the nature of the arguments which seem to establish the above conclusions:—

1. The accession of Maximinus is known to have taken place in the middle of the year A. D. 235, and copper coins are still extant issued by the senate with the usual stamp (s.c.), struck when he was tribune for the fourth time, which therefore cannot belong to an earlier date than the beginning of A. D. 238.

2. Upon receiving intelligence of the proceedings in Africa, the senate at once acknowledged the Gordians, threw down the statues of Maximinus, and declared him a public enemy. Hence it is manifest that they would issue no money bearing his effigy after these events, which must therefore belong to some period later than the beginning of A. D. 238.

3. It is known that the third Gordian was killed about the month of March, A. D. 244, and numerous coins are extant, struck in Egypt, commemorating the seventh year of his reign. But since the Egyptians calculated the commencement of their civil year, and consequently the years of a sovereign's reign, from the 29th of August, they must have reckoned some period prior to the 29th of August, A. D. 238, as the first year of the third Gordian's reign.

Hence the elevation of the first two Gordians, their death, the death of Maximinus, the accession and death of Balbinus with Pupienus, and the accession of the third Gordian, must all have fallen between the 1st of January and the 29th of August, A. D. 238.

COIN OF GORDIANUS II.

3. M. ANTONIUS GORDIANUS, according to most of the authorities consulted by Capitolinus, was the son of a daughter of the elder Gordianus, although some maintained that he was the son of the younger Gordianus. Having been elevated to the rank of Caesar, under circumstances narrated in the life of Balbinus [BALBINUS], after the murder of Balbinus and Pupienus by the praetorians a few weeks afterwards, in July A. D. 238, he was proclaimed Augustus, with the full approbation of the troops and the senate, although at this time a mere boy, probably not more than fifteen years old. The annals of his reign are singularly meagre. In the consulship of Venustus and Sabinus (A. D. 240), a rebellion broke out in Africa, but was promptly suppressed. In 241, which marks his second consulship, the young prince determined to proceed in person to the Persian war, which had assumed a most formidable aspect, but before setting out married Sabinia Tranquillina, the daughter of Mithreus [MITHREUS], a man distinguished for learning, eloquence, and virtue, who was straightway appointed praefect of the praetorium, and became the trusty counsellor of his son-in-law in all matters of importance. By their joint exertions, the power of the eunuchs, whose baneful influence in the palace had first acquired strength under Elagabalus and been tolerated by his successor, was at once suppressed.

In 242 Gordianus, having thrown open the temple of Janus with all the ancient formalities, quitted Rome for the East. Passing through Moesia, he routed and destroyed some barbarous tribes upon the confines of Thrace, who sought to arrest his progress; crossing over from thence to Syria, he defeated Sapor in a succession of engagements, and compelled him to evacuate Mesopotamia, the chief merit of these achievements being probably due to Mithreus, to whom they were, with fitting modesty, ascribed in the despatches to the senate. But this prosperity did not long endure: Mithreus perished by disease, or, as many historians have asserted, by the treachery of Philip, an Arabian, who, in an evil hour, was chosen by the prince to supply the place of the trusty friend whom he had lost. Philip, from the moment of his elevation, appears to have exerted every art to prejudice the soldiers against their sovereign. He contrived that the supplies destined for the use of the camp should be intercepted or sent in a wrong direction, and then aggravated the discontent which arose among the troops by attributing these disasters to the carelessness and incapacity of the emperor. At length he so roused their passions by artful misrepresentations, that the legions rising tumultuously, attacked Gordianus as the cause of their sufferings; and having gained possession of his person, first deposed, and then put him to death. The narrative of the circumstances attending this event, as recorded by Capitolinus, is evidently largely mingled with fable, but no doubt exists as to the manner in which Gordian perished, nor of the treachery by which the deed was accomplished.

Of a lively but tractable disposition, endowed with high abilities, of amiable temper and winning address, Gordian had gained the hearts of all, and was the idol alike of the senate, the people, and the armies, until betrayed by the perfidy of his general. So well aware was Philip of the popularity of his victim, that, instead of commanding his statues to be thrown down, and his name to be erased from public monuments, as was the common practice under such circumstances, he requested the senate to grant him divine honours, announcing in his despatch that the young prince had died a natural death, and that he himself had been chosen unanimously to fill the vacant throne.

Gordian was buried near Castrum Circesium or Cercesium, in Mesopotamia, and an epitaph, enumerating his exploits, was engraved upon the tomb in Greek, Latin, Persian, Hebrew, and Egyptian characters. The inscription itself is said to have been destroyed by Licinius, but the sepulchre, which formed a conspicuous object as viewed from the surrounding country, was still to be seen in the days of Julian (A. D. 363), as we are told by Ammianus Marcellinus, who calls the spot Zaitika, or the olive-tree.

(Capitolin. Maximin. duo, Gordiani tres; Herodian, lib. vii. viii.; Victor, de Caes. xxvii. xxviii. xxvii. xxviii.; Eutrop. ix. 2; Amm. Marc. xxiii. 5. § 7; Zoosim. i. 14—16, 19, iii. 14; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 293.)

COIN OF GORDIANUS III.

GORDIUS (Γόρδιος), an ancient king of Phrygia, and father of Midas, is celebrated in history, through the story of the Gordian knot. According to tradition, he was originally a poor peasant, but was destined to occupy a kingly throne, as was indicated by a prodigy which happened to him. One day, while he was ploughing, an eagle came down and settled on his yoke of oxen, and remained there till the evening. Gordius was surprised at the phenomenon, and went to Telmessus to consult the soothsayers of that place, who were very celebrated for their art. Close by the gates of the town he met a Telmessian girl, who herself possessed prophetic powers. He told her what he had come for, and she advised him to offer up sacrifices to Zeus βασιλεύς at Telmessus. She herself accompanied him into the town, and gave him the necessary instructions respecting the sacrifices. Gordius, in return, took her for his wife, and became by her the father of Midas. When Midas had grown up to manhood, internal disturbances broke out in Phrygia, and an oracle informed the inhabitants that a car would bring them a king, who should at the same time put an end to the disturbances. When the people were deliberating on these points, Gordius, with his wife and son, suddenly appeared riding in his car in the assembly of the people, who at once recognised the person described by the oracle. According to Arrian (Anab. ii. 3), the Phrygians made Midas their king, while, according to Justin (xi. 7), who also gives the oracle somewhat differently, and to others, Gordius himself was made king, and succeeded by Midas. The new king dedicated his car and the yoke to which the oxen had been fastened, to Zeus βασιλεύς, in the acropolis of Gordium, and an oracle declared that, whosoever should untie the knot of the yoke, should reign over all Asia. It is a well-known story, that Alexander, on his arrival at Gordium, cut the knot with his sword, and applied the oracle to himself. (Comp. Curt. iii. 1. § 15; Plut. Alex. 18; Strab. xii. p. 568; Aelian, V. H. iv. 17.) [L. S.]

GORDIUS, a Cappadocian by birth, the instrument of Mithridates Eupator VI. in his attempts to annex Cappadocia to Pontus. Gordius was employed by him, in B. C. 96, to murder Ariarathes VI. king of Cappadocia [ARIARATHES, No. 6]. He was afterwards tutor of a son of Mithridates, whom, after the murder of Ariarathes VII. he made king of Cappadocia. Gordius was sent as the envoy of Mithridates to Rome, and afterwards employed by him to engage Tigranes, king of Armenia, to attack Cappadocia, and expel Ariobarzanes I., whom the Romans made king of that country in B. C. 93. Sulla restored Ariobarzanes in the following year, and drove Gordius out of Cappadocia. Gordius was opposed to Murena on the banks of the Halya, A. C. 83—2. (Justin, xxxviii. 1—3; App. Mith. 66; Plut. Sull. 5.) [W. B. D.]

GORDIUS, a charioteer, the companion of Elagabalus in his first race, and from that day forward the chosen friend of the emperor, by whom he was appointed praefectus vigilum. (Lamprid. Elagab. 6. 12; Dion Cass. lxxix. 15.) [W. R.]

GORDYS (Γόρδης), a son of Triptolemus, who assisted in searching after Io, and then settled in Phrygia, where the district of Gordyaea received its name from him. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Γόρδιος; Strab. pp. 747, 750.) [L. S.]

GORGASUS (Γόργασος), a son of Machaon and Anticleia, who, together with his brother Nicomachus, had a sanctuary at Pherae, founded by Glaucus, the son of Aepytus. (Paus. iv. 3. § 6, 30. § 2.) [L. S.]

GORGASUS (Γόργασος), one of the sons of Machaon, the son of Aesculapius, by Anticleia, the daughter of Diocles, king of Pherae, in Messenia; who, after the death of his grandfather, succeeded to the kingdom. He also followed the example of his father, by practising the art of healing, for which he received divine honours after his death. (Paus. iv. 30. § 2.) [W. A. G.]

GORGASUS, painter and modeller. [DAMO-PHILUS]. (See also Wals, Kunstblatt, 1841. note 43, p. 347.) [P. S.]

GORGE (Γόργη), a daughter of Oeneus and Althaea, and the wife of Andraemon. When Artemis metamorphosed her sisters into birds, on account of their unceasing lamentations about their brother Meleager, Gorge and Deianeira alone were spared. (Anton. lib. 2; Ov. Met. viii. 552; Apollod. i. 8. §§ 3, 5.) According to Apollodorus, she became the mother of Tydeus by her own father. Her son Thoas led the Aetolians against Troy. One of the Danaides likewise bore the name of Gorge. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) [L. S.]

GORGAS (Γόργας), one of Alexander's officers, was among those who were brought reluctantly from Macedonia by Amyntas, son of Andromenes, when he was sent home to collect levies in a.c. 332. (Curt. vii. 1, ad fin.; see Vol. I. p. 155, b.) Gorgias was one of the commanders left by Alexander in Bactria to complete the reduction of the Bactrian insurgents, and to check further rebellion, while the king himself marched to quell the revolt in Sogdiana, a.c. 328. (Arrian, Anab. iv. 16.) He accompanied Alexander in his Indian expedition, and, together with Attalus and Meleager, commanded the mercenaries at the passage of the Hydaspes against Porus in a.c. 326. (Arrian, Anab. v. 12; comp. Curt. viii. 13; Plut. Alex. 60; Diod. xvii. 87, &c.) This is perhaps the same Gorgias whose name occurs in Justin (xii. 12) among the veterans whom Alexander sent home under Craterus in a.c. 324; and, in that case, he must be distinguished from the Gorgias who is mentioned by Plutarch (Eum. 7) as one of the officers of Eumenes in his battle against Craterus and Neoptolemus in Cappadocia, in a.c. 321. [E. E.]

G'ORGAS (Γόργας), of Leontini, a Chalcidian colony in Sicily, was somewhat older than the orator Antiphon (born in a.c. 480 or 479), and lived to such an advanced age (some say 105, and others 109 years), that he survived Socrates, though probably only a short time. (Quintil. iii. 1. § 9; comp. Xenoph. Anab. ii. 6. § 16; H. Ed. Foss. de Gorgia Leontino, Halle, 1828, p. 6, &c.; J. Geel, Hist. Crit. Sophistarum, in the Nova Acta Literaria Societatis Rheno-Trajectinae, ii. p. 14.) The accounts which we have of personal collisions between Gorgias and Plato, and of the opinion which Gorgias is said to have expressed respecting Plato's dialogue Gorgias (Athen. xi. p. 505), are doubtful. We have no particular information respecting the early life and circumstances of Gorgias, but we are told that at an advanced age, in a.c. 427, he was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Athens, for the purpose of soliciting its protection against the threatening power of Syracuse. (Diod. xii. 53; Plut. Hipp. Maj. p. 282; Timaeus, ep. Dionys. Hal. Jud. Lys. 3.) He seems to have returned to Leontini only for a short time, and to have spent the remaining years of his vigorous old age in the towns of Greece Proper, especially at Athens and the Thessalian Larissae, enjoying honour everywhere as an orator and teacher of rhetoric. (Diod. l. c.; Plut. de Socrat. Daem. 8; Dionys. l. c.; Plut. Hipp. Maj. p. 282, b., Gorg. p. 449, b., Memo. p. 71, Protag. pp. 309, 315; comp. Foss. p. 23, &c.) Sævern (Ueber Aristoph. Vogel, p. 26, in the Memoirs of the Royal Acad. of Berlin) endeavoured to prove that Gorgias and his brother Herodias, a physician of some note, settled at Athens, but there is not sufficient evidence for this opinion. As Gorgias did not go as ambassador to Athens till after the death of Pericles, and as we have no trace of an earlier journey, we must reject the statement that the great Athenian statesman and the historian Thucydides were among his disciples. (Philostr. Vit. Soph. p. 493, Epist. 13. p. 919; comp. Dionys. Hal. Epist. ad Pomp. 2, Jud. de Thucyd. 24.) But his Sicilian oratory, in which he is said to have excelled Tisias, who was at Athens at the same time with him, perhaps as ambassador from Syracuse (Paus. vi. 7. § 8; Plut. Phaedr. p. 267), must have exercised a considerable influence even upon eminent men of the time, such as Agathon, the tragic poet, and the rhetorician Isocrates. (Plut. Symp. p. 198; Dionys. Hal. de Isocrat. 1, de Compos. Verb. 23; Isocrat. Panath. i. p. 334, ed. Lange.) Besides Polus, who is described in such lively colours in the Gorgias of Plato, Alcibiades, Critias, Alcidas, Aeschines, and Antisthenes, are called either pupils or imitators of Gorgias. (Philostr. p. 493, &c., comp. p. 919; Dionys. de Isoc. 19; Diog. Laërt. ii. 63, vi. 1.)

In his earlier years Gorgias was attracted, though not convinced, by the conclusions to which the Eleatics had come: but he neither attempted to refute them, nor did he endeavour to reconcile the reality of the various and varying phenomena of the world with the supposition of a simple, eternal, and unchangeable existence, as Empedocles, Anaxagoras, and the atomists had done. On the contrary, he made use of the conclusions of the Eleatics, for the purpose of proving that there was nothing which had any existence or reality; and in doing this he paid so much attention to externals, and kept so evidently appearance alone in view, instead of truth, that he was justly reckoned among the sophists. His work, On Nature, or On that which is not, in which he developed his views, and which is said to have been written in a.c. 444 (Olympiod. in Plat. Gorg. p. 567, ed. Routh.), seems to have been lost at an early time (it is doubtful whether Galen, who quotes it, Opera, vol. i. p. 56, ed. Gesner, actually read it); but we possess sufficient extracts from it, to form a definite idea of its nature. The work of Xenoph. Gorgia et Melisso, ascribed to Aristotle or Theophrastus, contains a faithful and accurate account of it, though the text is unfortunately very corrupt: Sextus Empiricus (adv. Math. vii. 65, &c.) is more superficial, but clearer. The book of Gorgias was divided into three sections: in the first he endeavoured to show that nothing had any real existence; in the second, that if there was a real existence, it was beyond man's power to ascertain it; and in the third, that existence could not be communicated, even supposing that it was real and ascertainable. The first section, of which we have a much more precise and accurate account in the Aristotelian work than in Sextus Empiricus, shows on the one hand that things neither are nor are not, because otherwise being and not being would be identical; and on the other hand, that if there were existence, it could neither have come to be nor not come to be, and neither be one nor many. The first of these inferences arises from an ambiguity in the use of the term of existence; the second from the fact of Gorgias adopting the conclusion of Melissus, which is manifestly wrong, and according to which existence not having come to be is infinite, and—applying Zeno's argument against the reality of space—as an infinite has no existence. Gorgias further makes bad use of another argument of Zeno, inasmuch as he conceives the unit as having no magnitude, and hence as incorporeal, that is, according to the materialistic views, as not existing at all, although with regard to variety, he observes that it presupposes the existence of units. The second section concludes that, if existence were ascertainable or cognizable, everything which is ascertained or thought must be real; but, he continues, things which are ascertainable through the medium of our senses do not exist, because they are conceived, but exist even when they are not conceived. The third section urges the fact, that it is not existence which is communicated, but only words, and that words are intelligible only by their reference to corresponding perceptions; but even then intelligible only approximately, since no two persons ever perfectly agreed in their perceptions or sentiments, nay, not even one and the same person agreed with himself at different times. (Comp. Foss, pp. 107—185.)

However little such a mode of arguing might stand the test of a sound dialectical examination, yet it could not but direct attention to the insufficiency of the abstractions of the Eleatics, and call forth more careful investigations concerning the nature and forms of our knowledge and cognition, and thus contribute towards the removal of the later scepticism, the germs of which were contained in the views entertained by Gorgias himself. He himself seems soon to have renounced this sophistical schematism, and to have turned his attention entirely to rhetorical and practical pursuits. Plato at least notices only one of those argumentations, and does not even speak of that one in the animated description which he gives of the peculiarities of Gorgias in the dialogue bearing his name, but in the Euthydemus (p. 284, 86, &c.). Isocrates (Helen. Laudat.), however, mentions the book itself.

Gorgias, as described by Plato, avoids general definitions, even of virtue and morality, and confines himself to enumerating and characterising the particular modes in which they appear, according to the differences of age, sex, &c., and that not without a due appreciation of real facts, as is clear from an expression of Aristotle, in which he recognises this merit. (Plat. Meno, p. 71, &c.; comp. Aristot. Polit. i. 9. § 13.) Gorgias further expressly declared, that he did not profess to impart virtue—as Protagoras and other sophists did—but only the power of speaking or eloquence (Plat. Meno, p. 95, Gorg. p. 452, Phileb. p. 58), and he preferred the name of a rhetorician to that of a sophist (Plat. Gorg. p. 520 a, 449, 452); but on the supposition that oratory comprehended and was the master of all our other powers and faculties. (Ib. p. 456, 454.) The ancients themselves were uncertain whether they should call him an orator or a sophist. (Cic. de Invent. i. 5; Lucian, Macrob. 23.)

In his explanations of the phenomena of nature, though without attaching any importance to physics, Gorgias seems to have followed in the footsteps of Empedocles, whose disciple he is called, though in all probability not correctly. (Diog. Laërt. viii. 58; Plat. Meno, p. 76, Gorg. p. 453; comp. Dionys. de Isocrat. 1.)

The eloquence of Gorgias, and probably that of his Sicilian contemporary Tiasias also, was chiefly calculated to tickle the ear by antitheses, by combinations of words of similar sound, by the symmetry of its parts and similar artifices (Diod. xii. 53; Cic. Orat. 49, 52; Dionys. Hal. passim), and to dazzle by metaphors, hypallagæ, allegories, repetitions, apostrophes, and the like (Suidas; Dionys. Hal. passim); by novel images, poetical circumlocutions, and high-sounding expressions, and sometimes also by a strain of irony. (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 17, 8; Xenoph. Symp. 2; Aristot. Rhet. iii. 1, 3, 14; Philostr. p. 492; Dionys. de Lys. 3.) He lastly tried to charm his hearers by a symmetrical arrangement of his periods. (Demetr. de Elocut. 15.) But as these artifices, in the application of which he is said to have often shown real grandeur, earnestness, and elegance (μεγαλοπρέπεια καὶ σεμνότητα καὶ καλλιλογία, Dionys. de Admir. vi Demosth. 4), were made use of too profusely, and, for the purpose of giving undue prominence to poor thoughts, his orations did not excite the feelings of his hearers (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 3, 17; Longin. de Sublim. iii. 12; Hermog. de Ideis, i. 6, ii. 9; Dionys. passim), and at all events could produce only a momentary impression. This was the case with his oration addressed to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, exhorting them to union against their common enemy (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 14; Philostr. p. 493), and with the funeral oration which he wrote at Athens, though he probably did not deliver it in public. (Philostr. p. 493; and the fragment preserved by the Schol. on Hermogenea, in Geel, p. 60, &c., and Foss, p. 69, &c.) Besides these and similar show-speeches of which we know no more than the titles (Geel, p. 33; Foss, p. 76, &c.), Gorgias wrote loci communes probably as rhetorical exercises, to show how subjects might be looked at from opposite points of view. (Cic. Brut. 12.) The same work seems to be referred to under the title Onomasticon. (Pollux, ix. 1.) We have besides mention of a work on dissimilar and homogeneous words (Dionys. de Comp. Verb. p. 67, ed. Reiske), and another on rhetoric (Apollod. ap. Diog. Laërt. viii. 58, Cic. Brut. 12; Quintil. iii. 1. § 3; Suidas), unless one of the before-mentioned works is to be understood by this title.

Respecting the genuineness of the two declamations which have come down to us under the name of Gorgias, viz. the Apology of Palamedes, and the Encomium on Helena, which is maintained by Reiske, Geel (p. 48, &c.), and Schönbörn (Dissertat. de Authentica Declamationum, quæ Gorgias Leontini nomine extant, Breslau, 1826), and doubted by Foss (p. 80, &c.) and others, it is difficult to give any decisive opinion, since the characteristic peculiarities of the oratory of Gorgias, which appear in these declamations, especially in the former, might very well have been imitated by a skilful rhetorician of later times.

The works of Gorgias did not even contain the elements of a scientific theory of oratory, any more than his oral instructions; he confined himself to teaching his pupils a variety of rhetorical artifices, and made them learn by heart certain formulas relative to them (Aristot. Elench. Soph. ii. 9), although there is no doubt that his lectures were and there contained remarks which were very much to the point. (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 18; comp. Cic. de Orat. ii. 59.)

[A. Ch. B.]

GORGIAS (Gorgias), of Athens, a rhetorician of the time of Cicero. Young M. Cicero, when at Athens, received instructions from Gorgias in declamation, but his father desired him to dismiss him. (Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 21.) It appears from Pinterch (Œ. 24) that Gorgias led a dissolute life, and also corrupted his pupils; and this circumstance was probably the cause of Cicero's aversion to him. Gorgias was the author of several works, viz. 1. Declamations, which are alluded to by Seneca (Controv. i. 4). Some critics are of opinion that the declamations which have come down to us under the name of Gorgias of Leontini, namely, the Ἀνταλία Παλαμίδου and Ἐγκόμιον Ἐλένης, are the productions of our rhetorician. 2. A work on Athenian courtesans (Περὶ τῶν Ἀθηναίων Ἐρασιδῶν, Athen. xiii. pp. 567, 583, 596); but it is not quite certain whether the author of this work is the same as our rhetorician. 3. A rhetorical work, entitled Σύγγραμμα Διαβολῆς καὶ Ἀδείκτου, in four books. The original work is lost, but a Latin abridgment by Rutilius Lupus is still extant, under the title De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis. This abridgment is divided into two books, although Quintilian (ix. 2. §§ 102, 106) states that Rutilius Lupus abridged the four books of Gorgias into one; whence we must infer that the division into two books is an arrangement made by one of the subsequent editors of the treatise. (Comp. Ruhnken, Praefat. ad Rutil. Lup. p. 1. &c.) [L. S.]

GURGIAS (Γοργίας). 1. A physician at Rome, a friend and contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ, to whom Galen dedicated his work De Causis Procatartictis. (Galen, De Locis Affect. v. 8. vol. viii. p. 362; De Causa Procat. vol. vii. pp. 347, 352, ed. Chart.)

2. A surgeon at Alexandria, mentioned in terms of praise by Celsus (De Med. vii. Praef. 14, pp. 137, 151), who may be conjectured (from the names of his apparent contemporaries) to have lived in the third century B. C. [W. A. G.]

GURGIAS, a Lacedaemonian statuarius, who flourished in the 87th Olympiad, B. C. 432. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19; where, for Gorgias, Lacon, we should read Gorgias Lacon; Sillig in Böttiger's Amalthea, vol. iii. p. 285.) [P. S.]

GURGIDAS (Γοργιδας), a Theban, of the party of Epameinondas and Pelopidas. When the first step had been taken towards the recovery of the Cadmeia from the Spartan garrison in B. C. 379, and Archias and Leontiades were slain, Epameinondas and Gorgidas came forward and joined Pelopidas and his confederates, solemnly introducing them into the Theban assembly, and calling on the people to fight for their country and their gods. (Plut. Pelop. 12.) In the next year, B. C. 378, Gorgidas and Pelopidas were Boeotarchs together, and Plutarch ascribes to them the plan of tampering with Sphodrias, the Spartan harmost, whom Cleombrotus had left at Thebes, to induce him to invade Attica, and so to embroil the Athenians with Lacedaemon. (Plut. Pelop. 14, Ages. 24; Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 20, &c.; comp. Diod. xv. 29.) [E. F.]

GURGION (Γοργίων), was, according to Xenophon (Anab. vii. 8. § 8), the son of Hellas, and Gongylus the Eretrian, who received a district in Myria, as the price of his treachery to his country. [GONGYLUS.] The dates, however, would lead us to suppose that he was a grandson rather than a son of this Gongylus. Of this district Gorgion and his brother Gongylus were lords in B. C. 399, when Thibron passed over into Asia to aid the Ionians against Tissaphernes. It contained the four towns of Cambrium, Palaegambrium, Myrina, and Grynium, and these were surrendered by the brothers to the Lacedaemonian general. (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. § 6.) [E. E.]

GORGŌ AND GORGONES (Γοργὼ and Γοργόνες). Homer knows only one Gorgo, who, according to the Odyssey (xi. 633), was one of the frightful phantoms in Hades: in the Iliad (v. 741, viii. 349, xi. 36; comp. Virg. Aen. vi. 289), the Aegis of Athena contains the head of Gorgo, the terror of her enemies. Euripides (Ion, 989) still speaks of only one Gorgo, although Hesiod (Theog. 278) had mentioned three Gorgones, the daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whence they are sometimes called Phorcydes or Phoricides. (Aeschyl. Prom. 793, 797; Pind. Pyth. xii. 24; Ov. Met. v. 230.) The names of the three Gorgones are Stheino (Stheno or Stenusa), Euryale, and Medusa (Hes. l. c.; Apollod. ii. 4. § 2), and they are conceived by Hesiod to live in the Western Ocean, in the neighbourhood of Night and the Hesperides. But later traditions place them in Libya. (Herod. ii. 91; Paus. ii. 21. § 6.) They are described (Scut. Herc. 233) as girded with serpents, raising their heads, vibrating their tongues, and gnashing their teeth; Aeschylus (Prom. 794. &c., Choeph. 1050) adds that they had wings and brazen claws, and enormous teeth. On the chest of Cypselus they were likewise represented with wings. (Paus. v. 18. § 1.) Medusa, who alone of her sisters was mortal, was, according to some legends, at first a beautiful maiden, but her hair was changed into serpents by Athena, in consequence of her having become by Poseidon the mother of Chrysaor and Pegasus, in one of Athena's temples. (Hes. Theog. 287, &c.; Apollod. ii. 4. § 3; Ov. Met. iv. 792; comp. PERSEUS.) Her head was now of so fearful an appearance, that every one who looked at it was changed into stone. Hence the great difficulty which Perseus had in killing her; and Athena afterwards placed the head in the centre of her shield or breastplate. There was a tradition at Athens that the head of Medusa was buried under a mound in the Agora. (Paus. ii. 21. § 6, v. 12. § 2.) Athena gave to Hercules a lock of Medusa (concealed in an urn), for it had a similar effect upon the beholder as the head itself. When Hercules went out against Lacedaemon he gave the lock of hair to Sterope, the daughter of Cephæus, as a protection of the town of Tegea, as the sight of it would put the enemy to flight. (Paus. viii. 47. § 4; Apollod. ii. 7. § 3.)

The mythus respecting the family of Phorcyas, to which also the Graeae, Hesperides, Scylla, and other fabulous beings belonged, has been interpreted in various ways by the ancients themselves. Some believed that the Gorgones were formidable animals with long hair, whose aspect was so frightful, that men were paralysed or killed by it, and some of the soldiers of Marius were believed to have thus met with their death (Athen. v. 64). Pliny (H. N. iv. 31) thought that they were a race of savage, swift, and hair-covered women; and Diodorus (iii. 65) regards them as a race of women inhabiting the western parts of Libya, who had been extirpated by Hercules in traversing Libya. These explanations may not suffice, and are certainly not so ingenious as those of Hug, Hermann, Creuzer, Böttiger, and others, but none of them has any strong degree of probability. [L. S.]

GORGŌ (Γοργὼ), a lyric poetess, a contemporary and rival of Sappho, who often attacked her in her poema. (Max. Tyr. Diss. xxiv. 9, vol. i. p. 478, ed. Reiske.) On the relations of Sappho to her female contemporaries, see, besides the dissertation just quoted, Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, vol. i. p. 177.

GORGŌ. [CLEOMENES, p. 793, a.]

GORGON (Γόργων), the author of an historical work Περὶ τῶν ἐν Ἑλλάδι Στρατιῶν, and of Scholia on Pindar. (Athen. xv. p. 696-697; Hesych. s. v. Ἐπιτολῆς, Καταφάπτις; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. vii.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 65; Vossius, de Hist. Græc. p. 444, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

GORGŌNIUS. [GARGONIUS.]

GORGŌPAS (Γοργώπας), a Spartan, acted as vice-admiral under Hierax and Antalcidas successively, in B. C. 388. When Hierax sailed to Rhodes to carry on the war there, he left Gorgopas with twelve ships at Aegina, to act against the Athenians, who, under Pamphilus, had possessed themselves of a fort in the island, and who were soon reduced to such distress, that a powerful squadron of ships was despatched from Athens to convey them home. Gorgopas and the Aeginetan privateers new renewing their attacks on the Athenian coast, EUNOMUS was sent out to act against them. Meanwhile, Antalcidas superseded Hierax in the command of the fleet, and being entrusted also with a mission to the Persian court, was escorted by Gorgopas as far as Ephesus. Gorgopas, returning hence to Aegina, fell in with the squadron of Eunomus, and succeeded in capturing four of his triremes off Zoster in Attica. [See Vol. II. p. 95, a.] Soon after this, however, Chabrias landed in Aegina, on his way to Cyprus to aid Evagoras against the Persians, and defeated the Spartans by means of an ambuscade, Gorgopas being slain in the battle. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. § § 1-12; Polyæn. iii. 10; Dem. c. Lept. p. 479, ad fin.) [E. E.]

GORGUS (Γόργος). 1. Son of the Messenian hero, Aristomenes, who betrothed him in marriage to the maiden by whose aid he had himself escaped when captured by a body of Cretan bowmen, mercenaries of Sparta. [See Vol. I. p. 308.] Gorgus is mentioned by Pausanias as fighting bravely by his father's side in the last desperate struggle, when Eira had been surprised by the Spartans. Soon after this Aristomenes declined to take the command of the Messenians, who wished to migrate to another country, and named Gorgus and Mantiolus, son of the seer Theoclus, as their leaders. Gorgus proposed to take possession of the island of Zacynthus, while Mantiolus was in favour of a settlement in Sardinia. Neither of these courses, however, was adopted, and Rhegium was fixed upon as the new home of the exiles. (Paus. iv. 19, 21, 23; Müller, Dor. i. 7. § 10; comp. ANAXILAUS.)

2. King of Salamis, in Cyprus, was son of Chersias, and great-grandson of Evelthon, the contemporary of Arceilaus III. of Cyrene. His brother Onesilus, having long urged him in vain to revolt from the Persian king, at length drove him from the city, and, usurping the throne, set up the standard of rebellion with the Ionians in B. C. 499. Gorgus was restored to his kingdom in the next year on the reduction of the Cyprians and the death of Onesilus in battle. He joined Xerxes in his invasion of Greece, and his brother Philaon was taken prisoner by the Greeks in the first of the three battles at Artemisium in B. C. 480. (Herod. v. 104, 115, vii. 98, viii. 11; Larcher ad Herod. v. 104; Clinton, F. H. sub annis 499, 498, vol. ii. App. 5.)

3. A Messenian, son of Enclætus, was distinguished for rank, wealth, and success in gymnastic contests: moreover, unlike most athletes (says Polybius), he proved himself wise and skilful as a statesman. In B. C. 218 he was sent as ambassador to Philip V. of Macedon, then besieging Palus, in Cephallenia, to ask him to come to the aid of Messenia against Lycurgus, king of Lacedæmon. This request was supported by the traitor Leontius for his own purposes; but Philip preferred listening to the recommendation of the Acarnanians to invade Aetolia, and ordered Speratus, the Achæan general, to carry assistance to the Messenians. (Paus. vi. 14; Polyb. v. 5, vii. 10; Suid. s. v. Γόργος.) [E. E.]

GORTYS (Γόρτυς). 1. A son of Stympheia, and founder of the Arcadian town of Gortys. (Paus. viii. 4. § 5.)

2. A son of Tegeates and Maera, who, according to an Arcadian tradition, built the town of Gortyn, in Crete. The Cretans regarded him as a son of Rhadamanthys. (Paus. viii. 53. § 2.) [L. S.]

GOTARZES. [ARSACES XX. XXI.]

GRACCHANUS, M. JUNIUS, assumed his cognomen on account of his friendship with C. Gracchus. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 2.) He wrote a work, De Potestatibus, which gave an account of the Roman constitution and magistracies from the time of the kings. It stated upon what occasions new offices were introduced, and what changes were made in the duties of the old ones. At least, from the fragments that remain, it may be inferred with probability that such were its contents. It was addressed to T. Pomponius Atticus, the father of Cicero's friend. Atticus, the father, was the sodalis of M. Gracchanus. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 20.) It is likely that they were associates in some official college.

Junius Gracchanus is cited by Censorinus (De Die Nat. c. 20), Macrobius (Sat. i. 13), Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 2), and Varro (De L. L. iv. 7, iv. 8, v. 4, v. 9). Bertrandus (De Jurispr. ii. 1) thinks that the plebiscitum in Festus (s. v. Publica Potestas) is taken from Gracchanus, since the name Junius is mentioned in the imperfect passage preceding the plebiscitum.

The seventh book of the treatise De Potestatibus is cited by Ulpian (Dig. l. tit. 13, pr.), and the same passage is also cited by Joannes Lydus (de Mag. i. 24), but Lydus does not cite Gracchanus from the original work, which, as he says in his Prooemium, was no longer extant when he wrote. Nay, he appears to cite Gracchanus rather from the fragment of Ulpian in the Digest than from the original work of Ulpian, and he seems to attribute to Gracchanus part of that which is the later addition of Ulpian.

Pomponius, in the title of the Digest, De Originis Juris (Dig. l. tit. 2. s. 2), treats of magistrates, and what he says of the office of quaestor seems to be partly borrowed from Gracchanus. Hence, it may be not unnaturally presumed that he has borrowed other materials from the same source. It is remarkable, that two passages which appear in the Digest in an extract from the Enchiridion of Pomponius, are cited by Lydus (i. 26, i. 34) from the work of Gaius, Ad Legem XII. Tabularum. Joannes Lydus is an inaccurate writer, of small ability, and it is not unlikely that, in translating fragments from the Digest (which had been compiled several years before he wrote), his eye rested on the heading of the extract from Gaius, which immediately precedes the extract from Pomponius, and is conspicuous from being at the beginning of the second title of the first book of the Digest.

Niebuhr builds largely (in the opinion of Dirksen and other eminent modern critics, too largely) on the fact that Lydus cites from Gaius that which the Digest gives to Pomponius. It is Niebuhr's theory, that the commencement of the treatise of Gaius in the Twelve Tables gave an account of the early constitution and the vicissitudes of the Roman magistrates; that Gaius, in this part of his work, took Gracchanus for his principal authority; and that Gaius is trustworthy when he chooses Gracchanus as a guide, but is not a safe and critical authority when he depends on his own researches. According to Niebuhr, Pomponius unfairly appropriates the work of Gaius, which he epitomises in his Enchiridion, while Lydus, by honestly copying Gaius, preserves copious remains of Gracchanus. Pomponius, in the fragment De Origine Juris, sometimes counts dates by the number of years from the expulsion of the kings, or from the first citizenship. (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 20.) Lydus (l. 38) adopts the same mode of reckoning. Niebuhr assumes that all such statements connected with the history of the magistrates, and adapted to the years of the consular era, are derived from Gracchanus. Gracchanus, he maintains, was an invaluable historian of the constitution, possessed the soundest notions, and derived his information from the most authentic sources, such as the writings of the pontiffs and the early law-books.

Though the remains, which can with certainty be attributed to Gracchanus, are very scanty, and scarcely warrant such unqualified panegyric, they undoubtedly make us acquainted with some interesting and valuable facts in the early history of Rome.

G.]

GRACCHUS, the name of an illustrious family of the plebeian Sempronius gens, of which the following members are known in history.

1. TIB. SEMPRONIUS, TIB. P. C. N. GRACCHUS, was consul in B.C. 238; and with his colleague, P. Valerius Falto, carried on a war in Sardinia and Corsica, shortly after the insurrection of the Carthaginian mercenaries. He conquered the enemy, but, though he made no booty, he is said to have brought back a number of worthless captives. (Fast. a. n. Sardi; Zonar. viii. 18; comp. Polyb. i. 58; Oros. iv. 12.)

2. TIB. SEMPRONIUS, TIB. F. TIB. N. GRACCHUS, a distinguished general of the second Punic war. In B.C. 216 he was curule aedile; and shortly after the battle of Cannae, he was appointed master equitum to the dictator, M. Junius Pera, who had to levy a fresh army against Hannibal. He then pitched their camp near Casilinum; and the dictator being obliged to return to Rome, Gracchus was entrusted with the command of the camp; but in accordance with the dictator's command, he abstained from entering into any engagement with the enemy, although there was no want of favourable opportunities, and although the inhabitants of Casilinum, which was besieged by Hannibal, were suffering from famine. As there was no other way of relieving the besieged without fighting against the enemy, he contrived in three successive nights to send down the river Volturnus casks filled with provisions, which were eagerly caught up by the inhabitants, the river flowing through the town. But in the fourth night the casks were thrown on shore by the wind and waves, and thus discovered by the enemy, who now, with increased watchfulness, prevented the introduction of any further supplies into Casilinum. The famine in the place increased to such a fearful degree, that the people and the garrison, which chiefly consisted of Praenestines, fed on leather, mice, and any herbs they could get, until at length they surrendered. The garrison was allowed to depart on condition of a certain sum being paid for every man. Out of 570 men, more than half had perished in the famine, and the rest, with their commander, M. Anicius, went to Praeneste, where afterwards a statue was erected to Anicius, with an inscription recording the sufferings of the besieged at Casilinum. Shortly after this affair Gracchus accompanied the dictator to Rome, to report on the state of affairs, and to take measures for the future. The dictator expressed great satisfaction with the conduct of Gracchus, and recommended him for the consulship, to which he was accordingly elected for the year B.C. 215, with L. Postumius Albinus. The time was one of great disasters for Rome; but Gracchus did not lose his courage, and inspired the senate with confidence, directing their attention to the point where it was most needed. He undertook the command of the volones and allies, marched across the river Volturnus, and pitched his camp in the neighbourhood of Liternum. He there trained and disciplined his troops, and prepared them to meet the enemy. On hearing that the Campanians were about to hold a large meeting at Hamae, he marched towards Cumae, where he encamped, and from whence he made an unexpected attack upon the assembled Campanians. They were routed in a very short time, and 2000 of them, with their commander, Marius Alfius, fell in the engagement. After taking possession of their camp, Gracchus quickly returned to Cumae, as Hannibal was encamped at no great distance. The latter, on hearing of the affair of Hamae, hastened thither, but came too late, and found only the bodies of the slain, whereupon he too returned to his camp above Tifata; but immediately after he laid siege to Cumae, as he was anxious to obtain possession of a maritime town. Gracchus was thus besieged by Hannibal: he could not place much reliance on his troops, but was obliged to hold out for the sake of the Roman allies, who implored his protection. He made a sally, in which he was so successful, that the Carthaginians, being taken by surprise, lost a great number of men; and before they had time to turn round, he ordered his troops to withdraw within the walls of Cumae. Hannibal now expected a regular battle; but, as Gracchus remained quiet, he raised the siege, and returned to Tifata. Soon afterwards Gracchus marched his troops from Cumae to Luceria in Apulia.

For the year 214 his imperium was prolonged, and, with his two legions of volones, he was ordered to carry on his operations in Apulia; but the dictator, Q. Fabius Maximus, commanded him to go to Beneventum. At the very time he arrived there Hanno, with a large army, came from Bruttium; but a little too late, the place having been already occupied by Gracchus. When the latter heard that Hanno had pitched his camp on the river Cator, and was ravaging and laying waste the country, he marched out, and took up his quarters at a short distance from the enemy. His volones, who had served in the hope of being restored to freedom, now began to murmur; but as he had full power from the senate to act as he thought proper in this matter, he assembled the soldiers, and wisely proclaimed their freedom. This generous act created such delight among the men, that it was difficult to keep them from attacking the enemy at once. But the next morning at day-break he complied with their demand. Hanno accepted the battle. The contest was extremely severe, and lasted for several hours; but the loss of the Carthaginians was so great, that Hanno, with his cavalry, was obliged to take to flight. After the battle, Gracchus treated a number of the volones who had behaved rather cowardly during the engagement, with that generous magnanimity which is so peculiar a feature in the family of the Gracchi, and by which they rise far above their nation. He then returned with his army to Beneventum, where the citizens received them with the greatest enthusiasm, and celebrated the event with joy and festivities. Gracchus afterwards had a picture made of these joyous scenes, and dedicated it in the temple of Libertas on the Aventine, which had been built by his father.

At the end of the year he was in his absence elected consul a second time for B. C. 213, with Q. Fabius Maximus. He now carried on the war in Lucania, fought several minor engagements, and took some of the less important towns of the country; but as it was not thought advisable to draw the consuls away from their armies, Gracchus was commanded to nominate a dictator to hold the comitia. He nominated C. Claudius Centho. In B. C. 212 he was ordered by the consuls to quit Lucania, and again take up his quarters at Beneventum. But before he broke up an ill omen announced to him his sad catastrophe. He was betrayed by Flavius, a Lucanian, into the hands of the Carthaginian Mago. [FLAVIUS, No. 2.] According to most accounts, he fell in the struggle with Mago, at Campi Veteres, in Lucania; and his body was sent to Hannibal, who honoured it with a magnificent burial. Livy records several different traditions respecting his death and burial, but adds the remark that they do not deserve credit. (Liv. xxii. 57, xxiii. 19, 24, 25, 30, 32, 35—37, 48, xxiv. 10, 14—16, 43, xxv. 1, 3, 15—17; Appian, Annab. 35; Zonar. ix. 3, &c.; Oros. iv. 16; Eutrop. iii. 4, who confounds Tib. Sempronius Longus with our Tib. Sempronius Gracchus; Cic. Tusc. i. 37; Gellius, ii. 2.)

3. TIB. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, probably a son of No. 2, was elected augur in B. C. 203, when he was yet very young, although it was at that time a very rare occurrence for a young man to be made a member of any of the colleges of priests. He died as augur in B. C. 174, during a plague. (Liv. xxix. 38, xli. 26.)

4. TIB. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, was commander of the allies in the war against the Gauls, under the consul Marcellus, B. C. 196, and was one of the many illustrious persons that fell in battle against the Boians. (Liv. xxxiii. 36.)

5. P. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, was tribune of the people in B. C. 189; and in conjunction with his colleague, C. Sempronius Rutilius, he brought an accusation against M'. Acilius Glabrio, the conqueror of Antiochus, charging him with having appropriated to himself a part of the money and booty taken from the king at Thermopylae. Cato also spoke against Glabrio on that occasion. (Liv. xxxvii. 57; Fest. s. v. penatores.)

6. TIB. SEMPRONIUS, P. F. TIB. N. GRACCHUS, the father of the two illustrious tribunes, Tib. and C. Gracchus, was born about B. C. 210. In B. C. 190 he accompanied the consul, L. Cornelius Scipio, into Greece, and was at that time by far the most distinguished among the young Romans in the camp for his boldness and bravery. Scipio sent him from Amphissa to Pella to sound Philip's disposition towards the Romans, who had to pass through his dominions on their expedition against Antiochus; and young Gracchus was received by the king with great courtesy. In B. C. 187 he was tribune of the people; and although he was personally hostile to P. Scipio Africanus, yet he defended him against the attacks of the other tribunes, and restored peace at Rome, for which he received the thanks of the aristocratic party. It appears that soon after this occurrence Gracchus was rewarded with the hand of Cornelia, the youngest daughter of P. Scipio Africanus, though, as Plutarch states, he may not have married her till after her father's death. An anecdote about her engagement to him clearly shows the high esteem which he enjoyed at Rome among persons of all parties. One day, it is said, when the senators were feasting in the Capitol, some of Scipio's friends requested him to give his daughter Cornelia in marriage to Gracchus, which he readily promised to do. On his returning home, and telling his wife Aemilia that he had given his daughter to wife, Aemilia censured him for his rashness, saying that if he had chosen Gracchus she would not have objected; and on hearing that Gracchus was the man whom Scipio had selected, she rejoiced with her husband at the happy choice. Some writers relate the same anecdote of his son Tiberius and Claudia, the daughter of Appius Claudius and Antistia. Shortly after Gracchus also defended L. Scipio in the disputes respecting the accounts of the money he had received from Antiochus. Towards the end of the year M. Fulvius Nobilior, who claimed a triumph, was nobly supported by Gracchus against the other tribunes. In B. C. 183 he was one of the triumvirs to conduct a Roman colony to Saturnia; and shortly after this he must have been aedile, in which character he spent large sums upon the public games. In 181 he was made praetor, and received Hispania Citerior as his province, in which he succeeded Q. Fulvius Flaccus. [FLACCUS, FULVIUS, No. 5.] When his army was ready he marched to Spain, and having made an unexpected attack upon Munda, he reduced the town to submission. After receiving hostages, and establishing a garrison there, he took several strongholds of the Celtiberians, ravaged the country, and in this manner approached the town of Certima, which was strongly fortified; but as its inhabitants despaired of being able to resist him, they surrendered. They had a pay a large sum of money, and give forty of their nobles as hostages. Gracchus thence proceeded to Alce, where the Celtiberians were encamped. Here several skirmishes took place, until at last, by a feigned flight of his own men, he succeeded in drawing the Celtiberians away from their camp, of which he immediately took possession. On this occasion 9000 enemies are said to have been slain. Gracchus now proceeded to ravage the country, which, together with his victory, had such an effect upon the people, that in a short time 103 Celtiberian towns submitted to him. Laden with immense booty, Gracchus then returned to Alce, which he besieged. The place at first made a gallant resistance, but was compelled to surrender. He again gained great booty, but treated the conquered people with kindness; and one Celtiberian chief, Thurrua, even entered the Roman army, and assisted Gracchus as a faithful ally. The large and powerful city of Ergavica opened its gates to the Romans. Some historians, says Livy, stated that these conquests were not so easily made, but that the Celtiberians invariably revolted after their submission, as soon as the enemy was out of sight, until at last a fearful battle was fought, the irreparable loss of which induced the Celtiberians to conclude a permanent peace. This may indeed have been so, for the Spaniards had been treated by nearly all the previous Roman generals with cruelty and treachery; and they could not know that they had now to do with a bold, gallant, and formidable, but at the same time a kind and honest enemy. In the year following Gracchus remained in Spain; and by his usual prudence and valour he again achieved the most brilliant exploits; he relieved the town of Carahia, which was besieged by a large army of Celtiberians, and he afterwards defeated, by a stratagem, another army near Comlega, which had endeavoured to enslave him. In this manner he gradually subdued all the Celtiberians, and he afterwards showed that he was as great in the peaceful administration of his province, as he had before been at the head of his armies. He adopted various excellent measures, which tended not only to secure his conquests, but to win the affections of the Spaniards to such a degree, that nearly fifty years afterwards they evinced their gratitude towards his son Tiberius. He assigned lands and habitations to the poorer people, and established a series of laws to regulate their relations to Rome. In commemoration of his achievements in Spain, he changed the name of the town of Illurcia into Gracchuria.

In A.C. 178 Gracchus returned to Rome, where he celebrated a splendid triumph over the Celtiberians and their allies, and was elected consul for the year following, with C. Claudius Pulcher. He obtained Sardinia for his province, where he had to carry on a war against the revolted inhabitants. He gained a brilliant victory over the enemy, and then led his army into winter quarters. In the spring of the year following he continued his successful operations against the Sardinians, and reduced them to submission. When this was achieved, and hostages were received, he sent envoys to Rome to solicit permission to return with his army and celebrate a triumph. But public thanksgivings only were decreed, and Gracchus was ordered to remain in his province as proconsul. At the close of A.C. 175, however, he returned to Rome, and was honoured with a triumph over the Sardinians. He is said to have brought with him so large a number of captives, that they were sold for a mere trifle, which gave rise to the proverb Sardi venales. A tablet was dedicated by him in the temple of the Mater Matuta, on which the reduction of Sardinia was recorded, and on which were represented the island itself and the battles Gracchus had fought there.

In A.C. 169 Gracchus was appointed censor with C. Claudius Pulcher. His censorship was characterised by a strictness bordering on severity: several persons were ejected from the senate, and many equites lost their horses. In consequence of this, the tribunes brought an accusation against the censors before the people, but both were acquitted. On that occasion Gracchus acted with great magnanimity towards his colleague, who was unpopular, while he himself enjoyed the highest esteem and popularity, for he declared, that if his colleague should be condemned, he would accompany him into exile. With the money assigned to him for the public works he purchased the site of the house of P. Scipio Africanus, and of some adjoining buildings, and there erected a basilica, which was afterwards called the Basilica Sempronia. A more important act of his censorship was his throwing all the libertini together in the four tribus urbanae, whereas before they had gradually spread over all the tribes. This measure is called by Cicero one of the most salutary regulations, and one which for a time checked the ruin of the republic. In A.C. 164 Gracchus was sent by the senate as ambassador into Asia, to inspect the affairs of the Roman allies; and it appears that on that occasion he addressed the Rhodians in a Greek speech, which was still extant in the time of Cicero. In A.C. 163 he was raised to the consulship a second time. Polybius mentions several other embassies on which he was employed by the senate, and in which he acted as a kind mediator between foreign princes and Rome, and afforded protection where it was needed. The time of his death is unknown: Orelli (Onom. Tull. ii. p. 531) commits the blunder of saying that he fell in battle in Lucania, thus confounding him with No. 2.

Tib. Sempronius Gracchus had twelve children by Cornelia, nine of whom appear to have died at an early age. The remaining three were Tiberius and Caius, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to the younger Scipio Africanus. In his private and family life Gracchus was as amiable a man as he was great in his public career: he was the worthy husband of Cornelia, and the worthy father of the Gracchi, and, like his two sons, he combined with the virtues of a Roman those of a man. Cicero mentions him in several passages in terms of high praise, and also acknowledges that he had some merits as an orator. 7. TIB. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, the elder son of No. 6. If Plutarch is right, that Tib. Gracchus was not thirty years old at his death, in A. C. 153, he must have been born in A. C. 164; but we know that he was quaestor in A. C. 137, an office which by law he could not hold till he had completed his thirty-first year, whence it would follow that he was born about five years earlier, and that at his death he was about thirty-five years old. He lost his father at an early age, but this did not prevent his inheriting his father's excellent qualities, and his illustrious mother, Cornelia, made it the object of her life to render her sons worthy of their father and of her own ancestors. It was owing to the care she bestowed upon the education of her sons, rather than to their natural talents, that they surpassed all the Roman youths of the time. She was assisted in her exertions by eminent Greeks, who exercised great influence upon the minds of the two brothers, and among whom we have especial mention of Diophanes of Mytilene, Menelaus of Marathon, and Blossius of Cumae. As the Gracchi grew up, the relation between them and their teachers gradually became one of intimate friendship, and of the highest mutual esteem and admiration. Tiberius was nine years older than his brother Caius; and although they grew up under the same influence, yet their natural talents and dispositions were developed in different ways, so that their characters, though resembling each other in their main outlines, yet presented great differences. Tiberius, who was inferior to his brother in point of talent, surpassed him in the amiable traits of his gentle nature: his noble bearing, the softness of his voice, the simplicity of his demeanour, and his calm dignity, won for him the hearts of the people. His eloquence, too, formed a strong contrast with the passionate and impetuous harangues of Caius; for it was temperate, graceful, persuasive, and, proceeding as it did from the fulness of his own heart, it found a ready entrance into the hearts of his hearers. If the two brothers had been of an equal age, and could have united their efforts, their power would have been irresistible; but as it was, each had to fight single-handed, and each fell a victim to the selfishness of the oligarchy, and the faithlessness and shortsightedness of the people, whose rights they had undertaken to defend.

When Tib. Gracchus had arrived at the age of manhood, he was elected augur, and App. Claudius, who otherwise was not free from the haughtiness and selfishness so peculiar to his family, showed his esteem for Tiberius by offering him the hand of his daughter Claudia; and most historians, according to Plutarch, related, that as App. Claudius had made the engagement without his wife's consent, she exclaimed, on being informed of it, "Why in such a hurry, unless you have got Tib. Gracchus for our daughter's husband?"

When P. Scipio Africanus the younger, who was married to a sister of the Gracchi, undertook the command against Carthage, Tib. Gracchus accompanied him, and was a witness of the fearful fall of that city. Tiberius thus received the first practical lessons in military affairs from the most illustrious general of the time, in whose tent he lived, and whose friendship he enjoyed. The contemporary historian, Fannius, even related, that Tiberius, who surpassed all other soldiers in courage and attention to discipline, was the first among the Romans who scaled the walls of Carthage.

About ten years after his return from this expedition, A. C. 137, Tiberius was appointed quaestor, and in this capacity he accompanied the consul, C. Hostilius Mancinus, to his province of Hispania Citerior, where in a short time he gained both the affection of the Roman soldiers, and the esteem and confidence of the victorious enemy. When Mancinus, after being defeated by the Numantines, sent messengers to treat with them for a truce and terms of peace, the Spaniards, who had so often been deceived by the Romans in their negotiations, declared that they would not treat with any one except Tib. Gracchus; for the confidence they placed in him personally was heightened by the recollection of the just and fair treatment they had received from his victorious father. Tiberius accordingly was sent to Numantia, and concluded a peace with the Numantines on equitable terms. Considering the defeat which Mancinus had suffered, the terms were favourable to the Romans, and Gracchus saved by it an army of upwards of 20,000 men from utter annihilation; but the concessions made to the Numantines were nevertheless more than the pride of the Roman senate could brook. After the conclusion of the peace, an incident occurred which gave further proof of the confidence which the Numantines placed in Tiberius. The Roman camp, and all that it contained, had fallen into the hands of the enemy; and when the army had already commenced its retreat, Tiberius discovered that the tablets containing the accounts of the money he had had to dispose of as quaestor were lost; and being anxious to recover them, that he might not be exposed to annoyances after his arrival at Rome, he returned with a few companions to Numantia. On his arrival he sent to the magistrates, and begged of them to restore him the tablets. They were delighted at the opportunity of doing him a service; they invited him to enter the city, and received him in a manner with which they would have treated their sincerest friend,—they honoured him with a public banquet, restored to him the tablets, and when he left, they gave him permission to take with him, as a remembrance, any thing he might please. But Tiberius took only some incense, which he wanted for a sacrifice.

When Mancinus and Tiberius returned to Rome, the feelings which there prevailed formed a great contrast to each other; for while the friends and relatives of the soldiers who had served in Spain were rejoiced at their safe return, and looked upon Gracchus as their saviour, the senate and the rest of the people regarded the treaty with Numantia as a disgrace to the Roman name. The odium of the treaty, however, was thrown on Mancinus alone, who of course was the only responsible person. He was stripped naked, and with his hands bound, he was delivered up to the Numantines, that the treaty might thus be annulled (A. C. 136). Tiberius, for the first time, enjoyed the admiration of the people, who rewarded his good services in the affair with affection and gratitude. P. Scipio Africanus, the brother-in-law of Gracchus, and then at the head of the aristocracy, took an active part in the proceedings against Mancinus, without attempting either to save him or to get the treaty with Numantia ratified. It would seem that even as early as this time, Scipio and the whole body of the aristocracy watched with fear and jealousy the career of Tiberius, whose popularity was gaining fresh strength every day.

But the sympathy of Tiberius with the people was excited much more by its distress than by the demonstrations of its favour. His brother Caius related in some of his works, that Tiberius, on his march to Spain, in B. C. 137, as he was passing through Etruria, observed with grief and indignation the deserted state of that fertile country; thousands of foreign slaves in chains were employed in cultivating the land and tending the flocks upon the immense estates of the wealthy, while the poorer classes of Roman citizens, who were thus thrown out of employment, had scarcely their daily bread or a clod of earth to call their own. He is said to have been roused through that circumstance to exert himself in endeavouring to remedy this evil. C. Lælius had, before him entertained the thought of interfering, but, for want of courage, had despaired of success. Had the Licinian law, which regulated the amount of public land which a person might occupy, and the number of cattle he might keep on the public pastures, been observed, such a state of things could never have arisen. If Tiberius had wished to enforce obedience to the letter of that law, he would have acted with perfect justice, and no one could have censured him for it, but the greedy aristocracy, who had enriched themselves by the violation of the law, would have moved heaven and earth to prevent such a measure. The state of things, moreover, had, by a long-continued neglect of the law, become so complicated, that a renewal of the Licinian law, without any modification, would have been unfair towards a large class of the occupiers of public land, and it required the greatest care to act in the affair with prudence and moderation, and in a manner equitable and satisfactory towards all parties. Large tracts of public land had passed from father to son, and no one ever seems to have thought of the possibility of their being reclaimed by the state. Through this feeling of security many persons had erected buildings on their possessions, or had otherwise laid out large sums of money upon them; many also, who now possessed more than the five hundred jugera allowed by the Licinian law, had acquired either the whole or part of their possession by purchase, and were accustomed to look upon it as real property, although a moment's consideration would have convinced them that they were only precarious tenants of the republic, which might at any time claim its right of ownership.

Amid those clashing interests, Tib. Gracchus determined to remedy the evil by endeavouring to create an industrious middle class of agriculturists, and to put a check upon the unbounded avarice of the aristocracy, whose covetousness, combined with the disasters of the second Punic war, had completely destroyed the middle class of small landowners. With this view, he offered himself as a candidate for the tribuneship, and obtained it for the year A. C. 133. It should be observed, that at this period the tribunes were elected in the month of June, the harvest time in Italy, but they did not enter upon their office till the 10th of December.

The people appear to have anticipated that Gracchus was going to undertake something on their behalf, for placards were seen in all parts of the city calling upon him to protect them; but he felt that his work was too serious and important to be undertaken without the advice and assistance of others. His Greek friends, Diophanes and Blossius, and his mother, Cornelia, urged him on; and he was supported by the counsel of the most eminent men of the time, such as App. Claudius, his father-in-law, the consul and great jurist, Mucius Scaevola, and Crassus, the pontifex maximus, all of whom were probably as much losers by the measures which Gracchus was going to bring forward as the Scipios and others who opposed him. The first bill which he brought before the people proposed, that the agrarian law of Licinius, which had in fact never been abolished, should be renewed and enforced, with this modification, that besides the 500 jugera allowed by that law, any one might possess 250 jugera of the public land for each of his sons. This clause, however, seems to have been limited to two; so that a father of two sons might occupy 1000 jugera of public land. The surplus was to be taken from them and distributed in small farms among the poor citizens. The business of measuring and distributing the land was to be entrusted to triumvirs, who were to be elected as a permanent magistracy. He further enacted, that in future the possession of public land should not be transferred by sale or purchase, in order that the wealthy might not be able gradually to acquire again more land than the law allowed. In the case of buildings erected on land which was to be thus given up, the possessors were to be indemnified by a sum of money determined by a fair valuation of the buildings. There remains only one point in this agrarian law, for which the legislator is open to censure, not indeed on the ground of injustice, but merely on that of unfairness. A considerable, though probably not a very great number of those who had to give up a portion of their possessions, had acquired either the whole or a part by purchase; and as they had to give up their surplus, like those who had not paid for their land, those men were positive losers, just as much as if Gracchus had taken from them their private property. To remove all complaints on this ground, Gracchus ought to have added a clause, that such persons should receive from the public treasury the sums for which they had bona fide purchased the land, or else that the land thus purchased should not come within the law, and should be treated as private property, with which the law had nothing to do. The state ought, at all events, to have made this sacrifice. The opposition of the aristocracy would not indeed have been silenced by such a measure, but there would certainly have been no ground for that bitter exasperation which Gracchus now called forth. It is ever to be lamented that Gracchus did not introduce into his law a clause of that description.

The faction of the opposition, consisting of the senate and the aristocracy, was not numerous, but violent in the highest degree, and the thousands who were to be benefited by the measure were ready to support Gracchus at any risk; the issue of the struggle, therefore, could not be doubtful, and it would have been hopeless to oppose the agrarian law in the ordinary constitutional way, for as soon as the bill was passed by the tribes, it became law, the sanction of the senate not being required. The senatorial party, therefore, resorted to intrigues. A noble specimen of the deeply-felt and impressive eloquence with which Gracchus addressed the people in those days is preserved in Plutarch (Tib. Gracc. 8): it bears all the marks of genuineness, and has unjustly been considered by modern critics as a spurious piece of declamation. When Tiberius brought forward his bill, and it was manifest that it would be carried, the senatorial party resorted to the only means that was left them,—they gained over to their side one of the tribunes, M. Octavius Caecina, a man of a most obstinate character, who himself occupied more of the public domain than the law allowed. His interposition would of course have thwarted all the plans of Tiberius. The disputes between the two tribunes went on day after day, and Tiberius, though he was by no means in affluent circumstances, offered to indemnify Octavius out of his own purse, for the loss which he might sustain through the agrarian law. This offer was refused with indignation. Tiberius was prevailed upon to refer the matter to the senate; but there he was only abused, and the question did not advance one step further. When the people again met, and Tiberius saw no other way of carrying his measure, he declared that, as two tribunes differed in their opinions upon the public good, and could not come to any understanding, one of them must resign his office. Tiberius suspended the entire administration of government, and under heavy penalties forbade the magistrates to exercise their official authority, until this question was settled. Fear and exasperation increased, and the people looked forward with trembling to the day when the matter was to come to a decision. When the day of the assembly arrived, Tiberius publicly implored Octavius to yield to the wishes of the people, who desired nothing but what they had a right to claim. When this request was also repudiated, Tiberius proceeded to carry his threat into execution, but offered that his own case should be put to the vote first. When all attempts failed, Tiberius proposed the deposition of Octavius, and put it to the vote at once. When seventeen out of the thirty-five tribes had already voted for his deposition, Tiberius stopped the proceedings, and again implored Octavius to desist from his opposition; but Octavius indignantly exclaimed, "Complete what thou hast begun." The eighteenth tribe voted, and the tribuneship of Octavius was gone: he was dragged from the hustings, and with difficulty escaped being murdered on the spot. The deposition of a tribune was a thing unheard of in the history of Rome, and was, accordingly, proclaimed by the opposition as an unconstitutional act. They now triumphed over Gracchus, since he had given them a handle, and by his own act seemed to justify their hostility against him. The deposition of Octavius for the lawful exercise of his rights has been looked upon by both ancient and modern writers as a violation of the laws of the Roman constitution, but its injustice was only of a formal nature, a mere irregularity; and Tiberius, as Niebuhr (Lectures on Rom. Hist. vol. i. p. 333) justly remarks, might have said that a tribune who acted independent of the people was an abuse, and a still greater irregularity; the people surely had the right to take away a commission from a man to whom they had given it; it is an absurdity if in a republic this right is not maintained.

After the removal of Octavius, the agrarian law was carried without opposition, and permanent tribunes were appointed to superintend the measuring of the public land possessed by the wealthy, to deprive them of that which was beyond the amount allowed by the law, and to distribute it among the poor. The persons appointed as triumvirs were Tib. Gracchus, App. Claudius, his father-in-law, and his brother C. Gracchus, who was then little more than twenty years old, and was serving in the camp of P. Scipio at Numantia. Fortune thus seemed to favour the undertakings of Gracchus, and the people evinced a most enthusiastic attachment to him; but the treatment which he experienced in the senate, where P. Scipio Nasica was at the head of the aristocracy, was of a very different kind: he was attacked with contumely and the most unbridled fury. At the same time, one of his intimate friends suddenly died, and his body bore marks of poison. Such things were just so many proofs to Gracchus that it required the greatest precaution not to fall into the hands of some secret assassin. Whenever, therefore, he appeared in public, he was surrounded by a body of friends, who formed a sort of body-guard.

About this time a messenger arrived from Asia, with the will of king Attalus, who had bequeathed his kingdom and his property to the Roman people. Gracchus availed himself of this opportunity for enabling the poor, who were to receive lands, to purchase the necessary implements, cattle and the like; and he accordingly proposed that the money which Attalus had bequeathed to the Romans should be distributed among the people. It is generally stated that this law was carried, but in the Epitome of Livy (lib. 58) we read that he only promised the people to bring forward the bill. His agrarian law had evidently the object of creating an industrious middle class of husbandmen; and, in order to infuse some better blood into them, he is said to have entertained the idea of extending the Roman franchise, by admitting the Italian allies to the full rights of Roman citizens. (Vell. Pat. ii. 2.) The matter certainly appears to have been discussed at the time, but no steps seem to have been taken, though it would have been one of the wisest and most salutary measures that could have been devised. He further abridged the time that Roman citizens had to serve in the armies. Macrobii (Sat. ii. 10) mentions a lex judicaria of Tiberius, but this seems to be only a mistake, the name of Tiberius being there written instead of Caius. Tiberius went even so far as to threaten to deprive the senate of the administration, inasmuch as he declared that the senate had no right to decide upon the towns and cities of the kingdom of Pergamus. Tiberius had thus reached the zenith of his power, but fortune began to turn against him. The opinion of his opponents that he had violated the sacred character of a tribune in the person of Octavius, had gradually spread among the people, which in its short-sightedness could not distinguish between the motives of the two parties, and merely looked for momentary advantages and gratifications. Hence they began not only to show indifference towards their sincere and disinterested protector, but even turned against him. In addition to this, his enemies spread the absurd report that Tiberius had secretly received a diadem and a purple robe from the Pergamian messenger, and that he entertained the thought of making himself king of Rome. This report, which every one must have known to be a mere malicious calumny, was spread abroad by the contemptible Pompeius, with when Scipio Nasica, and other persons of distinction, made common cause.

The period at which the tribunes for the next year were to be elected was now drawing near, and Tiberius himself, as well as his friends, were fully convinced that after the expiration of his office his laws would be abolished, and that his life would be in imminent danger as soon as he should be divested of the sacred office of tribune. He therefore resolved to offer himself as a candidate for the tribuneship of the following year. This was indeed an irregularity, for up to that time no man had ever been invested with the office for two consecutive years; but Tiberius was compelled by necessity, and the duty of self-defence, to offer himself as a candidate. It was unfortunate for him that the election of the tribunes fell in the month of June, when the country-people, on whom he could rely most, were occupied with the harvest in the fields. The people assembled thus consisted, for the most part, of the city populace, who had little or no sympathy with him. His heart was filled with dark apprehensions and misgivings. He went about, leading his little son by the hand, and imploring the people not to desert him, and not to expose him to the fury of his enemies, against whom he had protected them. The tribes began to vote, and two had already declared in favour of Tiberius, when the aristocrats, who were mingled among the people, exclaimed that the election was illegal, and that no man could be elected tribune for two successive years. The presiding tribune, Rubrius, did not know what to do; another tribune offered to take the presidency, but the rest maintained that this could be decided only by lot. Amid such disputes the day passed away, and seeing that his enemies were gaining the upper hand, Tiberius proposed to defer the election till the next day. He now went about with his child, and endeavoured to rouse the people's sympathy. They were moved by his fear and danger; a large crowd gathered around him; they conducted him home, urged him not to despair, and kept watch about his house all night, to protect him against any unforeseen attack. Cheered by this demonstration of the people's favour, he, in conjunction with his friends, devised during the night a plan on which they were to act, if his enemies should use violence.

At daybreak the auspices were consulted, but the signs were unfavourable, and Tiberius was doubtful as to whether he should go to the assembly or not; but his friend Blossius urged him on not to give up his plans for things which perhaps were merely accidental. The people were assembled in the area of the capitol, and many of them came down to invite him and conduct him thither. When he arrived he was received with loud cheers and acclamations, and all promised well; but, when the voting began, the aristocrats did all they could to disturb the proceedings, and the noise and tumult became so great that no one could be heard. At this moment a senator, who was a friend of Gracchus, made his way through the crowd up to him, and informed him that the senators were assembled, and that, as they could not prevail upon the consuls to carry out their commands, they themselves were resolved to kill Tiberius, and had for this purpose armed many of their slaves and partisans. When Tiberius communicated this intelligence to those who stood nearest to him, they immediately prepared to repel force by force. Those who were at a greater distance wanted to know the cause of this sudden commotion, and as Tiberius could not make his voice heard, on account of the tumultuous noise, he pointed with his hand to his head, to indicate that his life was in danger. This act was maliciously interpreted by his enemies as a sign by which he demanded the diadem, and they hastened to inform the senate of it. The senators pretended to be greatly alarmed, and P. Scipio Nasica called upon the consuls to save the republic; but the consuls refused to have recourse to violence. The people, who in the mean time had learned that the life of their tribune was threatened, immediately armed themselves with sticks, the legs of the benches, and any other weapons they could lay hold of, and drove the aristocrats from the assembly. The confusion became general, and the tribunes took to flight. A report was quickly spread that Tiberius had deposed his colleagues, and was going to continue in his office without any election.

This was the moment which the aristocratic party had been anxiously looking for. Scipio Nasica sprang up, and exclaimed, "As the consul betrays the republic, do you who wish to maintain the constitution follow me." The senators rushed towards the assembly from the temple of Fides, where they had held their meeting. The people dispersed in all directions, and all who did not give way to the senators, or ventured to oppose them, were knocked down with clubs and sticks. Tiberius, in endeavouring to escape, fell over the body of a man who was killed, and as he was attempting to rise, he received a blow on his head, and was killed. He fell at the entrance of the temple of Fides, in front of the statues of the kings. The honour of being the murderer of Gracchus was disputed between P. Satureius, one of his own colleagues, and L. Rufus. Upwards of 300 persons were killed on that day by sticks and stones, but none by the sword. In the night following their bodies were thrown into the Tiber, and the surviving friends of Gracchus had to suffer imprisonment, exile, and death, at the hands of their infuriated and merciless opponents.

These, and other calamities which afterwards resulted from the legislation of Tiberius, though it was by no means their cause, might perhaps have been avoided by a little more prudence on the part of Tiberius. We may indeed regret that he did not all he might have done, but we cannot blame him for what he did: his motives were the purest, and he suffered the death of a martyr in the noblest cause that a statesman can embrace—the protection of the poor and oppressed. All the odium that has for many centuries been thrown upon Tiberius and his brother Caius arose partly from party prejudice, and more especially from a misunderstanding of the nature of a Roman agrarian law, which, although it had been pretty clearly explained by Sigonius, was yet never generally recognised till the time of Niebuhr. Velleius Paterculus, who is otherwise biassed against the agrarian law of Gracchus, gives a noble testimony to his character, in these words, "Vita innocentissimus, ingenio florentissimus, proposito sanctissimus, tantis denique adornatus virtutibus, quantas, perfecta et natura et industria, mortalis conditio recipit." (Plut. Vita Tib. Gracchi; Appian, B. C. i. 9—17; Liv. Epit. 58; Vell. Pat. ii. 2, 3;

Dion Cass. Fragm. Peir. 86—88; Oros. v. 8, &c.; Anr. Vict. de Vp. Illustr. 57; and the passages of Cicero which are collected in Orelli's Onomasticon, vol. ii. p. 531, &c.; comp. F. D. 8. C. SEMPRONIUS GRACCHUS, the brother of No. 7, and son of No. 6, was, according to Plutarch, nine years younger than his brother Tiberius, but he enjoyed the same careful education. He was unquestionably a man of greater power and talent than his brother, and had also more opportunity for displaying his abilities; for, while the career of Tiberius lasted scarcely seven months, that of Caius extends over a series of years.

At the time of his brother's murder, in a. c. 133, Caius was in Spain, where he received his first military training in the army of P. Scipio Africanus, who, although his wife was the sister of the Gracchi, exclaimed, on receiving the intelligence of the murder of Tiberius, "So perish all who do the like again!" It was probably in the year after his brother's murder, a. c. 132, that Caius returned with Scipio from Spain. The calamity which had befallen his brother had unnerved him, and an inner voice dissuaded him from taking any part in public affairs. The first time that he spoke in public was on behalf of his friend Vettius, who was under persecution, and whom he defended. On that occasion he is said to have surpassed all the other Roman orators. The people looked forward with great anticipations to his future career, but the aristocracy watched him with jealousy, seeing that he promised greater talent, energy, and passion than his brother, in whose footsteps it was presumed that he would follow. In a. c. 131, C. Papirius Carbo, a friend of the Gracchi, brought forward a bill to enable a person to hold the office of tribune for two or more consecutive years. C. Gracchus supported the bill, but it was rejected. The speech he delivered on that occasion appears again to have made a deep impression upon both parties; but after this time Caius obeyed the calling of his inner voice, and for a number of years kept altogether aloof from public affairs. During that period it was even rumoured that he disapproved of his brother's measures. Some circumstance or other, of which, however, we have no distinct record, seems again to have excited the fears of the optimates, and plans were devised for preventing Caius from obtaining the tribuneship. It is not impossible that this fear of the aristocracy may have been excited by Caius's speech against M. Pennus, which at any rate must have been delivered shortly before his quaestorship, a. c. 126. (Cic. Brut. 28; Fest. s. v. respublica.) Chance seemed to favour the schemes of the optimates, for in a. c. 126 the lot fell upon C. Gracchus to go as quaestor to Sardinia, under the consul L. Aurelius Orestes; and since he was fond of military life, for which he was as well qualified and disciplined as for speaking in public, he was pleased with the opportunity of leaving Rome.

For a time Caius was thus removed from the jealous and envious eyes of the nobles, but in his province he soon attracted the greatest attention; he gained the approbation of his superiors and the attachment of the soldiers. He was brave against the enemy, just towards his inferiors, punctual in the discharge of his duties, and in temperance and frugality he excelled even his elders. His popularity in the province is attested by two occurrences. As the winter in Sardinia had been very severe and unhealthy, and as the soldiers were suffering in consequence, the consul demanded clothing for his men from the allied towns of the island. The towns sent a petition against this demand to the senate at Rome, which thereupon directed the consul to get what he wanted by other means. But as he was unable to do this, Caius went round to the towns, and prevailed upon them voluntarily to supply the army with clothing and other necessities. About the same time ambassadors of king Micipsa arrived at Rome to inform the senate, that out of regard for C. Gracchus, the king would send a supply of corn for the Roman army in Sardinia. These proofs of the great popularity and reputation of Caius were the cause of fresh fear and uneasiness to the optimates. He had now been absent in Sardinia for two years, and his return was dreaded. In order to prevent this, fresh troops were sent to Sardinia to replace the old ones; and Orestes was ordered to remain in the island, it being intended by this measure to keep Caius there also, on account of his office. But he saw through their scheme, and thwarted it. It appears that during the latter period of his stay in Sardinia he had altered his mind, and that his vocation had become closer to him. It is reported that the shade of his brother appeared to him in his dreams, and said, "Caius, why dost thou linger? There is no escape, thou must die, like myself, in defending the rights of the people." It is attested by Cicero and Plutarch that Caius was not a demagogue, and that he was drawn into his political career by a sort of fatality or necessity rather than by his own free will, and that had it not been for the exhortation of his brother's shade, he would never have sought any public office. But when he heard the call of Tiberius, and was at the same time informed of the command issued by the senate respecting Aurelius Orestes, he at once embarked, and appeared at Rome, to the surprise of all parties. The optimates were enraged at this conduct, and even his friends thought it a strange thing for a quaestor to quit the camp without a special leave of absence. He was taken to account before the censors, but he defended himself so ably, and proved so clearly that he had not violated any law or custom, that he was declared perfectly innocent. But his enemies, bent as they were upon destroying all his influence, annoyed him with various other accusations, one of which was, that he had participated in the recent revolt of Fregellae. These prosecutions, however, were nothing but foul and ill-devised schemes to deprive Gracchus of the popular favour: none of the charges was substantiated by evidence, and all of them only served to place his innocence in a more conspicuous light. C. Gracchus, who was thus irritated and provoked by acts of glaring injustice, encouraged by the desire of the people to come forward as their patron, filled with confidence in his own powers and in the justice of the people's demands, and, above all, stimulated by the manes of his murdered brother, at once determined to become a candidate for the tribuneship, and to carry out the plans of his brother. When his mother heard of this resolution, she implored him in the most moving terms to desist from his scheme, and not to deprive her of her last comfort and support in her old age. But it was too late; Caius had already gone too far; his hatred of his brother's murderers, and the enthusiasm of the people, who flocked to Rome from all parts to choose him as the defender of their rights, did not allow him to retrace his steps. The whole of the aristocracy, without exception, opposed his election, but in vain; and all they could effect was that Caius was not elected first, as he had anticipated, but only fourth. Caius, however, as Plutarch remarks, soon made himself first, for he surpassed all his contemporaries in eloquence; and his misfortunes gave him ample scope for speaking freely, when he lamented the death of his brother, to which he resorted as often as an opportunity was offered.

He entered on his tribuneship on the 10th of December, A.C. 123. The first steps he took as a legislator may be regarded as an expiatory sacrifice which he offered to the shade of his brother, for they were directed against his enemies and murderers. The first law he proposed was aimed at the ex-tribune Octavius, and enacted that whoever had been deprived by the people of one office should never be allowed to offer himself again as a candidate for another; the second, which was directed against the murderers of his brother and friends, and more especially against Popilius Laenas, enacted that whoever had put to death or banished a Roman citizen without a trial should be liable to a public prosecution. The former of these bills, however, was withdrawn by Caius at the request of his mother; and Laenas avoided the one aimed at him by voluntary exile.

After these preliminary steps he renewed the agrarian law of his brother, which had not indeed been repealed; but the proper way of carrying it into effect had been prevented and delayed by a variety of disputes, which belong to the period between the death of Tiberius and the tribuneship of Caius. The remaining part of his legislation had two great and distinct objects: first to ameliorate the condition of the poor, and secondly to weaken the power of the senate, and with it that of the aristocracy generally. His plan was most extensive, and embraced nearly every branch of the administration; but the details are very little known, some of his laws being only slightly alluded to; but if we may judge from those of which we have any accounts, we are led to conclude that his legislation was of the wisest and most salutary kind; and that, if his plans had not been thwarted by the blind and greedy aristocracy, the Roman republic might have derived infinite blessings from it. He carried a law enacting that the soldiers should be equipped at the expense of the republic, without any deduction being made on this account from their pay, as had heretofore been done; another law ordained that no person under the age of seventeen should be drafted for the army. A third law enacted that every month corn should be sold at a low and fixed price to the poor. The republic had then to purchase large supplies of grain; and out of the public granaries the people were to receive the bushel (modius) of corn at five-sixths of an as. To carry this law into proper effect, it was necessary to build extensive granaries, which Caius superintended and conducted with the most minute care and unwearied vigilance. The ruins of these extensive public granaries existed at Rome throughout the middle ages, but at present no trace of them is visible. This measure, which may be regarded as a kind of poor-law, has been censured by writers of all ages, because, it is said, it drained the public treasury, because it led the people to idleness and indolence, and because it paved the way for that unruly democracy in which the republic perished. But in the first place, it must be borne in mind, that C. Gracchus did not give away the grain for nothing, but only sold it at so low a price that the poor, with some labour, might be enabled to support themselves and their children; and secondly, that Rome was a republic with immense revenues, which belonged to the sovereign, that is, to the people; and a large class of this sovereign people was suffering from want and destitution. There was no other remedy; the state was obliged to support these poor; and it is, as Niebuhr justly remarks, the duty of a free and proud nation to provide for those members of the community who are unable to provide for themselves.

The power of Caius's oratory was irresistible, and carried victory with it in all he undertook; and on the wings of popular favour he was carried from triumph to triumph. He now resolved to direct the weapons he had hitherto wielded on behalf of the poor against the power of the senate, which had excited his indignation by systematically opposing and disturbing his proceedings with the people. Hitherto the judges in the case of judicia publica had been elected from and by the senators; and these judges being generally men of the same class as those who were brought before them to be tried, they had outraged justice in every possible way; the governors of provinces extorted money not only to enrich themselves, but also to bribe their judges, who made their function a lucrative traffic. Caius now carried a law by which the judicia publica were transferred from the senate to a court consisting of 300 equites. We have three different descriptions of the enactments of this law; but Manutius (de Leg. Rom. 15) has made it highly probable that two of them refer only to two different conciliatory proposals, and that as they were rejected, the law, as stated above, was the final result. This law on the one hand inflicted a severe blow upon the power of the senate, and on the other it raised the equites, who formed a wealthy class of citizens between the nobility and the poor, as a powerful counterpoise to the senate. It may be questioned whether the rivalry which was thus created between the senate and the equites was salutary in its consequences or not; but thus much is certain, that the equites soon discovered as many motives for a bad administration of justice as the senators had had before. It is said that in the discussions upon this law, Gracchus, while addressing the people, turned his face towards the forum, whereas all orators before that time had turned their faces towards the senate and the comitium. Another constitutional measure was likewise directed against the arbitrary proceedings of the senate, though it was not felt as keenly as the former. Hitherto the senate had assigned the provinces to the consuls and praetors after their election, and thus had it in its power to gratify this or that person's wish, by assigning to him the province which he particularly desired, and from which he hoped to derive most advantage or honour. Gracchus remedied this evil by a law enacting that the provinces into which consuls or praetors were to be sent should be determined upon previous to the election of those magistrates. The province of Asia, which had for many years been left unsettled, and had thus given to the governors ample scope for plunder and extortion, received at length a regular organisation, for which it is indebted to C. Gracchus. In all his measures relating to the administration he took great care of the interests of the republic; and although he acted with justice towards the provincials and the people, to whom lands were assigned, yet he always tried to secure to the republic her revenues. For the purpose of facilitating the commerce and intercourse between the several parts of Italy, and at the same time giving assistance and employment to the poor, he made new roads in all directions, and repaired the old ones; milestones also were erected throughout Italy. Notwithstanding his great and numerous undertakings, he conducted and superintended everything himself, and each particular point was managed with a care and strictness as if he had nothing else to engage his attention. His skill and tact in his intercourse with persons of all classes with whom he was thus brought into connexion, and his talent for winning their affections, excited the admiration of every one. His favour with the people far and near, as well as with the equites, thus rose to the utmost height.

While things were thus in the most prosperous progress, and shortly before the election of the consuls for the next year took place, he once told the people that he was going to ask them a favour, which he would value above every thing, if they granted it; but he added, that he would not complain if they refused it. The people gladly promised to do anything he might desire; and every one believed that he was going to ask for the consulship: but on the day of the consular election, Gracchus conducted his friend C. Fannius into the assembly, and canvassed with his friends for him. Fannius was accordingly elected consul in preference to Opimius, who had likewise offered himself as a candidate. C. Gracchus himself was elected tribune for the next year (B.C. 122) also, although he had not asked for it. M. Fulvius Flaccus, a friend of Caius, who had been consul in B.C. 125, had caused himself to be elected tribune, for the purpose of being able to give his support to one important measure which Caius had in contemplation, viz. that of extending the Roman franchise. The plan was to grant the Roman franchise to all the Latins, and to make the Italian allies step into the relation in which the Latins had stood until then. This measure, though it was the wisest and most salutary that could have been devised, was looked forward to by the senate with the greatest uneasiness and alarm. The Latins and Italian allies had for some time been aspiring to the privilege of the Roman franchise; and Fregellæ, being disappointed in its expectations, had revolted, but had been destroyed by the prætor Opimius. But it is uncertain whether Gracchus did actually bring forward a bill about the extension of the franchise, or whether he merely contemplated to do so. The senate, instead of endeavouring to allay the ill feelings of those who thought that a right was withheld from them, provoked them still more by an edict forbidding any one who was not a Roman citizen to stay in the city or its vicinity so long as the discussions on the bills of C. Gracchus were going on. At the same time the senate had recourse to the meanest and most contemptible stratagem to check Caius in the progress of his excellent legislation. The course which the aristocrats now began to pursue shows most clearly that the good of the republic was not the thing for which they were struggling, and that they looked upon it merely as a contest for power and wealth; they cared little or nothing about the demoralisation of the people, or the ruin of the republic, so long as they could but preserve their power undiminished.

Among the colleagues of C. Gracchus was M. Livius Drusus, a man of rank, wealth, and eloquence; he was gained over by the senatorial party, and under their directions, and with their sanction, he endeavoured to outbid Caius in the proposal of popular measures. He acted the part of a real demagogue, for the purpose of supplanting the sincere friend of the people; and the people, who at all times prize momentary gain more than solid advantages, which work slowly and almost imperceptibly, allowed themselves to be duped by the treacherous agent of the aristocracy. Drusus proposed a series of measures which were of a far more democratic nature than those of Caius. Caius had proposed the establishment of two colonies at Tarentum and Capua, consisting of citizens of good and respectable character; but Drusus proposed the establishment of twelve colonies, each of which was to consist of 3000 needy Roman citizens. Caius had left the public land distributed among the poor, subject to a yearly payment to the treasury: Drusus abolished even this payment, and thus deprived the state of a large portion of its revenue. Gracchus contemplated granting the franchise to the Latins, but Drusus brought forward a measure that the Latins should be exempt from corporal punishment even while they served in the armies. The people thus imposed upon by Drusus, who assured them that the senate sanctioned his measures from no other desire than that of serving the poor citizens, gradually became reconciled to the senate; and the recollection of past sufferings was effaced by hypocritical assurances and demagogic tricks. Another means by which Drusus insinuated himself into the people's confidence was, that he asked no favour for himself, and took no part in carrying his laws into effect, which he left entirely to others; while Caius, with the most unwearied activity, superintended and conducted every thing in person. In proportion as the ill feeling between the people and the senate abated, the popularity of Caius decreased, and his position between the two became more and more perilous. Gracchus had proposed the establishment of a colony on the ruins of Carthage, and he himself was appointed one of the triumvirs to conduct the colonists. He settled every thing in Africa with the utmost rapidity; and after an absence of seventy days, he returned to Rome, shortly before the time at which the consuls for the next year were to be elected. Drusus had availed himself of the absence of Caius for making various attacks on his party and his friends, especially on Fulvius Flaccus, who began openly to stir up the Italian allies to demand the Roman franchise. It was in vain that Caius, after his return, endeavoured to restore what his enemies and his sanguine and passionate friend had destroyed. Fannius, who had obtained the consulship through the influence of Caius, had soon after treated him with indifference, and in the end even made common cause with his enemies. Opimius, who had never forgiven Caius for having procured the election of Fannius to the consulship, which he himself had coveted, now offered himself again as a candidate for that office; and it was generally reported that he was determined to abolish the laws of C. Gracchus. The latter had endeavoured to obtain the tribuneship for the third time, but in vain, either because he had really lost the popular favour through the intrigues of Drusus, or because his colleagues, whom he had offended by some arrangements during the public games in favour of the people, acted illegally and fraudulently in the proclamation and return of the votes. How much Caius had lost confidence in himself as well as in his supporters is clear from the following circumstance. By the command of the senate, and in pursuance of the above-mentioned edict, the consul Fannius drove out of the city all those who were not Roman citizens; and Caius, although he had promised them his assistance, if they would defy the edict and remain at Rome, yet allowed persons of his own acquaintance to be dragged off before his eyes by the lictors of the consul, without venturing to help them. The object of Gracchus undoubtedly was to avoid violence and prevent civil bloodshed, in order that his enemies might not obtain any just ground for attacking him, which was, in fact, the very thing they were looking for. But the people, who were unable to appreciate such motives, looked upon his forbearance as an act of cowardice.

The year of his second tribuneship, B.C. 122, thus came to its close. After Opimius had entered on his consulship, the senate, which had hitherto acted rather on the defensive, and opposed Gracchus with intrigues, contrived to lead Caius into wrong steps, that he might thus prepare his own ruin. His enemies began to repeal several of his enactments. The subject of the colony of Carthage was discussed afresh merely to provoke Gracchus, who, in establishing the colony, had disregarded the curse pronounced by P. Scipio upon the site of Carthage, and had increased the number of colonists to 6000. This and various other annoyances, which still more estranged the people from him, he endured for a time with forbearance and without making any resistance, probably because he did not believe that his legislation could be really upset. But as the movements of the hostile faction became more and more threatening, he could no longer resist the entreaties of Fulvius Flaccus, and even more he resolved to rally his friends around him, and take an active part in the public assembly. A day was appointed to decide upon the colony of Carthage, or, according to Plutarch, to abolish the laws of Caius. A number of country people flocked to Rome to support Caius and his friends; and it was said that they had been sent by his mother, Cornelia. Flaccus with his friends occupied the capitol early in the morning, and was already haranguing the people, when Caius arrived with his followers. But he was irresolute and desponding, and had a presentiment that blood would be shed. He took no part in the proceedings, and in silence he walked up and down under an arcade, watching the course of events. A common man of the name of Antyllus there approached him, touched his shoulder, and bade him spare his country. Caius, who was taken by surprise, gazed at the man as if he had suddenly been charged with a crime of which he could not deny his guilt. Some one of Caius's friends took this look for a significant hint, and slaw Antyllus on the spot. According to Plutarch, Antyllus was one of the attendants of the consul Opimius, and while carrying a sacrifice through the arcade, insolently provoked the anger of the bystanders by calling out, "Make way for honest men, you rascals!" But however this may be, Gracchus took no part in the proceedings on that morning, and the murder of Antyllus was committed wholly against his wish. It produced the greatest alarm and consternation, and Caius was deeply grieved, for he saw at once that it injured his party, and served to promote the hostile schemes of his enemies. He therefore immediately descended to the forum, to allay the terror and explain the unfortunate occurrence; but nobody would listen to him, and he was shunned by everybody as if he had been an accursed man. The assembly broke up, the people dispersed, and Gracchus and Fulvius Flaccus, lamenting the event, returned home, accompanied each by a number of friends. Opimius, on the other hand, who had now got the opportunity he wanted, triumphed and urged the people to avenge the murder. The next day he convoked the senate, while large crowds of the people were assembled in the forum. He garrisoned the capitol, and with his suite he himself occupied the temple of Castor and Pollux, which commanded the view of the forum. At his command the body of Antyllus was carried across the forum with loud wailings and lamentations, and was deposited in front of the senate-house. All this was only a tragic farce to excite the feelings of the people against the murderer and his party. When Opimius thought the minds of the people sufficiently excited, he himself entered the senate, and by a declamatory exposition of the fearful crime that had been committed, he prevailed upon the senate to confer on himself unlimited power to act as he thought best for the good of the republic. By virtue of this power, Opimius ordered the senate to meet again the next day in arms, and each eques was commanded to bring with him two armed slaves. Civil war was thus declared. These decrees, framed as they were with apparent calmness, for the purpose of clothing the spirit of party vengeance in the forms of legal proceedings, completely paralysed the mass of the people. That the equites, who as an order had been raised so much by Gracchus, deserted him in the hour of danger, is accountable only by the cowardice which is always displayed on such occasions by capitalists. On the second day Gracchus had been in the forum, but he had left the assembly, and as he went home he was seen stopping before the statue of his father; he did not utter a word, but at last he sighed deeply, burst into tears, and then returned home. A large multitude of people, who seemed to feel the silent reproach of their ingratitude and cowardice, followed him to his house, and kept watch there all night.

Fulvius Flaccus, who had been filled with rage and indignation at the decree of the senate and the conduct of Opimius, called on his friends to arm themselves, and with them he spent the night in drinking and rioting. On the morning he was with difficulty roused from his drunken sleep to give the necessary orders, and organise his men for resistance. Amid shouts he and his band seized on the Aventine, where they took up a strong position, in the hope of thus compelling the senate to yield. Caius refused to arm: he left his house
